Baylis argued for the appellant.—The effect of the case and the amendment is that it must be assumed that neither the appellant nor his servant had any knowledge that alum was in this bread, and the question is whether the appellant can be convicted of using alum without this knowledge on the part of either of them. Sect. 8 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, enacts that "No baker or other person or persons who shall make bread for sale beyond the limits aforesaid, nor any journeyman or other servant of any such baker or other person, shall at any time or times, in the making of bread for sale beyond such limits, use any mixture or ingredient whatsoever, in the making of such bread, other than and except as hereinbefore mentioned, on any account, or under any colour or pretence whatsoever, upon pain that every such person, whether master or journeyman, servant or other person, who shall offend in the premises, and shall be convicted of any such offence by the oath, or in case of a quaker by affirmation, of one or more credible witness or witnesses, or by his, her, or their own confession, shall for every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 10*l.*, nor less than 5*l.*, or in default thereof shall, by warrant under the hands and seal of the magistrate or magistrates, justice or justices, before whom such offender shall be convicted, be apprehended and committed to the house of correction, or some prison of the city, county, borough, or place where the offence shall have been committed, or the offender or offenders shall be apprehended, there to remain for any time not exceeding six calendar months, with or without hard labour, from the time of such commitment, unless the penalty shall be sooner paid, as any such magistrate or magistrates, justice or justices, shall think fit and order; and it shall be lawful for the magistrate or magistrates, justice or justices, before whom any such offender or offenders shall be convicted, to cause the offender's name, place of abode and office, to be published in some newspaper which shall be printed or published in or near the city, county, borough, or place where the offence shall have been committed, and to defray the expense of publishing the same out of the money to be forfeited as last mentioned, in case any shall be so forfeited, paid, or recovered." This publication is a punishment for something which the Legislature clearly intended to be considered as disgraceful, and although the word "knowingly" is not employed as in the 9th section with respect to selling, the word "use" must be taken to imply with intention. [LUSH, J.—Sect. 13 contemplates a master being punished for the act of his servant.] But it does not, therefore, follow that he should be liable for what was done in the ignorance of both of them. The baker may be liable under sects. 11 and 12 for having ingredients for adulteration on his premises without his knowledge, but the Legislature probably intended to distinguish such a proceeding from that of the innocent use of a mixture supplied to him by other people.

J. Edwards, for the respondent.—There is nothing in the words of the section to render proof of the baker's intention necessary to justify his being convicted for using adulterated flour. This and the other Acts concerning bakehouses and bread were passed to protect the public from imposition by that particular trade, and the Legislature has rendered it compulsory upon the bakers to exercise care in the use of their materials. It is for neglect of that duty the appellant has been convicted.

Baylis was not heard in reply.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that this conviction must be quashed. The question for our consideration depends upon the intention of the Legislature in imposing a penalty upon a baker for using a forbidden mixture or ingredient in his bread, according to the 8th section of this Act. By the following section a penalty is imposed upon any person who shall "knowingly sell or offer, or expose for sale, either separately or mixed, any meal or flour of one sort of corn or grain as the meal or flour of any other sort of corn or grain, or any ingredient whatsoever mixed with the meal or flour so sold or offered or exposed for sale." I think these two sections must be taken together; and, so taking them, the user of the 8th section must be with a guilty knowledge to justify a conviction. Sect. 13 gives a remedy to a master against his servant for any wilful act of the servant by which the master may be brought within the provisions of the statute; but I do not think it was contemplated that a baker should be convicted, when both he and his servants were innocent of any intention to use these ingredients. The magistrates have here acquitted the appellant of guilty knowledge, and they seem to me to have also acquitted the servant.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the meaning of the 8th section is, that if a baker uses alum or any other adulterating ingredient, and knows that he is using it, or, if he uses it and his servant is aware of it, he or his servant may be convicted; but if there be an utter absence of knowledge on the part of both the baker and his servant, neither of them can be said to use the ingredient so as to render him liable to the penalties imposed. I think a baker cannot be answerable for what may be an accident or the fault of someone over whom he has no control. I am the more inclined to adopt this view in consequence of the provisions alluded to by my brother Lush concerning a master's liability for his servant's acts, and his remedy against his servant; and also in consequence of the penalty of publication imposed upon a breach of this 8th section, which goes far to show that the Legislature contemplated it as something disgraceful.

The appellant was owner in fee of land within the district of the Metropolitan Building Acts, of which he agreed, in Feb. 1870, to give to one Loud, a builder, a lease, from Sept. 1865, for ninety-nine years, at a peppercorn rent, until June 1870, and at 28*l. a year afterwards. The lease was to be made as soon as certain houses to be built by Loud were covered in, which it was agreed should be done by March 1870. On the 26*th Oct.* 1870 the respondent, the district surveyor, sent to Loud his proper bill for fees under sect. 51 of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122). These fees were not paid, and Loud became insolvent. The respondent, in March 1871, delivered his bill for fees to the appellant, as owner, and upon his refusal to pay, obtained a summary conviction against him for the amount.

Held, upon a case stated by the magistrate, that the appellant was not owner of the buildings so erected within the meaning of that section at the time the respondent's fees became due.

THIS was a case stated by one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the Wandsworth police court, in the county of Surrey, and within the metropolitan police district, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with his determination upon the question of law which arose before him, as hereinafter stated, on the 3rd May 1871, at the Wandsworth police court aforesaid, the appellant having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the appellant.

Upon the hearing of a certain complaint preferred by the respondent, the district surveyor for the district of North Battersea, in the county of Surrey, within the said metropolitan police district, against the appellant, under sect. 51 of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122 (the Metropolitan Buildings Act 1855), for that the appellant did unlawfully neglect and refuse to pay to the respondent the sum of 8*l.* 10*s.*, due to the respondent by the appellant, for the respondent's fees in respect of certain buildings, of which the appellant was owner, within the respondent's said district; a proper bill, specifying the amount of the same, having been duly delivered to the appellant.

The magistrate ordered the appellant to pay to the respondent the said sum of 8*l.* 10*s.*

The following facts were either proved or admitted by both parties:

The appellant is, and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned, seised in fee of an estate within the parish of St. Mary, Battersea, in the county of Surrey, called the Clapham Junction Estate, which he has laid out for building purposes.

The defendant is, and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned the district surveyor for the district of North Battersea, in the said county of Surrey, within which district the said Clapham Junction Estate is situate.

By an agreement dated the 18th Feb. 1870, made between the appellant of the one part and one James Loud of the other part, the appellant, in consideration of the rents, covenants, and agreements thereinafter agreed to be paid and performed, agreed with Loud that when and so soon as he, Loud, should have erected and covered in with slates or tiles the messuage, tenement and outbuildings upon each of the several plots of ground thereinafter described to the satisfaction of the appellant's surveyor for the time being, he, the appellant would demise by separate leases, as thereinafter mentioned, unto Loud or his nominee or nominees four several plots of ground situate on the south side of Livingstone-road, being portions of the said Clapham Junction Estate, delineated in the plan of the said estate and numbered 107, 313, 314, 315; and also the four several messuages or tenements and outbuildings to be erected and built thereon by Loud for the term of 99 years from the 29th Sept. 1865, at the rent of a peppercorn, until the 24th June 1870, and from thence at the yearly rent of 28*l.* during the remainder of the said term, clear of all taxes except property tax. Loud thereby also agreed that he would at his own cost, under the inspection and to the satisfaction of the appellant's surveyor, erect and build upon each of the said several plots of land a good and substantial messuage or tenement, with out-offices, to be severally erected and roofed in by the 25th March 1870, and completely finished fit for habitation by the 24th June, 1870. The said agreement contained all usual clauses, and is to be taken as forming part of this case for reference if necessary.

Shortly after the date of the said agreement, Loud commenced the erection of the said four houses, and proceeded therewith, but the same were not completed within the time provided by the said agreement, and the appellant extended the time for such completion from time to time.

The said houses were roofed in, in or about the month of Sept. 1870. The same were duly surveyed by the respondent, who delivered to Loud on or about the 26th Oct. 1870, being one clear month after the roofs of the said four buildings respectively had been covered in, a proper bill specifying the amount of his fees in that behalf, amounting to 8*l.* 10*s.*, for surveying the same, pursuant to the statute: but Loud did not pay the same, or any part thereof, and subsequently effected an arrangement with his creditors under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

On or about the 6th March 1871, the respondent duly delivered to the appellant, as the alleged owner of the said four houses, a proper bill, specifying the amount of his fees for surveying the same, which fees the appellant refused to pay.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that Loud was the owner of the buildings so erected by him, and in respect of which the respondent's fees were incurred, within the meaning of the statute, and that the appellant was not the owner.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the appellant was in the receipt of the rent and profits of the said buildings at the time when the respondent's services were performed, and that he was the owner thereof within the meaning of the statute, so as to be liable to the payment of the respondent's fees in respect thereof.

The magistrate, being of opinion that the respondent's contention was right, gave his determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law upon which the case is stated for the opinion of the court therefore is, whether the appellant was the owner of the buildings in respect of which the respondent's fees were incurred, within the meaning of sects. 3 and 51 of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855.

If the court should be of opinion that the appellant is liable to pay such fees as aforesaid, then the said order is to stand; but if the court should be of the contrary opinion, then the said order is to be set aside, and the said complaint is to be dismissed.

Waddy argued for the appellant.—By the interpretation clause, sect. 3, of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), the word "owner" shall apply to every person in possession or receipt either of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement, or in the occupation of such land or tenement other than as a tenant from year to year or for any less term, or as a tenant at will. And by sect. 51, at the expiration "of one month after the roof of any building surveyed by any district surveyor under this Act has been covered in, the district surveyor shall be entitled to receive the amount of fees due to him from the builder employed in erecting such building, or in doing such work, or in doing any matter in respect of which any special service has been performed by the surveyor, or from the owner or occupier of the building so erected or in respect of which such work has been done or service performed; and if any such builder, owner, or occupier refuses to pay the same, such fees may be recovered in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, upon its being shown to the satisfaction of such justice that a proper bill specifying the amount of such fees was delivered to such builder, owner, or occupier, or sent to him in a registered letter addressed to his last known residence." It was held in Tubb v. Good (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 443; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 885) that "owner" in this section meant owner for the time being when the fees became due. It appears from the case that these houses were roofed in before the 26th Sept. 1870, and it was not until the 29th of that month that the appellant was entitled to anything more than a peppercorn rent. The case of Evelyn v. Whichcord (E. B. & E. 126) decided that under this section an owner of land in fee simple who lets it on a building lease at a peppercorn rent is not liable as owner to the surveyor for fees in respect of buildings afterwards erected on such land, a peppercorn rent not being within the meaning of the words "of the whole or of any part of the rents or profits of any land or tenement" in the interpretation clause, sect. 3. Loud was clearly not only the builder but the owner, popularly speaking, of the house. The general words in the interpretation clause are qualified by the particular words in the section. Where a section in the Act deals only with buildings, and does not refer in any way to land, the word "owner," if used in it, must be limited in its application to buildings only. [HANNEN, J.—There is nothing in the case to show that the surveyor's work was done before the 29th Sept.; although he cannot recover his fees until a month after a house is roofed in, he may, it seems, survey the house the day before he sends his proper bill. LUSH, J.—The surveyor's duty is to the public, and he has to inspect all buildings throughout their construction: sect. 39.]

W. B. Cooper for the respondent.—I admit that if a lease had been granted to Lond before the building works commenced, the builder would, upon the authority of Tubb v. Good, have been the only person who could have been made liable. Here, however, there is nothing but an agreement for a lease upon a condition which the case finds has not been fulfilled. It is not right that the surveyor should have to consider the equities between the parties. The only question is, who was the legal owner? Loud certainly is not and never was. [LUSH J.—It may be that the interpretation clause meant that the "owner" should be the person who was entitled to receive rents and profits, and not necessarily the person who had the legal title.] The appellant being owner of the land was also owner of the houses upon it: in any case, even under the agreement, he was entitled to rent on the 29th September, and it was not until the respondent could deliver his bill that he was entitled to receive his fees.

Waddy was heard in reply.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to our judgment. I think he was not at the time when these fees became due the owner "of the building so erected, or in respect of which such work has been done or service performed," according to the words of the 51st section. Notwithstanding the extended meaning of owner in the interpretation clause, I think here it is intended to carry with it merely the popular sense. The statute never intended that the surveyor should enter upon an investigation into the title of the land, but that he should have his claim against the person who would be popularly called the owner of the buildings. The interpretation clause seems to exclude with respect to the whole Act the limitation of the word to a mere legal owner; it relates to the person who would be entitled to the rent from an occupier. Loud was, at the time these fees were due to the respondent, the builder, and the owner of the buildings, and he was the only person upon whom the surveyor had any claim.

HANNEN, J.—I think the case is not free from difficulty, but on the whole I agree with my brother Lush.

Expenses of works executed by a local board of health—Recovery against owner in a summary manner—Private improvement expenses—Public Health Act 1848—Local Government Acts 1858 and 1861.

By the Public Health Act 1848, ss. 69 and 90, a local board of health may, under certain circumstances, execute works in a street, not a highway, and recover the expenses from the owners of houses in the street in a summary manner; or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such from the occupiers of the said houses by a private improvement rate. Held, upon a case stated, that the magistrates' order was invalid. The court, without expressing an opinion as to the period to which a board is limited for the purpose of declaring expenses to be for private improvements, when no demand has been previously made, considered that the respondents could not avail themselves, as they had here attempted to do, of both the alternative modes of proceeding against the appellant, of which the Public Health Act 1848 gave them the option.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the borough of Bolton, in the county of Lancaster, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for purpose of obtaining the opinion of this court on the questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Bolton aforesaid, in and for the said borough, on the 25th Feb. 1871, the above named appellant appeared in obedience to a summons duly served upon him in that behalf, the offence alleged in which said summons was in the words and figures following, that is to say,

"Borough of Bolton, in the county of Lancaster, to wit. To Nathaniel Wilson, of Little Bolton, in the said borough and county, gentleman. Whereas complaint hath this day been made before the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the said borough, for that you, the said Nathaniel Wilson, being now and at the time of the serving of the notice in writing next hereinafter mentioned, the owner of certain premises fronting, adjoining, and abutting upon a certain street to wit, Markland-street, in Great Bolton, in the borough of Bolton aforesaid, the same not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, after notice in writing from the town clerk of the said borough, on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the said borough, being (by the council of the said borough) the local board of health for Bolton aforesaid in that behalf, dated 3rd July 1858, had been served upon you, requiring you to execute before the 1st Sept. then next the works therein indicated, did not within the time specified in such notice comply therewith by sewering, levelling, paving, flagging, and channelling such part of the said street as fronted, adjoined, and abutted respectively upon the said premises, but therein made default; and that upon such default the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of such local board of health, as aforesaid, executed the works mentioned and referred to in such notice, and that the surveyor of the said borough afterwards duly settled the amount of your proportion of the expenses incurred by the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, as such local board of health as aforesaid, to be the sum of 13*l.* 6*s.* 8d.: and that the said sum of 13*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* has been since declared by order of the said local board of health payable by annual instalments of 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, during a period not exceeding thirty years, until the whole amount shall have been paid. And that the sum of 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, one of such instalments as aforesaid, was, on the 15th of Sept. 1870, and still is due and unpaid from you as such owner of the said premises as aforesaid, notwithstanding notice of demand thereof was duly served upon you on the 12th Jan. last, contrary to the form of the statutes in such case made and provided."

The justices heard the evidence tendered on behalf of the respondents, and the arguments of the attorney for the appellant, and upon such hearing the appellant was ordered to pay to the respondents the sum of 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, being the first instalment in the said summons mentioned, together with the respondents' costs in that behalf. The appellant being dissatisfied with the said determination upon the hearing of the said summons as being erroneous in point of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied for a case and entered into a recognizance, as required by the said statute in that behalf.

The said justices in compliance with the said application, and the provisions of the said statute, stated and signed the following case:—

The respondents are (by the council of the said borough) the local board of health for the district of the borough of Bolton in the county of Lancaster.

The appellant was in the year 1857, and hath since continued the owner, within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1848, of certain premises abutting upon a private street, within the district aforesaid, called Markland-street.

The respondents alleged that the said street, not being sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the respondents, they, as such local board of health and in force of the Public Health Act 1848, s. 69, gave the appellant and other owners notice in that behalf that the board required them to do such sewering and other works before the 1st Sept. then next.

The magistrate found as facts that such notice was duly served upon the appellant in July 1858, that he made default, that the respondents executed the works, and that the surveyor duly apportioned the costs of such execution among the respective owners, including therein the amount of the appellant's proportion thereof, which was in the whole the sum of 13*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

The works were completed by the respondents on the 30th Nov. 1860, and the apportionment on 21st Jan. 1861, and on the last mentioned day the respondents delivered to the appellant an account of his proportion of the said costs, which account was in the words and figures following:

Treasurer's Office, Acre's-field, Bolton, 21st Jan. 1861.
Mr. Nathaniel Wilson, St. George's-road, to the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Bolton.

Notice,—Unless the amount of this account is paid within fourteen days after delivery, interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum will be charged thereon until fully liquidated.

Markland-street.

1860, Nov. 30th.—To proportion of sewering, levelling, paving, flagging, and channelling, viz., 50ft. frontage, at 5*s.* 4*d.* £13 6 8

On the 25th July 1870, the said local board of health resolved and declared that the said amount of 13*l.* 6s. 8d. should be private improvement expenses.

On the 4th Sep. 1870, the respondents, at a meeting of the council, as such local board, under the 23rd section of the Local Government Act 1861, declared that the said expenses should be paid by annual instalments of 6*l.* 13s. 4d.,, with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per centum per annum; the first payable on the 15th Sept. 1870, and the last on the 15th Sept. 1871.

On the 12th Jan. 1871, the respondents caused a demand in writing to be served upon the appellant, requiring him to pay 6*l.* 13s. 4d., the amount of the said first instalment of the said expenses, within fourteen days of such notice.

On the expiration of the said fourteen days, the respondents caused application for the payment of the said 6*l.* 13s. 4d. to be made to the appellant, but he refused to pay, and the respondents then procured the summons hereinbefore set forth to be issued and served.

On the hearing of the said summons it was objected by the attorney for the appellant that, as the works had been completed and the apportionment made so long ago as the years 1860 and 1861, the lapse of time prevented the respondents from now recovering the amount, inasmuch as the 11th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, deprived the justices of jurisdiction after the expiration of six calendar months from the date of apportionment of the expenses, being the time when the matter of complaint arose; and he also contended that as, if the amount had been sought to be recovered in a summary way, proceedings must have been commenced within six months of the cause of complaint arising, so a similar limitation must be held to apply where, under the same section, the local board elected to treat the amount as private improvement expenses.

The said appellant, by his attorney, also objected that the statutes of limitation would also be a bar to the recovery of this claim.

Considering that it was competent to the said board to declare the aforesaid expenses private improvement expenses on the 20th Aug. 1870, and that the Statute of Limitations did not apply, the justices overruled both these objections, and made an order for payment by the appellant to the respondents of 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, the amount of the said first instalment. Subject, however, to the opinion of this court as to whether such judgment was thereby erroneous in point of law on any of the grounds hereinafter stated.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, whether it was competent to the said local board on the 25th Aug. 1870, to declare the said expenses private improvement expenses, although the works were completed in the year 1860; whether the justices were bound to dismiss the said complaint on the ground of the Statute of Limitations barring the said claim.

Baylis argued for the appellant.—The Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) s. 69, enacts "That in case any present or future street or any part thereof (not being a highway), be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled, to the satisfaction of the local board of health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered levelled, paved, flagged, or channelled, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, or channel the same within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or in case of dispute as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case) in the manner provided for by this Act; and such expenses may be recovered from the last-mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided." The local board may adopt either of these two modes of enforcing their claim; if, however, they exercise their option to proceed in a summary manner (according to sect. 129), as I contend they have done here, their proceedings must be subject to Jervis's Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), which provides, by sect. 11, that "In all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parts relating to each particular case, such aint shall be made, and such information e laid, within six calendar months from the hen the matter of such complaint or infor n respectively arose." It has been held, in b v. Dodgson (3 B. & S. 461), that as the has, by the Local Government Act 1858 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 63), a right to dispute pportionment during three months after of the amount settled upon him by the or, the board may, within six months from piration of the said three months, take pro- gs before justices for the recovery of the it. The notice of the proportion settled the appellant was given on the 3rd July and the summons was issued in Feb. 1871; r, therefore, even with the extra three s allowed by the Act of 1858, the board proceed summarily. Again, with respect other alternative mode of proceeding at option, viz., by order declaring the expenses private improvement expenses, sect. 90 of t of 1848 enacts, "That whenever the local of health have incurred or become liable for penses which by this Act are, or by the said oard shall be declared to be, private improve- expenses, the said local board may if they think fit, make and levy upon the occupier premises in respect of which the expenses ave been incurred, except in the cases here- provided, in addition to all other rates, a r rates, to be called private improvement of such amount as will be sufficient to rge such expenses, together with interest n at a rate not exceeding 5*l.* in the hundred, h period not exceeding thirty years, as the cal board shall in each case determine." ection clearly requires that a rate should be and according to the case there has been no Further, in sect. 62 of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, t proviso is, "In all summary proceedings local board for the recovery of expenses ed by them in works of private improve- the time within which such proceedings e taken shall be reckoned from the date service of notice of demand." Even, re, if these are private improvement ex- , the respondents ought to have taken out mmons at the latest within nine months of mand of the 21st Jan. 1861. [Stopped by rt.]

dwards for the respondents.—I admit that no s been made, but by the Local Government lment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 61), s. 23, "The es which have been incurred by any local of health as and for private improvement es under the Public Health Act 1848, as e expenses stated in the 62nd section of the Government Act 1858, to be a charge upon emises, with interest after the rate of 5 per er annum, may by order of the local board lth be declared payable by annual instal- with interest after the rate aforesaid during od not exceeding thirty years, until the amount be paid; and any such instalments terest, or any part thereof, may be recovered e owner or occupier of such premises in the anner as general district rates, and may be ed from the rent of such premises in the roportions as are allowed in the case of improvement rates under the 91st section Public Health Act 1848." On the 25th Aug. 1870 the board declared these to be private improvement expenses, and by this section they can now proceed as if they had made a rate. [LUSH, J.—The matter of complaint, as the board originally considered it, arose three months after the notice of the 21st Jan. 1861; and the question is whether, after the expiration of six months from that time, during which they might have proceeded summarily, they could change the nature of the claim, and by calling it something different from that which they had originally considered it, adopt another plan for collecting it. It would be a grievous wrong, in the case of a change of owners, if the board could thus saddle a new owner with charges they had neglected to collect from his predecessors.] The case does not state whether these proceedings were intended to be according to the provisions for recovery in a summary manner, or whether they were an application for a warrant under the 23rd section of the Act of 1861, as if a rate had been made. Now this notice of the 21st Jan. 1861 was not a demand at all; it was merely a notice to enable the owner to dispute the apportionment, and cannot be said to be the time from which the period of limitation was to be counted, according to sect. 62 of the Act of 1858. Besides, under the Act of 1861 these expenses may be recovered in the same manner as general district rates, and it has been held that Jervis's Act does not apply to rates. [LUSH, J.—What have you to say, Mr. Baylis, with regard to this 23rd section of the Act of 1861?]

Baylis in reply.—The intention of the Legislature appears to have been that a board of health might recover by either of the two alternatives given in the 69th section of the Act of 1848. I say they have here adopted one of these modes of proceeding, and have dropped it; they cannot now go back and begin with the other. [Stopped by the court.]

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to our judgment. These works were completed in the year 1860; and on the 21st Jan. 1861, a notice, which is set out in the case, was delivered to the appellant. It is now contended by the respondents that this notice did not constitute a demand for payment, but it is on the face of it a notice that interest will be charged unless the amount there mentioned is paid, and it states that the amount is the appellant's proportion of the expenses incurred by the board the year before. I certainly consider the document to be such a demand as that provided for in sect. 62 of the Act of 1858. No payment was made upon that demand, and no further proceedings were taken in the matter until the order was made by the corporation on the 25th Aug. 1870, that the amount they claimed from the appellant should be private improvement expenses. By the 69th section of the Act of 1848, the board had the option in 1861 either of proceeding summarily, or of making an order declaring this amount to be private improvement expenses; in the latter case, according to sect. 90 the board may levy the expenses by a rate upon the occupiers, part of which, by the following section, the occupiers may deduct from their rent. The Act of 1861, by sect. 23, seems to dispense with a rate, and the question is, as there was no rate here, at what time were the respondents bound to exercise their option? It is not necessary to say how they might have been limited, if no demand had been made upon the owner. Here there was a demand of payment on the 21st Jan. 1861, and according to Jervis's Act and the 63rd section of the Act of 1858, the respondents might, for nine months after that date, have proceeded summarily against the appellant. Neither is it necessary to say whether, during those nine months, the respondents could have revoked their notice, and proceeded otherwise; in this instance they did not do so. From the expiration of the nine months after the demand which the respondents made, these Acts of Parliament clearly disabled them from taking any proceedings whatever. They cannot revive a claim which they have lost by declaring that it shall be paid by instalments. I think the order made by the justices is invalid.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Whatever right the respondents might have to declare these to be private improvement expenses even at the time they did, I think they cannot adopt both the alternative modes of proceeding which were at their option. I agree with my brother Lush that this notice in Jan. 1861, was a demand for payment upon the owner. I think that this demand upon the owner showed an adoption on the part of the respondents of an intention to recover the money by summary proceedings. They cannot now convert the claim they then made into another of an entirely different character.

WEBLEY v. WOOLLEY.

23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, s. 6, enacts that certain regulations shall be observed with regard to the "manufacture and keeping of ammunition," one of which is that no "ammunition containing 5lb. of gunpowder shall be kept in any place not licensed for that purpose. . ."

An information preferred against the appellant, a gunmaker, who bought and kept ready-made cartridges to sell by retail, but did not manufacture them, alleged that he did unlawfully keep certain ammunition, to wit, 50,400 cartridges, containing 5lb. weight and upwards of gunpowder, to wit, 80lb. of gunpowder, in a certain place without a licence. . ." He was convicted under the above section and sect. 7 (penalty clause), fined and adjudged to forfeit the ammunition, in excess of the quantity which might be lawfully kept.

On a case stated:

Held, that sect. 6 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, applies only to manufacturers of explosive compositions keeping the same, and that, therefore, the conviction under it of the appellant, who was not a manufacturer of the ammunition he kept, was wrong.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

This was an information preferred by Robert Woolley, inspector of nuisances duly appointed for the borough of Birmingham, against Philip Webley of the said borough, gunmaker, for that he the said Philip Webley, on the 13th Feb. 1871, at the said borough, did unlawfully keep certain ammunition (to wit) 50,400 cartridges, containing 5lb. weight and upwards of gunpowder (to wit) 80lb. weight of gunpowder in a certain place there, without such licence for that purpose as is required by the statute in that behalf, contrary to the statute; and after hearing the parties, and the evidence adduced by them, we, the undersigned (being two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said borough of Birmingham), did thereupon convict the said Philip Webley of the said offence in the penalty of 10*l.*, together with the costs of obtaining the said conviction, amounting to the sum of 9*s.* 6*d.*, and did order and adjudge that the ammunition so kept as aforesaid, should be forfeited to the Queen. And the said Philip Webley, alleging that he is dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, did, within three days thereafter, apply to us, the said justices to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster.

Therefore, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, we hereby state and sign the following:

CASE.

The appellant having appeared upon summons before us, the undersigned, to answer to the said information, it was thereupon proved in evidence, and admitted between the said parties on the hearing before us, aforesaid:

That the said Philip Webley was a gun and pistol manufacturer, in the said borough of Birmingham, and a dealer in cartridges purchased from the makers, and retailed by him to customers, but not otherwise a manufacturer of any of the articles mentioned in sect. 6 of the Gunpowder Act 1860, nor a dealer in gunpowder or manufacturer of cartridges or other articles mentioned in sect. 18 of the said Gunpowder Act 1860, save in so far as the cartridges dealt in by the said Philip Webley, as aforesaid, severally contained small quantities of gunpowder.

It was also proved and admitted, as aforesaid, that on the 13th Feb. last, the said Robert Woolley, then being such inspector as aforesaid, visited the premises of the said Philip Webley, in the said borough of Birmingham, and then and there found therein 50,400 loaded metal cartridges, made by Eley Brothers, of London, of various sizes, and severally containing small quantities of gunpowder varying according to the size, from 6 grains each to 19 grains each, and in the whole containing upwards of 50lb., to wit, 80lb. weight of gunpowder, and that the said Philip Webley had not obtained and was not in possession of any licence for making or keeping ammunition or gunpowder, as provided by the said Gunpowder Act 1860.

Wherefore we the said justices did adjudge and determine that the said Philip Webley did keep ammunition (to wit) 50,400 loaded metal cartridges in a place where it was not then and there lawful under the Gunpowder Act 1860 to keep ammunition, and we did adjudge that the ammunition so kept as aforesaid and exceeding the quantity that might lawfully be kept in the said place, should be forfeited, and that in addition to such forfeiture the said Philip Webley should forfeit the sum of 10*l.*(a)

(a.) 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, s. 6.—"The following regulations shall be observed with regard to the manufacture of loaded percussion caps, and the manufacture and keeping of ammunition, ... or other preparations or compositions of an explosive nature. No such articles as

It was contended on the part of the said Philip Webley that, under the circumstances before stated, a licence under the said Gunpowder Act 1860 was not required by him for the keeping of ammunition as aforesaid.

If the said court should be of opinion that such licence was required for keeping such ammunition as aforesaid, then the conviction shall be confirmed. But if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the conviction shall be quashed.

Given under our hands this 21st April 1871 at the borough aforesaid.

SAMUEL THORNTON.
HENRY MANTON.

Field, Q. C. (with him Chandos Leigh) for the appellant.—The question is whether keeping cartridges is keeping gunpowder within the terms of the section under which this conviction took place, sect. 6, sub-sect. 2. [He referred to sects. 10 and 15.] The fair construction of sect. 6, is that it provides against a manufacturer who carries on a dangerous process, having in the vicinity of his works a quantity of gunpowder. And that section applies only to manufacturers. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Then there is no limit to the number of cartridges which may be kept by a person not a manufacturer, and sect. 18 will not touch him?] The argument must go to that length. It is founded on sect. 18, and on the apparent anomaly of prohibiting the keeping of 5lb. of gunpowder in small cartridges when the same person may lawfully keep 50lb. loose. If this conviction is good every gunmaker in England will be liable. [HANNEN, J.—It is supposed that a dealer or manufacturer would have proper premises.] A person employed in the perilous operation of filling cartridges may by sect. 6 sub-sect. 7, have 50lb. of powder loose beside him. [MELLOR, J.—But the place must be licensed—that imposes some check. COCKBURN, C. J.—And even when he has made the cartridges he is limited to 5lb.]

J. O. Griffits contra.—Sect. 2 relates to keeping and making gunpowder only. Sect. 18 touches gunpowder and cartridges, and sects. 6 and 7 are applicable to both. There are, however, no other sections applying to ammunition. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Is not the whole of sect. 2 intended to regulate the places wherein gunpowder shall be manufactured? MELLOR, J.—It only means "keeping" as incidental to manufacture.] It does not relate to other than a manufacturer. But sect. 18 applies to manufacturers and others—one may keep 200lb., the other 50lb.—and there is no reference to a licence. Sect. 2 was designed to protect the public against the danger of a large accumulation of combustible material. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is a manifest distinction between danger in making cartridges and the danger of keeping them when made.] The object of the Legislature was to prevent the storing of a quantity of gunpowder in an unlicensed place for sale. Sect. 6 applies to the keeping of ammunition by any person whether a manufacturer or not.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is quite unnecessary to decide in the present instance whether such a case as this falls within the 18th section of the Act. That may be a matter for further consideration; but we are of opinion that the case does not fall within sect. 6, and, consequently, that the conviction is wrong. I think the distinction made by Mr. Field in argument is sound, and manifestly presents itself as the true and proper view to be taken of sect. 6. That section relates to manufacturing and keeping of things manufactured, and I do not think it would be expedient or prudent to extend the provisions of the clause to anything not properly within it. This appellant is not a manufacturer, and therefore the section which, in my construction of it, applies to that which a person keeps after he has manufactured it does not apply to him; for although he may be said to have kept what is within sect. 6, yet he did not manufacture it. Hence it follows that the conviction must be quashed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that what Mr. Field suggested is the clear distinction to be observed; and I am satisfied that sect. 6 applies to manufacturers, and does not affect persons who are not manufacturers keeping a quantity of cartridges. I will reserve any opinion as to sect. 18 until a question shall arise upon it.

aforesaid, except percussion caps, exceeding the respective quantities hereinafter mentioned and set opposite to the descriptions of the respective articles (that is to say)

Ammunition containing five pounds of gunpowder . . . . shall be kept in any place not licensed for that purpose as hereinafter mentioned, and no such articles shall be kept in any place so licensed in excess of the respective quantities specified in the licence in that behalf.

Sect. 7 enacts that all ammunition made or kept in any place where under the Act it is not lawful to make or (as the case may be) keep ammunition, and any quantity of ammunition kept in a place where, under the Act, it may be lawful to keep such ammunition, exceeding the quantity which may be lawfully kept, there shall be forfeited; and every person making or keeping ammunition contrary to the Act shall, for so doing, in addition to such forfeiture as aforesaid, forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 10*l*.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. H. HOCKING and R. A. KINGLAKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 20, 1871.

TYSON v. LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18, s. 121) London (City) Improvement Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. cclxxx.)—Notice to treat under local Act—Before whom compensation to be assessed—Tenancy more than one year—Interest to be calculated from time of notice.

The corporation had given the plaintiff six months' notice, as required by the City Improvement Act, of their intention to take his premises, and the notice to quit also included a notice to treat.

The plaintiff was entitled to the residue of an unexpired term of a lease at this time, but at the time of the expiration of the six months' notice his interest would be for less than a year.

If the plaintiff's interest was greater than that for a year he was entitled to go before a jury; if not, his compensation was to be assessed under the 1st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

Held that, from the date of the notice, the corporation could not refuse to proceed with the purchase, and that the period from which the plaintiff's interest was to be calculated, for the purpose of determining what compensation was to be paid him, was from the date of the service of the notice, from which time the lands were bound, and not from the expiration of such notice.

SPECIAL CASE.

This was an action of mandamus brought to compel the defendant to issue his precept for the assessment of compensation claimed by the plaintiff, and to take all the necessary steps to have such compensation duly assessed, and for damages for his having made default in the issuing of such precept and in the taking of such necessary steps, and by the consent of the parties and the order of M. Smith, J., dated the 7th Dec. 1870, a special case was stated for the opinion of the court, without pleadings.

The plaintiff was, on Jan. 25, 1867, tenant of the whole and occupier of a portion of a house and premises forming No. 14, Black Horse-alley, in the parish of St. Bride, London, for the remainder of a term exceeding one year, under and by virtue of an agreement dated 24th June 1867; and such agreement provided for a term of three years from Midsummer day 1867, and for a yearly tenancy after the expiration thereof at the same rent and subject to the six months notice to quit.

Upon the 25th Jan. 1869, the Corporation of London, as promoters of the Holborn Valley Improvement (Additional Works') Act 1867, served on the plaintiff a notice to treat for the said premises. The notice stated that it was the intention of the mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled to take and use the plaintiff's house, shop, and offices, with the appurtenances belonging. It further stated that the mayor, aldermen and commons were willing to treat and agree with the plaintiff for the purchase of his estate and interest in the premises and for compensation to be made for the injury and damage sustained on account of the execution of the Act. It further stated that it gave the person or persons in possession or occupation of the premises or any of them or any part thereof, notice, and required them at the expiration of six months from and after the giving of such notice, peaceably and quietly to deliver up possession of the same; and the notice also required the plaintiff within the expiration of one month from its date to deliver at the office of the Comptroller of the City, a statement in writing of the particulars of the estate and interest to which he claimed to be entitled and of the amount of the sum of money he would be willing to receive in satisfaction or recompense for the value of such estate and interest, and as compensation for any improvements or fixtures, and for any injury or damage that he might sustain on account of the execution of the Act, and of the manner in which such amount of money had been computed; and in case that plaintiff should have a greater interest in the premises than as tenant at will, and should claim compensation in respect of any unexpired term or interest under any lease or grant of the premises so required, then he was further required to produce the lease or grant in respect of which such claim was made.

Upon the 19th Feb. 1869, the plaintiff sent to the corporation a statement of the amount of his claim and the nature of his interest in the said premises. The plaintiff was in the occupation of the premises at the date of the commencement of the action. The necessity for a formal demand on the defendant to perform his duty was waived before action, and it was agreed that no objection of form should be taken on either side.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the plaintiff at the date of the issuing of the writ was entitled to maintain this action.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative then judgment with the costs of suit was to be given to the plaintiff that a writ of mandamus do issue to the defendant to issue his precept in respect of the said lands, pursuant to the statutes, and to do all acts, and take all necessary steps for the purposes of having the compensation to be paid assessed by a jury. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, the judgment with costs of suit to be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff's points of argument were: first, that the plaintiff is entitled to have the value of his interest assessed by a jury, and to a mandamus; secondly, that the plaintiff had at the time of the service of the notice to treat a greater interest in the said house and premises than as tenant from year to year; thirdly, that the notice to treat bound the lands, and that the respective rights of the parties must be determined according to the state of things at the date thereof; fourthly, that it was the duty of the corporation upon such notice to treat being given, to take the necessary steps to have the amount of compensation assessed, and that any neglect to perform that duty was actionable; fifthly that the defendant ought not to be allowed to set up any difference in the amount of the plaintiff's interest at the time of action brought, and the time when the notice to treat was given, which would be to take advantage of their own laches.

The points on which the defendants argued were: First, that inasmuch as at the date when the six months' notice by the corporation to the plaintiff expired, his term of three years in the premises had less than a year to run, and at the date of the commencement of the action such term had expired by effluxion of time, the plaintiff is not entitled to have a jury summoned to assess compensation to him; secondly, that the plaintiff's right to compensation, if any, is enforceable only under the 121st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845; thirdly, that at the date of action brought, the plaintiff was not entitled to have a jury summoned; fourthly, that he was not entitled to claim a writ of mandamus.

The Holborn Valley Improvement (Additional Works) Act 1867 incorporates the London (City) Improvement Act, which incorporated portions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. It is provided by the 13th section of the London (City) Improvement Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. cclxxx.) that for the purposes of this Act it shall be lawful for the mayor, aldermen, and commons, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to take and use, or cause to be taken and used, any lands, and pull down and remove, or cause to be pulled down and removed, any houses or buildings which they may deem necessary or expedient to take, use, or pull down and remove for the purposes of this Act, at any time at the expiration of six months after notices in writing from the mayor, aldermen, and commons, or their agent duly authorised, of the intention to take or use the same, shall have been left at the principal office of business, or given to the principal officer of the corporation interested in or entitled to, or by this Act enabled to sell and convey any such lands, houses, or buildings, or to the person who shall be the owner and occupier thereof, or have been left at his usual or last known place of abode or business, or with the tenant or occupier of the same lands, houses, or buildings, or have been affixed upon some part of such lands, houses, or buildings. And by the 34th section it is enacted, that all persons in the actual possession of any lands to be taken or purchased by virtue of this Act, as owners, leaseholders, tenants at will, or lessees for a year, or for any shorter time or otherwise, shall, at the expiration of six months from and after notice in writing from the mayor, aldermen, and commons, or their agent duly authorised, shall have been left at or affixed upon the premises, or so soon after as they shall be required so to do, peaceably and quietly deliver up the possession of the said premises to the mayor, aldermen, and commons, or the person authorised by them to take possession thereof; and in case any such persons shall refuse to give up such possession as aforesaid, then it shall be lawful for the said court of mayor and aldermen to issue their precept to the sheriffs of the said city of London to deliver possession of the premises to such person as shall in such precept be nominated to receive the same; and the said sheriffs are hereby required to deliver such possession accordingly of the said premises, and to levy such costs as shall accrue from the issuing of such precept on the person so refusing to give up such possession as aforesaid, by distress and sale of their goods, but no such possession shall be delivered up until such payment or deposit of purchase or compensation money shall have been made as it is directed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

W. G. Harrison, for the plaintiff.—If the plaintiff had no greater interest than one from year to year, the amount of his compensation is to be settled by two justices, under the 121st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845; but if the plaintiff had a greater interest than that of a tenant from year to year, then he is entitled to have a jury summoned, and to go before them in the usual manner to assess the value of his unexpired term or interest in his premises. Here the plaintiff had a greater interest than a tenant from year to year, for the agreement was for three years from the 24th June 1867, and at the time when notice to treat was given, which was on the 25th Jan. 1869, Tyson had an equitable interest in the premises greater than three years. We must look at and examine the equitable interest, for, whereas the agreement for a lease gives an actual occupation for three years, the equitable interest gives an occupation for four years at least: Sweetman v. Metropolitan Railway Company (1 H. & M. 543; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 156). That which is to be valued under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is not what the plaintiff has, but what he claims to have. It was held in The Marquis of Salisbury v. The Great Northern Railway Company (17 Q. B. 840) that a notice by a railway company to a landowner, served in pursuance of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, requiring the lands for the purposes of the company, is a sufficient exercise of the powers of compulsory purchase to place the parties in the position of vendor and purchaser, and Lord Campbell there states "that the contract may be considered as mutual, it being in the landowner's power to compel the company, after the expiration of the period prescribed for exercising their compulsory powers, to complete the purchase." He subsequently goes on to say, "It seems to me that the intention of the Legislature was, that the contract of purchase should be complete as soon as the notice has been given by the company." The amount of compensation here is to be assessed with reference to the value of the plaintiff's interest in the premises, and not with reference to its value to the corporation.

Stebbing v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 37; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 530;
Morgan v. Metropolitan Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 553; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 568; in error, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 97.

The quantum of the plaintiff's interest in the land is from the date of the notice, and the premises are, for the purposes for which they are required, virtually in the hands of the corporation from such date, and from that time the plaintiff's interest must be calculated.

Thesiger for the defendants.—The only real question is whether the date from which compensation is to be assessed was the time when the six months' notice was given, or whether it was the time when the six months' notice expired. If the expiration of the six months is the time, then the plaintiff would have less than an interest of a year; but if the date of giving the notice is the time, he would have an interest in the premises greater than that of a tenant from year to year. The quantum of interest must be in respect of the value of interest in the premises. Under the 18th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act notice to treat is to be given to the parties interested, and under the 21st section the parties are to state their claims within twenty-one days. If the quantum of value be under 50*l.*, they must go before two justices of the peace, even if the interest which they possess in the premises is greater than that of a yearly tenant, but if the interest is greater than 50*l.* they may go before a jury. I admit that when notice to treat is given a contract is created between vendor and purchaser: (Sparrow v. Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, 9 Hare, 436). But the power to take the lands is not at the date of the notice but six months after, at its expiration: (Morgan v. Metropolitan Railway Company, in error L. Rep. 5 C. P. 97.) In that case the railway company had given the plaintiffs notice of their intention to take their premises at the expiration of six months, and the plaintiffs accordingly had taken other premises, and, the six months having expired meanwhile, the former premises remained upon their hands. The Lord Chief Baron said, that, in consequence of the notice given to them by the company, the plaintiffs were not only entitled to a mandamus, but to an action for damages also. He goes on to say, that the company were bound to give the plaintiffs a notice to treat within a reasonable time after the expiration of the six months from which notice to take was served upon them, but he does not say that compensation is due from the time of the first notice. So the interest which the corporation are entitled to take is the interest at the expiration of the notice. The premises are bound from the time of notice to treat, but if the tenant has sustained any costs or losses by removing before the expiration of the term, he would be entitled to compensation.

Willes, J.—We are not satisfied upon the argument that the plaintiff's interest in the premises was less than that of a year, nor are we satisfied that any distinction ought to be drawn in favour of the Lord Mayor from the time of notice to quit and notice to treat, both which notices were embodied in one document in the present case. Taking the two notices together, and bearing in mind the decision in Morgan v. The Metropolitan Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 7; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 568, I think Mr. Thesiger is right in saying the notices compel the defendants to treat for the premises, or, following the opinion of the Lord Chief Baron, that they are to take them as an obligation. As the case comes before us, the notice to treat has relation to the time when given, which is at the same time as the notice to quit. The land was to be taken according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, which has a binding effect on the premises from the time of the notice, as at the expiration of the six months. It means, "We have made up our minds to take your lands, and we give you notice." The giving the first notice is the period to which all questions of compensation for injury, damage, or losses of any kind must be referred, and if such is the case for one purpose, why not for all purposes? The six months' notice was intended for the tenant's benefit that he should leave without incurring useless expenses. In applying the 121st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, apart from the 34th section of the London (City) Improvement Act, there is no doubt you must take the estate of the tenant at the time of the notice. There is no doubt in this case that at the time of such notice the plaintiff had more than a year's tenancy, and proceedings would have been taken against him under the provisions of sect. 21, where his estate was freehold or leasehold. The 13th section of the Local Act gives a power to take houses and lands, but not to purchase them, while the 34th section is not especially directed to the case of tenants from year to year, but to all classes of persons, whether tenants at will, by the year, or in fee. It is framed for the benefit of the city, and enacts that all persons in the actual possession of any lands to be taken or purchased by virtue of the Act, as owners, leaseholders, tenants at will or lessees, for a year or for any shorter time or otherwise, shall, at the expiration of six months from and after notice, in writing, from the mayor, aldermen, and commons, or their agent duly authorised, shall have been left on the premises, or so soon after as they shall be required so to do, peaceably and quietly deliver up to the mayor, aldermen, and commons, or the person authorised by them to take possession thereof, and in order to remove all doubt the section ends, "but no such possession shall be delivered up until such payment or deposit of purchase or compensation money shall have been made as is directed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845." The statute deals with the case of possession where possession exists without regard to the estate, and I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation, and in such a manner as is more expensive to the corporation, namely, by the verdict of a jury.

Keating, J.—I am of the same opinion. The period of time when the tenant's interest determined was when notice to quit was given. Here the two notices, one the notice to quit, the other the notice to treat, were combined in one. The six months merely relates to the time when the corporation will require possession. Mr. Thesiger argues that the period was at the expiration of the six months, but they are bound to take the lands from the date of the notice. The notice means, We take your lands, and at any time after the expiration of six months you must deliver up possession and have compensation assessed.

Brett, J. The question of possession in sect. 34 leaves every question to be dealt with according to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

Collier, J.—The 21st section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act gives the tenant twenty-one days to consult his interest and to state particulars of his claim. Here the time is simply extended to six months, but as the provisions are not altered, that makes no possible difference on the principle on which compensation is to be assessed.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Reg. v. Manning and Rogers

Arson—Building—Unfinished house—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 6.

An unfinished dwelling house of which the external and internal walls were built, and the roof covered in, and a considerable part of the flooring laid, and the walls and ceilings prepared for plastering, is a building within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 6, the unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to which is a felony.

Semble, that it is a question for the jury, whether the structure in question is a building.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by Martin, B.

The following is a copy of the indictment:

Lancashire to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath, present that William Manning and John Rogers, on &c., at &c., feloniously, unlawfully, and maliciously did set fire to a certain building of one John Rhodes, there situate, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

It is obviously framed upon the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 6.

The prisoners were members of a society or union of hand-made brickmakers.

The building set fire to was one of seven built in a row, intended for dwelling houses, and which were built in part of machine-made bricks. On the night of the 25th June last the prisoners (and some others who escaped) set fire to it by means of paraffin oil. All the walls, external and internal, of the house were built and finished; the roof was on and finished; a considerable part of the flooring was laid; the internal walls and ceilings were prepared ready for plastering. The house was in a forward state towards completion, but was not completed.

At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution, it was objected by the learned counsel for the prisoners that the erection set fire to was not a building within the meaning of the statute, because it was not completely finished.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. To constitute a building within the meaning of sect. 6, it is not necessary that the structure should be completed for its intended purpose; it is sufficient if it has advanced so far as to have acquired the character of an entire building. I think that an unfinished house of which the walls had only been built 4ft. high, would not be a building within the section: Here all the walls, external and internal, being complete and the roof covered in, I think this was a building within the section.

HANNEN, J.—A house, I think, means a building sufficiently advanced to be ready for the habitation of man, and a structure may be a building otherwise than a house within sect. 6, though it was only advanced so far as the one in question.

Conviction confirmed.

REG. v. STENSON AND HITCHMAN.

False pretences and conspiracy—Evidence.

S. and H. were jointly indicted on counts for false pretences and a general count for conspiracy. S. was convicted on the counts for false pretences, and both on the count for conspiracy.

The evidence was, that they were ostensibly carrying on business as publishers under the name of B. and Co., and that H. was the author of a book published by them. To force the sale of the book, S. got M. to write letters purporting to come from a titled lady ordering a copy of the book, and to address them to country booksellers. These letters were delivered by M. to S., and found their way by post to different country booksellers, and inclosed with them was a printed circular from the firm, offering reduced terms for an order of seven copies or more. At the trial two witnesses produced a number of such letters, some of which had been given to them by the booksellers (other than those named in the indictment) who received them, and some came to them from such booksellers by post. There were no counts in the indictment alleging any intent to defraud these particular booksellers. It was also proved that H., after the frauds charged, had represented himself as B. and Co.:

Held, that the letters were admissible in evidence, without calling the booksellers who actually received them.

Held, also, that the representations of H. after the frauds charged were admissible in evidence.

CASE reserved at the sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex, on the 12th Sept. 1871, by Mr. Serjeant Cox, the deputy-assistant judge.

The defendants were charged with obtaining money by false pretences, and also for a conspiracy to defraud.

The indictment contained nine counts.

The first count charged that the prisoners "did send to and caused to be received by one Charles Pope Chapple a certain manuscript letter or paper, on which was stamped, printed, and embossed an earl's coronet, in coloured relief, and purporting to be written by a person rightfully using the title and designation of Lady Scott," and that the defendants "by so sending and causing it to be received, as aforesaid, the said letter," &c., did falsely pretend to the said Charles Pope Chapple that a lady of rank lawfully bearing the name of Lady Scott, entitled by law to use and display a coronet, was then desirous to purchase a copy of a certain work called "Sunshine and Shadow," and then asked the said Charles Pope Chapple to procure for her a copy of the said work entitled, &c., in time for her return from town, and also that the said letter was a true and genuine letter of a lady of rank; and also that the order in the said letter contained was a true and genuine order for goods, to wit, for the said book, entitled, &c.; and also that a certain Lady Scott desired to become a customer of the said Charles Pope Chapple; and also that a certain Lady Scott had then recently gone from Ilminster to London, and was about to return from London to Ilminster, and then required to be purchased for her the said book entitled, &c., and upon her return would call at the shop of the said Charles Pope Chapple and pay for the said book, by means, &c., the said defendants did obtain from the said Charles Pope Chapple a certain valuable security, to wit, an order for the payment of the sum of 2*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, with intent, &c.

The second count charged a similar false pretence to R. W. Hetherington.

The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth counts charged the like false pretences to Alfred Lambert, Henry Bailly, James Ensor, William Morley, Thomas Weller, and Barnard Valentine.

The ninth count charged that on the 1st day of June, 1871, the said defendants, "together with others, whose names are to the jurors unknown, unlawfully did conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together by divers false pretences and fraudulent and indirect means and devices to obtain from and acquire to themselves the moneys of certain dealers in books, to wit, Charles Pope Chapple (and the seven other persons, named in the eight counts charging false pretences) and others, and to cheat and defraud the said dealers in books of their said moneys against the peace, &c.

The evidence for the prosecution was that the defendants were carrying on business ostensibly as publishers under the style of Hamilton and Co. The defendant Hitchman had published a book entitled "Sunshine and Shadow," of which he professed to be the writer, in the assumed name of the Viscount de Montgomery. This book was published and sold at the publishing offices conducted by the defendants. For the purpose, as it was alleged, of procuring a sale for the book, they caused to be sent by post to a great number of booksellers in the country a letter purporting to be from one Lady Scott, stating that she (the writer) desired to purchase a copy of the work entitled "Sunshine and Shadow" (a prospectus of which was enclosed, containing extracts from numerous eulogistic criticisms), and requesting the bookseller to procure a copy of it for her, which she would call and pay for on her return from town. The prospectus enclosed with this letter stated that if a bookseller would order seven copies at once a larger discount would be allowed, and he might return unsold copies.

The effect of this letter was proved by some of the booksellers in question to have been that, believing it to be the genuine order of a Lady Scott, they had ordered the book through their usual London agents, who proved that they had procured the volumes from the defendants' office, paying for them there the wholesale price at which books are sold by publishers to booksellers; and one of the country booksellers (Chapple), induced by the offer in the prospectus of the seven copies at a larger discount, sent an order and a cheque for 2*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.* for seven copies, which were duly forwarded to him by the defendants.

It was proved that all of these letters purporting to be from Lady Scott were written by a lady named Maniate, whose evidence was as follows:

I am a teacher of languages at Brompton. I answered an advertisement in the Times for a lady wanted to copy letters. The defendant Stenson called on me. He brought a quantity of note paper with a coronet upon it, and the form of a letter which I was to write. It was the Lady Scott. (Letter now produced.) I wrote a great number of them, and gave them to the defendant. He also brought me some envelopes and a directory containing the names of country booksellers, and directed me to address the envelopes to them. I did so, and gave them to the defendant. All the letters and envelopes before me (those produced by the booksellers named in the indictment, as also those produced by Abraham Gould and by Mr. Miles) are in my handwriting, and were some of those I wrote by the direction of Stenson and gave to him.

There was no evidence to connect the defendant Hitchman with this proceeding of Stenson.

There was no direct evidence that the letters were sent out by the defendants or one of them. They were not proved to have made them up or to have posted them. The jury were asked to infer that they did so from the fact proved that they were written and addressed by Mrs. Maniate by direction of one of the defendants (Stenson), who was proved to be ostensibly carrying on, with the other defendant, Hitchman, the business of Hamilton and Co., at whose offices the book ordered by the supposed Lady Scott was published.

There was no evidence to prove that the letters were not sent by a Lady Scott, but the jury were asked to infer the non-existence of any Lady Scott entitled to use a countess's coronet, from the evidence of Mr. George Harrison, a Windsor herald, who proved that he was acquainted with the crests of the nobility; that the crest on the letters produced was a countess's coronet; that there were several Lady Scotts, but none of them was a countess, or entitled to use the crest upon the letters.

The existing Lady Scotts were not called.

It was contended for the prosecution that it might be inferred from the fact that Mrs. Maniate had written all the letters and addressed all the envelopes for defendant Stenson, that they were not sent out by any Lady Scott, but by the defendants, or one of them; and further, that this might also be inferred from the printed prospectus of the book having been enclosed with the letters.

The object of this false pretence was alleged to be to induce the country booksellers to order the book, whereby the defendants obtained a sale, and consequently the money, for a book that would not have been bought by the booksellers but for the false pretence contained in the Lady Scott letter.

In the course of the trial the following questions were raised:

First, the booksellers named in the indictment were called to prove the receipt by them of, and to produce the Lady Scott letter received by them through the post.

Then Abraham Gould said:

I am an advertising agent. I knew Hitchman eleven years ago as Montgomery. Knew Stenson at the latter part of last year. I went about to collect evidence for this prosecution. I produce five letters which I received from booksellers in different towns. Three of them were given to me by themselves when I called upon them, and two came to me by post.

Cross-examined:

I will not be quite positive how many came by post, or how many were given to me by the booksellers. They told me when they gave them to me that they had received them by post. (Question objected to.)

These letters were copies of the Lady Scott letter, and were identified by Mrs. Maniate as having been written and addressed by her for the defendant Stenson.

They were addressed to other booksellers than those named in the indictment, and were put in by the prosecution under the count charging a conspiring to defraud the booksellers there named "and others."

It was objected for the defendants—first, that a false pretence that formed part of the charge could not be proved by the mere production of letters by a witness who had received them from the parties; secondly, that the evidence must be limited to the charges of false pretences made to the persons named in the indictment.

I so held.

It was then contended for the prosecution that under the ninth count (for conspiring to defraud the said booksellers and others) it was competent to the prosecution to prove similar frauds on other booksellers than those named in the indictment.

It was replied for the defendants, that even if this were so, letters alleged to have been received from booksellers in the country by the witness personally, or coming to him by post, are not admissible on mere production by the recipient, and that they could be made evidence only by calling the booksellers themselves to prove how and when they had come to them.

I was of opinion that the letters so produced were inadmissible both to prove the counts for false pretences and the count for conspiracy, but counsel for the prosecution strongly urging that if the evidence was wrongly rejected there would be a miscarriage of justice without redress, while the defendants would have a remedy if the prosecution was wrong, I consented to receive them, and reserved the point.

Secondly. Later in the course of the trial, counsel for the prosecution proposed to put in evidence as proof of conspiracy under the ninth count certain acts of the defendant Hitchman, done after the date of the offence. It was objected on the part of the defendants, that acts done after the alleged fraud was completed could not be admissible evidence of a conspiracy to commit that fraud. I admitted the evidence, reserving this point also for the consideration of the court.

Witnesses were then called to prove that defendant Hitchman, after the date of the frauds charged in the indictment, had called himself by the name of Hamilton, and represented himself as of the firm of Hamilton and Co.

Thirdly. Subsequently Mr. Miles, a partner in the firm of Hamilton, Adams, and Co., publishers, having their business near to that of the defendants, produced a quantity of letters which he stated had come to the office of Hamilton, Adams, and Co., by mistake for Hamilton and Co.

Mrs. Maniate was recalled to prove that all the letters and envelopes so produced by Mr. Miles were some of those she had written by direction of defendant Stenson. It appeared that they were not addressed to the booksellers named in the indictment.

On the part of the defendants, it was objected that they could not be received, first, as the evidence must be limited to the specific charges in the indictment; and, secondly, as there was no sufficient evidence that these letters had ever been sent to or received by the persons to whom they were alleged to be addressed.

For the prosecution, it was contended that they were admissible under the count for conspiracy charging the attempt to defraud the booksellers named "and others," and that one of the defendants having directed them to be written made them evidence, without further proof of whence they came.

I reserved this point also for the opinion of this Court.

I withdrew from the jury the case as against Hitchman on the first eight counts of the indictment (charging false pretences), but I left to them the question as to him (Hitchman) on the count for conspiracy, and as to the defendant Stenson on all the counts.

The jury found the defendant Hitchman guilty on the count for conspiracy only, and the defendant Stenson guilty on all the counts except the first.

Sentence was deferred, and the prisoners remain in custody.

The opinion of the Court is requested on the three points above stated; first, if in all or either of them the evidence was wrongly admitted; secondly, if so, whether such wrongful admission invalidates the conviction, first of Stenson under the counts for false pretences, and second of both the defendants under the count for conspiracy.

EDWARD WM. COX,
Deputy-Assistant Judge.

Montagu Williams for the prisoner Stenson.—The letters produced by Gould and Miles were inadmissible, without calling the country booksellers to whom they were addressed to show in what state and under what circumstances they received them. [LUSH, J.—Maniate wrote the letters and addressed them, and then gave them to Stenson; and then they are found in different country towns. He gave her a directory to copy the names and addresses of the country booksellers. If the letters had been altered, Maniate might have been questioned upon that. It was for you to show if anything else had been put into the letters. KELLY, C.B.—The simple question is, whether Stenson sent the letters? It is possible that some one else may have done so. PIGOTT, B.—You might have shown how Stenson got rid of them. LUSH, J.—The letters were last traced to his hands, and it is a fair inference that he sent them.] There was no evidence who sent them or who received them.

Straight (H. Browne with him) for Hitchman.—The statements by Hitchman, made after the frauds charged, that he represented the firm of Hamilton and Co., were not admissible to connect him with the frauds or the conspiracy. [KELLY, C.B.—Is it possible to imagine that the partner most deeply interested in the book could be ignorant of the proceedings taken by the other partner to sell and get rid of the book? Lush, J.—The statement in the case, "that the defendants were ostensibly carrying on business as partners under the style and firm of Hamilton and Co., and that Hitchman had published the book of which he professed to be the writer," shows a previous connection between the prisoners.]

Besley, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Kelly, C. B.—In this case, which is a peculiar one, there are only two questions substantially. The first is, whether the letters produced by Gould and Miles were admissible in evidence? It appears that the prisoner Stenson induced the witness Maniate to write a number of fabricated letters, purporting to be written by a Lady Scott, ordering one copy of a book called "Sunshine and Shadow." The letters were in such terms as to indicate that the book was a work of great merit, and to induce persons to purchase it. A number of these letters, and also envelopes addressed to country booksellers, were written by her, and the whole of them were delivered over to Stenson. The evidence was, that these letters were received by the country booksellers through the post. The letters, together with a circular, stating that, if a bookseller would order seven copies at once a larger discount would be allowed, emanating from the defendant's establishment, carried on under the name of Hamilton and Co., found their way into the hands of the country booksellers. A witness, Gould, produced five of such letters. Some were given to him by the booksellers to whom they were addressed by Maniate, and some he received by post from booksellers in different towns. Upon this the question was raised, whether the letters were admissible in evidence, without calling the booksellers themselves. I am of opinion that they were admissible in evidence as soon as the foundation was laid that a number of similar letters were written by Maniate for Stenson and placed in his hands, and evidence was given that they had been transmitted to country booksellers by post. We come then to the charge of conspiracy. Surely there was evidence of an intention to defraud the trade in general. In addition to those letters, there was evidence that a number of others produced by the witness Mills were prepared at Stenson's instance and delivered to him by Maniate, and that they somehow or other had got into circulation. This was evidence against him on the count for conspiracy. The next question is, whether these letters were evidence against the other prisoner, Hitchman? He was a partner in the establishment carried on by him and Stenson, and he was the author of the work which it was the object of these fabricated letters to circulate and to sell. I therefore think the letters were some evidence against him on these counts. As soon as evidence was given that a conspiracy had been the means of these letters coming into existence, any evidence which would connect the other prisoner Hitchman with the general intent and objects of a conspiracy was evidence against him. And then arose the second question, viz., whether declarations by the prisoner Hitchman, after the date of the frauds charged, that he had called himself by the name of Hamilton, and represented himself as Hamilton and Co., were admissible against him? There can be no doubt that anything done at any time, even as late as the day before the trial, which shows that a person had been at a former time a party to a conspiracy, is admissible in evidence against such person. Here not only were the declarations made by him, but it was shown that he had the strongest motives as a member of the firm and the author of the work, to sell and circulate it, and therefore they were admissible against him on the count for conspiracy. Both on the counts for false pretences, as well as on that for conspiracy, I think the evidence was admissible, and that the conviction must be affirmed.

Byles, J.—I also think that the conviction should be affirmed.

Pigott, B.—I am of the same opinion. The evidence was clearly admissible, it is sufficient to say, upon the count for conspiracy, but I also think it was admissible upon the charge of false pretences. The letters were written by order of Stenson, and delivered to him, and found their way into the hands of country booksellers. It is a fair inference to draw that Stenson sent them to the booksellers. As to the declarations of Hitchman, after the frauds charged in the indictment, I cannot see any doubt that they were evidence to connect him with what he did before. They clearly connect him with the conspiracy.

Lush, and Hannen, JJ., concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Reg. v. Holmes and Furness.

Indecent assault—Evidence—Contradiction of prosecutrix.

On the trial of an indictment for an indecent assault, the defence being consent on the part of the prosecutrix, she denied on cross-examination having had intercourse with S.

Held that S. could not be called to contradict her upon this answer.

This rule applies to cases of rape, attempts to commit a rape, and indecent assaults, in the nature of attempts to commit a rape.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the peace holden in and for the county of Surrey on Tuesday, 17th Oct. 1871, Henry Holmes and Joseph Frederick Furness were tried upon an indictment charging them with indecently assaulting one Sarah Palmer.

The prosecutrix, in her cross-examination, was asked by the prisoner's counsel if she had had connection with Robert Sharp, and she denied it.

The prisoner's counsel called the said Robert Sharp, and asked him if the prosecutrix had ever had connection with him, but the counsel for the prosecution objected on the authority of Reg. v. Cockroft (11 Cox. C. C. 410), and the court refused to allow the question to be answered, but reserved the point whether such answer ought to have been allowed to be given, for the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

The jury found both prisoners guilty, and the court sentenced the said Henry Holmes to six calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour, and the said Joseph Frederick Furness to four calendar months' imprisonment with hard labour, both at the House of Correction at Wandsworth, in the said county, but respited the execution of the said sentences until the decision of the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved should be known, and committed the prisoners to the custody of the governor of the common gaol at Newington in the said county in the mean time.

E. Richards Adams, Chairman.

The case was remitted by this court to the sessions for the purpose of having a copy of the evidence stated, which was returned as follows:

Sarah Palmer, single woman, in service at Mrs. Essex, 4, Blythe-terrace, South Lambeth-road:

On Tuesday night, Sept. 5, my mistress gave me permission to go out and take tea with some one. Both my arms have been burnt, this prevents me from using my arms properly. At 6 p.m. I left home and took tea at the corner of Myers-street. I left at 8 p.m. to return home. I went past the house in which Holmes lives; it is at the corner of Water-street. I called at my mother's; she was not in. I left, and was going home. I saw Holmes and Furness at the door of Holmes's house. I spoke to Holmes; Furness was there. I said, "Holmes, have you seen my mother?" He said, "No, Sarah; I have not seen her." I left him, and walked towards home. Holmes and Furness came running after me to the corner of South Lambeth-road. Holmes said, "Sarah, your mother wants you." I said to Holmes and Furness, "Is it true?" They both said, "It is quite true." I walked by the side of them down to where they said mother was. We passed a public house called the Canton Arms. We walked straight down. It is a very dull street. I went down because they said mother was in a public house there. When I was in this road, Holmes said [Witness then described the indecent assault in which Holmes was the actor and aiding Furness]. I met a gentleman and complained to him. This gentleman went home with me. I did not know him. My mistress was at home. I was to have been home by nine o'clock. It was ten o'clock when I got home. I was crying. I made a complaint to my mistress. They went for my mother; she came, and I complained to her. I mentioned two names to my mother.

Cross-examined by counsel for Holmes:—

I am sixteen. I have known Holmes before about twelve months. He had been very friendly with my mother. I have been to his house sometimes two or three times in a week. On this evening I did not go into Holmes's house. It was about a quarter-past eight when I passed Holmes's house. This was in the South Lambeth-road. There are houses on both sides of the road. The road is lighted. The bricks were a good distance round. I have walked out with Holmes; my mother and Mrs. Stafford were with us. Two gentlemen were looking on and watching while this was going on. The bricks were piled up. Both of them (H. and F.) pushed me The hole is a very large one, deeper than my knees. I did not go down the whole time. There was a third young man; he left us; he left me against my own house. Both the prisoners undid their trousers. I did not hear anyone pass by. This occupied about half an hour. Mrs. Essex lives a long way from the bricks. I knew a Mrs. Stafford and Robert Sharp three and a-half years. He has been a sweetheart of mine. I have not said to Charlotte that I would not have said anything about it unless my mistress had seen the dirt on my back. My mistress saw the dirt on my back, and found fault with me for being so late. Mrs. Stafford said, "He has done nothing to you, don't go against "Harry." I said, "I won't if I can help it, he would have done wrong if he could." I have been familiar with Holmes and with Sharp. No connection has taken place between me and Sharp. I told Charlotte that I went to be examined, but they said it was no use, I ought to have been examined the same day.

Cross-examined by counsel for Furness:

I never had connection with any man whatever. On the same Sunday Charlotte asked me if I was in the family way. I did not tell Sharp that there was some yellow on my gown from the brick. Charlotte asked me if I was in the family way by Bob Sharp. I have seen Furness before; he has spoken to me two or three times. I did not know his name. I said to my mother Holmes and another young man. I was in their company from a quarter past eight till ten. I was not alone with Furness that evening. I screamed as loud as I could. Holmes had his arm on my mouth. I believe two gentlemen did go by; they could not see me. There was no lamp where I was. I was in the back kitchen at Holmes's on Wednesday week. Holmes said, "Sarah I am truly sorry for what I have done to you, will you ask your father to make it up before you go into court." Mrs. Stafford was present. I went there about nine. I drank beer with them. It was a wet evening.

Re-examined:

No man had ever done anything improper with me before. Mrs. Keightly is Sharp's sister. It was after this evening that Mrs. Keightly spoke to me; this was after the first hearing before the magistrate. She said, "Has Bob done anything to you?" I said, "No; he has not." I saw Sharp last Sunday week. He was in the public-house when I went to get some ale. He, Sharp, said, "I want to speak to you, I will come outside to you and leave my ale." I was going home, he said, "Sarah, I know no harm of you, I will take my oath of that. I will take off my coat and pawn it before I go against you. Do not go against Holmes. Make it up with him," I said, "I can't make it up, I must leave it to father." He said, "Don't go against him, he has no mother nor father." Mrs. Stafford said, "kiss Holmes," and I did, and shook hands with him. I saw a third man before I spoke to Holmes. When this took place no other man was present but Holmes and Furness. This took place in a street leading to South Lambeth-road. It led to Albert-square. It is a new street. There are houses on both sides of the way. The bricks were between the path and the houses. The pile was on the footpath. It led down as if you were going into the kitchen. The two men looking on seemed very respectable. They were on the other side of the road. I was not got into the hole.

Fanny Essex, 4, Blocke-terrace, South Lambeth-road:

Prosecutrix has been in my service five or six months. She was so in the month of September and is now. She has conducted herself in every way as I could expect. Her arms have been burnt previously to her coming into our service. Her hands are a little contracted. On the 5th Sept. I gave her leave to go to a tea party. She left about six and should have returned at nine, but did not till ten o'clock. I saw her as soon as she came in. Her things appeared to be in a disordered state. She was very confused. She appeared as if she had been crying. She made a complaint, and in consequence I sent for her mother. Her mother came in about half an hour, I was present when the girl saw her mother, she made a complaint, and a name was mentioned.

Cross-examined:

I complained to her about being late. There was a mark of dirt on her jacket. We had on one or two occasions to find fault with her for being long on errands.

Eliza Palmer, mother of prosecutrix:

I live at 24, Water-street. My daughter will be seventeen next April. On Tuesday, 5th April, I received a message. I went to the house of Miss Essex about half past ten, p.m. I saw my daughter. She made a complaint, and was crying bitterly. She mentioned a name—only one. She referred to another person.

Cross-examined:

I have known Holmes about twelve months. He is respectable decent young man. He has been friendly with us. I do not know that my daughter was six months ago keeping company with Sharp.

George Palmer, father of the prosecutrix:

Prosecutrix is my daughter. Before I was examined at the police court, I saw the two prisoners the evening before they were both together. Holmes said — Furness was present — "I am very sorry, Palmer, to have done what I have done; I hope you will try to make it up." I said "I do not know whether I can or not; I have left it in a gentleman's hands to carry the job through." Furness said, "I was with your daughter, Mr. Palmer, the evening before this occasion." Holmes said, "It is of no use your saying we were not there, for we were there." I never had to find fault with my daughter, except for playing in the street.

Cross-examined:

When I gave Holmes in charge, he said "I shall lose my work." I once gave my daughter a smack on the head.

William Kempster, Div. W.:

On the 8th Sept. I took Holmes into custody. He was at Kennington-cross. I told him he was charged with indecently assaulting Sarah Palmer, at South Lambeth, on Tuesday, 5th Sept., with another one. He turned to the father, who was present, and said, "Palmer, can't we settle this? It will throw me out of my situation if I am locked up." Palmer said, "No, I shall charge him." I was present on the first examination on 8th Sept. Furness was not then in custody. There were four examinations. Furness was taken into custody on the 29th. He came to the police court on behalf of Holmes. I know the place where the alleged assault took place. The street leads from South Lambeth-road to Albert-square. It is about 200 yards to the square. Houses are being built. On the opposite side some houses are occupied, and some are empty. The street is twenty or thirty yards wide. There is a stack of bricks on the footpath close to where there is a hole. Prosecutrix told me she clung to the scaffold poles and the bricks.

For the defence, Louis Elizabeth Keightley:

My husband is a corporal in the Royal Artillery, and I live at 17, Spring-place, Wandsworth-road, South Lambeth, near the residence of Palmer, the father and mother. I do not know anything of Holmes and Furness. I have known prosecutrix. I never had much conversation with her till Sunday night subsequent to the first hearing. She stopped me in Spring-place, I spoke to her. She told me the young man had not had connection with her that night. She said she was two months gone in the family way. She said she should not have told her mistress if she had not seen her clothes disordered and dirt on her back; this was after the first hearing. I believe it was on 10th September.

Cross-examined:

Robert Sharp is my brother. He never told me she was his sweetheart. I was never intimate with her. I live in the same house with my brother. I did not know anything about this charge till she spoke to me about it. On Sunday night I went to the father and mother to know about it. I could not understand what the girl said or what she meant. I did not ask her any questions. She said she had been examined by two doctors. I never put any questions to her except how her mistress found it out. She told me she had been examined, but whether at her father's house or at the hospital I cannot say. I never saw Holmes.

Elizabeth Stafford, wife of George Stafford:

Holmes lodged in my house. On the 5th Sept. I first heard of this charge. On the 27th Sept. I met prosecutrix. We went into the Prince of Wales and had something to drink. I have seen Holmes and Furness together. Prosecutrix put her hand where she ought not. Prosecutrix said "He has not done anything to hurt me." I have seen her kiss him lots of times; she always kissed him first.

Cross-examined:

I saw her put her hand where she ought not in a passage as she was coming back. It was some few weeks ago, not many before this charge was made, only a small time before he was locked up; it was between eight and nine in the evening. There was a lamp on the kitchen mantelpiece which threw a light. He was going to kiss her, and she was going to kiss him. She threw her hand like this (showing how). I told Mrs. Tyler I had forgotten to mention before the magistrate about her putting her hand where she should not. Every one said I should have to mention it. I was only examined once. I was asked whether I had seen anything more; I said no.

Robert Sharp:

I am nineteen years old. Q. Have you ever had connection with Sarah Palmer?

Question objected to. Objection allowed.

Straight for the prisoners.—The authorities on this question are conflicting. The only defence raised at the trial was the consent of the prosecutrix to the alleged indecent assault. The evidence was material to the issue because it went to her credibility. The cases of Rex v. Hodgson (Russ. & Ry. 211), and Reg. v. Cockroft are decisions against the admissibility of evidence to contradict the prosecutrix; but Rex v. Hodgson was decided at a period when a more extensive protection was allowed to witnesses than now. In that case the prosecutrix was told she need not answer the question—whether she had had connection with a named man? on the ground that the answer might tend to criminate her, and she declined to answer, so that the question now raised did not arise. The question here is, the prosecutrix having denied having had connection with any other man whatever, can a man be called to contradict her, and prove that he has had connection with her? In this case the prosecutrix stands in a peculiar position in relation to the charge, and great latitude is allowed as to evidence affecting her general character. In Reg. v. Eyre (2 F. & F. 579) Byles J. held in a case of rape that not only what the prosecutrix said immediately after the occasion, but what was said in answer to her, was receivable. So Martin B. in Reg. v. Arnall (6 Cox. C. C. 439) admitted on a trial for rape evidence of a conversation between two persons in relation to the charge made in the presence of the prosecutrix. The credibility of the prosecutrix is to a very great extent mixed up with the charge. The case of Reg. v. Robins (2 Moo. & Rob. 512) is a direct authority in favour of the admission of the evidence. In that case the prosecutrix denied having had connection with a man named. And Coleridge J., after consulting with Erskine J., said that neither he nor that learned judge had any doubt on the question, and that it was not immaterial to the question whether the prosecutrix had had this connection against her consent to show that she had permitted other men to have connection with her, which, on her cross-examination, she had denied. In Rex v. Barker (3 C. & P. 588), evidence of the general looseness of character of the prosecutrix was admitted, but Park J. doubted whether particular acts of intercourse could be proved. In Rex v. Martin (6 C. & P. 562) Williams J. allowed evidence to be given of the previous intercourse between the prosecutrix and one of the prisoners, but not between her and other men. In Reg. v. Cockroft the prosecutrix declined to answer the question whether she had had intercourse with other men, and so the question did not arise.

Oppenheim for the prosecution.—It is submitted that the proposed contradiction is not relative to the issue upon the indictment. Before the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 24, the cross-examining counsel was bound by the answer of a witness to the question whether he had been convicted, but that section enables him to prove the fact by the production of the certificate of conviction in case the witness denies it. Evidence of a previous connection with the prisoner may be shown, but not with other men; for that is not relevant to the issue, as a rape may be committed on a prostitute. So, too, general evidence of lightness of character on the part of the prosecution is admissible. In Rex v. Clarke (2 Stark. Rep. 241) Holroyd, J. admitted evidence of the prosecutrix's loose character, but refused to allow evidence of particular acts.

Kelly, C. B.—The question in this case is of very great importance, and if we had entertained a substantial doubt upon it, we should have desired the case to be re-argued before all the judges: but, to the principle of evidence and the authoon it, it seems impossible to entertain a doubt that the evidence tendered to conthe prosecutrix was inadmissible. On the an indictment for a rape, or an attempt to a rape, or for an indecent assault, which may amount to an attempt to commit a the prosecutrix is asked whether she has connection with some other man named, denies it, we are clearly of opinion that an cannot be called to contradict her. The principle is, that when a witness is exas to a collateral fact, the answer must be er better or worse, and he cannot be cond as to that by a third person. If the providence were receivable, the prosecutrix e cross-examined as to the whole history life, and one, ten, or even fifty persons e called to contradict her on various points vidence, and she be totally unprepared to e evidence of contradiction of any one . On principle, therefore, I am of opinion party cross-examining on such collateral ust be bound by the answers, otherwould lead to a multiplication of colsues, and would be attended with great ience and injustice to the prosecutrix. e authorities, the ground for the rejection idence is still stronger. Rex v. Hodgson ision that the prosecutrix is not bound er the question whether she has not had on with another man named, and that could not be called to show that she had connection. That case, which is a direct y, was confirmed by the twelve judges. re is the case of Reg. v. Cockroft, in which B. and Willes, J. distinctly held that the rix was not bound to answer such quesd that if she did, witnesses could not be contradict her answers. We are now pon to overrule those decisions, on the y of Reg. v. Robins, where Coleridge, J., sulting Erskine, J., admitted evidence to ct. With regard to Rex v. Peake the really amounted to this, that the prosecus the associate of common prostitutes, evidence of general loose character has n held to be admissible in cases of this and so in Rex v. Martin. Such evidence ect bearing on the issue of consent or non on the part of the prosecutrix. No doubt e originally a difference of opinion on this , but in the last case the evidence was in accordance with the decision of the dges in Rex v. Hodgson, and we have the pinion of Coleridge, J. to the contrary. t, therefore, declare our opinion that the was inadmissible.

J.—I am of the same opinion. The quesbether the prosecutrix, who denied having ection with a particular man, can be con by the man who is produced as a witswear that he had connection with her. ot a contradiction material to the issue, pe may be committed upon a common e. I have had the opportunity of conay brothers Willes and Keating, JJ. and of the same opinion as they have already on, that the evidence of contradiction is issible. If the evidence is inadmissible se of rape, à fortiori it is inadmissible in of an indecent assault.

PIGOTT, B.—I think that such evidence of contradiction is not relevant to the issue, and would lead to injustice in many cases if it were receivable. The prosecutrix would be taken by surprise, and unprepared to rebut it.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. For a time I was inclined to a different opinion, but now I am quite convinced that the judgment of the court is right, and that such evidence is too remote from the issue. The collateral issue has no bearing on the real one, whether or no the particular act complained of was done with the consent or against the will of the prosecutrix.

HANNEN, J.—I think there is no distinction between the cases of rape and indecent assault, so far as regards this question, the same reasoning is applicable to both. It may be regarded as a matter going to the general character of the prosecutrix; but still I think the issue of connection with a named person is inadmissible. It would be impossible for the prosecutrix to be prepared for such a contradiction, and the alleged intercourse might have been under similar circumstances to that under investigation.

Conviction affirmed.

BRUTTON v. THE PARISH OF ST. GEORGE, HANOVER-SQUARE.

Metropolis Local Management Act—25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 75, 107—"Line of buildings"—Order to pull down—Service on occupier or builder—Delay.

The occupier of a house contracted with a builder for the erection of a conservatory over the portico. The framework was erected on the 24th Aug. 1869, but the building was not finally completed until the 20th Sept. On the 26th Aug. the vestry of the parish in which the house was situate had notice of the erection of the building, and on the 4th March 1870, claiming to act under the Metropolis Local Management Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) s. 75, they issued a summons, not to the occupier, but to the builder, to appear before the magistrate to show cause why the building should not be pulled down as constituting an offence within the Act. The builder having previously left the country did not appear, and an order was made for the demolition of the building. The 107*th section of the Act requires that any complaint under the Act must be made within six months after the commission or discovery of the offence:*

Held, first, that the summons was too late, the offence having been committed on the 24th Aug., and discovered on the 26th; secondly, that it should have been served on the occupier and not on the builder, who was not "engaged in" the work within the meaning of the 75*th section.*

IN Aug. 1869, the plaintiff, William Courtenay Brutton, being the tenant and occupier of a house, No. 12, Queen-street, Mayfair, in the county of Middlesex, a corner house with a portico projecting into the street, entered into a contract with a builder named Rudkin to erect a conservatory upon the portico for the sum of 129*l.* The framework of the conservatory was erected on the 24th Aug., but the building was not actually finished until the 29th Sept. On the 25th Aug. a person connected with the vestry of St. George's, Hanover-square, called at the house, inspected the works, and took down the names and addresses of Rudkin and the plaintiff. The plaintiff then went to the clerk of the vestry, and stated that if they made any objection to the proposed erection on the ground of its being contrary to the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) he should fight the question with them, and requested them to state their intentions before he proceeded further with the works. The vestry, however, made no communication whatever to the plaintiff before the following March.

Some time after the completion of the conservatory, the architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works sent in his certificate to the vestry, stating that the building extended beyond the "line of buildings," and was therefore an infringement of the Act.

On the 4th March 1870 the vestry took out a summons against Rudkin, who had in the meantime given up his business and gone away to Australia, requiring him to appear before the magistrate on the 11th March, to show cause why the conservatory should not be pulled down. A copy of the summons was left at Rudkin's former place of business, and was afterwards, on the 10th March, brought to the plaintiff by Rudkin's successor. The plaintiff immediately communicated with the solicitors of the vestry, stating that Rudkin could not be found, and at his request the hearing of the summons was adjourned. The summons was ultimately heard on the 22nd April, when the plaintiff attended, but the vestry objected to his appearing on the summons, as he was not served, and the plaintiff accordingly instructed counsel to appear for Rudkin. After hearing counsel, the magistrate himself inspected the premises, and intimated his opinion that the building created no nuisance, but was rather an ornament; but as the builder was technically wrong, he, at the instance of the vestry, made an order upon Rudkin to pull down the conservatory, but stated that he would willingly grant a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench as to the law upon the subject. There was, however, some delay in settling the case, and ultimately the magistrate signed the order, after which no case could be submitted to the Superior Court of law.

The plaintiff then having received notice from the defendants that they would proceed to demolish his conservatory on the 3rd Aug., on the 2nd Aug., filed the present bill, and on the 3rd obtained an interim injunction to restrain the demolition until the hearing.

The cause now came on for hearing. It appeared that the tenant of the house next to the plaintiff's, so far from complaining of the building, wrote him a letter expressing his approval of it.

The 75th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act, under which the vestry took the proceedings, enacts:

> That no building, structure, or erection shall, without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate, . . such general line of buildings to be decided by the superintending architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the time being; and in case any building, structure, or erection be erected, or begun to be erected or raised, without such consent, or contrary to the terms and conditions on which the same may have been granted, it shall be lawful for the vestry of the parish or the board of works for the district in which such building or erection is situate, to cause to be made a complaint thereof before a justice of the peace, who shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the owner or occupier of the premises, or the builder or person engaged in any work contrary to this enactment, to appear at a time and place to be stated in the summons to answer such complaint; and if at the time and place appointed in such summons the said complaint shall be proved to the satisfaction of the justice before whom the same shall be heard, such justice shall make an order in writing on such owner or occupier, builder, or person, directing the demolition of any such building or erection, or so much thereof as may be beyond the said general line so fixed as aforesaid, within such time as such justice shall consider reasonable; and shall also make an order for the payment of the costs incurred up to the time of hearing; and in default of the building or erection complained of being demolished within the time limited by the said order, the said vestry or board shall forthwith enter the premises to which the order relates, and demolish the building or erection complained of, and do whatever may be necessary to execute the said order, and may also remove the materials to a convenient place, and subsequently sell the same, as they think fit; and all expenses incurred by the said vestry or board in carrying out the said order, and in disposal of the said materials, may be recovered by the said vestry or board from the owner or occupier of the said premises, or the builder or person engaged in the work, either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the said vestry or board, in manner therein provided as to the recovery of penalties.

And by the 107th section it is enacted:

> That no person shall be liable for the payment of any penalty or forfeiture under the said recited Acts or this Act, or any bye-law made by virtue thereof, for any offence made cognizable before a justice, unless the complaint respecting such offence have been made before such justice within six months next after the commission or discovery of such offence.

Cottrell and Hume Williams (of the Common Law Bar) for the plaintiff.—The proceedings of the vestry have been altogether irregular. If the building constituted an offence within the meaning of the Act, which we deny, the complaint should have been made before the justice within six months after the commission of the offence. The offence was committed on the 24th Aug. 1869, when the framework was completed, and was discovered on the 25th or 26th, but the summons was not taken out until the 4th March, 1870. Again, the wrong person was served, for the occupier was the proper person to serve, and not the builder, who had finished the building and had gone away and been paid. The Act says that the notice must be given to the occupier, or builder engaged, that is, actually engaged at the time, not who had been engaged. The reason why the Act provides for service on the builder is, that while the building is in course of construction, he is at law presumed to be acting under the authority of the owner or occupier. The decision of the architect to the Board of Works as to what is the "line of buildings" is not conclusive. It was monstrous to make the order for demolition without giving the plaintiff, the person most affected, proper notice. Whether the building constituted an offence or not, it is now too late for the vestry to take fresh proceedings under the Act. They cited

Cooper v. The Wandsworth Board of Works, 14 C.B. N. S., 180; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278;

Simpson v. Smith, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 87;

And the following Metropolitan Local Management Acts:

18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 220;

18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, ss. 38, 39, 45, 105;
25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 75, 107.

Schomberg, Q.C. and Streeten (of the Common Law Bar), for the defendants.—The vestry had the power of proceeding either against the owner, occupier, or builder, as they chose to select, and in serving the notice on the builder they were perfectly regular. The six months required by the Act did not commence to run until the actual completion of the building on the 20th Sept. 1869; therefore, the notice of the 4th March was not too late. The vestry could not have proceeded until they had received the report of the architect to the Board of Works. The plaintiff commenced erecting this building without complying with the provisions of the Acts of Parliament, and therefore cannot now ask for relief. The "line of buildings" as fixed by the architect must be taken as correct. They cited

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that it was a fair question which was the front line of the houses in the street, but that in his view the portico must be taken as the front line. At all events, the plaintiff was justified in contesting the question with the vestry, and if they intended to persist in their objection to the erection of the conservatory, their proper course would have been to have given the plaintiff notice to that effect as soon as they discovered what was being done, instead of waiting till the work had been completed. It was clear that the offence, if offence it was, commenced on the 24th Aug., when the framework of the conservatory was erected, and it was admitted that the summons might have been taken out that evening, or on the morning of the 25th. The six months allowed by the Act then began to run on the 24th, the day when the offence was committed, and expired on the 24th Feb. following. At all events, the vestry were aware of the offence on the 26th Aug., and was it to be said that they were entitled to lie by until the 4th March 1870, and allow the offence to be committed without taking steps to prevent it? On the 4th March 1870 they took out a summons, not against the occupier, but against Rudkin, who had finished the work and gone away to Australia, and they left the notice at his place of business, it being his place of business no longer, and, but for the accidental circumstance of a workman sending the notice to the plaintiff, the farce would have been gone through on the 10th March of making an order upon Rudkin in Australia to pull down part of Brutton's house in London, and it might have been pulled down by the parish officers without any previous notice whatever to the occupier. It was most remarkable that such an absurd proceeding should have been possible. The question now to be decided was, had the vestry acted within the powers of the Metropolis Local Management Act? It was true that it was for the public benefit that the uniformity of streets should be maintained, and persons who infringed upon the provisions of the law for that purpose ought no doubt to be brought to justice; but when such large powers were possessed by a public body, it was most important that they should be reasonably and rationally exercised, and that the parties affected thereby should have an opportunity of being heard. Now the vestry contended that they were right in serving the notice upon the builder, and that his liability continued for six months after the completion of the work. The case turned on the 75th section of the Act, which said, that the notice was to be served upon the "owner or occupier of the premises, or the builder, or person engaged in" the work. What was the meaning of that section? Rudkin, the builder, was not the "person engaged in" the work. He had gone away and been paid, and had no further connection with the building. Nothing could be more absurd than that the vestry should think that serving the notice on Rudkin was equivalent to serving it on the occupier. There could be no doubt whatever that where there was a known occupier, he was the person to be applied to, but if the occupier was not known, then the notice was to be served upon the builder actually engaged in the work, not upon a builder who had some time before been engaged in the work. The builder while engaged in the work was the agent of the occupier, and had an interest in it, but directly he had completed his work and gone away, what interest had he? He was therefore of opinion that the notice of the 4th March was a void notice altogether. Nothing could be more irrational than the conduct of the vestry in thinking that a notice on Rudkin, who had no interest in the question, was a sufficient notice on the plaintiff; and there was no body of rational men in the world who would not have shuddered at the idea of destroying the property of one man by a notice served upon another, whose interest in the property had altogether ceased. He therefore decided that the notice to Rudkin was a nullity. It was said by way of excuse for the delay that no proceedings could be taken before the architect of the Metropolitan Board of Works had made his report, but he was of opinion that the vestry were not bound to wait for his report. First, then, he decided that the offence commenced on the 24th Aug. 1869; secondly, that the notice on Rudkin was a mere nullity, he being the wrong man to serve. The next question then was, were the proceedings taken in due time? The 107th section of the Act directed that the complaint should be made within six months after the commission or discovery of the offence. But the summons was not taken out until after the six months had expired. That summons was therefore too late, and a nullity also. The Act provided only one way of proceeding—namely, by summons; personal remonstrance would not do; letters would not do; it must be by summons, and the summons here was too late. It was not pretended that this conservatory was calculated to injure a single human being. The only person who could have been annoyed by it was the plaintiff's next door neighbour, who, so far from saying that it was a nuisance, said that he thought it an improvement. Under these circumstances, what excuse was there for these parish officers? In spite of all the remonstrances of the plaintiff and his solicitor, they made this order for the demolition of this conservatory, and the plaintiff's only remedy was to come to this court, otherwise they would undoubtedly have demolished it. The plaintiff had done perfectly right in appealing to this court for protection, and the parish officers had been irrational, unreasonable, and wrong in every step they had taken in the matter. If the building erected by the plaintiff was not lawful from the commencement, time had made it lawful, and the plaintiff had established his right to a perpetual injunction from interfering with it, as prayed by the bill, and the defendants must pay the costs of the suit.

Thursday, Jan. 11, 1872.

Re THE ENDOWMENT CALLED THE MEYRICK FUND; Re THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT 1869; Re THE CHARITABLE TRUSTS ACT 1853.

Endowed Schools Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56)—Educational endowment — University exhibitions — "Meyrick's Fund"—Motion to enforce information as to—Jurisdiction of commissioner.

A. by his will, in 1712, after bequeathing a certain portion of his property to trustees to provide annual exhibitions for scholars of Jesus College, Oxford, to be selected from the principality of Wales, and to be resident at the college, left the residue of his estate for the purchase of advowsons to be held by the exhibitioners, and to which the governing body of the college were to have the right of presentation. The exhibitions were provided for, and the residue of the estate had been applied by the governing body of the college in the purchase of livings which were held by former exhibitioners.

Held, that the Endowed Schools Commissioners had, for the purposes of a scheme, power under the Endowed Schools Act 1869, to call upon the college to furnish information as to the endowment.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the Endowed Schools Commissioners that the bursar of Jesus College, Oxford, being the person having the actual possession or control of the documents concerning the above endowment, or the property thereof, might be committed for contempt of court, as after mentioned, and that a suit of sequestration might be ordered to issue against the property and effects of the principal, fellows, and scholars of the said college, as being the corporate body acting or concerned in the administration of the said endowment, its property and income, and in receipt and payment of the moneys thereof, and being the depositories of the funds of the same, for a like contempt, such contempt consisting in the refusal of the said bursar and of the said principal, fellows, and scholars of the said college, to comply with requisitions made to them by the said commissioners, under the authority of the above Acts, to render certain accounts and statements, and answers to inquiries relating to the said endowment, and the property and income thereof. The facts of the case were these:—

The Rev. Edmund Meyrick, by his will dated the 25th March 1712, after stating that he had always intended to bestow a good part of what God should please to bless him withal, for the encouragement of learning in Jesus College, Oxford, and for the better maintenance of six of the junior scholars who were scholars of the foundation of the college out of the six counties of North Wales, gave and devised and bequeathed a certain portion of his estate to trustees, in trust to give to each of the said scholars the annual sum of 10*l.* during his residence in the college. The testator then proceeded to make a provision for the maintenance and settlement of six exhibitioners in the college, who were to be natives of the six counties of North Wales, giving a preference to his own kindred, and to each of these he directed his trustees to give the annual sum of 8*l.* during his residence in the college. And the testator gave and devised the residue of his estate to his trustees in trust for purchasing advowsons to be held by the said exhibitioners and scholars, and to which the principal and fellows of the said college were to present; and he appointed the Bishop of Hereford, Dr. Jonathan Edwards, then principal of Jesus College, Dr. H. S. Scannon, and Dr. J. Wynn, trustees of his will.

After the testator's death the sums bequeathed to the scholars and exhibitioners were regularly paid, and the residue of the estate, amounting to about £900 a year, and which was called the Meyrick fund, was applied by the governing body of the college in the purchase of livings, which were presented to former scholars and exhibitioners.

Shortly after the Endowed Schools Act 1869, came into operation, the commissioners called upon the principal, bursar, and fellows of the college to answer the following requisitions in reference to the fund. (a) An account of the property belonging to the endowment. (b) An account of the receipts and expenditure for the four years ending the 31st Dec. 1870. (c) A list of the persons holding exhibitions under the foundation. (d) A list of the trustees in whom any portion of the endowment is legally vested. (e) A list of the managing trustees, if different from those who now hold the property. (f) A statement of the scheme, statutes, or ordinances, which now govern the endowment. The authorities of the college, however, considering that the endowment was not within the meaning of the Endowed Schools Act, declined to answer the requisitions.

Thereupon these proceedings were taken, under the 49th sect. of the Endowed Schools Act, which gives to the commissioners the same powers of demanding information as are given to the Charity Commissioners by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137 s. 11 and by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 124, ss. 6 and 9, and under which last clause the penalty for refusing information is the liability to be committed for contempt of court. The arguments mainly turned upon the construction of the 5th section, and the 4th clause of the 14th section of the Act of 1869. The 5th section defines an "educational endowment" as "an endowment, or any part of an endowment which, or the income whereof, has been made applicable, or is applied for the purposes of education at a school of boys and girls, or either of them, or of exhibitions tenable at a school or university, or elsewhere." The 4th clause of the 14th section provides that nothing in the Act shall authorise the making of any scheme interfering with the constitution of the governing body of any school, or with any exhibition (other than one restricted to any school or schools, or district), forming part of the foundation of any college in Oxford or Cambridge, unless the college assent to the scheme." By the interpretation clause the term "exhibition" is

However, I think if the 5th and 14th sections of the Act receive their natural construction, the words cover the point. Universities being expressly referred to in those sections, it is said that the Act refers to districts, and that the principality of Wales is not a district; but it is quite as much so as the counties of Durham, York, or Middlesex, although perhaps the Act contemplated much smaller districts. It is also said that the commissioners might make a scheme, which will not be a proper one, having regard to the nature and origin of the fund; but, if that is so, there is a remedy. Upon the whole, I hold that the commissioners have the jurisdiction which they claim, and that, therefore, they are entitled to the discovery which they seek to obtain. The motion must be allowed with costs.

THE MUTUAL TONTINE WESTMINSTER CHAMBERS ASSOCIATION (LIMITED) (apps.) v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMISSIONERS OF ST. GEORGE'S UNION (resps).

Tenements structurally divided—Control of outer door—Kind of tenancy—Rateability.

The appellants were owners of the Westminster Chambers, consisting of seven blocks of building, each with an entrance door and a staircase. They contained altogether 117 sets of rooms, structurally divided, each with an outer door on to the staircase, and having no other communication with each other. The street door to each block was kept locked at night, and a porter, who was hired by the appellants, resided in each block, and had a key of and access to all the sets of rooms in the building for the purpose of a general superintendence, and as the servant of the occupiers. The form of agreement between the appellants and occupiers, contained the usual clauses in the lease of a separate house—such as power to the landlord to enter and paint, and to enter and see repairs carried out, &c.:

Held, that each set of rooms ought to be separately placed upon the valuation list of the parish, and each occupier separately rated to the relief of the poor.

SPECIAL case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, pursuant to an order of the Court of General Assessment Sessions, holden under and by virtue of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, at the Guildhall, Westminster, on the 4th March 1871.

The Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association (Limited), hereinafter called the appellants, had objected before the assessment committee of the St. George's Union to the valuation of certain buildings, known as and hereafter called "The Westminster Chambers," as made in the valuation list of the parish of St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, of which the appellants were the owners; and being aggrieved by the decision of the said assessment committee thereon, they duly appealed against the same to the Court of General Assessment Sessions, on the ground (amongst others) that the Westminster Chambers were erroneously assessed in the said valuation list as 117 hereditaments, and should have been assessed as seven hereditaments only.

The Westminster Chambers consist of seven blocks of building, having seven principal entrances. Each of these blocks is divided into two ranges by an internal staircase, which has only one door at the principal or street entrance. These blocks of buildings are structurally divided into one hundred and seventeen different suites or sets of rooms, which are quite distinct from each other, like chambers in the inns of court, and are in some instances let and occupied, and are in every instance capable of being let and occupied separately as residences or offices; each suite or set of rooms has an outer door, opening on to one of the said internal staircases, and also an inner private hall or passage, a water-closet, and a lavatory. There is no means of communication between these suites or sets of rooms except the said internal staircases.

The form of agreement hereafter set out, with the memorandum and schedule, shows the terms upon which the rooms are let, and such agreement is to be taken as forming part of this case.

The outer or street door to each block of building is kept locked at night, and a porter, who is hired by the appellants, resides in a distinct set of rooms in the basement of each block of building, and has a key of and access to the suites or sets of rooms in such building, for the purpose of a general superintendence, and as the servant of the occupiers respectively, by whom he is in some cases employed and paid for looking after the rooms.

The Westminster Improvement Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 176), s. 69, applies to the appellants, and enacts:—

That where any house erected on land of the commissioners shall be occupied, or be intended to be occupied by different persons in distinct sets of apartments, the commissioners, their successors or assigns, may, if they shall think fit so to do, demise or sell any set of apartments separately from the rest of the said house.

The appellants provide gas for the staircases and passages, and water for the entire buildings, and pay all rates and taxes in respect thereof, charging their tenants higher rents in consequence.

Upon the same facts, the commissioners of assessed taxes had, under the 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, stated a case for the opinion of her Majesty's judges, as to whether the assessment of the Westminster Chambers to the house duty should be on seven blocks of building, or on each suite or set of rooms, as distinct properties, according to the 14th Rule of Schedule B of that Act; and the judges had decided that the Westminster Chambers should be assessed in seven blocks.

The appellants contended that the Westminster Chambers ought to be assessed in the said valuation list as seven hereditaments only, relying on the decision of the judges above mentioned. The respondents contended that that decision had no bearing on this case, and that the Westminster Chambers were correctly assessed in the said valuation list, by treating each of the said suites or sets of rooms as a rateable hereditament.

The Court of General Assessment Sessions decided that the Westminster Chambers ought to be assessed as seven hereditaments, and ordered that the said valuation list be altered, by striking out the separate valuation of each suite or set of rooms, and inserting in lieu thereof a separate valuation of each of the said seven blocks of building, subject, nevertheless, to a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, on the question whether the Westminster Chambers ought to be separately valued in the said valuation list in suites or sets of rooms, as distinct, separate, rateable hereditaments, or in seven blocks of building.

The said court further ordered that the question of value be heard and determined after the decision of the case by the Court of Queen's Bench, and that the costs of the appeal remain subject to the order of the Court of General Assessment Sessions.

If the court is of opinion that the decision of the sessions is right, the valuation list is to be amended accordingly, otherwise to remain as approved of by the assessment committee; in either case subject to the decision of the sessions on the question of value, and the costs of the appeal.

The following is the form of agreement before alluded to:—

An agreement made and entered into the day of 18 between the Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association (Limited), by George Sands Sidney, their secretary, hereinafter called the lessors of the one part, and hereinafter called the lessee of the other part. The lessors hereby let, and the lessee hereby takes, all that rooms numbered and being on the floor of the building, and numbered of the chambers belonging to the association, called the Westminster Chambers, situate in Victoria-street, in the city of Westminster, together with the use of the water closet and washing closet attached thereto, and also the use in common with other tenants of the entrance hall, and stairs, and lift leading to the same premises, for the term of year from the day of 18 , and so on from quarter to quarter, but determinable at the end of the first quarter, or of any subsequent quarter, by either of the parties giving to the other of them three calendar months previous notice in writing for that purpose, and under the quarterly rent of l., payable on the usual quarter days, free from all deductions whatsoever, the lessors hereby agreeing to pay all taxes, rates, assessments, and impositions, parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise, charged or to be charged on the premises, but if the premises shall be rendered uninhabitable by fire not originating therein, and not occasioned by the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or his or their servants, the rent shall be suspended until the premises are rendered habitable. And the lessors and lessee hereby mutually agree, &c.

Then came the usual agreements in the lease of a house, and at the end was added—

Memorandum.—The premises are taken by the lessee, subject to the regulations made by the lessors with respect to the duties of the porter, the supply of coal, and other matters for the general convenience of the tenants. These regulations are set forth in the schedule to this agreement, and are to be considered as forming part. The lessors, however, reserve to themselves the right of altering and modifying these regulations from time to time, as the convenience of the tenants or other circumstances may render desirable.

In the schedule referred to were—

THE REGULATIONS.

Memorandum of regulations made by the directors in respect of supply of coals, cleaning rooms, &c.

There are seven entrances to the building, and the care of each entrance, and the rooms connected therewith, will be in the charge of a resident porter, appointed and removable by the directors. There are duplicate keys to the outer door of every set of chambers, one of which is to be always in the hands of the porter, the other in the case of the tenant, while the rooms are in use. The tenants have the right, free of charge, to the general services of the porter, within the scope of his general duties, as hereinbefore defined. Tenants have the right to the special services of the porter, as hereinafter defined, upon the terms hereinafter mentioned. Coals are supplied by the directors at a charge of 3½d. per measure of 900 cubic inches, and wood at 1d. for each fire lighted, and gas is brought to the entrance of each set of rooms, and may be laid on by the tenants at their own expense, if desired. Tenants are not allowed to have stores of coals in their rooms. The general duties of the porter, and which are to be performed free of charge to the tenants, are as follows:—To be constantly in attendance in the section of the building committed to his charge, either by himself or, in his temporary absence, by some trustworthy assistant. To cleanse every morning, before nine o'clock, A.M., the general stairs, passages, lifts, and entrances attached to the section, and to attend to the lighting and extinguishing of the gas therein. To receive and deliver to the several tenants all letters, parcels, and messages, and to receive the keys of the outer doors of the several sets of rooms from the tenants on their leaving for the night. To attend to the regular and proper supply of coals to the several apartments. The special services of the porter which he is bound to render to the several tenants, if required, at a charge of 1s. 6d. per week for each room, comprise the cleansing and arrangement of each such room, and the lighting of the several fires, whenever required. Any extra services required of the porter by the tenant, and which are not inconsistant with his general duties, are to be the subjects of special arrangement. Any services, whether special or extra, so rendered by the porter, will be rendered as the servant of the tenant, and for which, or the consequences thereof, the association will not be responsible.

Poland argued for the appellants that the respondents were wrong, and the Court of General Assessment Sessions were right. The general superintendence of the chambers, reserved by the appellants through the porter of each block, renders the occupation that of mere lodgers, who ought not to be separately assessed to the relief of the poor. By the registration cases which have been decided under the different Acts concerning the representation of the people, the test for separate rating has been not the structural severance of the tenement only, but also the reservation by the landlord of the control of the outer door:—

Hewetts v. Booth, 15 C. B., N. S., 500;
Pitt v. Smedley, 7 M. & G. 85.

Manisty, Q. C. and Streeten appeared for the respondents, but were not heard.

COCKBURN, C. J.—There is no occasion to call upon the other side. The case is a very clear one. There can be no doubt that each occupier of the hundred and seventeen sets is separately rateable to the relief of the poor, and consequently there should be a valuation of each in the assessment list. The alteration in the original list by the Court of General Assessment Sessions, was, therefore, an error, and must be set right. The question in these cases always is, whether the occupier has a distinct and separate habitation, or is a mere inmate with the landlord. Sometimes it is not easy to say which he is, but one of the tests adopted is whether the landlord reserves to himself the control of the outer door, so that although liable, perhaps, upon the contract between them, yet the tenant cannot maintain trespass against the landlord for entering his rooms. Here, I conceive, in accordance with that rule, these occupiers would have been mere inmates if the appellants had reserved the control of the outer door of each block of buildings. To decide whether they have done so, I look at the agreement between them and the occupiers. I find in the agreement all the characteristics of a lease, and in the clauses all the provisions of a tenancy under a lease. The landlord has no right to enter the premises which are to be occupied by the tenant. There is to be a porter in each block appointed by the appellants, but he is only for the convenience of the inhabitants, not to secure for the landlord a control over the rooms, or a right to enter them. It is stipulated that the porter may take care of the keys in the absence of the occupiers, but he is bound, as their servant, to give them up when asked for them. There is nothing in the agreement to prevent a man from going out and taking his key in his pocket. It seems, therefore, to be a plain case, for the agreement fails to show such a control over the outer door in the landlord, as to enable him to exclude the tenant from entering without being liable for trespass.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case it is the duty of the overseers of every parish to make a valuation list of their parish, and it is the duty of the assessment committee to revise the valuation lists, in accordance with the statutes. If, therefore, each set of these rooms is liable to the poor rate, and each occupier is rateable, the committee ought to put each set in the list. No doubt, in point of law, a landlord may agree to let a portion of his house upon any terms he pleases, but the rateability of the tenant must depend upon the agreement containing the terms of the tenancy, if there be one, or upon the facts concerning his occupation, if there be no agreement. I think it will be found that all these registration cases come to this,—when there is no demise in writing, it becomes of importance to consider the control of the outer door; but when there is a lease or an agreement before the court, from which the nature of the tenancy may be gathered, it is not of so much consequence what control the landlord has over the door. In the case of Reg. v. Smith (30 L. J. 74, M. C.; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 437), the question was whether the appellant had exclusive occupation of the whole of his house, and the ground upon which the judgment of Hill, J. and myself was given in favour of the exclusive occupation, was the substance of the agreement, by which we considered that the appellant had retained possession of all the rooms, although he had agreed to allow another person to have the occupation of some of them. The substance of the agreement was, too, the ground of our decision in Roads v. Trumpington (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 56; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 821). Now, look at this agreement, and say whether it can be maintained that the lessor did not intend to part with the control of the various rooms to the occupiers. It seems to me that such an assertion would be monstrous. It is clear that each tenant has the exclusive occupation of his rooms, and ought to be rated separately. It is suggested in the case that our decision in this way is opposed to that of the judges who have decided concerning these same premises with respect to the inhabited house duty; but there each tenement must be a distinct property, and that point is of no authority with regard to the present question.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The stipulations of this agreement are ordinarily found in the lease of a house, about which there is no doubt of its distinct rateability. The usual powers of re-entry contained in it would be unnecessary if Mr. Poland's contention were right. All the clauses go to show a separate tenancy, and it is a mistake to say that the porter is in any way the representative of the appellants; he is provided by them, but that is an arrangement for the convenience of the tenants. There is no duty upon his part inconsistent with the separate and distinct tenancy of each of the occupiers. They can employ him in any way they like. There may be nice points as to the amount of control a landlord has over the outer door, but upon this agreement there can be no doubt the occupiers should be rated separately.

THE VESTRY AND PARISH OF ST. MARY, NEWINGTON (apps.) v. JACOBS (resp.)

Right of owner of land dedicated to public use—Highway—Access to property—Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 50) s. 72—Metropolis Local Management Act) 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) ss. 96, 98.

The owner of land, who dedicates a portion of it to public use as a highway, parts with no other right than a right of passage to the public over the land so dedicated, and may exercise all other rights of ownership not inconsistent therewith; and the appropriation made to and adopted by the public of a part of the street to one kind of passage, and of another part to another, does not deprive him of any rights, as owner of the land, which are not inconsistent with the right of passage by the public.

The provisions of the Highway Acts and the Metrolis Local Management Act, so far as they apply to roads or streets, are subordinate to the paramount rights reserved by the owner.

Where, on a summons against the respondent under the Highway Act for doing damage to a highway, it appeared that the respondent, the owner and occupier of premises adjoining a public highway, used the premises for the deposit of heavy machinery, which he conveyed to and from the premises across the flagged pavement or footway in front of them, in trolleys or waggons which injured the pavement, and it was found by the magistrate that the premises in question could not be reasonably enjoyed without access across the footway, and that the rights of ownership and those of the public might be jointly exercised consistently with the general welfare, it was Held that the magistrate was not bound to convict, and was justified in dismissing the summons.

THIS was a case stated by one of the metropolitan police magistrates under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The appellants are the vestry of the parish of St. Mary, Newington, to whom, by sect. 96 of the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), the powers and duties of surveyors of highways and the property vested in such surveyors are transferred.

The respondent is the occupier of premises abutting towards the west on a highway in the parish called Newington Causeway, such highway consisting of a foot pavement and a roadway. The respondent's premises also abut on Tiverton-street, in the east, and part of them are arches, over which is the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. Adjoining the pavement is the dead wall of the railway arches, extending about 60ft. along the pavement.

This respondent is the tenant of the railway company, and is, for the purposes of this case, to be treated as standing in the position of the railway company, the freeholders.

The footway of Newington Causeway is a flagged pavement, about 27ft. wide, and extending from King's place to the corner of the New Kent-road, having on that (the east) side only four roads or carriage ways intersecting it—namely, at Rockingham-street, at Mead's-place, the entrance to the Surrey Sessions House, and at Horsemonger-lane—all narrow ways. On the west side of the road, facing Newington Causeway, are many crossings and carriage ways; and that side is in the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, and its use as a highway is not nearly so ancient as that of the east side. The Causeway was originally a foot and bridle way. Until the year 1865, when the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway was formed, under parliamentary powers, from Ludgate-hill to Victoria, there was one continuous and unbroken line of shops from Rockingham-street to the entrance of the Surrey Sessions-house, such shops being used for the display of goods. Within that distance there was no break of flag pavement, and no road for carriages and horses across it, there being no premises to which such access was required. The pavement for some length of time has been a promenade for the south side of London, and the keepers of shops abutting upon it, have paid higher rates and rents, in consequence of the very large number of purchasers frequenting it on foot.

For sixty years and upwards the inhabitants of St. Mary, Newington, wishing to have access to these premises across a footway, have always applied to the highway board, and, since that board has been abolished, to the vestry, for permission to do so, and there is no instance of a refusal recorded in the parish books, although there are entries of such concessions upon terms.

The respondent became the tenant of the railway company in June 1870, and subsequently by deed dated the 31st Sept. 1870, of the premises in question, which consist of a yard, building, and railway arches, with a gateway opening on to the pavement. In consequence of the railway arches and wall the premises are unfit for dwelling-houses, and they are used by the respondent as a deposit for new and second-hand machinery, engines, boilers, and other implements of the heaviest description, some single pieces weighing as much as seven or eight tons. Sometimes four, five, or six horses, have been required to draw in the carriage or trolleys on which such pieces were placed, and it was impossible to turn a team of horses of that length from Tiverton-street into the premises of the respondent, so that practically the only access for such goods to his premises was across the pavement of Newington Causeway. At first, the respondent, instead of using horses for the purpose, unloaded from the carriage or trolleys in the roadway at Newington Causeway, and by the aid of rollers and levers slowly moved the huge machinery, &c., across the pavement into his premises. This occupied much time and caused an obstruction of the pavement which was alleged to be a nuisance, and was the subject of complaint by the shopkeepers aforesaid as injurious to their trade.

In the month of June 1870, the respondent applied in writing to the appellants for leave at his own expense to take up the flag pavement in front of his gate, and to lay down paving stones, so as to form a carriage entrance from the roadway to his premises on the same level as the present flagged footway. The application was fully considered and discussed, and by a vote of the majority of the vestry was refused.

It was proved that in the months of Nov. and Dec. 1870, the respondent proceeded to drive carriages or trolleys laden with machinery across the pavement, and that by reason of the extraordinary weight of the machinery, &c., the flags became broken and crushed, and damage had thereby been done to the pavement to the amount of 3*l.* 12*s.* A demand of payment was made by the vestry clerk, and refused by the respondent. The respondent was then summoned, under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 72, for causing injury or damage to be done to the highway.

It was contended on the part of the respondent that he was entitled to take goods into his yard or premises, and that to do this he must cross the pavement with them; that it occupied less time and far less obstructed the traffic if he drew them across upon wheels and with horses; that the damage was not wilful, but a necessary result of the refusal of the board to permit him to replace the flags with hard materials, and that therefore he was not responsible under the summons.

On the part of the appellants this contention was traversed, and it was contended that there had been a special dedication by all the adjoining owners of land of this pavement as a pavement for foot passengers only, and that as it had been acquiesced in for more than sixty years all antagonistic rights of user had been forfeited and foregone by each individual freeholder; that the public had by undisturbed user for more than sixty years acquired an indefeasible right to have the pavement used as a footway only, and it was not competent for the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company to let the land for the purposes in question, as it would create a public nuisance, and was in contravention of their statutory obligation requiring them to keep on one side of their line eight feet at least uncovered and unbuilt upon, and that the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway could not so use the land themselves.

The opinion of the police magistrate was that the injury or damage was not wilfully done to the highway, that the freehold property in question could not be reasonably enjoyed without access across the existing footway, and that the rights of ownership and of the public might be jointly exercised there quite consistently with the general welfare; and the magistrate dismissed the summons.

The question for the court was whether the magistrate was right in dismissing the summons. If he ought to have convicted the respondent the case was to be remitted to him to adjudicate upon.

Manisty, Q. C. (with him E. Clarke), for the appellants.—The case finds a dedication of the highway to the public, and no user can be permitted or is lawful which is inconsistent with that dedication. The dragging across this footway of heavily laden waggons, which injured the pavement, is inconsistent with a dedication of this pavement as a public footway. As to the respondent's contention that the damage done to the pavement was not wilful, but was a necessary result of the refusal of the board to permit him to replace the flags with hard material, it is enough to answer that the word "wilful" does not occur in the 72nd section of the Highway Act in connection with injuries or damages done to highways, but only in regard to riding upon any footpath or causeway.

Metcalfe (with him R. Browne) for the respondent.—No doubt it is not necessary to show that the act of the respondent was done wilfully, but it must be shown that it was unlawful. But the respondent had a right to make the use he did of the footway, for such user was not inconsistent with the dedication of the highway to the public. The magistrate finds expressly that the respondents' property could not be reasonably enjoyed without access across the existing footway, and that the rights of ownership and of the public might be jointly exercised there quite consistently with the general welfare. There was practically no other access to the premises than across this footway; and provided the respondent did not keep his trolleys an unreasonably long time on the footway he does not commit any offence. "A cart or waggon," says Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in R. v. Jones (3 Camp. 231), "may be unloaded at a gateway, but this must be done with promptness. So as to the repairing of a house: the public must submit to the inconvenience occasioned necessarily in repairing the house; but if this inconvenience is prolonged for an unreasonable time, the public have a right to complain, and the party may be indicted for a nuisance." So in Rex v. Cross (3 Camp. 227) the same learned judge says, "a stage coach may set down or take up passengers in the street, this being necessary for public convenience, but it must be done in a reasonable time." Reg. v. Longton Gas Company (2 E. & E. 651) was also referred to.

Manisty, Q. C. in reply.

Cur adv. vult.

Dec. 11.—The judgment of the court (Cockburn, C.J., Mellor and Hannen, JJ.), was now delivered by MELLOR, J.—In this case the question submitted to us by the magistrate is whether, upon the facts stated and found by him, he ought to have convicted the respondent. We consider the question to mean, Was he bound to convict the respondent? We are of opinion that he was not so bound, and that he therefore was justified in dismissing the summons. The appellants are the vestry of St. Mary, Newington, who, under the provision of the Metropolitan Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), exercise the functions of surveyors of highways and are, by sect. 98 of that Act, enabled from time to time to cause the streets within their district to be paved and repaired, and to cause the ground or soil thereof to be raised and lowered. The vestry, as surveyors of the highways, complained of the acts of the respondents as falling within section 72 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, by "causing injury or damage to be done" to the highway termed Newington Causeway. There is no doubt that had the acts in question been done by a stranger, or by an ordinary passenger, they would have fallen within the section referred to, and in such case the appellants, in their character of surveyors of the highways within the parish, would have been the proper persons to prosecute the complaint. The appellant is, however, the owner of premises contiguous to Newington Causeway, and the acts complained of were done by him in the carrying on of his ordinary business in such premises, and upon that part of the footway which lies immediately in front thereof. The vestry had previously refused permission to the respondent to take up the flags, and make a proper paved carriage access across the Causeway to his premises, which premises he was in the habit of using for storing up machinery of a very weighty sort. The respondent having applied the premises to this purpose, conveyed the machinery across the Causeway by means of rollers and levers, but, this mode of proceeding necessarily occupying considerable time, it was objected to by the police as causing an undue obstruction of the thoroughfare. Thereupon, as the only alternative to the entire abandonment of the use of the premises before referred to, and which it appeared was the only use to which, owing to the peculiar character of the locality they could be put, the respondent, in the exercise of his right as owner, adopted the course of conveying the machinery to and from his premises in the trolleys or waggons across the flagged footway. It was in so doing that the damage was done which formed the subject of the present complaint. The right of the respondent depends upon the nature and extent of the rights acquired by the public over the footway in question, either at common law or under the Highway Acts, or the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 98. The owner who dedicates to public use as a highway a portion of his land, parts with no other right than a right of passage to the public over the land so dedicated, and may exercise all other rights of ownership not inconsistent therewith, and the application made to, and adopted by, the public of a part of the street to one kind of passage, and another part to another does not deprive him of any rights as owner of the land not inconsistent with the right of passage by the public. If this were not so the owner of a large estate, having dedicated a portion of his land to the use of the public as a roadway, and they, or the persons representing them, having raised a footpath on one side or on both sides of such roadway, for their own more convenient use thereof, would, after the lapse of time, be so bound by this convenient arrangement of such roadway as to be unable to open a new gateway or entrance to his land from such roadway without being liable to be convicted under the provisions of the Highway Act. If this were really the law the result would be most serious to owners who have dedicated or may dedicate roadways to the public, and in towns would, to a great extent, prevent the owners of houses and buildings from changing their character and use to any purpose of business which could not be accomplished without the use of a horse, or cart, or carriage. That such is not the law appears to us to be the result both of principle and authority, and we think that the provisions of the Highway Acts and the Metropolis Local Management Act, so far as they apply to roads or streets, are subordinate to the paramount right reserved by the owner. We do not deny that the owner cannot derogate from the grant of roadway made by him to the public, and cannot do anything which would really and substantially interfere with the right of passage by the public. So far as we are aware, no case is to be found in the books which conflicts with the view of the law above expressed, notwithstanding the numerous instances which must have occurred in which an owner rebuilding or changing the character of his houses or other buildings, has made crossings of the footpath, in order to carry into effect some object of convenience or business. The case of Sir John Lade v. Shepherd (2 Stra. 1004), is a strong authority in favour of our view. In that case the plaintiff, being owner of land, built a street upon it, which had become a highway. An owner of other land contiguous, but separated from it by a ditch, laid a bridge over the ditch, the end whereof rested upon the highway. The plaintiff brought an action of trespass against the defendant, who insisted that the plaintiff, by making it a street and dedicating it to the public, was precluded from suing him as for a trespass to his private property, although he might be liable to an indictment for a nuisance. But it was said by the court, "It is certainly a dedication to the public so far as the public has occasion for it, which is only for a right of passage. But it was never understood to be a transfer of the absolute property in the land." That the property of the soil and freehold in a highway is in the owner or the representative of the dedicating owner, subject to an easement for the benefit of the public, was also decided in Dovaston v. Payne (2 H. Bl. 527), and is supported by the authorities cited in the notes to that case in Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 2. The same doctrine is clearly stated by Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Pratt (4 E. & B. 860), which was the case of a conviction of the appellant under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 30, for committing a trespass by being in the day time on land in the occupation of B., in search of game. Pratt was, in fact, on a public highway in pursuit of game, the land on both sides being the property of B., and the court held that he was rightly convicted, as the road was land in the occupation of B., subject only to the right of way of the public; and Lord Campbell, in giving his judgment, thus expressed his opinion of the law as applicable to that case: "He" (the appellant) "was, beyond all controversy, upon land, the soil and freehold of which was in the owner of the adjoining land, that is Mr. Bowyer. It is true that the public had a right of way there; but, subject to that right, the soil, and every incident to the ownership of of the soil, was in Mr. Bowyer." And the other judges in their judgments limit the right of the public to the use of the way for the purpose of passing and repassing thereon. Whether or not that case is open to doubt as to the construction put upon the Game Act, it truly expresses, as we think, the true limit of the public rights over a highway, and, inasmuch as the magistrate in the present case has expressly found that the freehold property in question could not be reasonably enjoyed without access across the existing footway, and that the rights of ownership and those of the public might be jointly exercised consistently with the general welfare, we think that he was justified in dismissing the summons. Our judgment will therefore be for the respondent.

GUILDFORD UNION (apps.) v. ST. OLAVE'S UNION (resps.)

Status of irremovability—Break of residence—Stay in a hospital—Animus revertendi.

A pauper lived in the respondent's union before the 25th March 1867 long enough to obtain a status of irremovability. On that day he was admitted into the respondent's workhouse, and he remained there until the 27*th Aug.* 1868, when he voluntarily took his discharge, and on the same day became an inmate of a hospital in another union. On the 31*st Dec.* 1868 he was discharged from the hospital, and took a lodging in the respondents' union, where he remained until the 20*th Jan.* 1869, when he was again admitted into the respondents' workhouse.

Held, that, independently of the exception by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, of time spent in a hospital, the pauper had a constructive residence in respondents' union during his temporary absence, although he had no specific lodging or house to return to, and therefore his status of irremovability was not destroyed, and an order for his removal to the place of his last legal settlement was bad.

THIS was an appeal to the Surrey Easter Quarter Sessions 1871, from an order of justices as to the removal of William Duke, a pauper, from the respondents' to the appellants' union, and by consent of the parties and by order according to the Statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, the following case was stated for the opinion of this court.

The order, which is the subject of this appeal, was made on the 8th Dec. 1870 by two justices of the peace for the county of Surrey, for the removal of William Duke, hereinafter called "the pauper," aged fifty years (then and now being an inmate of the Saint Olave's Workhouse, in the respondents' poor law union), to the appellants' poor law union, on the ground that the parish of Godalming, in the county of Surrey (being one of the parishes comprised in the said appellants' union), was the place of his last legal settlement.

The pauper has a settlement by birth in the said parish of Godalming, and the order of removal is admitted to have been proper, unless the pauper at the date of the said order, had acquired a status of irremovability under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

For fifteen years, immediately preceding the 25th March 1867, the pauper resided in the parish of St. Olave's (being one of the parishes comprised in the said respondents' union), and during the last ten of the said fifteen years he lodged at the same house and never slept out of the said parish, and during the whole of the said fifteen years he was a breaksman in the employ of Messrs. Nicholson, Besley, and Co., who carried on business in the said parish, and during that period he never received parish relief.

On the said 25th March 1867, the pauper was admitted into the St. Olave's Workhouse, being disabled from following his employment in consequence of disease in his legs, and he remained in the said workhouse until the 27th Aug. 1868.

On the said 27th Aug. 1868, having previously received from a son of his late employers a letter of admission to St. Thomas's Hospital, in the parish of St. Mary, Newington, in the St. Saviour's Union, and not having been received into such hospital, the pauper received from the same person a letter of admission into the hospital at Guildford, in the county of Surrey, a hospital for the reception of patients suffering from curable diseases, together with the sum of 5*s.* to pay his travelling expenses; and the pauper voluntarily took his discharge from the said St. Olave's Workhouse, and went direct to the said hospital at Guildford, where he was admitted on the same day, the respondents' union having nothing to do with his so entering the said hospital.

The pauper remained at the said hospital at Guildford from the said 27th Aug. 1868 until the 31st Dec. 1868, when he was discharged uncured.

Upon being so discharged from the said hospital on the 31st. Dec. 1868, the pauper went direct to London, and took a lodging in the said parish of St. Olave's, and resided there for about a fortnight, when he took another lodging in the same parish, at which he resided until the 20th Jan. 1869. The pauper's means of subsistence during the said period between the 31st Dec. 1868 and the 20th Jan. 1869 was a sum of 4*l.* 6*s.*, part of which had been received by him while in the hospital at Guildford, and the remainder of which he received on his return to London out of a fund which had been established by his said late employers.

On the 20th Jan. 1869 the pauper was again admitted into the said St. Olave's workhouse, and he has remained there down to the present time.

The pauper never slept out of the said parish of St. Olave's (except in the said hospital at Guildford) from the date of his discharge from the said St. Olave's Union on the said 27th Aug. 1868 until his readmission into the said union on the said 20th Jan. 1869.

The court is requested to draw inferences of fact if necessary.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, the said pauper, Wm. Duke, at the date of the said order of removal, was irremovable from the said parish of St. Olave's.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the appeal is to be allowed with costs against the respondents.

If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then the appeal is to be dismissed with costs against the appellants.

E. Clarke for the respondents.—This was a sufficient break of residence to destroy the pauper's status of irremovability in the respondents' union. By Reg. v. Glossop (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 227) "There must be both a place which he (the pauper) has a right to return to, and an intention to return, to constitute a constructive residence; and where a man has gone away and left no residence, though he means to return at a future time, the animus revertendi is immaterial." [BLACKBURN, J.—Those certainly are the words attributed to me, but I never intended to lay down that there could never be a constructive residence, unless the pauper continued to have a house or lodging in the place where his status of irremovability had existed. COCKBURN, C. J.—The contrary was distinctly held in Reg. v. St. Leonard, Shoreditch (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 21.] In that case the decision was upon the ground that the pauper never ceased to reside, although she slept away during the night. According to the judgment of Cockburn, C. J. in that case, the onus of proof at all events is cast upon those who set up the irremovability, that the pauper has the intention of returning.

Thesiger for the appellants.—The statute which creates irremovability after residence of a certain time, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 provides in sect. 1, "That the time, during which such person shall be a prisoner in a prison . . . . or shall be confined in a lunatic asylum . . . . or as a patient in a hospital, shall for all purposes be excluded in the computation of time hereinbefore mentioned." It has been held, with regard to one of these exceptions upon evidence of intention to return, similar to that in the present case, that the time during which a pauper has been in prison cannot be taken into computation for the purpose of making up or for the purpose of breaking a residence: (Hartfield v. Rotherfield, 17 Q. B. 746.)

COCKBURN, C. J.—We need not trouble you further. In the first place, this case, with respect to a hospital, is concluded by that just cited with respect to a prison; secondly, and independently of that authority, a mere temporary absence of this kind under the circumstances of this case is no break of the status of irremovability. It is not necessary in order to constitute a constructive residence that the absent pauper should retain possession of a specific place of residence to which he may return. Both on authority and on principle I think our judgment should be for the appellants.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think so also. By the statute the period spent in the hospital does not count in the computation of irremovability, and independently I think there was in this case no break of residence, because I do not agree with the inference which has been drawn from my words in Reg v. Glossop, that a pauper must have had a legal claim to some house or lodging in the place to which he intended to return, in order to continue his status of irremovability during a temporary absence. I meant merely that his right to a place of residence should form part of the facts upon which the consideration of his intention to come back should turn, and upon which his status of irremovability should be decided. The fact that a man has no house or lodging is not ground for saying that he resides nowhere.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

TOWNSEND v. THE OVERSEERS OF ST. MARYLEBONE.

Description of nature of qualification—Joint tenant—Dwelling-house—Representation of the People Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102)—Reform Act 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 27.

Under the description "dwelling-house," a qualification as for a house may be proved under 2 Will. 4, c. 45, or an occupation of a dwelling house under the Representation of the People Act.

A person claimed a vote for the borough of M., who occupied a house as joint tenant with another, the value of such house being much more than enough for a qualification under the Reform Act 1832. The nature of the qualification was described in the list as "a dwelling-house."

He was thus entitled to a vote under the Reform Act, but not under the Representation of the People Act.

He was accordingly objected to, on the ground that a description of the nature of a qualification "dwelling-house" under the Representation of the People Act could not confer a vote under the Reform Act.

The revising barrister struck out the word "dwelling."

Held, per Willes, Keating, and Collier, JJ. (dissentiente, Brett, J.), that the revising barrister was right in allowing the vote, although it was unnecessary to strike out the word "dwelling."

Per Brett, J., that the 3*rd section of the Representation of the People Act has given a new qualification, and that, as the error was in the nature of the qualification, the revising barrister ought not to have amended.*

AT a court held at Marylebone, for the purpose of revising a list of the voters for that borough, the vote of James Blackman was duly objected to. The case stated that

1. James Blackman had occupied, jointly with another person, the premises in respect of which his name had been inserted by the overseers of the said parish in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members to serve in Parliament for the said borough of Marylebone.

2. The said James Blackman had so occupied the said premises during the twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July last; had been rated in respect of the said premises for all rates for the relief of the poor in the said parish made during the time of his occupation; had duly paid all the poor rates and assessed taxes which had become payable from him in respect of such premises previously to the 6th April then next preceding, and had resided for six calendar months next previous to the last day of July last, within the said borough.

3. The clear yearly value of the said premises so occupied by the said James Blackman and another, was of an amount which, when divided by the number of the joint occupiers of the said premises, gave a sum of much more than ten pounds for each such occupier.

4. In the said parish of St. Marylebone the overseers make out only one list of all persons entitled to vote in the election of members to serve in Parliament for each borough, including in such list as well those entitled to vote in respect of the occupation of premises of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l.*, under 2 Will. 4, c. 45, as those entitled to vote as inhabitant occupiers, as owners or tenants of any dwelling-house within the said borough, under the Representation of the People Act 1867.

5. In the list so made out by the said overseers, the qualification in respect of which the name of James Blackman was inserted in the list was described in the third column as a dwelling-house; the house in fact was originally constructed, and is now used, as a shop, with dwelling rooms above.

6. The names of thirty-three other persons, whose names, together with that of the said James Blackman, are set out in schedule hereunto attached, were objected to under similar circumstances.

7. It was objected that inasmuch as the qualification, in respect of which the name of James Blackman had been inserted in the list, as made out by the said overseers, was described as a "dwelling house," his title to have his name inserted in such list could only be under the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, and as it was by that section provided that no man should under that section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling house, that therefore the said James Blackman was not entitled to have his name inserted in the said list. The barrister held that if the nature of the qualification was insufficiently described, he had power to amend the description of the qualification for the purpose of more accurately defining the same, and he did so by substituting "house" for "dwelling house" as the nature of the qualification, and retained the name of the said James Blackman and of the said thirty-three other persons in the said list, and he ordered the appeals in all the above mentioned cases to be consolidated.

The question upon which the judgment of the court is requested is whether or not the said barrister did or did not rightly decide that the said James Blackman and the said thirty-three other persons whose names are set out in the schedule hereto were entitled to have their names inserted in the register of voters for the said borough of Marylebone. If the court be of opinion that his decision was wrong, the names of the said James Blackman and the said thirty-three other persons are to be removed from the register of voters for the said borough of Marylebone.

Gorst for the appellant.—The claimant was an occupier of sufficient value if the nature of the qualification had been "house" instead of "dwelling house." The term "dwelling house" appears for the first time in the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act, and it is there stated in the proviso to the section, that no man shall have a vote by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling house. I do not deny that he might still vote as a joint occupier for the same premises, had they been properly described, but the proviso to the 3rd section takes away his right to vote as a joint occupier for a dwelling house. The 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40 does not give the barrister a power to amend unless the qualification is sufficiently described. There is nothing in the case to show whether the claimant resided in the house or elsewhere. If he claims under the old Act it is immaterial whether he resides in the house; but that is not so under the Representation of the People Act. The 56th section shows that the new franchise is to be in addition to any old franchise and this Act is to be construed as far as it goes with the old Acts; it also says that the forms shall be as they were formerly. The case is the same as if the proviso to the 3rd section had been written into the Reform Act 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45).

No counsel appeared to represent the respondent.

WILLES J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was right in allowing the franchise, although it is unnecessary to say whether the precise course he took in turning dwelling-house into house was right. The claim in respect of a dwelling-house was sufficiently made by showing that the person claiming the franchise was entitled to a dwelling-house in fact, coupled with the proof that that which he described as a dwelling-house fell within the requirements of the Act of 1832, or within the conditions to be fulfilled in the Representation of the People Act as a dwelling-house. The Act of 1832 gave the right to vote as to a house, notwithstanding the number of terms, such as warehouse, counting-house, shop, which were coupled with it. You have there a house containing a dwelling-house, and a house which is not a dwelling-house, and if it had been necessary to state the qualification more fully, the answer would be in the description of the house—viz., a dwelling-house. If the objection was made out under the Act of 1832, the claimant could show he had a dwelling-house; then, having established it as a house and as a dwelling-house, he could show that the conditions of the Act of 1832 had been complied with, and that the house was of sufficient value to give him the franchise under the 29th section of that Act. Matters so standing, the Representation of the People Act was passed to enlarge the franchise, and assist voters who had previously been excluded. If the argument of counsel be correct, what would be the effect of that Act? Why, of defeating a claim to the franchise which would be good under the Act of 1832, and the reduction of the franchise would absolutely defeat the vote. He further argues that the Representation of the People Act gives a new franchise in respect of a dwelling house, and that a claim to a dwelling house means a claim to a dwelling house under the Act of 1867, and excepts the claim under the Act of 1832, and that sect. 29 of the Act of 1832 should be read with the proviso in the Act of 1867. But the answer to his argument lies in the fact that the claim is not obliged to be made under the Representation of the People Act; but the claim may be made in respect of a dwelling house under the 27th and 29th sections of the Reform Act 1832, or under the Representation of the People Act. It is merely an expansion of the franchise in respect of a dwelling house, and the claim is as formerly. He may claim under either Act; if he fails under the latter, he may claim under the former, or vice versâ, for the nature of the qualification and the description are the same. I reject the notion that the Representation of the People Act indirectly takes away any right the claimant would have had under the Reform Act of 1832. I think the revising barrister was right on the whole, but that no amendment was necessary.

KEATING, J.—The Representation of the People Act in terms leaves untouched the franchise under the old Reform Acts. It is conceded that under the old Act he might have proved, and have a vote; but it is said the Representation of the People Act does away with that, because it gives the franchise to a quality of dwelling house which would not have had the franchise before. If so, it would be a strange result, and one I should be sorry to agree to, unless under very great pressure. I think no amendment was required.

BRETT, J.—I regret that I cannot come to the same conclusion as the rest of the court in this case, and as the parties are entitled to my opinion I give it accordingly, and state that I think the revising barrister was wrong. The qualification described was in the third column, which states the nature of the qualification, and there it was described as a dwelling-house. Under the old Reform Act of 1832, the 27th section gave the different qualifications house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building. A house may include a warehouse, and I apprehend a warehouse and shop is a house, yet in the interpretation of the Act of Parliament, if he described himself by one he could not prove for the other, and if he described as for a shop and proved for a house he would lose his vote. The Representation of the People Act has given, in my opinion, a new qualification in respect of a dwelling-house, and it is expressly enacted by the 59th section that it shall be construed as one with the Acts for the time being in force, and it appears to me that the new qualification with the proviso ought to be read in with the 27th section of the Reform Act. It is said that the construction of the 3rd section takes away the right to vote, but it only does so because the claimant is misdescribed. The court ought to be as careful of the rights of the objector as of the rights of the voter.

COLLIER, J.—I am of opinion the revising barrister was right, and that no amendment was required. The claimant was entitled, under sect. 27 of the Reform Act. I do not think he ought to be deprived of his vote because he described a house as a dwelling-house, and thereby imposed a greater proof than was necessary upon himself. This was not a description of a new qualification. Under the new Act, a man must be an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling house, and he does not describe himself as so entitled.

Judgment affirmed.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

CALVER v. ROBERTS.

Parliamentary election—Notice of objection—Mistake in "place of abode" of objector—Change of residence—Reform Act 1832, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 7.

A notice of objection pursuant to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 7, schedule A, No. 5, signed by the objector, with the address of his former place of abode, is insufficient, although his residence is so near the former that it stands upon part of the garden belonging to the former residence.

AT a court held at Brentwood, to revise the lists of voters for the southern divivision of the county of Essex, the vote of Thomas Davis, whose name appeared upon the copy of the register relating to the hamlet of Brentwood, was objected to by James William Calver, a person on the register for the time being for the said division of the said county. The said James William Calver appeared before the barrister and proved that he had, within the time required by the Registration Acts, duly served upon the overseers of the said hamlet, and upon the said Thomas Davis, notices of objection to the vote of the said Thomas Davis, which notices were in all respect, except as to the statement of the abode of the said objector, in compliance with the Registration Acts.

In the said notices the objector had described himself as "James William Calver, of Pembroke-road, Walthamstow, E.," on the register of voters for the parish of Walthamstow, in the southern division of the county of Essex.

It appeared that for some years previously to the month of August, 1871, the said James William Calver has resided in a house in Pembroke-road, Walthamstow, and that his place of abode was so described in the register for the time being. In the said month of August, however, and a few days before his signing the said notices of objection, he had removed to a house known as 1, Grosvenor-park-terrace, Grosvenor-park-road, Walthamstow, and he had let his house in Pembroke-road to a tenant who was in occupation of it at the time of the signing of the said notices.

At the time the objector had originally come into occupation of his house in Pembroke-road, he had occupied therewith a garden, which garden extended backwards from his house in Pembroke-road to a road called Wingfield-road, which ran parallel to Pembroke-road. The said garden extended on one side to a road called Grosvenor-park-road, which ran at right angles to Pembroke and Wingfield-roads. Some few years ago a strip of land fronting the Grosvenor-park-road had been taken from this garden, and upon this strip of land a row of six houses fronting to Grosvenor-park-terrace had been built.

The houses now numbered 4, 5, and 6, which were the houses nearest to Pembroke-road, had been built about three years, but the house now numbered 1, which occupied the angle formed by Grosvenor-park-road and Wingfield-road, had only been just completed in Aug. 1871, when the said James William Calver removed into it. The distance from his former house in Pembroke-road along that road to the corner of Grosvenor-park-road was 50yds., and the distance from that corner along Grosvenor-park-road to the new house was about the same distance, or rather more.

After his removal the objector continued to occupy the residue of the garden which he had occupied when in his former house, which garden, however, did not in any part abut upon Pembroke-road, but was situate at the back of the houses in Pembroke-road. To this garden he obtained access by a back door in the wall of his new house. The door of communication from the old house to the garden was kept fastened after the new tenant took possession of the house, but it might have been opened if it had ever been required.

It did not appear that Pembroke-road was the name of any district in Walthamstow, or that any houses but those fronting to Pembroke-road were known as "Pembroke-road;" Grosvenor-park-road was quite as well known as Pembroke-road.

After the removal the said James William Calver, he had received letters (some of which were produced in court) which had been addressed to him at Pembroke-road, and especially he had received certain notices of objection signed by him in the same manner as those above mentioned, which he had returned to him through the Dead Letter Office, in consequence of the persons to whom they were addressed not having been found.

It was contended, on behalf of the objector, that no one could have been misled by his place of abode being given as Pembroke-road instead of Grosvenor-park-road, because the two houses were so close together that any person inquiring for him in Pembroke-road would have been at once told where to find him. It was also contended that the site of the house in Grosvenor-park-road having once formed part of a plot of land occupied with the house in Pembroke-road, it could properly be described as Pembroke-road.

The revising barrister was of opinion that the case was undistinguishable from Melbourne v. Greenfield (R. & G. 261; 7 C. B., N. S., 1; and 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93), and was satisfied, from the evidence of the objection, that in describing himself as of Pembroke-road, "he had intended to describe his former house, and not that to which he had removed," and the barrister therefore thought, for the reasons given by Erle, C.J. in that case, that the 101st section of the Registration Act (6 Vict. c. 18) was inapplicable. He also thought that the case was distinguishable from Thackeray v. Pilcher (36 L. J. 73, C. P.; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 100) (which was quoted on behalf of the objector), or other similar cases, because in the present case the objector had not given, as in that case, a mere imperfect description of his abode by referring to some large district in some part of which it was really situate, but had given an incorrect description by referring to a particular place—Pembroke-road—where he did not reside at the time in question. He thought that the fact that the objector had removed a short distance only, and that the site of his new house had once formed part of the garden of the old, could not affect the principle laid down in Melbourne v. Greenfield, which he understood to be that an objector must actually describe his real abode, and that it is not sufficient for him to describe a place at which his real abode may be ascertained, however readily that might be done.

But for the case of Melbourne v. Greenfield, the barrister stated that he should probably have held the notice good as he did not think that any person so objected to could be practically inconvenienced by the misdescription.

Being however of opinion that the case was in point, he held that he was bound to follow it, and, moreover, thought that the said Thomas Davis (and the other persons objected to as hereinafter mentioned) might have been induced, by the law laid down in that case, to neglect the notice of objection they had received.

For the purposes of this case the revising barrister found the following facts: That the description of himself as "of Pembroke-road" given by the objector was intended as a description of the house mentioned as his place of abode on the register and not of the house in which he really resided at the time of signing the notice. That it is not a description which anyone would think of giving of the new house or which would be understood as applicable to the new house, and if the said James William Calver had been a stranger in the neighbourhood at the time he went to reside at No. 1, Grosvenor-park-terrace, Grosvenor-park-road, he could not have been found with reasonable facility by the description given of him as "of Pembroke-road."

He also found that the said James William Calver, not being a stranger in the neighbourhood, but well known in Pembroke-road by reason of his former residence there—he might, in fact, have been found by a party objected to without difficulty, because upon a personal inquiry in Pembroke-road the inquirer would either have been informed at once of the removal, and have been directed to the new house, or else have been rected first to the old house and thence to the w one, which was close by; while, if the inquiry ad been made not personally, but by letter, addressed to Pembroke-road, the letter would have been delivered to the objector. Thus, although the objector had not described his true place of abode, he had given the information practically required for his identification by describing himself as of a place in the immediate neighbourhood of his abode, and at which it might have been readily ascertained.

For the reasons mentioned above, the revising barrister considered that he ought to hold the notices of objection insufficient, and he expressed an opinion to that effect; but understanding that a large number of persons had been objected to in the same form, with a view to facilitate an appeal from his decision, he reserved his formal decision as to retaining or expunging the name of the said Thomas Davis (who did not appear to prove his qualification), and adjourned the further consideration of the case and also the court at which the same came before him from time to time and from place to place within the said division of the county, pursuant to the statute, in the meantime hearing and deciding upon the merits of the cases of all persons so objected to by the said James William Calver, who chose to appear before him in answer to the objection and to prove their qualification.

At a court held at the town hall, Stratford, within the said division, by appointment, for the revision of the lists of certain parishes, and by adjournment of the court held at Brentwood, and of other courts, he finally decided to retain on the list the name of the said Thomas Davis, without requiring him to prove his qualification, on the ground that the said notices of objection were insufficient, and that he was not at liberty, as a matter of law, to take into consideration all the facts stated in the case when he presented it for the opinion of the court.

The said James William Calver gave due notice of appeal against this decision, and the barrister thought proper that the appeal should be allowed.

At the same court he decided for the same reasons to retain on the various lists, without proof of their qualifications, the names of all the persons contained in the schedule which accompanies this case, who had all been objected to by the said James William Calver in the same form and under the same circumstances as above stated, and who all failed or declined to appear before him to prove their qualification in answer to the said objections. It appeared to him that his decision so to retain all the said names depended upon the same point of law as the case of Thomas Davis, and notice of appeal having been given, he declared that the appeals were to be consolidated, and thereupon he named Thomas Nicolles Roberts, of 2, Torrington-street, Russell-square, London, a person interested and consenting to be respondent in the consolidated appeal.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the facts stated above the revising barrister was right in holding the said notices of objection to be bad on the ground above stated.

If the court decide that the revising barrister was right then all the names in the schedule are to remain on the register.

If the court decide that he was wrong, the register is to be amended by expunging therefrom the names in the schedule.

E. Clarke for the appellant.—The address of the objector was put down by mistake as Pembroke-road, instead of Grosvenor-park-road. The objection is that the former residence of the objector is described instead of the present abode. The notice was given pursuant to the 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 7.(a) And the revising barrister states he should have considered the place of abode sufficiently explicit had he not been pressed with the case of Melbourne v. Greenfield (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93; 7 C. B., N. S., 1). The "place of abode" means the place of abode which is named on the register, and this view was taken by Maule, J., in Knowles v. Brooking (2 C. B. 226), although it was true that he dissented from the opinion of the rest of the court. He says the Act of 6 Vict. c. 18, requires the objector to describe himself as on the register or list of voters, and to refer particularly to the parish on the register or list. The object of these alterations was to identify the persons mentioned in the list more completely, so as to enable those whom it concerned to know easily and certainly who the persons named were, and to enable the party objected to, by referring to the list or portion of the register mentioned in the notice, to ascertain whether the objector has a right to object; here the objector was well known to all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. He cited Wollett v. Davis (4 C. B. 115), when he was stopped by the court.

Hugh Shield, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

WILLES, J.—The learned counsel for the appellant has done all in his power to induce us to overrule the case of Melbourne v. Greenfield, which we, sitting as we do here, are unable to do, nor should we desire to do so if we could. The statute says that the objector shall leave at the place of abode of the party objected to a notice which is described in the schedule to the Act, and which is to contain the place of abode of the objector at the time at which he objects. In the present case the objector had ceased to live in the residence which he gave as his place of abode, and, moreover, he had let the former house, which he described himself as occupying. Had he been a stranger no one could have found him out, and it cannot be that a difference is to be made because he happened to be well known in that particular locality. The description of his place of abode was intended by him to be the description of his place of abode, as it appeared on the register, instead of his present residence, and the question is much the same as that discussed in Knowles v. Brooking (2 C. B. 226), where, notwithstanding the dissentient opinion of Maule, J., the court held the notice of objection sufficient, which was signed by the objector from his real place of abode, although not corresponding with that on the register. And the law was further pronounced in Melbourne v. Greenfield that the objector should date from his actual place of abode, and not from that on the register. We see no reason why the revising barrister should have wished the case of Melbourne v. Greenfield to be overruled; and we think that he was quite right in following that case rather than his own judgment, for it would have been impossible to say that a sufficient description of the right place of abode has been inserted in the notice of objection.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

BRETT and COLLIER, JJ. concurred.

Decision affirmed.

(a) The 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 7, provides that in every year every person who shall be on the register for the time being for any county may object to any other person upon any list of voters for such county, as not having been entitled on the last day of July then next preceding, to have his name inserted in any list of voters for such county; and every person so objecting (save and except overseers objecting in the manner hereinbefore mentioned) shall on or before the 25th Aug. in such year, give, or cause to be given, to the overseers of the poor of the parish or township to which the list of voters containing the name of the person so objected to may relate, a notice, according to the form numbered (4) in the said schedule (A), or to the like effect; and the person so objecting shall also, on or before the said 25th Aug., give, or cause to be given, to the person so objected to, or leave, or cause to be left at his place of abode, as described in such list, a notice, according to the form numbered (5) in the said schedule (A), or to the like effect; and every such notice of objection shall be signed by the party so objecting as aforesaid; and wherever the place of abode of the person objected to, as described in the said list, shall not be in the parish or township to which such list may relate, and the name of the occupying tenant of the whole part of the qualifying property, together with his place of abode, shall appear in such list, the person so objecting shall also, on or before the same day, give to or leave, or cause to be given or left, at the place of abode of any such occupying tenant, a duplicate notice, signed as aforesaid.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

BENDLE v. WATSON.

Parliamentary election—County vote—Description of qualification—Erroneous number to house—Power to amend—Insufficient qualification—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 40.

Where the description of the property of a voter is erroneous, the revising barrister has power to amend, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 40, as an "insufficient description of the property."

The claimant's qualification for a county vote was described as a "freehold house and shop," No. 4, English-street, Carlisle. After his name had been so put on the register, the local authorities altered the number of his house to 9. There was another No. 4, English-street. The claimant's vote was objected to and disallowed by the barrister, as he considered he had no power to amend.

Held, that the barrister had power to amend.

Per Brett, J., that the barrister not only had power, but was bound to amend.

AT a court held at the city of Carlisle, in the county of Cumberland, to revise the list of voters in the election of knights of the shire for the county of Cumberland, the name of John Spiers Baker was objected to.

The name of John Spiers Baker appeared on the register in the following form:

Christian name and surname of each voter at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place in the parish, and number of house (if any), where property is situated.
John Spiers Baker.	Town-villa, Sutherland, near Liverpool.	Freehold house and shop.	4, English-street, Carlisle.

It was proved that the premises in question are now and have for six years previously been numbered 9, English-street.

It was proved that at one time the said premises had been numbered as 4, English-street, but that six years ago the number had, by competent local authority, been changed from 4 to 9, and had remained 9 ever since.

The said John Spiers Baker was proved to have been on the register for the premises in question when they were numbered 4, and had so remained on the register, without objection, up to the present time.

It was also proved that there are in the same English-street other premises numbered 4, which do not belong to the said John Spiers Baker, and in respect of which he does not claim to be entitled to the franchise.

The revising barrister was asked to amend by altering the number in the fourth column from 4 to 9.

He decided that the said John Spiers Baker had not proved his right to have his name retained upon the said list of voters in respect of the qualification described in such list, because the number of the house and shop aforesaid was wrongly stated to be 4 instead of its proper number 9, and he declined to amend as asked because he did not consider that he had the power to do so, or that he should be right in exercising the power if he had it.

Except for the reason aforesaid the said John Spiers Baker had a right to have his name retained upon the said list.

The names of seven other persons (whose names and qualifications were set out in the schedule annexed to the special case, and therein described as they would appear if the descriptions were amended according to the facts), were objected to under similar circumstances.

The revising barrister expunged the names of the said John Spiers Baker and of the said seven other persons from the lists.

Due notice of appeal from the decision of the revising barrister was given, and he ordered the appeals in the above-mentioned cases to be consolidated, and named Joseph Bendle, of the city of Carlisle, gentleman, to be the appellant, and Thomas Watson, of the said city of Carlisle, gentleman, to be respondent in the said appeal.

If the court should be of opinion that the revising barrister had the power to make the aforesaid amendment and ought to have exercised it, the name of the said John Spiers Baker will, with the amendment asked for as aforesaid, be restored to the said list, as also the names of the said seven other persons altered as they appear in the said schedule.

Sharp for the appellant. — The revising barrister has not found the description insufficient to prove the identity of the property. The nature of the qualification is a freehold house and shop, which is sufficient. The 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 4 provides for persons making a fresh claim who do not retain the same qualification. By the 5th section the overseers are to make out a list of claimants, and there is also a list of the voters, which consists of the copy of the old register. I contend that if the nature and description of the qualification be misdescribed the claimant's name should be expunged. The case is clearly within the 40th section, for the place of abode is not a part of a voter's qualification, and one place of abode may be substituted for another (Luckett v. Knowles, 1 Lutw. Reg. Cas. 451; 2 C. B. 187); and here the abode is the same, although the number is altered: (Barlow v. Mumford, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 81; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441.) The point is whether the revising barrister ought to have altered the number of the house, there being no such misnomer or inaccurate description of any place sufficient to abridge the operation of the Act under the 101st section of 6 Vict. c. 18. In the case of Barlow v. Mumford the claimant was described as of Ely-place, but the number of his house was not given. The revising barrister was considered to have acted rightly in amending the claim by adding a number and allowing the vote. And in Flounders v. Donner, 2 C. B. 63, Erle, C.J., says that if the omission of the number be supplied to the revising barrister, pending the revision, he is bound to amend the description under the 40th section. [BRETT, J.—An insufficient description is different from a wrong one.]

T. H. Fawcett for respondent.—There was no mistake on the part of the overseers or of the clerk of the peace. Sect. 4 provides for the publication of the lists by the overseers, which enables them to see if the voters are properly described. For six years the appellant had suffered the same error to be made, and he never claimed for the proper qualification. He ought to have made a fresh claim. The revising barrister might sanction an addition to the register, but no addition could make it accurate. [BRETT, J.—The nature of the qualification is in the third column; the description is in the fourth. Although the revising barrister cannot alter the third column, yet he can alter the description in the fourth column.] The number of the house refers to a different qualification altogether, and is not the qualification described on the register. In Bartlett v. Gibbs (13 L. J. 40; 5 M. & G. 81) Tindal, C.J. says: "We think the decision ought not to depend upon a critical examination of the forms in the schedule which are inserted as examples, and are only to be followed implicitly so far as the circumstances of each case may admit, but we think the Legislature intended that the registration list should afford such information of the nature and situation of the premises in respect of the occupation of which each person claimed a vote, as would enable the other voters to ascertain by inquiry the sufficiency of the occupation and value of each of the premises." [WILLES, J.—In that case the list gave the particulars of one occupation, though the qualification consisted of the occupation of several premises in the immediate succession.] In Onions v. Bowdler (5 C. B. 65; 2 Lutw. Reg. Cas. 59) the revising barrister was held to have rightly refused to alter the qualification by adding a new one, although he might have amended the old one: (Hitchins v. Brown, 2 C. B. 25.)

WILLES, J.—Turning to the language of the 4th section, we find that wherever the christian names or the place of abode, or the nature of the qualification (which relates to the qualification the claimant really has, but not a qualification in general), or the local or other description of the property of any person who shall be included in the list, and the name of the occupying tenant, shall be wholly omitted in any case where the same is by the Act directed to be specified therein, or if any person whose name is included in any such list, or his place of abode, or the nature or description of his qualification shall in the judgment of the revising barrister be insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, such barrister shall expunge the name of every such person from such list, unless the matters be supplied to his satisfaction before finishing the list; and we see, therefore, that it is sufficient to show the place of abode and the nature or description of the qualification. It has been decided that you may alter the place of abode, where the abode is in rerum natura, by amending, and you may also amend where the description is insufficient, and it now remains for us to see if you may alter an erroneous description. For the better illustration of my view on the subject, I will take a case for an example; for instance, the case of a house in a street and numbered 4. I will assume that the house is described on the register as No. 40, and the person who enjoys the occupation of No. 4, and is entitled to a vote, finds it described as No. 40. There is no No. 40 in the street, so that it is not the description of anything, and therefore not erroneous, but insufficient, according to the section. I think the revising barrister could have amended. But carry the case a little farther, and suppose No. 40 had been built while matters were in fieri, so that not only was the description insufficient, but erroneous also. That appears to have been the consideration applied in Luckett v. Knowles (2 C. B. 187), where two of the judges were for applying the early part of the section. The list in this case was erroneous, and an amendment was required; the fact of there being an insufficient description is not defeated by the description being erroneous also. The appellant was not struck off the list of voters because he owned old No. 4 and did not own new No. 4, but because his qualification was insufficient. Now comes the proviso to the 40th section, that whether any person shall be objected to or not, no evidence shall be given of any other qualification than that which is described in the list of voters, or claims; nor shall the barrister be at liberty to change the description of the qualification as it appears in the list, except for the purpose of more clearly and accurately defining the same. Surely it cannot be said that this was any other qualification than that in the list. The fact of the description being insufficient does not make the house any other than as described, and the description is of a freehold house and shop, the number being solely for the purpose of individualising the house, and as it is in one sense a true one, by which I mean that there was no falsification, the barrister might have amended. If there had been an attempt to introduce something new on the register, I should at once say no amendment could be made; but where there is a qualification, but insufficiently described, the barrister ought to amend, and his decision must, therefore, be reversed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the Legislature when they intrusted the power of revising the vote to a barrister, was to prohibit him from altering the nature of a qualification in the third column; but where it is shown that the nature of the qualification was the same, the revising barrister was not denied the power under the 40th section to amend. Although six years have elapsed since the number of the house was changed, the question is just the same as if it had been changed on the last day of July. If the words of the Acts are susceptible of a construction to give the revising barrister a power to amend, we should do so upon the principle established in Luckett v. Knowles, where not only a total omission was supplied, but a description in the place of abode contrary to the fact was altered. The power of the barrister is not limited to cases of total omission, and I entirely differ with him in thinking that if he had the power to amend, he ought not; I think, if he had power, he undoubtedly ought to have amended.

BRETT, J.—This is a difficult case to decide. I think the revising barrister not only had power to amend, but that he was absolutely bound to amend. The time to which attention is called is the moment the parties were before the revising barrister; the description was inaccurate, as it was No. 4 instead of No. 9. The third and fourth columns together are the description of the qualification—the third column the description of the nature, the fourth column the local description of the subject matter. The inaccuracy was so great that the house could not be commonly described as set down in the list, and we must first see if the barrister had power to amend, and, if he had power, whether he ought to exercise it. Unless the case can be brought within the 40th section he has no power, but I think it falls within that section. Under the first part of the section he cannot amend, as there is no mistake by the overseer in inaccurately copying the register; the overseer could not alter the register, and the only person who could was the barrister. If the inaccuracy makes the description of the qualification the description of another qualification, and that were to be proved, no evidence could be given of the insufficient qualification, and the barrister cannot amend. The section says the barrister may strike out the name where the matter be insufficiently described, but if there be proof he may amend, if the case be not brought within the proviso. But there is an exception in an exception, for the proviso, after stating no evidence shall be given of any qualification except that in the list, goes on to say that the barrister shall not be at liberty to change the description of the qualification except for the purpose of more accurately defining it. If it were not for the case of Luckett v. Knowles, I should have great doubt in thinking that there was not a description of something else than that really proved.

COLLIER, J.—The first words of the section enact that the revising barrister shall correct any mistake which shall be proved to him to have been made in the list. This was a clear error in the list, but I think the amendment can also be made under the subsequent part of the section. It has been said the qualification is insufficient because it is erroneous, but I consider that to be a heresy. It has also been contended that the proviso applies, but I do not think any evidence of any other qualification was given, and I agree that the revising barrister ought to have amended.

Decision reversed.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

HUCKLE (app.) v. PIPER (resp.).

Parliamentary election — County vote — Rateable value of occupation under several landlords — Aggregate value — Representation of the People Act* (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 6).

An occupation of several pieces of land under different landlords, none of which pieces are sufficiently rated to confer a vote for the county, but which are in the aggregate of sufficient value, makes a good qualification for a county vote under the 6th section of The Representation of the People Act: and the fact that the tenants hold under different landlords is no objection:* (Gadsby v. Burrow, 7 M. & G. 21, distinguished).

At a court held the 4th Oct., 1871, at Biggleswade, in the county of Bedford, to revise the lists of voters in the election of knights of the shire for the county of Bedford, the name of Henry Jeeves was duly objected to, and which name appeared on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of knights of the shire for the said county, in respect of the occupation as owner or tenant of lands or tenements within the parish of Sandy, of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards.

Christian name and surname of each voter.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place, No. of house (if any).
Jeeves, Henry	Sandy	£12	North Croft.

It was proved that Henry Jeeves, being of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, had occupied for a sufficient time, on the 31st July last, as tenant, lands and tenements in the parish of Sandy, under four separate and distinct landlords, being separate and distinct owners of the respective lands and tenements, and to which said lands and tenements the said Henry Jeeves was separately assessed to the poor rates in the said parish in the sums following, that is to say, 5*l.* 10*s.*, 1*l.*, 2*l.* 12*s.* 9*d.*, and 5*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; that the lands and tenements comprised in such four several and distinct occupations were properly and fully assessed to the said poor rates in the said parish at such respective sums as aforesaid; that during the time of such respective occupations the said Henry Jeeves had been rated to the several premises so respectively occupied by him to all the rates made for the relief of the poor in respect of the said premises, and had paid all rates in respect of the said premises respectively.

It was objected that the name of the said Henry Jeeves could not be retained on the said list, inasmuch as the said Henry Jeeves was not separately assessed to the poor rate of the said parish in respect of a separate occupation of premises of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards, and was not the occupier of premises under one landlord of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards, and that the four separate assessments of premises held by the said Henry Jeeves under different landlords in the said sums of 5*l.* 10*s.*, 1*l.*, 2*l* 12*s.* 9*d.*, and 5*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, which when taken together make an aggregate sum of 14*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.*, were not a sufficient qualification under the 6th section of the Representation of the People Act 1867. The qualification was held sufficient, and the name of the said Henry Jeeves was retained on the said list.

At the same court the names of James Millard, William Patrick, John Gillions, and William Gosling were also duly objected to, and their names appeared on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of knights of the shire for the said county in respect of the occupation as owner or tenant of lands or tenements within the said parish of Sandy, of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards, and also within the parish of Tempsford, as follows:

Christian name and surname of each voter at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place in this parish, and number of house (if any), where the property is situate
Millard James	Girtford	12*l.* rateable value	St. Neot's-road
Patrick, William	Girtaford	12*l* rateable value	Blunham Field
PARISH OF TEMPSFORD.
Gillions, John	Tempsford	12*l.* rateable value	Langford End
Gosling, William	Tempsford	12*l.* rateable value	Langford End

It was proved that James Millard was properly assessed to the poor rate of the parish of Sandy, in respect of two occupations by him of premises under different owners, in the separate sums of 7*l.* and 6*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; and that William Patrick was properly assessed to the like rate, in respect of three occupations by him under different owners in the separate sums of 10*l.*, 2*l.*, and 4*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*; and that John Gillions was properly assessed to the poor rate of the parish of Tempsford, in respect of two occupations by him of premises under different owners, in the separate sums of 5*l.* 5*s.* and 7*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; and that William Gosling was properly assessed to the like rate, in respect of two occupations by him of premises under different owners, in the separate sums of 8*l.* and 5*l.* 10*s.*

It was objected that these names could not be retained on the said lists as occupiers of premises of the rateable value of 12*l.* and upwards.

The revising barrister held that the qualification was sufficient in each case, and retained the names of the said James Millard, William Patrick, John Gillions, and William Gosling on the said list.

If the court was of opinion that the qualification as proved in either of the foregoing cases was insufficient, the name of the person whose qualification is insufficient is to be struck out of the said list.

Bulwer, Q. C., for the appellant.—The right to vote for members of Parliament for the county was first conferred on the tenant occupier of lands by the Chandos clause (2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 20). The 30th section of the Representation of the People Act directs in what manner the overseers are to make out the lists of persons on whom a right to vote for the county in respect of the occupation of premises is conferred by that Act, and they are to act in the same way as the overseers of the boroughs are required to do under the Registration Acts. Then the 27th section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, provides that no person is to be registered unless he has been rated to all rates for the relief of the poor in such township during the time of his occupation; and by the 13th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, the overseers are to prepare an alphabetical list of all persons entitled to vote in respect of the occupation of premises wholly or in part within his parish. If the tenant occupies lands of less value than 12*l.* a year in the parish, the overseer of the parish cannot put him on the list of voters, nor can the overseer in the adjoining parish, for the same reason. The case of Gadsby v. Barrow (7 M. & G. 21), is in point. There it was held, under the Reform Act (2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 18), that a tenant who holds under two different landlords two different sets of premises, the rent of each being less than 50*l.* per annum, though together they amount to more than that sum, is not entitled to a vote for the county. Erle, J. there says, "The 20th section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, gives a qualification in respect of leasehold property, first to tenants, for sixty years at a 10*l.* rent; secondly, to tenants for twenty years at 50*l.* rent; and, thirdly, to tenants from year to year at a 50*l.* rent, and I think that in all these cases it was meant that the holding should be under one tenancy at one rent."

H. Shield, for the respondent, was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—We are of opinion that the revising barrister was right in deciding as he did. There are four pieces of land which, when put together, were of the rateable value of more than 12*l.* per annum, and although the claimant appears to have been differently rated for each piece of land, yet the total is sufficient to make up the amount necessary to confer a vote under sub-sect. 2 of the 6th section of the Representation of the People Act. Then, under sub-sect. 3, he has been rated in respect of all rates made for the relief of the poor, and paid them, so that he had fulfilled the requirements of the Act. The application of the case of Gadsby v. Barrow (7 M. & G. 21) seems to have been in the mind of the revising barrister, but that case was decided under authority of the Reform Act 1832, followed the terms of the Act, entitling only the occupier, who paid a single rent, to a vote, and I think the court rightly held that a yearly rent made up of two sums of 25*l.* each, due and payable to different landlords, was not a rent of not less than 50*l.* payable in respect of the tenancy of land; it was two separate pieces of land, the value of which could not be taken to make up the whole amount. But the 6th section which we deal with makes it sufficient to make up all the lands together within the county of the rateable value of 12*l.* or upwards, and with that the statute is satisfied.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the pieces of land were not separately assessed in respect of the separate occupation, by adding the amounts together we shall obtain the aggregate required.

BRETT, J.—It is most desirable that we should construe the statute according to the words used; whether the interpretation goes in favour of or against the exension of the franchise, we must construe the Act of Parliament according to the words of it. In the present case the rateable value of the lands are to be taken as more than 12*l.* per annum; the only objection is that the lands occupied by the claimants were occupied under different landlords. I think this case comes clearly within the words of the 6th section of the Representation of the People Act, and upon that section alone I should say the claimants were entitled to a vote, for the subject matter is being the occupier as owner or tenant of lands or tenements within the county.

Decision affirmed.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

SIMEY v. DIXON.

Parliamentary election—Objection, notice of—County and borough vote—28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, s. 6.

A notice of objection, which named the "third column" as that on which the objection is grounded, and which stated that the objection related to the nature of the voter's interest in the qualifying property, is sufficient within the 6th section of 28 Vict., c. 36, to enable the objector to prove that a voter whose qualification was a "freehold benefice," in a borough, was entitled to a borough vote, and therefore not entitled to vote for the county under 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 24.

AT a court holden in Sunderland on the 12th Oct. last for the revision of the lists of persons entitled and claiming to be entitled to vote for a knight or knights of the shire for the northern division of Durham, the following name in the list of persons entitled to vote was objected to, that is to say:

Christian name and surname of each voter at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place in this parish, and number of house (if any) where the property is situate.
Cocken, William.	The Rectory, Bishopwearmouth.	Freehold benefice.	Bishopwearmouth parish.

It appeared in evidence that this was the name of the rector of Bishopwearmouth, and that the qualification for which it was endeavoured to retain his name on the said list was the parsonage house of the rectory, to which he was entitled in right of his benefice. It was proposed on behalf of the objector to prove that this house was situated within the parliamentary borough of Sunderland, and that it was and had been occupied by the voter a sufficient time to entitle him to a borough vote.

Exception was taken on behalf of the voter to the admissibility of the proposed evidence, on the ground that the notice of objection did not entitle the objector to go into this particular ground of objection. The notice of objection produced was in the form given by the 28 Vict. c. 36, Schedule A, No. 2, and specified the ground of objection in the following words, that is to say, "And I ground my objection on the third column of the register, and the objection relates to the nature of your interest in the qualifying property."

The revising barrister was of opinion that having reference to the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 24, the said notice in point of form and particulars satisfied the 28 Vict. c. 36 for the purpose of the objector, and was sufficient within the said statute to entitle the objector to give in evidence the above facts. He thereupon admitted the evidence, and erased the name of the voter from the list.

The questions for the court is whether the said notice was sufficient within the 28 Vict. c. 36, to entitle the objector to give the above facts in evidence. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the register shall remain as it is; if in the negative, the said name shall be restored to the register.

Udall for the appellant.—The objection to the vote cannot be raised in the manner in which it has been in this case. The objection should have been to the fourth column; as it is, it is not sufficiently clear. The party who is objected to knows the grounds which he has to defend. The objection is under the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 24, and it is there stated that no person shall be entitled to vote for a county in respect of any house occupied by himself which would confer a vote for the borough. If he was not in occupation on the 31st July he was entitled to a vote for the county, and he did not claim in respect of the rectory, but he claimed for the parsonage house. [WILLES, J.—A freehold benefice is a parsonage house.] He had a right to claim for any freehold part of the benefice out of the borough. The objection to the vote cannot be made to the third column, and no person shall be required to give evidence in support of his right to be registered otherwise than as such right shall be called in question in the grounds of objection: (29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, ss. 6, 7.) The objection ought to have been to the fourth column: (Bennett v. Brumford, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 407.) [BRETT, J.—Your case depends on whether the objection is to the third column or not.] When the objection is to the nature of the qualification it is not necessary to give notice.

Quain, Q.C. was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—We are of opinion that the revising barrister was right. The question is whether the objection is taken within the meaning of the statute. The claim was to a freehold benefice, being the parsonage house, which was within the limits of the borough of Sunderland. I think he was properly objected to, and that the franchise in the county was rightly refused, in pursuance of the 24th section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45. The 6th section of the County Voters' Registration Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 36), already alluded to, enacts that if the objection be grounded on the third column it shall be necessary to state whether the objection is to the nature of the qualifying interest or to the value of the property, or to both; and the notice of objection was clearly to the third column. I reject any notion that the objection could have been taken to the fourth column, and if it had been it would have been idle. It was part of the nature of the interest of the rector that he should have a vote for the borough, and he therefore, under the 24th section, would have no right to vote for the county. The learned counsel for the appellant contends that the notice which is given must be more specific, but the objection to the nature of the interest in the third column seems to me as specific and pointed a mode of directing attention to what was to be proved as could well be; and I think the decision should be affirmed.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The notice to my mind applies to the third column most clearly.

BRETT, J.—This objection is not to a person on the list of claimants, but to a person on the list of those who are entitled to vote for the county. It was thought that a notice of objection under No. 5 schedule of 6 Vict. c. 18 was insufficient, and the 28 Vict. c. 36, s. 6, was accordingly passed to alter it. To any person on the list of claimants, notice of objection may be general, otherwise it is not valid, unless the ground of objection be specifically stated therein, and this is to be deemed to be sufficiently satisfied by naming the column of the list on which the objector grounds his objection. Mr. Udall argued that this was an objection to no column. If you name the column, it is sufficient in all cases but one, but in that case it is necessary to state whether the objection relates to the nature of the interest or to the value of the property, so that it is sufficient except in the third column to object to the column and nothing more. Then comes the question: Did the objector misconceive the column? It is said he ought to have objected to the fourth column, but that only is the description of the property claimed for, and states that it is situate in Bishopwearmouth parish; such an objection would be utterly futile. The real objection is to the nature of the interest, that it gives no vote for the county because it gives a vote for the borough, and I therefore think the notice of objection was sufficient. Decision affirmed.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

FORD (app.) v. BOON (resp.).

Registration—Notice of claim—"House"—Amendment—6 Vict. c. 18, ss. 15 and 40; Schedule B, No. 6.

B. being entitled to be registered in respect of the occupation of a house in E. of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l., served upon the overseers a notice of claim in the form given by the* 6 Vict. c. 18, Schedule B, No. 6, in the third column of which the "nature of qualification" was stated to be "House."

E. is a city and county of itself, having reserved rights of voting as freeholders and freemen under 2 Will. 4, c. 45, and therefore persons possessing freehold property are entitled to vote for the city, and the overseers of the parish make out two lists, one of persons entitled to vote as occupiers, the other of persons entitled by virtue of other rights except as freemen:

Held, that the notice was sufficient, or, if not sufficient, that the revising barrister had power to amend.

ON appeal from the revising barrister for the city of Exeter, the following case was stated:

At a court holden, &c., Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe claimed to have his name inserted in the occupiers' list for the parish of St. David.

Brutton John Ford duly objected to his name being so inserted.

It was proved to my satisfaction that the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe sent to the overseers of the said parish, between the 1st and 26th Aug., a notice of claim in the words and figures following:

NOTICE OF CLAIM.

To the Overseers of the Parish of St. David.

I hereby give you notice that I claim to have my name inserted in the list made by you of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the city of Exeter, and that the particulars of my qualification and place of abode are stated in the columns below.

Dated the 21st Aug., 1871.

Christian name and surname of the claimant at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lane, or other place in the parish where the property is situate, and name of the house (if any) where the right depends on property.
Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe.	Saint David's-hill.	House.	Saint David's-hill.

Signed R. S. GAUNICLIFFE.

It was proved to my satisfaction that the overseers duly published a list of persons claiming to have their names inserted in the lists as required by 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 15, in which the names and qualifications of the claimants appear precisely as they are set forth in their respective notices of claim.

It was also proved to my satisfaction that the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe was on the 31st July last past entitled to have his name inserted in the said list in respect of the occupation of a house in the said parish of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l*.

Exeter is a city and county of itself, having reserved rights of voting as freeholders and freemen under 2 Will. 4, c. 45, and therefore persons possessing freehold property are entitled to vote for the said city, and the overseers of each parish make out two lists, one consisting of persons entitled as occupiers, and the other of persons entitled by virtue of other rights except as freemen, which, after being revised by me, are amalgamated into one list by the town clerk, forming the register of voters for the city.

It was contended on the part of the objector, that though the claimant had followed the form in the schedule prescribed by the Act, he had insufficiently filled it up, inserting only the qualification and not the nature of it also, and that therefore the notice of claim was insufficient—that the word "house" did not express any qualification known to the law, and there was no indication of the list in which the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe claimed to have his name inserted, or whether he claimed to be entitled to vote as owner of a freehold house or as occupier of a house. It was further contended that I had no power to amend the notice of claim under 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40, by inserting the words "occupation of."

First, because that would be giving a qualification, and not merely more accurately defining one already given, "house" being no qualification at all; secondly, because the said section only applied to the lists which I had to revise, and not to the list of claimants, or any notices, and no alteration of the published list of claimants could enable me to hold that the claimant had duly claimed as required by 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 38, before I could insert his name in the list.

On the part of the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe, it was contended: First, that the notice of claim being in the form given by the Act (6 Vict. c. 18), was sufficient, although it did not expressly state on which list the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe claimed to be placed; secondly, that the nature of the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe's qualification was sufficiently indicated by the notice of claim; thirdly, that section 40 did enable me, if necessary, to amend the list of claimants, and that the claim was good, and he relied as an authority for this upon the case of Barlow v. Mumford (Law Rep. 2 C. P., 81), and the cases therein referred to; fourthly, that any description of the nature of the qualification in the notice of claim which, if it had appeared in the overseers' list, I should have corrected into a correct description, was sufficient, in support of which he relied on the authority of Eaden v. Cooper (2 Lutw. 183; 11 C. B. 18), and that in an occupiers' list, even if "house" were insufficient to designate the qualification as being ambiguous, and not stating whether it meant "freehold house" or "house as occupier," yet it might be more clearly defined according to the nature of the qualification which it was proved to have been intended to mean if the information was supplied to me.

I held, first, that the form of the notice was sufficient, being that given by the Act, and no one being in fact required to place his name upon either list, till the case came before the revising barrister; secondly, that the description of the nature of the qualification in a notice of claim was sufficient, if it was such that I should (if it had appeared upon an overseers' list or a register for a county) have amended it under 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40 into a correct description, and that "house" was a description which I should have been justified in amending into "occupier of a house" under such circumstances; thirdly, though I was of opin on that 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 40 did not apply, for the reason relied on by the objector, I held that I was bound by the authority of Barlow v. Mumford to hold that it did so apply, and I was satisfied that if I had the power of amendment, I ought to use it. I therefore held that the notice of claim was sufficient, and inserted the name of the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe in the said list of occupiers.

The said Brutton John Ford appealed from this decision.

Under similar circumstances I inserted in the list of occupiers the names of the persons whose names are given in a schedule marked A to this case annexed, and the said Brutton John Ford appealed from my decision thereon. The several appeals depend upon the same decision and ought to be consolidated.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe duly claimed to be placed on the said list, I having made such amendment, if any were necessary, as I had power to do.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, the list of voters for the city of Exeter is to remain unaltered.

If the court should be of opinion in the negative the names of the said Robert Saunders Gaunicliffe and the other persons mentioned in the said schedule to this case are to be erased from the said list.

Kingdon, Q.C. for the appellant.—The notice was insufficient. The description of the nature of the qualification as "house" might be sufficient in an ordinary borough; but in a borough where freeholders have a right to vote, it is insufficient, as it does not indicate the list on which the claimant claims to be put. [Lopes, Q.C. mentioned Hitchins v. Brown (15 L. J. 38, C. P.; 2 C. B. 25.] In ordinary boroughs it is not necessary for a claimant to describe the particular nature of his interest in the property which is his qualification; but this is not an ordinary borough, and must be governed by the rules applicable to counties, and in counties the particular nature of the claimant's interest in the property which is his qualification must be stated. "Upon reference to the schedule relating to counties this is further illustrated, for there the parties are not required to be occupiers, and the particular nature of the party's interest must be stated; and if the party be an occupier, that is set forth, because that is an ingredient in the nature of the qualification" (per Erle, J., in Daniel v. Camplin, 14 L. J. 121, C. P.; 7 M. & G. 167; 1 Lutw. 264). That exactly applies to a case like this, as in a constituency of this sort the parties are not required to be occupiers. There having been thus an omission to state some part of what was necessary to constitute the claim, and not merely an insufficient description of the claim, sect. 40 of 6 Vict. c. 18 did not give the revising barrister power to amend (per Williams, J., in Howitt v. Stephens (28 L. J. 105, C. P.; K. & G. 183). In Townsend v. Overseers of Marylebone (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 749) the court thought that the word "dwelling-house" did sufficiently indicate the list on which the claimant claimed to be put, as, though valid as a claim by 10*l.* householder, it was not good as a claim under sect. 3 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and the court therefore thought that the claimant in that case had sufficiently indicated that he claimed to be put on the list of 10*l.* occupiers, as his notice of claim was insufficient as a claim to be put on the other list. [COLLIER, J.—In that case I thought that the word "dwelling-house" sufficiently described a claim as a 10*l.* occupier under the Act of 1832, but would not be sufficient for a claim under the Act of 1867; but I did not found my judgment upon that.]

Lopes, Q.C. for the respondent, was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was right. I do not at all concur in the doubts which he had as to the decision of the court in Barlow v. Mumford. He appears to have concluded that that case was one in which the court decided that the notice of claim ought to be amended; but in reality it was the list founded on the notice of claim which the court decided ought to be amended. It may be that a notice of claim is not within sect. 40 of 6 Vict. c. 18, but only the list; but as soon as the statement in the claim gets into the list, it is clearly within that section. The revising barrister was quite right, in my judgment, in holding that under Barlow v. Mumford he had power to amend, and that, if he had the power, he ought to use it, because, in giving notice of objection in such a case as this, the objector would object to the specifications of the qualification, and that is a case in which an amendment may be made. The amendment was necessary in this case, as Exeter happens to be (that it is a city and county is of no importance) a city in which burgage tenure exists, and the burgage tenants have in certain cases a right to vote under sect. 33 of the Act of 1832. Sects. 34 and 35 of that Act also relate to burgage tenants. Thus the 10*l.* occupation franchise existed in Exeter under sect. 27 of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, and the 40*s.* burgage franchise (under certain conditions) under sects. 33, 34 and 35. But for that circumstance, if Exeter were a pure borough, these claims would seem to be sufficient. The claim appears to have been deemed sufficient in Hitchins v. Browne (2 C. B. 25), in which case in column 3 there was simply the word "house," and in column 4, what was a description of the occupation of houses in succession. There, no one thought the statement "house" insufficient; indeed, the court thought it unnecessary for the barrister to make any amendment, to make the claim apply to houses in succession. The court thought the word "house" meant a house qualification. In this case, also, "house" was a sufficient description of the qualification. If it was not sufficient, the revising barrister was right in amending by inserting the words, "occupation of." My impression yesterday was, and, since our decision in the case of Townsend v. Overseers of Marylebone, it is now the law, that if there be a description which is sufficient in the case of a claim to vote in respect of a 10*l.* house, and that description happens also to include some other head of qualification, the claimant may prove a qualification, either under the Act of 1832, in respect of the genus "house," or under the Act of 1867, in respect of the species "dwelling-house." The head of qualification is the same in either case. Thus in a place where burgage tenants have the franchise, if a man claims for a "house," he may either show that he has a 10*l.* house, or he may prove that the house, in respect of its species, is a freehold house. In this instance, the claim was in respect of the occupation of a house which was of the yearly value of 10*l.* The claimant had, therefore, a good right to be inserted on the register, and the appeal must be dismissed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think the revising barrister was right. The claim was for a "house," and the overseers' list so states. It is the duty of the overseers to receive claims, and out of them to make a list which goes before the revising barrister. The revising barrister has sometimes to look at the claim; but it is the list which is actually before him. Here the voter claimed for a "house," and Mr. Kingdon does not deny that, in an ordinary borough, that would be a good claim; but he contends that in this instance it ceases to be good, because Exeter happens to be a city and a county, where not only occupiers but freeholders vote, and we are asked to decide that the revising barrister ought, either under sect. 40 of 6 Vict. c. 18, to have struck the claim out as insufficient, or to say that a latent ambiguity appears when it is shown that freeholders have the franchise, so that it is impossible to say whether the claimant claimed as occupier or freeholder. I think the case is within our decision of yesterday: (Townsend v. Overseers of Marylebone.) We there thought that before 1867 the word "dwelling-house" would have been a sufficient description, and that it did not cease to be so in consequence of anything contained in the Act of 1867. So here, "house" would have been sufficient under ordinary circumstances, and the fact that Exeter is both a city and a county does not render it insufficient. The question is whether the revising barrister was bound to strike the claim out as insufficient. If it remains on the list, surely the claimant may prove his qualification as a 10*l.* householder. If it were necessary that the qualification should be more clearly defined as "occupation of house of 10*l.* value," then I agree with my brother Willes that the revising barrister ought to amend, the subject-matter of the occupation being rightly described.

BRETT, J.—As to the first point, I never had any doubt, viz., that the revising barrister ought to amend, not the notice of claim, but the list. The notice is only an authority to the overseer, who is entitled to make out the list only from the claim. When he has performed that duty, and made out a list, the list goes to the revising barrister. As to the main point, but for our decision yesterday in Townsend v. Overseers of Marylebone, I should entertain great doubts. In this borough, besides other qualifications, there were two in respect of the mere occupation of a house and in respect of the freehold, and the claimant described his qualification merely as "house." Under these circumstances, the claim appears to me to have been not only inaccurate but insufficient, as, by omitting to state a material part of the qualification the claimant gives an objector great difficulty, as it is impossible to tell from this statement whether the claim is in respect of the occupation or ownership of a house, and it therefore throws on the objector the difficulty of having to be prepared to meet either case, and Mr. Kingdon contends that an objector ought not to have that difficulty cast upon him. He urges, moreover, that the difficulty is so great that the claim in that form ought not to be admitted, and he cites the judgment of Erle, J. in Daniel v. Camplin, and of Williams, J. in Howitt v. Stephens. But for our decision yesterday in Townsend v. Overseers of Marylebone, I should have thought that argument a strong one, and those dicta a strong authority. The argument yesterday was that a difficulty was thrown in the way of an objector, if the claimant might prove, under a claim for a "dwelling house," a qualification under the Act of 1832, or one under the Act of 1867. As I understood the majority of the court yesterday, they thought that "dwelling house" does not describe a qualification under the Act of 1867, but that, assuming that it does, it also describes a qualification under the Act of 1832, and is, therefore, applicable to either, and thus the decision of the court negatived the argument derived from the difficulty cast upon an objector. The decision of yesterday, therefore, negatives Mr. Kingdon's argument, and I bow to that decision. Here the term used was applicable to either of two qualifications, and, that being so, the claimant was justified in proving either of the two that was consistent with the description he had given.

COLLIER, J.—I am of the same opinion. Our decision in Townsend v. Overseers of Marylebone, governs this case. I understand that decision as affirming that where a claim is made under the Act of 1832, and the claimant has used words which describe that claim, that is sufficient, and the claim is not to be held bad simply because the words in question are such as would also include a claim under the new Act. I will only add, that I entirely agree that, if any amendment were necessary, the revising barrister was bound to make the amendment under sect. 40 of 6 Vict. c. 18.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Saturday, Nov. 18, 1871.

FIRTH v. OVERSEERS OF WIDDICOMBE-ON-THE-MOOR.

Registration—County vote—12l. occupier—Notice of claim—30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 30, sub-sect. 1—31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 17—6 Vict. c. 18, s. 15, and Form 6 Schedule B.

The appellant claimed before the revising barrister to have his name inserted in the list of 12*l. occupiers for the parish of W. It was proved that on the 25th Aug. he sent to the overseers of W. a notice of claim in the following terms: "To the overseers, &c. I hereby give you notice that I claim to be inserted in the list of voters for the division of East Devonshire, and that the particulars of my place of abode and qualification are stated in the columns below. Dated the 25th Aug.* 1871. (Signed) F. H. Firth." The nature of his qualification was described in the third column below as "land as occupier." The appellant was entitled to be put on the list in respect of land occupied by him of the value of more than 50*l. a year. The revising barrister held the notice insufficient, as it was sent in too late to enable the appellant to claim to be put on the list of* 50*l. occupiers, and that a notice of claim to be put on the list of* 12*l. occupiers ought to show on its face that it was a claim to be put on that list, and not a claim to be placed on the register sent in too late.*

Held, that the notice was sufficient as a notice of claim to be placed on the list of 12*l. occupiers.*

ON appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the Eastern Division of the County of Devon, the following case was stated:

1. At a court held, &c., Frederick Hand Firth claimed to have his name inserted in the list of 12*l.* occupiers for the parish of Widdicombe-on-the-Moor. Robert Ford Tucker duly objected to his name being so inserted.

2. It was proved to my satisfaction that the said Frederick Hand Firth had, on the 25th Aug. 1871, sent to the overseers of the said parish a notice of claim in the words and figures following:—

3. "Notice of claim.—To the overseers of the parish of Widdicombe-on-the-Moor. I hereby give you notice that I claim to be inserted in the list of voters for the division of East Devonshire, and that the particulars of my place of abode and qualification are stated in the columns below. Dated the 25th Aug. in the year 1871.—Signed F. H. FIRTH."

Christian name and surname of the claimant at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street or other like place in this parish, and number of house (if any) where the property is situate, or name of the property, if known by any, or name of the occupying tenant, or if the qualification consist of a rent-charge then the name of the owner of the property, out of which such rent is issuing, or some of them, and the situation of the property.
Frederick Hand Firth.	Great Cator.	Land as occupier.	Great Cator.

4. It was proved to my satisfaction that the said Frederick Hand Firth was entitled, on the 31st July last past, to have his name inserted in the said list, in respect of the qualification described in the said notice of claim, and that the land occupied by him was of the value of more than 50*l.* a year.

5. There was no evidence that any list of persons claiming to have their names inserted in the said list of 12*l.* occupiers had been published by the overseers of the said parish.

6. It was contended by the said objector that the notice was insufficient, because it did not show in what list the said Frederick Hand Firth claimed to have his name inserted.

7. It was contended by the said Frederick Hand Firth that the notice was to the like effect as the form of notice given by 6 Vict. c. 18. sch. B, No. 6, and that the date at which the notice was sent to the overseers sufficiently indicated the list in which he desired his name to be inserted.

8. I held that the Legislature having, by 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 4, appointed a form in which persons should claim to be placed on the register of voters for a county, and by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 17, taken in conjunction with 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 15, having expressly appointed a different form in which persons should claim to be placed on the list of 12*l.* occupiers, the first form was not applicable to a claim to be placed on the list of 12*l.* occupiers, but that a notice of claim to be placed on such list should show on its face that it was a claim to be placed on that list, and not a claim to be placed on the register sent in too late.

9. I therefore refused to insert the name of Frederick Hand Firth in the said list.

10. William Avery claimed to have his name inserted in the said list under precisely similar circumstances, the nature of his qualification being described as follows:—

William Avery.	Lower Cator.	Land as Occupier.	Lower Cator.

11. I refused to insert his name in the said list on the same ground.

12. Due notice of appeal from my decision was given by the said Frederick Hand Firth and William Avery, and the appeals depend upon the same decision, and ought to be consolidated.

13. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the said notices of claim were sufficient.

14. If the court is of opinion that the said notices were sufficient, then the said list is to be amended by inserting the names of the said Frederick Hand Firth and William Avery according to their said claims.

15. If the court is of opinion that the said notices were not sufficient, then the said list is to remain unaltered.

16. And the said Robert Ford Tucker having in writing declined to support the decision appealed against, I appoint the overseers of the said parish of Widdicombe-on-the-Moor to be the respondents herein.

G. Lewis for the appellant.—The claim was sent in Aug. 25th, and the last day for claims, other than those of 12*l.* occupiers, is July 20th. The date at which the claim was sent in, then, shows sufficiently on what list the claimant claimed to be put. The notice here was substantially the same, mutatis mutandis, as form 6 schedule B to 6 Vict. c. 18, which is made by sect. 30 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 17, the proper precedent. It does not vary further from that precedent than the notice of objection in Lambert v. Overseers of New Sarum (12 C.B. 642), varied from the statutory form; and yet the notice of objection there was held sufficient; and a notice of objection is always construed more strictly than a notice of claim.

The respondents did not appear.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the notice of claim sent in by the appellant was not open to the objection made to it, and that the decision of the revising barrister was erroneous. The decision seems to be founded on the notion that a 12*l.* occupier, sending in his claim, cannot properly do so by only describing himself in column 3 as claiming in respect of the nature of his qualification for land as occupier, and that if he does nothing more he omits to give sufficient notice to the overseers to put him on the proper list. Having carefully searched through the Acts of Parliament I find nothing applicable beyond the 17th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, which refers back to sect. 15 of 6 Vict. c. 18 and the forms given in the schedule of that Act, and I do not find in sect. 6 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102 any provision that a person claiming the new county franchise given in that section shall tell the overseer on which list he claims to be put. Looking at the terms of the Act, which provides that a claimant shall describe the nature of his qualification, I do not think that it is to be inferred that he is bound to claim to be put on any particular list. The overseers in counties have a particular duty with regard to the 12*l.* occupiers. The later statutes, which provide for the case of a 12*l.* occupier, omitted by the overseers, refer to previous enactments applicable to the case of claimants of borough votes. The enactments in question are forms 6 and 7, schedule B, of 6 Vict. c. 15, but form 7 being wholly inapplicable, we must take form 6 as the proper precedent for a notice in the present case. If we take into consideration the fact that form 6 dealt with a claim in respect of property, and form 7 with a claim otherwise than in respect of property (viz., as a freeman), that may seem an indication, taking the two together, that a person claiming should, in his notice, indicate the list on which he claims to be put. But, if we take form 6, which alone relates to property, as the proper precedent applicable here, then we have in the present case a notice which sufficiently complies with the requirements of the statute, and it appears to me to be an unnecessary refinement to go into the question of the necessity of dealing with form 7, which is not applicable at all to the case of a claim for a county. I think that the notice before us was sufficient, as it gives every information that is required, and enables the overseers to do everything that is necessary.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is the duty of the overseers in boroughs to make out lists of the persons entitled to vote for the borough, and all persons omitted from such lists had a right to make their claims, and, if qualified, to have their names inserted on the lists. In counties, the rule was different; there the duties of the overseers were merely ministerial. In this state of things, the Representation of the People Act 1867 was passed, by which a new franchise was created in counties. This Act put on the overseers in counties a duty with regard to the newly created franchise, similar to that already imposed on overseers in boroughs. But, doubts having arisen as to whether the right to make a claim in case of omission attached to the 12*l.* occupiers, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, sect. 17 provided that a person omitted might claim in the same way as a person under similar circumstances would claim in a borough, or as nearly as circumstances allowed. In the case of a person omitted in a borough, a form of claim was given in the schedule to 6 Vict. c. 18. In a borough, a person could only claim as either an occupier or else as a freeman; but, if he sent in his notice to the overseer, it was not necessary for him to say that he claimed as an occupier, because the fact of his not claiming as a freeman was equivalent to his claiming as an occupier. That seems tolerably clear. But the revising barrister seems to have thought that 30 & 31 Vict. c. 58, s. 17, taken in conjunction with 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 15, rendered it necessary for a person claiming a county vote in respect of a 12*l.* occupation to claim as a 12*l.* occupier, and to be put on the 12*l.* occupiers' list. I have looked all through the Acts, and I am unable to find that such a person is under any obligation to say that he claims as a 12*l.* occupier, and I therefore think that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed.

BRETT, J.—The objection raised before the revising barrister and his decision raise this point: Assuming that the nature of the qualification is sufficiently described, is it or is it not necessary that the notice of claim should show further on which list the claimant claims to be put? In counties, before the Act of 1867, the overseer used to send out a notice, and a person claiming to be put on the list then sent in a claim in the form 2 of schedule A to 6 Vict. c. 18. In boroughs the overseers made out a list, and any person omitted from that, or from the list made up by the town clerk, sent in a claim, in form 6 or 7 of schedule B of 6 Vict. c. 18, as the case might be. But since the Act of 1867, which gave a new county franchise, any person claiming in respect of the new franchise, was bound to claim, not in the mode hitherto in use in counties, but according to the mode previously used in boroughs. Thus the overseers were first required to make out a list of the persons entitled in respect of the new franchise, and if any person was omitted from that list, he was to make his claim according to the mode previously in use in boroughs. Taking that to be so, the revising barrister, conceiving that the Legislature had, in sect. 4 of 6 Vict. c. 18, referring to form 2 schedule A to that Act, given a form applicable to a claim for a county vote, thought that the Legislature had, by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 17, taken in connection with 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 15, expressly appointed a different form. That is, in a sense, true; as the Legislature appears to have provided that a person omitted in a county was to claim according to form 6 or 7, schedule B of 6 Vict. c. 18, and not according to form 2, schedule A, of that Act; and form 7 being inapplicable, it would appear that the claim must be according to form 6. The revising barrister accordingly concluded that a person omitted in a county must adopt form 6, schedule B, of 6 Vict. c. 18, and not form 2, schedule A. He then goes on to say that, as form 2 of schedule A is not applicable to a claim as a £12 occupier, it is not sufficient for such a person to claim according to form 6 of schedule B of 6 Vict., c. 18, but he ought to show on the face of his claim that he claims to be put on the £12 occupiers' list. I think his reasoning erroneous. He appears to have overlooked the fact that form 2, schedule A, which is applicable to counties, is as nearly as possible the same as form 6 of schedule B of 6 Vict. c. 18, which is applicable to boroughs; and although the claim in the present case is as nearly as possible in form 2, schedule A, rather than in form 6 of schedule B of 6 Vict. c. 18, the revising barrister has failed to see that the claim is practically in accordance with form 6, schedule B of 6 Vict. c. 18 (as made applicable to a claim for a county vote), though literally in accordance with form 2, schedule A. Form 6 of schedule B of 6 Vict. c. 18 having been provided (mutatis mutandis) for a case like the present, we have no right to engraft upon it the rule that it should show on its face that it is a claim to be put in one list rather than another. I, therefore, concur in thinking that the decision should be reversed.

COLLIER, J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 17 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, refers us to section 15 of 6 Vict. c. 18, and the forms there referred to, for the proper form applicable to the present case. When we turn to that form, we find that it does not precisely apply, and we then have to make it apply as far as we can. The notice in the present case is, in my judgment, sufficient, as it is substantially according to form 6 of schedule B, of 6 Vict. c. 18.

BUCKLEY (app.) v. WRIGLEY (resp.)

Registration—County vote—40s. freehold—Expenses to be deducted.

Appellant, and forty-seven other persons, claimed a county vote, describing their qualification as "share of freehold houses and lands." The appellant and another person were the owners in fee simple of certain houses and land in trust for themselves and the other forty-six claimants, in forty-eight equal undivided shares as tenants in common. The gross annual rental up to June 1871 was 141*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*, but for the year between 31*st July* 1870, and 31*st July* 1871, it was 143*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, the increased rent of 1*l.* 8*s.* 6*d. being occasioned by the bringing into the dwelling-houses a supply of water, and such bringing in of water was found by the revising barrister a convenience to the tenants, who were charged an increased rent in respect of it, and such increased rent commenced in June* 1871, when the water supply commenced. The cost of laying on such water was 21*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* There were certain outgoings in the shape of chief rent, right of way, repairs, and commissions to a rent collector, amounting to 39*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* If only this last amount was deducted (and it was conceded that this was properly deducted) from the gross rental of 143*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, there remained a net annual rental of 103*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*, and each of the forty-eight claimants was then entitled to be put on the register as a 40s. freeholder; but if the expense of laying on the water was also deducted, there remained a net annual rental of only 81*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, which did not give a 40s. freehold to each of the forty-eight claimants. The revising barrister held that the expense of laying on the water was a necessary expense and proper to be deducted from the gross annual rental, and consequently disallowed the votes.

Held, that the revising barrister was wrong.

ON appeal from the revising barrister for the southern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire, the following case was stated:

The names of the appellants and forty-six other persons were in the list of voters for the southern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire for qualifications described as "Share of freehold houses and lands in the township of Saddleworth, called Valley Cottages, Woodend, near Mossley," and the said appellant and forty-six other persons were duly objected to as not being entitled to have their names retained in the said list of voters.

The conveyance of the property was in fee simple, and dated in January 1870, and was to Robert Shaw Buckley and another in trust for themselves and forty-six other persons (including the appellant) in forty-eight equal undivided shares as tenants in common.

The gross annual rental at the date of the conveyance, and thenceforward up to June 1871, was 141*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*; but for the year between the 31st July 1870, and the 31st of July 1871, the gross annual rental was 143*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, the increased rent of 1*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* being occasioned by the bringing into the dwelling-houses a supply of water from the Ashton-under-Lyne, Staleybridge, and Dunkinfield Waterworks, and such bringing in of water was a convenience to the tenants, who were charged in respect of it an increased rent, and the increase of rent took place in June 1871, when such water supply commenced. Thus the gross annual rental of the property during the year between the 31st July 1870, and the 31st July 1871, was 141*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*, plus 1*l.* 8*s.* 6d. (the increase of rent obtained between June, 1871, and the 31st July, 1871), equal to 143*l.* 2*s.* 10d.

The houses were managed by an agent who was paid by commission which I found to be necessary, and who expended during the year, between the 31st July 1870 and the 31st July 1871, in repairs and otherwise in respect of the houses in question the following amounts which I held, in the absence of any other evidence, to be necessary expenses and proper to be deducted from the gross annual rental.

Right of way	1	10	0
Repairs	26	15	0
Commission	7	1	8
Expended for laying on water for use of tenants of the houses	21	19	1

which, being deducted from 143*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, the gross annual rent, left a net annual rental of 81*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.* The latter sum, being equally divided among the forty-eight tenants in common, left a less sum than 40*s.* annual value to each. Upon this I disallowed the votes of the appellant and of the other forty-six tenants in common whose names are appended to the schedule hereto annexed.

In all other respects the appellant and the said forty-six other persons were duly qualified. And I declare that the appeal of the said Jesse Edward Buckley and of the said forty-six other persons depend upon the same decision, and ought to be consolidated.

If I was wrong in deducting the sum of 21*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* from the gross rental for the purpose of estimating the annual value, then the vote of the appellant is to be allowed, and his name, and the names of the said other forty-six persons in the schedule hereto, are to remain in the list of voters for the southern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire in respect of the said qualification. If I was right, then the votes are to be disallowed.

C. Bowen, for the appellant.—This is simply a case where a man has improved the value of his property by making a permanent improvement. He cited Rolleston v. Cope, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 292; 40 L. J. 160, C. P.

Pickering, Q.C. for the respondent.—It is simply a question of fact whether the expenses are necessary or not; whether they were incurred voluntarily or not does not matter. The expenses incurred in this case were necessarily incurred in order to get the rent. He cited Hamilton v. Bass, 1 C. B. 631; 2 Lutw. 213; 22 L. J. 29, C. P.; Moorhouse v. Gilbertson, 14 C. B. 70; 23 L. J. 19, C. P.; 2 Lutw. 260.

C. Bowen was not called on to reply.

KEATING, J.—I am of opinion that the revising barrister was wrong, and that the votes ought to be allowed. If I could adopt the argument of Mr. Pickering, that the revising barrister found as a fact that the expense of laying on the water was necessary for obtaining the rent which was essential to the qualification, I should not hesitate to say that the revising barrister was right; but, on looking at the case, it seems plain that the laying on the water was for the convenience of the tenants, and that the expense incurred was for the purpose of suiting their convenience, and an increased rent was paid in consequence of the additional convenience thus afforded. Mr. Pickering contends that the revising barrister meant that the 141*l.* could not be got if the water were not laid on. We do not infringe on the rule laid down in Sherlock v. Steward (29 L. J. 87, C. P.), where it was held that the commission paid to the rent collector was rightly deducted, because it was found as a fact that without incurring that expense there would be no rent.

BRETT, J.—If the case meant that 141*l.* could not have been got without the expenditure, it would be admitted that it fell within Sherlock v. Steward. But the revising barrister does not say that. He simply says that the supply of water was for the convenience of the tenants, so that the case is the same as if the 21*l.* had been expended in building an additional luxury in the shape of a room.

KEATING, J.—My brother Willes, who has left the court, authorised me to say that he fully concurred in the judgment we have given.

Decision reversed.

FERNIE v. SCOTT.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Parliamentary election—County vote—Freehold for life—40s. freehold—Bye-laws passed by corporation—Poor and necessitous burgess—Custom—Tenant from year to year.

A corporation, being possessed of certain lands, made a bye-law that they should be occupied by poor and necessitous burgesses at a rent to be fixed and named by the corporation at their pleasure. The bye-law provided that only such persons were poor and necessitous burgesses as were declared so by a majority of the council of the borough. The claimant, who claimed to be entitled to a vote as a 40s. freeholder, had been declared a poor and necessitous burgess, and had been allotted one acre at a rent of 5s. per annum until further notice:

Held, that the claimant had no freehold or equitable interest sufficient to entitle him to a vote; that the estate was held at the will of the council, and at the most his interest was not greater than that of a tenant from year to year.

CASE stated by the revising barrister for Stafford.

At a court held by me, one of the barristers appointed to revise the lists at Stafford, on the 21st Oct. 1871, for the revision of the list of voters for the county of Stafford, Alexander Scott duly objected to the name of Joseph Abberley being retained in the list of voters for the western division of the said county. The following facts were established by the evidence. The mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Stafford, for many years previously to the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act, 1835, were possessed of certain land situate within the said borough, and, known by the name of Coton Field. Before the year 1835 the custom and practice of the said mayor and aldermen and burgesses, with regard to the occupation of the said land, was as follows: Each member of the common council, usually called the corporation, had two acres for his life, and his widow after his decease, so long as she continued such widow, and resided in the borough; but a non-resident in the borough, on the receipt of parochial relief, forfeited the holding. The other acres, as they became vacant by death or forfeiture, were distributed by the mayor for the time being, one each to be held by those persons whom he selected, for the same tenure and under the same customs as those above described. If the acre was in tillage, 5*s.* was paid by each person to the treasurer of the corporation, as entrance money, on taking possession. If in grass, 10*s.* as entrance was paid. The rents have varied, some having paid 2*s.* 6*d.* and others 5*s.* a year.

The Municipal Corporation Act superseded the old charter under which Stafford became a corporation.

In the year 1836 a bye-law was enacted, to point out the manner in which the corporation of the borough of Stafford should deal with Coton Acres.

The following is the bye-law referred to in the last paragraph:—

Borough of Stafford, to wit.—At a quarterly meeting of the council of the borough of Stafford, held this 9th Feb. 1836 at the mayor's office within the said borough, two-thirds of the whole of the said council being present, to wit—John Masfen, Esq., the now mayor of the said borough, and Edward Lloyd, William Jones, Thomas Stevenson, John Kenderdine Shaw, being respectively now alderman of the said borough, and Thomas Hammersley, Joseph Clewlon, John Marson, Thomas Woolley, Thomas Watwood, Charles Edward Morgan, John Wyme, Thomas Cliffe, Thomas Lea, Thomas Frith, Charles Wright, and Thomas Carter being respectively now councillors of the said borough, and the said John Masfen, Esq., presiding at the said meeting.

It is now by the said council so assembled, as aforesaid, declared, enacted, constituted, and ordered as follows:— Whereas the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the said borough for many years now last past, to wit, from the 12th day of Jan. in the fourth year of the reign of our late Sovereign Lady Queen Anne, have been entitled to the fee simple and inheritance of and in certain lands and tenements near the said borough, situate in the manor of Coton Field, subject nevertheless to a certain perpetual annual rent charge amounting to the sum of 12*l.*, now payable to the Right Honourable Charles Chetwynd, Earl Talbot, and also to a certain perpetual annual payment amounting to the sum of 26*l.* for the maintenance of certain almshouses in the said borough.

And whereas certain orders, rules, and ordinances, have been heretofore from time to time made and resolved by the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the said borough, touching the holding, enjoyment, and occupation of the said lands and tenements, under the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, and the reservation of the rents and profits of the same, under, and by virtue of which orders, rules, and ordinances, the said lands and tenements have heretofore and are now held and enjoyed by certain persons (except as hereafter mentioned) in certain divisions or portions each amounting to an acre, more or less, under the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses.

And whereas certain parts, to wit, two acres of the said lands and tenements, are at this time unoccupied by any tenant or holder thereof, under the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, and it is proper and expedient that reasonable and wholesome rules, ordinances, and regulations, and orders should be made and established respecting the future holding and enjoying of the said parts of the said lands as shall hereafter become vacant, and further respecting the future reservation of the rents and profits of such parts of the said lands and tenements as are now held, occupied, and enjoyed as aforesaid, under, and by virtue of the former orders, rules, and ordinances before mentioned. Therefore it is now, by the said council of the said borough, so assembled as aforesaid, hereby declared, enacted, constituted, and ordered that the said part of the said lands, called Coton Field, which are now unoccupied as aforesaid, and all such parts thereof as shall become vacant, shall, in future, be held and enjoyed by no other persons whatever than the poor and necessitous burgesses of the said borough by birth or servitude, duly qualified to vote for members of Parliament for the said borough, or the widows of such burgesses, the said burgesses and widows being respectively resident within the said borough. And it is hereby further, by the said council so assembled as aforesaid, declared, enacted, constituted, and ordered that no one burgess or widow of a burgess as aforesaid, shall hereafter hold or enjoy more than one acre of the said lands now vacant or which hereafter shall become vacant, under the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses.

And it is hereby further, by the said council so assembled as afores id, declared, enacted, constituted, and ordered that such lands shall be held and enjoyed at a certain rent payable therefore to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the said borough, the amount thereof and days of payment to be fixed and ascertained by the council of the said borough, from time to time, as occasion shall require, at the reasonable discretion of the said council. And it is hereby further, by the said council so assembled as aforesaid, declared, enacted, constituted, and ordered, that for the purpose of selecting from the said poor and necessitous burgesses proper persons for the holding and enjoying the said lands under the said mayor, aldermen and burgesses, two grounds of preference shall hereafter exist, and be maintained, to wit, one ground of preference shall be in favour of that burgess who shall appear by the freeman's roll to have been a sworn burgess for the greatest space of time; and the other ground of preference shall be in favour of that burgess, who for six months previous, and up to the time of selection shall have had and then have the greatest number of children at home under the age of ten years, and that as often as any part of the lands aforesaid shall from time to time become vacant, the selection of a burgess for the holding and enjoying the same shall be made by turns with respect ultimately to the said two grounds of preference, provided that in the first instance of election, a burgess shall be selected on the ground of preference first above-named.

And it is hereby further provided, that if at any time two or more burgesses claiming preference on the ground first above-named shall appear to have been sworn as burgesses on the same day, then the said selection shall be made of such one of the said two or more of the said burgesses as shall be most aged. And that if at any time two or more burgesses claiming preference on the ground secondly above-mentioned shall have happened to have had for six months previous, and up to the said time of selection, and then have the same number of children at home under the age of ten years, then the said selection shall be made of such one of the said two or more of the said last-mentioned burgesses as shall appear by the freeman's roll to have been a sworn burr the greatest space of time; and if two or more said last-mentioned burgesses shall appear to have ers as burgesses on the same day, then the said n shall be made of such one of the said last- ed two or more burgesses as shall be most aged.

t is hereby further, by the said council so assem- aforesaid, declared, enacted, constituted, and that if any burgess shall hereafter die in the and enjoyment of any part of the said lands he ordinances, regulations, and orders hereby made ublished, and shall leave a widow, she being a within the said borough, shall continue, from n of the death of her said husband, to hold and he said part of the said lands, subject nevertheless ordinances, regulations, and orders which are or hereafter in force in and for the said borough, spect to burgesses holding any part of the said s well relating to rent payable for the same as to r things whatsoever.

t is further hereby, by the said council so assem- aforesaid, declared, enacted, constituted, and that no burgess shall be regarded or considered ed necessitous burgess within the meaning of the rdinances, and regulations, and orders, unless he declared so to be by a majority of the council of borough, assembled at a regular meeting of the ncil.

ded always that no present or future member of ncil of the said borough shall be capable of hold- njoying any part of the so vacant, or which shall vacant as aforesaid, so long as he shall continue er of the said council.

t is hereby further, by the said council declared, , constituted, and ordered, that all persons, what- o at this present time hold or enjoy any part of lands under the said mayor, aldermen, and bur- shall hereafter pay an advanced rent for the ed that the amount of the said rent, and the om which the same shall begin to be payable, and the same shall in future be payable, be respec- ed and ascertained by the said council at some r regular meeting thereof; and that each and every persons last mentioned who shall refuse their to hold the said lands so now occupied by them wly as aforesaid at the advanced rent so to be d ascertained as aforesaid, shall be ejected from e by due course of law.

t is hereby further by the said council so assem- aforesaid declared, enacted, constituted, and that so much and so many of all former orders, gulations, enactments, and ordinances heretofore ed resolved by the mayor, aldermen, and bur- f the said borough, and now in force, touching ding, enjoyment, or occupation of the said lands nents, or the reservation of the rents and profits as is and are inconsistent with or contrary to larations, enactments, constitutions, and orders made, shall be and the same is and are hereby , and annulled. names of 110 other persons whose names lifications are set out in the schedule hereto, jected to under similar circumstances by . Alexander Scott. I decided that the said Joseph Abberley and the other said 110 other persons had not freehold in the said land called Coton Field, such as would entitle them to a vote for the county; and I disallowed the claim of the said Joseph Abberley and the 110 other persons mentioned in the schedule, and struck their names out of the said list of voters.

Due notice of appeal from my decision was given, and I ordered the appeals in the before-mentioned cases to be consolidated.

If the court be of opinion that my decision was wrong, the register is to be amended by inserting the name of the said Joseph Abberley and of the 110 other persons mentioned in the schedule hereto.

Streeten (Gorst with him) for the appellant.—The question is whether Joseph Abberley was a tenant at will or whether he had an equitable freehold estate entitling him to a vote. [WILLES, J.—Is he not entitled to a vote only so long as he is poor?] It was an estate of uncertain duration, but a custom had existed prior to the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act. [WILLES, J.—A member of the common council is not a member of the corporation.] The bye-law was passed by the corporation in favour of poor and necessitous burgesses for the better regulation of their tenure, and although the corporation can alter the rent, they cannot alter the possession. [BRETT, J.—Only while the bye-law is in existence. They may repeal the bye-law to-morrow, and turn the claimant out.] The tenure is regulated by the bye-law, and no burgess can hold more than one acre. [WILLES, J.—The legal estate in the land was vested in the corporation, and you must divide that among all the burgesses and show that they had 40*s.* apiece.] There is no instance of any person ever having been turned out, and this estate, which may last for life, although determinable on a contingency, is in the nature of a freehold, (He referred to Coke upon Littleton, Fol. 42 A.) [WILLES, J.—I am not aware of any case of an estate for life where the termination of it is in the option of the grantor.] A freehold estate of uncertain duration is sufficient to confer a vote: Beeson v. Burton (20 L. T. 111; 12 C. B. 647). There Jervis, C.J., says: "The estate is held upon an uncertain event, for it is uncertain whether the majority of allottees will consent to a sale or exchange, and therefore the case falls within the definition of an estate for life in Coke upon Littleton, 42 A. [WILLES, J.—In that case the estate was not determinable at the will of the grantor.] The estate of the burgesses as it stands now is a freehold for life.

Davis v. Waddington, 7 Man. & G. 37;
Trentfield v. Lowe, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 454; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394.

There is no power in the grantors to do away with the estate, although they can vary the rent, and the case comes within the definition of freehold for life in Coke upon Littleton.

Gough, for the respondent, was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion the decision of the revising barrister was right, and ought to be affirmed. There is a mistake in supposing that the occupier had a freehold interest in the land. If it was a question in whom the interest was, I should say in the corporation. The mode of enjoyment has differed, and different people have had that enjoyment, and the interest therefore seems vested in the corporation, who could deal with the land as they pleased. When the equitable rights are stamped on the corporation, the equitable tenants have a right to vote by virtue of 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, and the 73rd section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, their qualification being sufficient, if it comes to the question that they are entitled to vote at all. But they must make out, not only an equitable interest in land, but an equitable interest as freehold in land. The mere fact that the occupation was originally conferred from charitable motives, and is still enjoyed with restrictions, will not, if the interest of the occupier amount to freehold subject to a certain contingency, preclude him from the franchise, is laid down in Fryer v. Bodenshaw (1 Hop. & Colt. Regis. Cas. 204; 19 L. T. Rep. N.S. 645; L. Rep. 4, C. P. 529), where the claimant's vote was allowed, he being appointed to a house for his life from which he could not be disturbed except for felony, although he was subject to certain rules and obliged to observe the regulations of the charity. The present case is not like this, for there is here no such limit to the expiration of the tenancy; nor is it like Durant v. Kennett (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603; 1Hop. & C. Regis. Cas. 297) which was decided on the ground that the claimant was occupying as member of a corporation aggregate, and not in the character of an owner or tenant. I pass over the question of custom, as it is clearly manifest that no claim can be made by the present claimant under that head. Here the foundation for the claim is directly on the order by which the tenant came into possession, but really by virtue of the bye-law. The bye-law recites that the claimant was a poor and necessitous burgess, and only such as are poor and necessitous burgesses are entitled to receive a plot of land; and the reasons which are given for the occupation show that the occupation is to be regarded not so much as a benefit to him as to the corporation, who would otherwise have to relieve him out of the rates, which would fall on the inhabitants. Let us see what the order is. "Ordered, that the acre lately held by Widow Adams be delivered to Joseph Abberley, as tenant thereof to the council, and that he do pay 5*s.* entrance money and 5*s.* per annum as and for rent until further notice, subject to the right of the council to get sand, gravel, and stone therefrom and under the same, pursuant to the order of the 28th April 1856, the council paying compensation for all surface damage," meaning they are to become tenants till further notice, and such notice must be given fairly. Now, if the tenant received a legacy, the council might turn him out as a person not requiring a benefit. That would fairly put an end to the tenancy, as it is of such an uncertain period. The case of Davis v. Waddington (7 M. & G. 37) is not in point, as it does not involve a case of freehold, and in Beeson v. Burton (12 C. B. 647; 20 L. T. Rep. 111), the tenancy was not determinable at the will of the grantor, but the allotments were to be held respectively by each resident freeman desiring to become the occupier, obtaining possession thereof so long as he should be willing to hold the same, and pay the annual rent and conform to the orders and regulations; but here it is determinable without the will of the occupier being taken into consideration. Then, passing over to the provision that no burgess shall be considered poor and necessitous unless he is declared so to be, it was competent for the revising barrister to come to the conclusion that the land was to be distributed as a charity, and that the corporation reserved the power of apportioning the rent. This shows an enjoyment as tenant from year to year. I think the revising barrister was right, and there is no evidence in the case to hold there was such a freehold in the claimant as to entitle him to a vote. We are not disposed to lay down that a person receiving alms from a corporation should have a vote.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The order is in the nature of the title deed of the occupier, and the order creates a tenancy from year to year. In Trentfield v. Lowe (L. Rep. 4, C. P. 454; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394) there was a distinct estate for life.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think there is no finding of any legal custom to confer a vote. If there was a custom it must have existed previous to the year 1836, when the bye-law was passed, and the case cannot be supported on custom. If the attempt is made to support the case on the bye-law, then we discover the grantors can alter the bye-law at will. Whether they can make such a bye-law I give no opinion; but as they repealed the former bye-law, why should not they do the same by this? At most it creates a tenancy from year to year, after entry and payment of rent. The person appointed to the property is entitled to notice to quit, and it seems to me impossible to imagine any arrangement more likely to create abuse, and therefore more mischievous, than to hold the claimant entitled to a vote, which would in fact be giving the franchise to a person in receipt of parish relief.

Decision affirmed.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

CHARLTON (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF STRETFORD (resps.).

Parliamentary election—County vote—Sub-lessee—Term of more than sixty years—Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 5—(2 Will. 4, c. 45), ss. 20, 26.

A sub-lessee of a term which, when originally created was for more than sixty years, and of the clear yearly value of 5*l. over and above all rents and charges payable out of the same, is entitled to vote for members of Parliament for the county.*

Semble, the 5*th section of the Representation of the People Act* 1867, does not create a new franchise, but lowers the value of the old one.

AT a court for the revision of the list of voters for the polling district of Stretford, in the south-eastern division of the county of Lancaster, Thomas Surwood, described on the list of persons claiming to be entitled to vote for the township of Stretford as follows:

Name.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street, lane, &c.
Surwood, Thos.	4, Gladstone-street, Stretford.	Leasehold houses, term over 60 years.	Nos. 60 and 62, Bold-street, and No. 4, Gladstone-street.

was duly objected to. The said Thomas Surwood had no qualifying interest whatever in the houses in Bold-street, but he was a sub-lessee for a period of not less than sixty years, and was in actual occupation of, No. 4, Gladstone-street.

The clear yearly value of No. 4, Gladstone-street was over 5*l*., but under 10*l*., over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same.

It was contended on behalf of the claimant that the 5th section of the Representation of the People Act 1867 extended to the case of a sub-lessee as well as to that of a lessee, and that such sect. 5 was in substitution, and was substantially a repeal of that part of the 20th section of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, which relates to the clear yearly value of leaseholds, notwithstanding the 56th and 59th sections of the said Act of 1867.

The revising barrister considered that the claimant's case did not come within the 5th section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, because he was not entitled to the said house, either as lessee or assignee, for the unexpired residue of any term originally created; secondly, that the claim could not be supported under the 20th section of the Reform Act (2 Will. 4, c. 45), because the said house was not of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l*.; and, thirdly, that the said two Acts could not be construed as if the last part of the said 20th section of the Act of Will. 4, beginning with the words "Provided always," formed part also of the said 5th section of the Act of 1867. He therefore disallowed the said claim of the said Thomas Surwood, and struck his name off the list of claimants, deciding that to entitle a person, being only a sub-lessee of premises, to vote in the election of a knight of the shire to serve in Parliament for the said division of the said county, such premises must be of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l*. over and above all rents and charges as aforesaid. If the court should be of opinion that the decision was wrong, then the name of the said Thomas Surwood must be inserted in the list of the said claimants.

Joshua Williams, Q. C. (Edwards with him) for the appellant.—The right of voting by leaseholders was originally created by 2 Will. 4, c. 45, and the 20th section of that Act throws light on the 5th section of the Representation of the People Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102). The under lessee is quite as much a lessee as the lessee of a freehold, and so entitled to a vote. The two statutes are to be read together. He referred to Warburton v. Overseers of Denton, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 729; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 267.

No counsel appeared to argue on the other side.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal is well founded. The revising barrister seems to have come to the conclusion that the under lessee was not a lessee within the 5th section of the Representation of the People Act, which defines who is entitled to be registered as a voter and to vote for members of Parliament, that is to say, everyone who is of full age and not subject to any legal incapacity, and is seised at law or in equity of any lands or tenements of freehold, copyhold, or any other tenure whatever for his own life or the life of another, or for any lives whatsoever, or for any larger estate of the clear yearly value of not less than five pounds over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same, or who is entitled either as lessee or assignee to any lands or tenements of freehold or of any other tenure for the unexpired residue, whatever it may be, of any term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years, of the clear yearly value of not less than five pounds over and above all rents and charges payable out of or in respect of the same. The revising barrister did not seem to come to his conclusion on the notion that the lease was the less a lease because the claimant was an under tenant, but because the claimant was not entitled to a vote unless he was lessee or assignee of the lease. The language of the statute is for any term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years, and it does not exclude a voter because he has only thirty years or twenty years of his term remaining, so long as at the creation of the term it exceeded sixty years, although part of that time has expired. But all doubt is cleared up when we turn to the 20th section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, which gives a vote to every male person of full age who shall be entitled either as lessee or assignee to any lands or tenements, whether of freehold or any other tenure whatever, for the unexpired residue, whatever it may be, of any term originally created for a period of not less than sixty years, of the clear yearly value of not less than 10*l*. over and above all rents and charges payable out of the same; and then the proviso at the end of the section provides that the sub-lessee or assignee of any underlease shall have a right to vote if he be in actual occupation. The proviso is not declaratory that the lessee is the same as the sub-lessee, but it says that as a sub-lessee is a lessee, and as great abuses might follow by splitting up votes, a check shall be put on the practice, and that no one shall have a right to vote in respect of any term of sixty years, unless he shall be in occupation of the premises. The case of Warburton v. The Overseers of the Township of Denton (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 267; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 729) is binding on us, for, by the construction of the 5th section, we held that a person to be entitled to a vote under its provision must be lessee of a corporeal hereditament which could be the subject of occupation, or assignee of such an hereditament, and that a chattel rent-charge, though originally created for more than 60 years, does not confer a vote; and we are equally bound to hold that the 5th section includes the case of a sub-lessee. The difficulty of the case of a sub-lessee not in occupation does not arise here; when it does present itself for our decision, it will be a question of difficulty whether the proviso at the end of the 20th section is to be read in or not; if it is to be read in, all difficulty will vanish, but at present we are not called upon to deliver judgment upon that point.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion upon the question which is now before us. I have nothing further to add.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the question comes within the Representation of the People Act, and I should have thought so if it had stood alone. It applies to the state of things when the lease was made. The first part of the section repeats in terms the 19th section of the Act of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, and looking to the provisions in the 20th section, the real effect is not to create a new franchise, but to lower the value from 10*l*. to 5*l*. Considering also the 56th and 59th sections of the Representation of the People Act, we must read the franchises conferred in addition to, and not in substitution of, any existing franchises, except where it would be inconsistent with the tenor of former Acts to do so. Decision reversed.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

DIXON (app.) v. COCKETT (resp.)

Summary jurisdiction of justices—Bonâ fide claim of right—Express provision for settlement of disputes.

A private Act of Parliament, incorporating a bridge company, and enabling them to take certain maximum tolls, which the company by resolution might diminish and alter, provided for the settlement of disputed tolls by a justice, by way of arbitration. By a subsequent section, if any collector should demand or take a greater or less toll from any person than he should be authorised to do by virtue of the Act or resolutions under it, or should demand or take a toll from a person exempt from the payment thereof, he was to forfeit a sum less than 5l. upon an information before justices.

The respondent, a foot passenger, paid the appellant, the collector of tolls, upon demand, a toll the second time the same day, and laid an information before justices against the appellant for demanding it. There was no exemption in the Act upon a passenger's crossing the bridge a second time in the same day; but it was admitted that from the passing of the Act, forty years before, until this demand, no passenger ever had paid under such circumstances. No resolution of exemption, however, was in existence. The justices, convicted, notwithstanding the appellant's assertion of a bonâ fide claim of right.

Held, upon a case stated by the justices, that as there was a particular provision in the Act for the settlement of such a dispute, the information ought to have been dismissed; also that the fact of forty years' practice, although evidence of exemption, was not conclusive.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln, under the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law, which arose as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Lincoln, in and for the said parts of Lindsey, on the 16th June 1871, an information preferred by Wm. Cockett, of Dunham-on-Trent, in the county of Nottingham (hereinafter called the respondent), against Wm. Dixon, of Newton, in the said parts, collector of tolls (hereinafter called the appellant), charging for that on the 24th May 1871, in the parish of Newton, in the said parts of Lindsey, the said Wm. Dixon, the toll collector of a bridge called Dunham Bridge, did unlawfully demand and take from the said Wm. Cockett the sum of 1*d.*, as and for the toll of a foot passenger over the said bridge, he the said Wm. Cockett being exempt from the payment of such toll by reason that no more than one full toll should be taken for or in respect of the same foot passenger in any one day for passing and repassing any number of times through the said toll gate or toll bar at Dunham Bridge aforesaid, he the said William Cockett having previously paid the sum of 1*d.* for toll, contrary to the stat. 11 Geo. 4, c. lxvi., and the rules and regulations made thereunder, was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and the justices adjudged him for his said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of 6*d.* to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent the sum of 1*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, for his costs in that behalf; and if the said several sums should not be paid forthwith, they ordered that the same should be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said appellant, and in default of sufficient distress they adjudged the said appellant to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Kirton in the said parts, and there kept to hard labour for the space of seven days, unless the said several sums and all costs and charges of the said distress, and of the commitment and conveying of the said appellant to the said house of correction, should be sooner paid.

And whereas the applicant being dissatisfied with this determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, had in pursuance of sect. 2 of the said statute of 20 & 21 Vict c. 43 duly applied to the justices in writing to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion of this court, and had duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

Therefore the said justices in compliance with the said application, and the provisions of the said statute, and by consent of the said parties, stated and signed the following case:

The Act 11 Geo. 4, c. lxvi, contains the following provisions:

By clause 69, that as soon as the said bridge shall be made fit for the passage of carriages, horses, cattle, and passengers, it shall and may be lawful for the said company, or the committee of management, or the collector, to be appointed by the said company or committee, or by any lessee or lessees of the tolls from time to time, and at all times hereafter, to demand, collect, and receive, before any horses, beasts, cattle, carriages, or foot passengers, shall be permitted to pass over the said bridge, or through any gate to be erected by virtue of this Act across the approaches thereto, such tolls as the said company shall from time to time think proper, not exceeding the respective sums following, that is to say:

Tolls (amongst others). For every foot passenger, except the person employed in driving any waggon, cart, or other such like carriage, the sum of one penny.

By clause 70, Provided always, and it is further enacted that no more than one full toll shall be taken for or in respect of the same horses, beasts, or cattle in any one day for passing and repassing any number of times through the said toll gate or toll bar to be erected by virtue of this Act.

By clause 84, And be it further enacted that if any dispute or disputes shall happen respecting the demanding, or taking, or the payment of toll, or about the amount of the toll due, or the charges of making, keeping, or selling any distress for the recovery of the said tolls, such dispute shall be settled and determined by some justice of the peace for the said county, liberty, or place, in which respectively, such dispute or disputes shall happen, who, upon application made to him for that purpose, shall examine the matter on the oath of the parties or other witness or witnesses (which oath such justice is hereby authorised to administer), and shall determine the amount of the tolls due, and other matter in dispute between the parties, and may also award such costs and charges to either party as to the said justice shall appear right and proper; all which costs and charges shall and may be levied and recovered in case of non-payment thereof forthwith by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the person or persons awarded or directed to pay the same by warrant under the hand and seal of such justice, rendering the overplus, if any, upon demand, after deducting the costs and charges of making such distress and sale to the person or persons whose goods and chattels shall have been so distrained and sold.

By clause 85, Collectors, &c., are not to be deemed incompetent witnesses in any dispute, suit, or litigation, touching, or in anywise relating to the said tolls.

By clause 86, That it shall be lawful for the said company, and they are hereby empowered from time to time to lessen or reduce all or any of the tolls by this Act granted, and for such time or times as they the said company shall think proper, and from time to time afterwards to advance any of the tolls so lessened or reduced to any sum or sums of money not exceeding the respective tolls granted by this Act: Provided always that it shall not be lawful for the said company to lessen or reduce the said tolls or any of them without the consent of three-fourths in value of the creditors on the said tolls respectively; and no toll shall be lessened, reduced, or advanced unless at a meeting of the said company, of which twenty-one days' public notice shall be given.

By clause 88, The tolls may be leased.

By clause 90, That all and every toll collector, being lessee of the said tolls, or appointed either by any such lessee or lessees, or by the said company or committee of management to collect the tolls by this Act granted, shall and he is hereby required to place his christian and surname, painted on a board in legible characters in the front or some other conspicuous part of the toll house or toll gate, immediately on his coming on duty . . . . and shall continue the same so placed during the whole time he shall be upon such duty; and every such collector shall place or cause to be placed on the front of the toll house or toll gate at which such collector shall be stationed, the board hereinbefore directed to be provided, containing the usual name of the bridge, and of the toll gate whereon the board shall be fixed, and also the list of the tolls payable at such bridge or g te; and if any collector of the said tolls shall not place such boards respectively as aforesaid, and keep the same there during the time aforesaid, or shall demand or take a greater or less toll from any person than he shall be authorised to do by virtue of this Act, or of the orders and resolutions of the company or committee of management, made in pursuance thereof, or shall demand and take a toll from any person or persons who shall be exempt from the payment thereof and claim such exemption, or shall refuse to permit or suffer or shall in anywise hinder any person or persons from reading such boards respectively, or shall refuse to tell his christian or surname to any person or persons who shall demand the same on having paid the said tolls or any of them, or shall refuse to give a ticket denoting the payment of toll, or shall in answer to such demand give a false name or names, or upon the legal toll being paid or tendered shall unnecessarily detain or wilfully obstruct, hinder, or prevent any horse, beast, cattle, carriage, or passenger from passing over the said bridge or through the said toll gate, or shall make use of any scurrilous or abusive language to any proprietor, treasurer, clerk, surveyor, or other officer, or any passenger or passengers, then and in every such case every such toll collector shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.* for every such offence, as the justice or justices, before whom the information shall be laid, shall adjudge, to be recovered and applied as hereinafter mentioned.

By clause 104, That if any person shall think himself or herself aggrieved by anything done in pursuance of this Act (except in such cases where the final determination is directed by this Act), and for which no particular method of relief hath been hereby appointed, such person may appeal to the justices of the peace at any general or quarter sessions of the peace to be holden in and for the county or parts in which the cause of complaint shall arise.

The following facts were proved and found by the justices:

That the said bridge had been erected and built about thirty-seven years.

That the company (called the Dunham Bridge Company) on the completion of the said bridge opened the same for the accommodation of the public, and by their agents entered into the receipt of the tolls on their own account, and so continued to receive them for upwards of a year.

That the said company has since then let the said tolls on lease; but on two subsequent occasions it has been in receipt of the tolls on its own account.

That on the opening of the bridge for traffic, a toll board with a list of the tolls was hung up at the entrance of the bridge, such list being, in fact, a copy of the list of the maximum amount of tolls authorised by the Act; but the said board contained no reference to the exemption from toll under the Act.

That the company had let the tolls arising and becoming payable under the said Act to the present lessees for two previous separate terms, and lastly for a third term as and from the 18th April, 1871, for three years, at 227*l.* per annum, to three persons, named Thomas Bower, John Richard Bower, and Enoch Blackbourne. By the indenture of lease, the bridge, the toll house, "and all and all manner of tolls whatsoever arising or to arise and become payable during the continuance of the term hereby demised at the said toll bar or toll gate respectively, by virtue of the said recited Acts of Parliament," were demised to the said lessees.

That the said company and their lessees from the opening of the said bridge to the time alleged in the said information, demanded one penny for each passenger for passing and repassing any number of times in one day, and no more than one penny has ever been charged by the said company during the three separate terms when the said company was in receipt of the said tolls on its own account.

That at the time stated in the information the appellant demanded and claimed, as of right, one penny of the respondent for passing over the bridge, namely, both in passing, and a second penny for repassing.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that he was of right entitled to levy a toll of one penny on each passenger for each time he might pass over the bridge through the toll bar or toll gate erected across the approach to such bridge; that the tolls set out in the Act of Parliament, and specified on the toll board, entitled him to do so; and that there being an exemption in favour of the same, horses, beasts, or cattle in any one day passing and repassing any number of times through the said toll gate or toll bar, and not in favour of foot-passengers, duly entitled him to such toll; and that the justices had no jurisdiction under that form of summons to determine the question, as the appellant claimed the toll as a matter of right.

The respondent contended that the appellant was only authorised to levy such tolls as the said company should from time to time think proper, and not the tolls mentioned in the Act; that, although he was bound to admit that the board was evidence of the tolls leviable, yet, as the board was silent as to the exemptions under the Act, it was only reasonable to suppose that exemptions made by the company were also omitted.

It was also stated on behalf of the respondent, and admitted by the appellant, that there is not in existence any minute of the company either adopting the table of tolls in the Act, or making any other table. The respondent therefore contended that the fact of the company and its lessees having for so many years exempted foot passengers from more than one payment, must be taken as evidence of the company having made such an exemption when framing their table of tolls, and that the appellant by having demanded a second toll had contravened the Act of Parliament.

The justices being of opinion that the 84th section of the Act gave them authority to settle disputes with regard to the tolls, overruled the appellant's objection to their jurisdiction; and they were of opinion that the company in making their scale of tolls exempted foot passengers from paying toll for passing or repassing any number of times after the first, and they gave their determination in manner aforesaid.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: first, whether the justices had any power to determine the question under the said summons, as the lessees claimed the toll as a matter of right, the question being one of law; secondly, whether the lessees were entitled under the circumstances to claim a penny each time every foot passenger passed or repassed over the said bridge, and whether the justices were right in convicting the appellant.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be dismissed.

Cave for appellant.—This was a matter which ought to have been determined by arbitration under clause 84, and not upon an information under clause 90. It may be, that upon a claim for excessive toll, after the determination of a justice under clause 84, a collector may be convicted summarily. Here, however, there had been no such determination, and the bonâ fide claim of right by the appellant was sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the justices upon a summons. Also there was no evidence of any resolution or meeting of the bridge committee, both of which are, by clause 86, necessary preliminaries to any alteration of the tolls from those provided by the Act. [BLACKBURN, J.—The justices have found as a fact that this alteration was made, and we cannot upset their finding, unless we consider that there was no evidence to support it.]

J. W. Mellor for respondent.—Unless the justices had jurisdiction under clause 90 to hear and decide this information, they had no power to state this case, nor could the appellant in any way take the opinion of this court. By Jervis's Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, "After the hearing and determination by a justice or justices of the peace of any information or complaint, which he or they have power to determine in a summary way, by any law now in force or hereafter to be made, either party to the proceeding before the said justice or justices may, if dissatisfied with the said determination, as being erroneous in point of law, apply in writing, within three days after the same, to the said justice or justices, to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds for such determination, for the opinion thereon of one of the Superior Courts of law, to be named by the party applying." If, therefore, the justices have exceeded their jurisdiction, this court cannot review their decision: Flannagan v. Overseers of Bishopswearmouth (27 L. J., M. C., 47). [LUSH, J.—Cases are continually stated with the object of raising the question of the justices' jurisdiction.] By clause 84 of the local act, the justice shall determine a dispute brought before him under that provision, and such determination is excepted in clause 104 from the provision for appeal to quarter sessions.

Cave not heard in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case one or two questions depend upon the construction of the local Act referred to, but the main point upon which our decision is required is, whether this proceeding, which is clearly a summary conviction under the 90th section, was rightfully adopted by the justices under the circumstances. Now if that section stood alone, we should have first to apply the general principle that, in cases which are rendered liable to the summary jurisdiction of justices, a bonâ fide claim of right on the defendant's part is sufficient to oust the jurisdiction. The Legislature has thought fit not generally to trust such a tribunal with questions of title, which its members are not accustomed to deal with. There are no doubt certain cases concerning which the summary jurisdiction granted by statute would be inoperative, unless the justices assume power to investigate questions of title; for instance, the case of an encroachment under the Highway Acts, which we have often held to be within the jurisdiction of justices, although a question of title only. Had sect. 90 stood alone, there might too have been difficulties as to its interpretation; but, in my opinion, they need not now be considered; for here, by this Act, a peculiar tribunal is appointed for the particular purpose of settling all disputes of this kind, and we are bound to read the whole Act together. The justices should, I think, have decided not to hear this case upon the information before them; they should have said, as objection is taken to our summary jurisdiction, we are bound at all events to consider whether, under the provisions of the Act, this dispute between the parties cannot be otherwise determined. They might have dismissed this charge against the collector, and suggested an application by the respondent in pursuance of sect. 84, not against the collector, but against the lessees. The justices here seem to have thought correctly, that they had jurisdiction to determine this question of title under that section; and they were incorrect in thinking, upon the whole Act considered together, that they had a summary jurisdiction under sect. 90, after the objection taken by the appellant. They made a mistake in a matter of law, and the information ought to have been discharged. On the other points discussed, it is not necessary that we should express an opinion; but, for the future guidance of the justices and the parties interested, we may mention our opinion that, under sect. 104, there is given an appeal to quarter sessions from an order made under sect. 84. It appears that for forty years a toll was never demanded from a foot passenger twice in the same day, and the justices concluded from that fact that the bridge company must have formally resolved not to levy double tolls from a passenger in one day. It is not necessary for us to allude to this point, but we may as well say that, although non-user for so long a time was evidence to create a strong impression of a formal exemption, yet it was not conclusive. What we desire to intimate is, that this fact should be considered as evidence only. These remarks, however, are to be taken as obiter. Our decision is, that the justices should have dismissed this information.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not an order under sect. 84, but a conviction under sect. 90. If the later section had stood alone, it would have given the justices authority to decide the toll due from the respondent, and even to convict the appellant for making a mistaken but innocent demand. But as sect. 84 expressly provides for the settlement of bonâ fide disputes, sect. 90 must have been intended to treat of acts which are of the nature of offences.

QUAIN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

REG. v. MORGAN.

*Local board of health—Election of members—Nomination—Qualification of voters—*11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 22, 24.

The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (The Public Health Act 1848), s. 22, enacts that ratepayers and owners of property shall be entitled to vote at the election of members of a local board of health, "provided that no owner whatsoever shall be entitled to vote as such, unless, fourteen days at least previously to the day of tendering his vote, he shall have delivered" to the clerk of the board "a statement in writing of his name and address, and containing a description of the nature of his interest or estate in the property, giving the qualification," &c.:

Held, that a statement of qualification delivered prior to one annual election would not suffice for another election in the year following, but must be renewed.

Sect. 24 enacts that any person entitled to vote may nominate for the office of member in manner therein specified, but does not require the person nominating to state whether he does so "as owner" or "as ratepayer." A nominator described himself in a nomination paper to be "duly qualified as owner," whereas, in fact, he was only qualified "as ratepayer."

Held, that the statement of the nature of the qualification was surplusage, and that, as he was duly qualified to nominate, his nomination was good, notwithstanding the error in description.

Motion for a rule nisi, calling on George Morgan to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto, should not issue, calling on him to show by what authority he exercised the office of member of the local board of health for Sheerness.

An election, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, of members of the Sheerness Local Board of Health being about to be held, candidates were nominated on the 15th Sept. 1871, some of them, amongst whom was John Cole, were nominated by A. W. Marks, in a document which fulfilled the requirements of sect. 24 of the above Act, and was subscribed as follows:—

I, being duly qualified as owner in the district, nominate the above to be member of the local board.
A. W. MARKS.

The notice necessary to give Marks a right to vote as owner had been given by him fourteen days before the election held in 1870, and his name was then entered by the clerk to the local board in the proper register. No subsequent notice was sent in by Marks, but his qualification as owner, in respect of the same property, continued to exist, and he was, moreover, qualified to vote as a ratepayer.

Upon the 26th Sept. voting papers were issued. They were collected on the 29th of the same month, and afterwards four persons were declared by the chairman (under sect. 27), to be elected, one of whom was Morgan, and Cole was declared not to be elected (although he had obtained more votes than Morgan), on the ground that his nomination was void, Marks not being entitled to vote as owner, he having omitted to send in a notice.

11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 22, enacts:

That the ratepayers in respect of property in the district for which the election is held, and the owners of such property shall be entitled to vote according to a certain scale, provided that no owner whatsoever shall be entitled to vote as such, unless, fourteen days at least previously to the day of tendering his vote, he shall have delivered to the clerk a statement in writing of his name and address, and containing a description of the nature of his interest or estate in the property giving the qualification, &c.

Sect. 24 enacts:

That any person entitled to vote may nominate for the office of member of the local board of health himself (if qualified to be elected), or any other person or persons so qualified (not exceeding the number of persons to be elected); and every such nomination shall be in writing, and shall state the names, residence, calling or quality of the persons nominated, and shall be signed by the party nominating.

Michael in support of the motion.—A claim to vote as owner had been sent in by Marks twelve months previously to the election; and such claim need not be renewed every year (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 22). [COCKBURN, C. J.—Is not the language of the final proviso there too strong to be overcome. The owner is not to be entitled to vote as such "unless fourteen days at least previously to the day of tendering his vote" he shall have delivered a statement in writing of the kind specified. That enactment was, I suppose, intended to ascertain and fix the fact of his being an owner. And if a notice given twelve months before the tender of the vote would be sufficient, then one given twelve years before might do, although he might since have changed his ownership. LUSH, J.—Suppose he had sold all his property?] Then his vote would be bad. [COCKBURN, C. J. But is it not the function of the returning officer to see that persons disentitled to vote do not do so, and not to let them vote first and strike their votes out afterwards. MELLOR, J.—Besides, how is he to judge? Must he search through the voting papers of numerous bygone years?] He had certainly returned Marks as "owner." [LUSH, J.—But there can be no estoppel by the act of the returning officer if the statute says that notice shall be given within fourteen days.] Next, sect. 24 enacts that any person entitled to vote may nominate for the office of member of the local board of health himself (if qualified to be elected), or any other person or persons so qualified (not exceeding the number of persons to be elected.) It does not say that he is to be qualified in any particular manner. He is to be "entitled to vote"—the rest is mere surplusage. [LUSH, J.—If he had nominated himself "as owner," would he have been entitled to be elected?] No, for he would not have been within the terms of the statute, and could not have been returned. But here he was qualified as ratepayer. He fulfilled all the section required, but added surplusage.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Upon this latter ground you may take a rule nisi, but not on the former point that the notice given for a previous election would suffice for a subsequent one.

A rule nisi having been accordingly drawn up in the terms above stated:—

Nov 20, 1871. Merewether showed cause.—No form of nomination is prescribed by the Act, but schedule A. gives the form of voting paper. In that voting paper the voter must state the number thereof, his name and address, and the number of votes "as owner," "as ratepayer." And the act of nomination is an act of voting. Thus, under sect. 6 of 22 Vict. c. 35, where a municipal borough is divided into wards, the person nominating a candidate for town councillor must be entitled to vote for the particular ward for which he nominates, and if he be entitled to vote only for another ward, his nomination and the election of the candidate are void (Reg. v Parkinson, 17 L.T. Rep. N.S. 169, L. Rep. 3 Q B 11; 37 L.J., 52, Q. B.). The person nominating in the present case ought to have given the same information to the returning officer, as schedule A. requires in the voting paper. [HANNEN, J.—A nomination may operate as a vote, but it is not one. COCKBURN, C.J.—The returning officer might easily see if the nominator was a ratepayer or not.] It would be troublesome to the officer to ascertain the fact. If Marks were not an owner entitled to vote, he could not nominate as such, but he essayed to do so, whereupon the returning officer looked to see if he was an owner qualified to vote as such, and found that he was not. Then was it the part of the returning officer to refer to the rate book, in order to ascertain if he was a ratepayer? [COCKBURN, C.J.—That would not be a very onerous duty, for doubtless the owners are few. There is nothing which requires the nominating party to state a qualification, and if he gave none, the officer would then have to inspect both books.] That which must be done on nominating must be done on voting, if the nomination is to have the effect of a vote.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We need not trouble you to support the rule, Mr. Michael. The question all turns on the construction of the 24th section which runs thus: "Any person entitled to vote may nominate for the office of member of the local board of health himself (if qualified to be elected), and every such nomination shall be in writing, and shall state the names, residence, calling, or quality of the persons nominated, and shall be signed by the party nominating," &c. Now in that there is nothing that provides that the party nominating shall state in what respects he is entitled to vote. And, besides the fact that there is nothing said on the subject, it seems to me plain from the same section, containing an express provision that the qualifications of the persons nominated shall be stated, that it was not intended to require a similar statement with respect to the person nominating, otherwise there would also have been a provision in terms to that effect. Then Mr. Merewether says that is to be implied from the fact that the person voting must state his qualification when the nomination paper operates as a vote. It may have been that there is an omission in the statute, and it would have been advisable to call on the party to state his qualification, but the Legislature has not done so, and we must not interpolate a term in an Act of Parliament, or attempt to repair defects; we are not called upon to undertake such arduous duty. "But," says Mr. Merewether, "what trouble is caused to the returning officer, if he is compelled to ascertain for himself the qualification of the person?" Yet, if my first proposition is correct, viz., that the person nominating is not called on to state a qualification at all, in every instance where he puts in a qualification which he is not bound to state, that addition is mere surplusage, and the returning officer would have to look first to see if the person were an owner, and, if not, then if he were a ratepayer; so there is no hardship on the returning officer. In the present case, though the party being misled from circumstances, put in his qualification "as owner." I consider that, inasmuch as he was not called upon to insert any qualification at all, it is pure surplusage, and the returning officer might, had he been so minded, have looked at the list of ratepayers, when he would have seen that the person was in the list, and was qualified. I think, therefore, that this rule must be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. There might have been some effect in Mr. Merewether's argument if the statute had not directed the form in which the nomination paper should be made; but, on the contrary, the section declares that the nomination shall "state the names, residence, calling or quality of the persons nominated, and shall be signed by the party nominating;" it seems to me that the argument is entirely upset by the fact that the section is so worded—all that is necessary as far as description of the nominator is concerned is that the nominatoin should be signed by him.

WILLIAMS (app.) v. LEAR (resp.)

"Taxed cart"—Excise licence—Tolls.

A local Turnpike Act of the year 1852 allowed a higher toll upon a "taxed cart" than upon "a gig, or chair, or such like carriage with a single seat only, and with two wheels only."

The appellant, the toll-collector, demanded and took the higher toll from the respondent for a butcher's cart, with one seat and two wheels, for which he had taken out an excise licence under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, and was convicted by justices under the local Act for so doing.

Held, that the conviction was right; for the words "taxed cart" must refer to the particular kind of cart so called and defined in 43 Geo. 3. c. 161, & 48 Geo. 3. c. 55; and not to every cart upon which a tax had been paid, as was decided in Purdy v. Smith, 28 L. J. 150, M. C.

CASE stated by justices of Devon sitting at the Castle of Exeter, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43:

The appellant, John Williams, the lessee and collector of tolls at the Alphington turnpike gate, in the parish of St. Thomas, in the county of Devon, appeared before the undersigned justices of the peace for the county of Devon at the Castle of Exeter, on the 12th May 1871, in pursuance of a summons issued against him on the complaint of Henry Salter Lear, for unlawfully demanding and taking from him, on the 5th May 1871, the toll of 6*d.* for a cart and one horse driven by him through the said turnpike gate; the same being a greater toll than he was authorised to take in respect of such cart and horse by virtue of the powers of any Act of Parliament, or of the orders and resolutions of the trustees or commissioners of the turnpike road in which the said gate is situated.

The complaint was preferred under a part of the 30th section of 4 Geo. 4, c. 95 (the General Turnpike Act), which is as follows:

If any collector of the said tolls shall demand and take a greater or less toll from any person than he shall be authorised to do by virtue of the powers of any Act, or of the orders and resolutions of the trustees or commissioners made in pursuance thereof, he shall forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.*

The local Act (15 & 16 Vict.), entitled "An Act to repeal the Act relating to the Exeter and Countess Weir turnpike roads, and to make other provisions in lieu thereof, and to authorise the construction of certain new roads, and for other purposes," enacts—

Sect. 27:

That after the 31st Dec. 1852 the trustees may demand and take at the several and respective toll gates which shall by virtue of this Act be upon or on the sides of the roads such tolls as the trustees at any of their meetings may direct, not exceeding the tolls following—that is to say:

For every horse or other beast drawing any gig or chair or such like carriage, with a single seat only and with two wheels only, or any double-seated carriage, on two wheels only, commonly called a dog-cart, sixpence.

For every horse or other beast drawing any car or chair or other such like carriage, with double seats (except a dog-cart), or any phaeton, caravan, or taxed cart, or any other four-wheeled light carriage, if drawn by one horse or other beast only, eightpence.

Sect. 39 authorises the trustees from time to time to lessen or reduce all or any of the tolls authorised to be taken under the powers of that Act.

The trustees did, by resolution, reduce the above tolls as follows, the 6*d.* to 4½*d.*, and the 8*d.* to 6*d.*

The facts proved were that the complainant was a butcher residing at Chudleigh, ten miles from Exeter, and that on the day named he drove through the defendant's turnpike gate with one horse, drawing an open cart on springs, with a single shifting seat only, and with two wheels only; the toll of 6*d.* was demanded by the defendant, was objected to by the complainant, but ultimately paid by him, under protest.

That the cart was an ordinary market cart used by the complainant in his business and on other occasions, and for which he took out an excise licence. And he contended before us that it came within the above first description of a carriage liable to the toll of 4½*d.* only.

The defendant insisted that it was, in fact, a "taxed cart" within the meaning of the above second description, and was, therefore, liable to the higher toll of 6*d.*

The justices being of opinion that the cart came within the first description, and was, therefore, liable to the toll of 4½*d.* only, convicted the defendant in the penalty of 6*d.* and costs.

The defendant, being dissatisfied with this judgment, as being erroneous in point of law, requested a case for the opinion of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, which was granted and stated accordingly.

Lopes, Q.C. argued for the appellant.—Since an Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 14), assessed taxes on carriages have been abolished; and by sect. 18 an excise duty is payable upon every "carriage;" that term, by sect. 19, clause 6, being defined to mean and include any vehicle "except a waggon, cart, or other vehicle used solely for the conveyance of any goods or burden in the course of trade or husbandry, and whereon the christian name and surname," &c. shall be painted. In the case of Purdy v. Smith (28 L. J. 150, M. C.), it was contended that a cart which had paid a tax the year before was not a taxed cart; but Lord Campbell is reported to have said, "Is it not a better construction to hold that a cart upon which a tax has been paid is a taxed cart?" The respondent's cart in this case comes within that definition, and was therefore liable to the higher toll.

The respondent did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—LUSH, J. delivered the judgment of himself and Hannen, J.—We are of opinion that the conviction is right. The name "taxed cart" was a designation given by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, Sch. D, No. 4, also by the 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Sch. D, No. 4, to a particular kind of carriage described in the Act, namely, to a carriage with less than four wheels, "constructed wholly of wood and iron, without any covering other than a tilted covering, and without any lining or springs," and with a fixed seat, without slings or braces, and without any ornament whatever, other than paint of a dark colour, for the preservation of the wood or iron only, and which shall have the words 'a taxed cart' and the owner's christian and surname and place of abode marked or painted" in letters of a given length, and of a given colour, upon the back panel, and which should not be of more than a given value. Carriages which answered these conditions were taxed at a lower rate than ordinary carriages, and they were designated "taxed carts," to distinguish them from carts or carriages which were exempt from duty on account of their being used solely for purposes of husbandry, or as common stage carts In course of time such vehicles came to be also exempted from duty, but they were still called by the old name, and are referred to in the Stamp Acts as carriages of an exceptional description, which were entitled to exemption because of their peculiar construction: (see 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 39). It cannot be doubted that many such "taxed carts" were in use at the date of the local Act, and that the term is there used for the purpose of denoting this well-known description of vehicle. As all the earlier statutes were repealed by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, and every carriage, whatever may be its form, construction, or value, is now subject to duty, except such as are used solely for purposes of trade or husbandry, it may be that "taxed carts," in the sense in which the term is used in the local Act, no longer exist. But whether they do or not, the carriage in respect of which the higher toll was charged by the appellant was not one of this description, and therefore it was not liable to the toll of 6*d.* The origin and meaning of the term appear to have been overlooked by this court in deciding the case of Purdy v. Smith (28 L. J. 150, M. C.), when it was held that a taxed cart meant simply a carriage upon which a tax had been paid. It is clear to us that such was never the meaning of the term, and we cannot therefore follow that decision. The appeal must be dismissed, and the conviction affirmed.

Judgment for respondent.

DUDLEY UNION (appts.) v. WOLVERHAMPTON UNION (respts.).

Union extending into several jurisdictions—Court of appeal from order of removal—Poor Law Amendment Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 106), s. 27.

By sect. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1867, "where a union extends into several distinct jurisdictions, every matter, act, charge, or complaint by which the guardians thereof are affected or in which they have any interest, shall for the purpose of jurisdiction be deemed to arise or exist equally throughout the union:"

Held, that the appellate jurisdiction from an order of removal under this section is the same as that under which the order is made; and it does not depend upon the place from which the removal is ordered.

Bosanquet, last term, obtained a rule nisi, calling upon the justices in and for the county of Stafford to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to enter or cause to be entered continuances from session to session to the next general quarter sessions of the peace in and for the said county, upon the appeal of the guardians of the poor of the Dudley union against an order under the hands and seals of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the borough of Wolverhampton for the removal of Anna Maria Rudge and her three children from and out of the Wolverhampton union into the said Dudley union, and at such next general quarter sessions of the peace to hear and determine the merits of the said appeal.

It appeared from the affidavit of the clerk to the guardians of the Dudley union, upon which the rule was obtained, that all preliminary requisites to entitle the appellants to have the appeal from the said order of removal heard by the justices of Staffordshire at the last October quarter sessions, had been complied with, that when the appeal accordingly came on to be heard, the respondents admitted that the appellants were entitled to have judgment given in their favour upon the said appeal, if the said court of quarter sessions had any jurisdiction to hear such appeal. The said court declined to hear the appeal on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to entertain it, because the appeal, under the circumstances, ought to have been made to the quarter sessions for the borough of Wolverhampton.

The whole of the Wolverhampton Union is in the county of Stafford, and it includes several parishes and townships, and among others the parish, (within which is the borough) of Wolverhampton, and the township of Bilston. The whole of the township of Bilston is in the county of Stafford, and no part of it is within the borough of Wolverhampton. The borough of Wolverhampton has a recorder and a separate quarter sessions of the peace. The last Michaelmas sessions of Staffordshire took place before those of the borough of Wolverhampton.

The paupers were in the township of Bilston at the time the order of removal to the appellants' union; but the order was made by the justices of Wolverhampton, within the borough of Wolverhampton.

Matthews, Q.C. and Jelf, on behalf of the appellants, showed cause against the rule.—By the Poor Law Amendment Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 27, "Where a union extends into several distinct jurisdictions, every matter, act, charge, or complaint, by which the guardians thereof are affected, or in which they have any interest, shall for the purpose of jurisdiction be deemed to arise or exist equally throughout the union." The earliest provision on the subject is in sect. 6 of 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30, "The appeal against any order for the removal of any poor person from out of any parish, township, or place, shall be had, prosecuted, and determined, at the general or quarter sessions of the peace for the county, division, or riding, wherein the parish, township, or place, from whence such poor person shall be removed, doth lie, and not elsewhere, any former law or statute to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding." That provision was held in Reg. v. Salisbury (2 Q. B. 72), and four following cases, to have been repealed by the Municipal Corporation Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 105); by which section the recorder of every borough shall hold "a court of quarter sessions of the peace in and for such borough, of which court the recorder of such borough shall sit as the sole judge; and such court of quarter sessions of the peace shall be a court of record, and shall have cognisance of all crimes, offences, and matters whatsoever cognisable by any court of quarter sessions of the peace for counties in England; and the said recorder shall have power to do all things necessary for exercising such jurisdiction, notwithstanding his being such sole judge, as fully as any such last-mentioned court," except with respect to county rates and liquor licenses. In a later case, Reg. v. The Recorder of Liverpool (16 Q. B. 1070), Lord Campbell, in referring to this section, said, "The statute makes the place of appeal depend not upon the place for which the justices acted, but upon the place in which they acted."

Powell, Q.C. and Bosanquet, for the respondents, supported the rule.—Sect. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1867 relates only to the original jurisdiction in such matters as these, and makes no provision for appellate jurisdiction. It is necessary, therefore, to look at the earlier law; and, although the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 has restored to borough recorders the appellate jurisdiction for matters within their borough, which was taken away by the Act of 1697 from borough justices, it does not give them jurisdiction in matters outside their boroughs. Appeals to quarter sessions are entirely creatures of statute; and the only Act which provides concerning the particular sessions to which appeals must be made is the 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30, which, by sect. 6, requires the appeal to be prosecuted and determined at the sessions for the county, division, or riding wherein the parish, township, or place from whence such poor person shall be removed, doth lie. To the extent of defining which is the proper sessions for the appeal, this section cannot be said to have been repealed by subsequent legislation. Indeed, it cannot have been altogether repealed, for without it there is no express provision for an appeal to sessions at all. [COCKBURN, C.J.—By the Union Chargeability Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 79) the word "union" must be read instead of the words "parish, township, or place," in the Act of Will. 3.] The whole union is here in the county of Stafford; and that part of it from whence the paupers were removed is not in the borough of Wolverhampton.

COCKBURN, C.J.—To my mind this is a clear case, and I have no doubt the rule should be discharged. It is plain that when guardians fix the jurisdiction under which they obtain an order of removal, they fix also the appellate jurisdiction for reviewing the order. It seems to me to be unnecessary to discuss the old law, further than to consider what was the state of the legislation on the subject at the time of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1867. By the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 the law stood thus: Whenever a question arose upon the removal of a pauper from a parish in a borough having a recorder, the appeal must go to the recorder, and not, as by the Act of Will. 3, to the county. By the Act of 1867, where a union extends into several distinct jurisdictions, every matter affecting the guardians shall, for the purpose of jurisdiction, be deemed to arise or exist equally throughout the union. It is plain that the Legislature intended that a matter happening in any parish of a union should be treated as if it happened in any other parish. It was contended that the whole union, being thus subject to any jurisdiction existing in it, it was open to a party aggrieved to appeal from the jurisdiction under which the first order was made to any other jurisdiction existing over the union; the rule, however, seems to be that the appellate jurisdiction must be that which relates to the place where the original matter arose; and this is the only rational, consistent, and convenient course to adopt. In the present case, at all events, it must be quite as satisfactory to carry this appeal to the learned recorder of Wolverhampton, as to the changing and uncertain tribunal which has to decide appeals to the county sessions.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. In enacting this 27th section of the Act of 1867, probably the Legislature never thought of the tribunal for an appeal; the language, however, carries the appellate as well as the original jurisdiction in its provision.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The respondents seem to attach to the statute of Will.3, an importance which I do not think it deserves. The object of the Union Chargeabilty Act was to place each union in the same position as a parish occupied before. Formerly, however, the justices of the county only had jurisdiction over some of the parishes of unions in which another jurisdiction existed. By sect. 27 of the Act of 1867 all jurisdictions in a union are extended over the whole union; and it seems to me that the appellate jurisdiction is fixed by the original jurisdiction chosen.

LUSH, J.—I have felt considerable doubt about this matter; but so much inconvenience would attend upon uncertainty as to the appellate tribunal, which would be the consequence if the respondent's arguments were to succeed, that I have concluded that the only reasonable intention of the Legislature must be that by the 27th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act the appellate jurisdiction is the same as that under which the original order was made. Some violence, in my opinion, is done by that conclusion to the provisions of the Act of Will. 3, but to some extent that Act has been repealed, and our decision is the most consistent with subsequent legislation.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF SURREY.

New highway—Certificate of justices—Consent of owner—Order of quarter sessions—Certiorari—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, ss, 84 & 85.

Proceedings were taken under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, ss. 84 and 85, to divert a footpath which crossed the corner of the grounds of an asylum, the new path being of greater length round the fence, and upon what had been a ditch between the fence and the highway. Two justices certified that the new path was more commodious than the old, but made no mention in their certificate of any consent of owner. A written consent of the proprietors of the asylum was enrolled with the certificate and plan by the quarter sessions. This consent professed to be by the owners of the lands or grounds through, along, or adjoining which the footpath was intended to be diverted and turned, and they consented to the making and continuing of the new path through, along, or adjoining their said lands or grounds.

Held, upon a rule for a certiorari to bring up the order of quarter sessions for want of jurisdiction, an appeal having failed by reason of insufficient notice, that this was a substitution of a new path; that the certificate need not mention the consent of the owner; and that this consent contained in effect what was mentioned in the scheduled form.

The rule was therefore discharged.

E. Clarke, at the instance of Charles Ansell the younger and others, had obtained a rule nisi calling upon the keepers of the peace and justices in and for the county of Surrey, and John Walker and William Alston Head, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this court all and singular the orders made by the said justices, or some of them, at a general sessions of the peace holden at Reigate, in the said county, on or about the 4th April last, upon a certain appeal, wherein the said Charles Ansell the younger and others were the appellants, and the said John Walker and Wm. Alston Head were the respondents, against an original order or certificate dated the 28th Feb. last, and made or given by the Right Hon. the Earl of Cottenham and Lieut.-Colonel Charles Sedley Burdett, two of the said justices, for the diversion of a certain footpath in the parish of Caterham, in the said county, and also the said original order or certificate.

The following is the order made by the justices of Surrey, at the said general sessions. The certificate is recited in the order:

At the general quarter sessions of the peace holden at Reigate, in and for the county of Surrey, on the 4th April 1871, and from thence continued by adjournment to the 1st May 1871.

Whereas the deputy clerk of the peace for this county in pursuance of an Act of Parliament passed in the 5 & 6 Will. 4, intituled, "An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Highways in that part of Great Britain called England," has now laid before this court a certificate under the hands of the Right Hon. the Earl of Cottenham, and Lieut.-Col. Chas. Sedley Burdett, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for this county, relating to the diverting, turning, and stopping up a certain part of a certain footway in the parish of Caterham, in the county, which certificate is accompanied by certain proofs, written consent of the owners of the lands, and a plan particularly describing the said part of the said footway proposed to be diverted, turned and stopped up, and the proposed footway to be substituted by metes, bounds, and admeasurements thereof, which said certificate proofs, written consent, and plan were lodged with the said deputy clerk of the peace on the 1st March last, and which said certificate is in the words following, that is to say, "Surrey to wit. To Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace at the General Quarter Sessions to be holden at Reigate in and for the said county of Surrey on the 4th April 1871. Whereas, on the 23rd Jan. 1871, at Caterham, in the said County of Surrey, the Godstone District Highway Board through John Walker, their surveyor, and duly authorised agent in that behalf, made application and request unto us, the undersigned, The Right Hon. the Earl of Cottenham, and Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Sedley Burdett, two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the said county of Surrey, to view a certain part of a certain public footway, being so much of the said footway as led out of a certain public highway leading from Coulsdon to Caterham, both in the said county, into a certain other public highway leading from Coulsdon aforesaid to Chaldon in the said county, and the said part of the said public footway being situate in the parish of Caterham, within the district of the said Godstone district highway board, and hereinafter more particularly described, and did at the same time produce unto us a certain order in writing for such application and request, bearing date the 22nd Dec. 1870, under the hand of the Reverend Jarvis Kenwick, therein described to be, and being the chairman of a vestry meeting of the inhabitants of the said parish, held on the 15th Dec. 1870, and then continued by adjournment to, and holden on the said 22nd Dec. 1870, from which said order it appeared as the fact was, that the said inhabitants in such vestry as aforesaid assembled, deemed it expedient that the said part of the said public footway should be diverted, turned, and stopped up, as proposed to the said vestry meeting, and as hereinafter more particularly set forth. And whereas the said part of the said footway so proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up, commences at the junction of the said footway so proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up, with the said highway leading from Coulsdon to Caterham, extends therefrom in a south-westerly direction across certain land there used for the purposes of, or in connection with, the asylum, for imbecile poor, and terminates at a point of junction between a certain public highway leading from Caterham to Chaldon, and the said highway leading from Coulsdon to Chaldon, and is of the length to wit of 530yds., or thereabouts, and of the breadth to wit of 4ft., or thereabouts. And whereas the proposed public footway to be substituted between the said points of commencement and termination for the said part so proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up as aforesaid, is within the said parish of Caterham, and within the said Godstone highway district, and is to be carried between the said points on a raised footpath to be made at the side of the said existing highways leading respectively from Coulston to Caterham, and from Caterham to Chaldon, and is of the length to wit of 616yds., or thereabout, and of the breadth to wit of 5ft., or thereabouts. And whereas on the said 23rd Jan. 1871, we, the said justices, in pursuance of such order, application, and request, and of the statute in that behalf made and provided, did jointly in company with each other view the said part of the said public footway proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up as aforesaid; and it appeared to us, upon such view, that the said part of the said public footway might be so diverted, turned, and stopped up as aforesaid, so as to make the same more commodious to the public. And whereas we, the said justices, did thereupon direct the said highway board to affix a notice in the form or to the effect of schedule (No. 19) to the statute aforesaid annexed, in legible characters, at the place and by the side of each end of the said part of the said footway, so proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up as aforesaid, from whence the same was proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up; and also to insert the same notice in one newspaper published or generally circulated in the county, where the said part of the said footway proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up as aforesaid lay, for four successive weeks next after our said view of the said part of the said public footway, and to affix a like notice on the doors of the several churches of the parish of Caterham, such being the only parish in which the said part of the said public footway so proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up, lay, on four successive Sundays next after the making of such view by us. And whereas the said several notices were so published as aforesaid, and proof thereof has this day been given to our satisfaction; and a plan (which is hereunto annexed) has been delivered to us at the same time, particularly describing the said part of the said old, and also the proposed, public footway to be substituted therefore by metes, bounds, and admeasurements thereof; which plan has been verified by the said John Walker, a competent surveyor in that behalf. Now we the said justices do hereby, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, certify that we have jointly in company with each other, viewed the said part of the said public footway as aforesaid, and that the said footway proposed to be substituted for the said part of the said old footway is more commodious to the public for the following reasons, that is to say: Firstly by reason of its greater width; secondly, by reason of its being to be carried for the whole of its course between the said points of its commencement and termination on a made path, while the said path of the said footway proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up, is carried by an unmade path over an arable field; and, thirdly, by reason of its being to be subject to no right restricting its full and free use and enjoyment by the public, while the said part of the said footway proposed to be diverted, turned, and stopped up is subject to a right on the part of the owners of the soil thereof of ploughing it up periodically in due course of farming; and we further find that the said part of the said old footway will, if and when the said diversion and substitution shall be effected, become and be unnecessary and useless. Given under our hands the 28th Feb. 1871, at Sandridge Court, in the parish of Sandridge, in the county of Surrey, Cottenham C. S. Burdett. And whereas the said certificate, proofs, and written consent have been now read by the deputy clerk of the peace in open court, and Charles Ansell the younger, John James, Edwd. Hooper, Juland Danvers, Wm. Darley Bentley, Francis Parsons, Thos. Bradbury Winter, Jo. Bennett, Wm. Roffey, Thos. Ellis, Wm. Ellis, Wm. Tamplin, and Francis Spencer have considered that they would be injured and aggrieved by the diverting, turning, and stopping up of the said part of the said footway, and have made an appeal to this court against the same. And whereas due notice has not been given of such appeal. It is ordered by this court that the said appeal be, and the same is hereby dismissed; and whereas no other appeal has been made to this court against such diverting, turning, and stopping up, it is ordered by this court that the said certificate, proofs, written consent, and plan be, and the same are hereby enrolled; that the said part of the said footway mentioned and described in the said certificate be diverted, turned, and stopped up accordingly; and the footway also therein mentioned and described be substituted in lieu thereof; and that the said appellants do forthwith pay to the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District the sum of 15*l.* 5*s.* and for the costs and expenses incurred by the said managers in resisting the said appeal. By the Court, (Signed) DEPUTY CLERK OF THE PEACE.

The following are the words of the consent which accompanied the certificate, and is mentioned in the said order:—

We, the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District, being the owners of the lands or grounds described on the plan hereunto annexed, and through, along, or adjoining which, part of a certain footpath or highway leading out of the road from Coulsdon to Caterham, both in the county of Surrey, and extending in a south-westerly direction across certain land there now used for the purposes of, or in connection with, the Asylum for Imbecile Poor, to and into a certain other highway leading from Coulsdon to Chaldon (and which footpath or highway is shown on the said plan by the colour blue) is intended to be diverted and turned; in consideration of the stopping up of such part of the said footpath or highway so shown by the colour blue as aforesaid, do hereby consent to the making and continuing of the new highway, which is indicated by the colour red on the said plan, through, along, or adjoining our said lands or grounds.

Given under our common seal the 18th Jan. 1871.

The common seal of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District in the presence of

WM. BREWER, Chairman.

It appeared from the plan, and also from the affidavits upon which the rule was granted, that the length of the footpath across the land of the asylum was 530yds.; and that the length of the substituted footpath along the side of the highway was 616yds. The new footpath was constructed upon what had been a ditch between the high road and the fence round the land of the asylum.

Field, Q. C. and Thesiger for the respondents, showed cause against the rule.—The first case upon this subject was Welch v. Nash (8 East. 395), in which it was held under the 19th section of the General Highway Act, 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, that it was not sufficient that an old highway was widened in parts to make it a substitution for a new highway. That decision, however, was dissented from by the Court of Common Pleas in De Ponthieu v. Pennyfeather (5 Taunt. 634); and this court distinctly overruled Welch v. Nash in the case of Reg. v. Phillips (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 648), and held that the addition of fresh land to an old narrow highway, so as to widen it and make it a commodious road, is sufficient substitution of a "new highway." It was held in the same case that a certificate was valid which alleged only one of the two alternatives, either that the new highway was nearer, or that it was more commodious than the other. By the authority of Reg. v. Phillips therefore, this substituted path is a new highway within sect. 85 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50; and being more commodious than the old one, it need not be nearer. The certificate of the justices contains all the assertions required by that section, and is therefore good on its face. It is not stated that the consent of the owners should form part of the certificate, and therefore it is sufficient that it appears in the order of the sessions that the consent was lodged with the clerk of the peace. Moreover, the certificate has been before the sessions, and the justices have entertained the question whether it was good or bad. Certiorari therefore, in the same way as mandamus, will not lie against them upon this question, even if they were wrong:

Reg. v. The Justices of Worcestershire, 3 E. & B. 477; Reg. v. Justices of Surrey, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 466; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801.

The consent sufficiently states that the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum, who give it, are the owners of the grounds through which the proposed new highway was to be made.

Denman, Q. C. and E. Clarke, for the appellants, supported the rule.—This is an attempt by the respondents to extend the effect of the case of Reg. v. Phillips. Here there is no new right of way to be dedicated to the public in place of the old; the substituted footpath is to be made over the ditch, which is already part of the highway. Reg. v. The United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company (Limited) (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 378; 31 L. J. 166, M. C.). The words of the earlier Act of 13 Geo. 3 were the same as in this Act concerning consent, and it was held in Rex v. Kirk (1 B. & C. 21), that an order was bad because it did not appear upon the face of it that the consent of the owner had been obtained. And in Rex v. The Justices of Kent (1 B. & C. 622) Bayley, J., held that it should have appeared upon the face of the order that a sufficient assent was given under the hand and seal of the owner. [LUSH, J.—The Act of Will. 4 does not say that the consent of the owner must appear on the certificate, nor, indeed, on the order itself. It only requires the owner's consent as a fact.] At all events the words of the consent are not sufficient; the form given in the schedule No. 18 has words asserting that the person who gives the consent is the owner of the lands through which the highway is to be diverted and turned, and that he consents to the making and continuing such new highway through his said lands. Here the managers merely claim to be owners of the lands or grounds "through, along, or adjoining which," the highway was intended to be diverted—in fact, it is not through their land at all, but upon the old highway. The Act never contemplated such a diversion, for the consent in the schedule provides for money to be paid to the owner in consideration for his consent. By sect. 118 the forms in the schedules "shall be used upon all occasions, with such additions or variations only as may be necessary to adapt them to the particular exigencies of the case." [LUSH, J.—That section concludes "that no objection shall be made or advantage taken for want of form in any such proceedings by any person whomsoever."]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this rule must be discharged. The preliminary formalities required by the 84th and 85th sections appear to me to have been substantially complied with. When the vestry deem it expedient to divert a highway, the surveyor is to request the justices to view it; and when it appears to the justices that it may be diverted so as to make the same nearer or more commodious to the public, and the owner of the lands or grounds through which such new highway so proposed to be made shall consent thereto by writing under his hand, and certain notices have been given, the justices are to certify that the new highway is nearer or more commodious, and why; and afterwards this certificate, with a certain plan and the written consent of the owner, is to be enrolled by the clerk of the peace at quarter sessions, provided, by sect. 87, that upon appeal the court of quarter sessions do not refuse to enrol the same. Now, throughout these sections, the certificate, the plan, and the consent, are spoken of as separate matters, and I see no necessity for referring to the consent in the certificate. There is nothing wrong, therefore, on the face of the certificate; inasmuch as a certificate is of no force until enrolment. If anything were wrong on the face of it, it would be beyond the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions to order it to be enrolled. Here the consent certainly was not in the words of the schedule, but the section referring to the schedules provides that no objection shall be made or advantage taken for want of form. It is true that no statement is made to the effect that the asylum board were owners of the whole ground of the new footpath; but it appears that they claim to be owners of the lands or grounds, through, along, or adjoining which the path was intended to be diverted; and they consented to the making of the new highway "through, along, or adjoining our said lands or grounds." It seems that the new path is in a great measure what was the ditch by the side of the asylum grounds, which with the road ad mediam filum viæ must be presumed to be in the same ownership as that of the adjoining land. Taken altogether, it must be sufficient, as no mention of the consent is necessary on the face of the certificate, that the persons who are the owners, which fact may be shown aliunde, consent to the new path. I think the justices at quarter sessions are the proper persons to judge whether the consenting parties are the real owners, and upon these materials they might reasonably hold the asylum board to be the owners, whose consent was necessary. I see no reason to question the validity of this order, or the application of Reg. v. Phillips to the facts of the case, so the rule will be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the scheme of the statute was to substitute a new road for the closed old road; but the facts of this case are within the rule established in Reg v. Phillips, and this seems to be a substitution offered to the public for the old right of way they had before; it increases the accommodation for the public along the highway, just as was done by the substituted road in that case. Although we are, by confirming this order, going perhaps further than that case, yet I think the circumstances of this case are within the principle there laid down. I am satisfied also that although the form of this consent departs from that given in the schedule, yet there appears sufficient evidence to show that the asylum managers are owners of the land adjoining, and primâ facie therefore they are owners of the soil to the middle of the road. As to the other objection, the order is to be made by the quarter sessions, and it would be inconvenient for all the justices there assembled to view the substituted roads. On that account it is provided that two justices only shall view and certify. They have to satisfy themselves and certify of the comparative distance or convenience of the old and new roads; but they are not bound to examine the form of the written consent. No mention of the consent need appear in the certificate, and in some cases I do not know how it could. The ownership and the consent of the owner are questions for the quarter sessions. No doubt the certificate and the consent are separate matters, and I think we are bound to say there is no want of jurisdiction in any part of the justices' proceedings.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The certificate required by the Act is not operative by itself; it is sufficient, if it shows upon the face of it that the two justices have done all that is required of them. The written consent truly does not in terms state what is contained in the scheduled form; but in effect the managers claim what by law makes them owners of the new path. I think this was a sufficient substitution of a new path, and the certificate and consent are good.

Rule discharged.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

CHORLTON (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF TONGE (respts.).

Registration—County vote—Notice of objection—Description of objector—Parish divided into polling districts—31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, s. 22.

Sect. 22 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, which provides that in the case of a parish forming part of more than one polling district, the part of such parish situate in such polling district shall be deemed to be a separate parish for the purposes of the revision of voters, and the lists and register of voters, does not render it obligatory on an objector having his qualification in such a parish to show on the face of his notice to which particular polling district he belongs, but it is still sufficient, notwithstanding this enactment for him to describe himself as on the list of voters for the parish in question.

ON appeal from the decision of the revising-barrister for the South-Eastern Division of the County of Lancashire, the following case was stated:

At a court holden, &c., Samuel Stott, of Quarry-hill, Healey, near Rochdale, objected to the name of Enoch Beswick.

The notice of objection to the person objected to was in the following form:

To Mr. Enoch Beswick, of Kemjon-lane, Tonge.

Take notice that I object to your name being retained on the Tonge list of voters for the South-East Division of the County of Lancaster. Dated this 15th Aug. 1871.

(Signed) SAMUEL STOTT, of Quarry-hill, Healey, near Rochdale.

On the register of voters for the township of Spotland.

The township of Spotland consists of the hamlets of Brandwood Higher End, Brandwood Lower End, Whitworth Higher End, Catley-lane, Chadwick, Clay-lane, Falinge, Healey, Whitworth Lower End, Wolstenholme, and Woodhouse-lane.

The first three named hamlets of Brandwood Higher End, Brandwood Lower End, and Whitworth Higher End, constituted the whole of Brandwood Higher End polling district in the year 1871 and preceding year.

The said other hamlets within the township of Spotland, form part of, and are included in, the Rochdale polling district.

It was not proposed to be proved before the revising barrister that the said Enoch Beswick was entitled to have his name retained in the list of voters in respect of the said qualification hereinbefore described, but on his behalf it was contended that the said notice of objection was invalid on the ground that it did not state the particular list of voters in which the name of the said Samuel Stott appeared. The overseers of the township of Spotland prepare the list of voters of the whole township of Spotland, and they published during the year 1871, within the Brandwood Higher End polling district, the names of all voters whose qualification was situate within such polling district; and they published during the same year, within the polling district of Rochdale, the names of all voters whose qualification was situate within such part of the township of Spotland as was within such polling district of Rochdale. Thus they published during the year 1871, on or before the 1st Aug., within the Brandwood Higher End polling district, a document headed as follows:

Brandwood Higher End Polling District.

The register of persons entitled to vote at any election of a member or members of Parliament for the Division of South-East Lancashire between the 3rd Dec. 1870 and the 1st Jan. 1872:

Hamlets of Brandwood Higher End, Brandwood Lower End, and Whitworth Higher End, in the township of Spotland.

And the said overseers also published during the year 1871, on or before the 1st August, within such part of the township of Spotland as lies in the Rochdale polling district, a document headed as follows:

Rochdale Polling District.

The register of persons entitled to vote at any election of a member or members of Parliament for the Division of South-East Lancashire, between the 31st Dec. 1870 and the 1st Jan. 1872:

The hamlets of Catby-lane, Chadwick, Clay-lane, Falinge, Healey, Whitworth Lower End, Wolstenholme, and Woodhouse-lane, in the township of Spotland.

The name of the objector appears only as follows on the last above-mentioned register of persons entitled to vote:

Christian name and surname of the claimant at full length.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street, lane, or other like place in the parish, and No. of house (if any) where the property is situate, or any name of the property, if known by any, or name of the occupying tenant, or if the qualification consist of a rentcharge, then the names of owner of the property out of which such rent is issuing, or some of them, and the situation of the property.
Stott, Samuel.	Quarry-hill, Healey, near Rochdale.	Freehold house and land.	Quarry-hill, tenants, John Williamson and others.

It was contended before the revising barrister on behalf of the persons objected to, that such notice of objection was invalid on the following grounds:

First, that there was no list of voters described or distinguished by the name of "The register of voters for the township of Spotland; secondly, that the list of voters whose qualifications were in the township of Spotland were divided into two parts, one part consisting of the three townships of Brandwood Higher End, Brandwood Lower End, and Whitworth Higher End, and constituting the Brandwood Higher End polling district; and the other part consisting of the eight townships of Catley-lane, Chadwick, Clay-lane, Falinge, Healey, Whitworth Lower End, Wolstenholme, and Woodhouse Lane, and forming part of the Rochdale polling district; thirdly, that the objector should have described the particular list of voters on which his name appeared, and not have given the name of a township which formed part of two polling districts, and had two separate and distinct sets of lists.

The revising barrister considered that if the said notice of objection was according to the form numbered 5 in schedule A of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, or to the like effect, as required by the 7th section of the said Act, it was good, and seeing that the only difference between the said notice of objection and the said form was that in the said notice it was "on the register of voters for the township of Spotland," and in the said form numbered 5, the words are, "on the register of voters for the parish of ——," he considered that the said notice of objection was, under the circumstances of this case, to the like effect as the said form No. 5, and that it was not necessary to specify the particular list of voters, as was contended. He, therefore, decided that the said notice of objection was valid, and struck off the name of the said Enoch Beswick from the said list of voters.

This was an appeal against that decision.

Edwards for the appellant.—The person objecting has signed himself as on the register of voters for the township of Spotland, and that was sufficient, according to form 5 schedule A of 6 Vict. c. 18, and form 2 schedule A. of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36. But subsequent enactments have rendered it insufficient. Sect. 34 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, provides for increased polling places in both counties and boroughs, and a description of such new polling places is to be advertised. Sect. 6 (subsect. 6) of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, provides for the uniform printing of all the lists of a county, so as they shall be capable of forming one book, or of being detached each list by itself, so that the list of any parish or township, or all the lists of any polling district or districts may be had separately. Sect. 22 of the same Act provides that where any parish (which is the same as township) "forms part of more than one polling district, the part of such parish situate in each polling district shall be deemed to be a separate parish for the purposes of the revision of voters, and the lists and register of voters." Here the township of Spotland formed part of more than one polling district; a separate list was made for each such polling district, and each such district must be deemed a separate parish for the purposes of the revision. The effect, then, of sect. 22 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, is to render form 5, schedule A to 6 Vict. c. 18, and form 2 schedule A of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, insufficient in a case where the parish forms part of more than one polling district (as was the case here), and to render it necessary for the person objecting to specify in what polling district the part of the parish in which his qualifying tenement lies is situate. It has often been decided that the person objecting must give such a description of the list on which his name is to be found, that the party objected to may at once be able to find his name without being obliged to search several lists for it. The most recent authority for that is Allen v. Town Clerk of Warrington (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 291; 39 L. J. 113, C. P.); but, as the party objecting in this case did not specify the list on which his name was to be found, the appellant might have had to search more than one list in order to find his name. Moreover, the effect of sect. 22 is to abolish altogether the parish of Spotland for the purposes of the revision; so that "on the register of voters for the parish of Spotland is no description at all; as for registration purposes, there is no such parish and no such register.

WILLES, J.—I am inclined to think that the revising barrister was right, and that the notice of objection was good. I start with this proposition, that the notice to be good must be in accordance with the Act of Parliament. The first form of notice to be given to parties objected to by any persons other than the overseers, is form 5, schedule A, to 6 Vict. c. 18; and in the case of the person objected to being already on the register, form 2, schedule A, to 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, is given. That form has been followed here, as the party objecting has described himself as "on the register of voters for the parish of Spotland." My next proposition is that 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, has not been expressly repealed by any subsequent Act; but Mr. Edwards's argument is directed to show that it has been impliedly repealed by the subsequent Act, providing for the establishment of new polling districts, the effect of which, he contends, is to expunge and abolish the township of Spotland for purposes of registration, so that, according to his argument, it is now necessary for the objector to describe himself as on the register of voters, not for the township of Spotland, but for the particular polling district of the township of Spotland to which he happens to belong. That, he contends, is the effect of sect. 22 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58. That conclusion is led up to by reference to various provisions in previous Acts as to providing different polling places. To take a consistent view upon this subject, one must go back to the Reform Act of 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45). It is remarkable, when looking at the provisions of this Act as to polling-places, that there is nothing to show that such polling-places are to be coterminous with parishes. A man is bound, in signing a notice of objection, to describe himself as of a particular parish or township, just in the same manner as a person making a claim. Thus in all these cases, the ecclesiastical divisions are to be followed more or less. The 63rd section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45 makes provision for dividing counties into polling districts (a division which was actually made by 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64), and the 64th section of 2 Will. 4 c. 45 provides for the erection of a polling booth in each of such districts, and enacts that no voter shall poll out of the district in which his qualifying property lies. Now, I believe, some parishes lie partly in one county and partly in another; but, assuming that no instance of such a division could be given, the possibility of such a state of things is sufficient to show that it is not legally impossible to attribute one part of a parish to one polling district and another to another. I come now to the provision in sect. 34, by which justices of the peace are to assign new polling places, and a description of the new polling places is to be advertised. If that provision stood alone there would be no doubt that it would be more convenient for a voter to describe himself, not only as of a particular parish, but also as of a particular polling district in the parish. By subsect. 6 of sect. 6 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, provision is made for the uniform printing of the lists of a county, so that they shall be capable of forming one book, or of being detached, each list by itself, so that the lists of any parish or township, or all the lists of any polling district or polling districts, may be had separately. This section, therefore follows the civil divisions referred to in sect. 34 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102; and if the enactment of the sub-section is carried out, there could be no difficulty in getting the lists for the whole township and finding out the objector's name. I now come to the section that has been mainly relied on, the 22nd section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, which provides that "where any parish . . . forms part of more than one polling district, the part of such parish situate in each polling district shall be deemed to be a separate parish for the purposes of the revision of voters and the lists and register of voters, and may be designated by some distinguishing addition in the list of voters for such a parish." That does not expressly repeal the schedules of 6 Vict. c. 18, and 28 & 29 Vict. c 36 above referred to; the question is, whether it repeals them by necessary implication, so as to render the descriptions there given as "in the register of voters for the parish of ——," insufficient where the parish in question forms part of more than one polling district, and to render it necessary for the objector to describe himself as on the register of voters for the particular polling district as well as for the particular parish. I do not think it does so impliedly repeal them. It provides that "the part of such parish situate in each polling district shall be deemed to be a separate parish" for certain purposes there specified. Those purposes are "the revision of voters and the list and register of voters." These words are confined, in my judgment, to the revision by the revising barrister, who is the judicial officer appointed to revise the lists, and to the settlement of the lists and register by the officers whose duty it is to settle them for the purpose of revision. An objector is neither such an officer nor the revising barrister, but only a person who has the right to intervene and correct the people who have to do with the revision; the same remark applies to a claimant. The words of the section are satisfied by referring them to the judicial and ministerial officers appointed by the statutes to frame correct lists, and have no application to private persons, who have a statutory right to intervene to set those officers right. I am therefore of opinion that the description given in form 5, schedule A of 6 Vict. c. 18, and form 2, schedule A of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 36, is still sufficient, and that the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and on the short ground last adverted to by my brother Willes. Here the objector gave the notice in the form prescribed by the statute. Mr. Edwards's argument is that the effect of sect. 22 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 53 is to render the statutory form, which before was admittedly sufficient, insufficient in a case where the parish to which the objector belongs forms part of more than one polling district. The words of that section that he relies on are: "The part of such parish situate in such polling district shall be deemed to be a separate parish for the purposes of the revision of voters and the nd register of voters." There is no doubt in Mr. Edwards's argument, but what I fail is that there is anything in the section in- ent with the sufficiency of the form previ- iven by statute, and which has been fol- here. I do not think that this 22nd section it difficult to accept the form previously in still sufficient. I should not be disposed to the words as confined to the proceedings the revising barrister; still I think that s nothing inconsistent in holding that they repeal previous express enactments as to the which notices of objection are to be given. ght to be extremely careful before we con- hat an express provision of an Act of Par- t is impliedly repealed by a subsequent Act.

T, J.—But for sect. 22 of 31 & 32 Vict. should have thought it was not possible to hat the notice given here was insufficient, llows the form given in previous statutes. sufficiency of that form, then, affected by id section? The section is perhaps rather t to construe. At first it appeared to me ble of being construed in two ways, either licable to every purpose of the revision ginning to end, or else as confined to the revision before the revising barrister. construction is difficult; as, if the former ect, it must apply to the precept, the list, de of publication, and notices of objection. hing would be altered, and all the enact- of former statutes would be affected. If, other hand, the section applies only to the roceedings before the revising barrister, ficulty arises, that, when the lists for a par- parish come before the revising barrister, d have to divide them, and settle on which ar list each person was to be placed. s, however, an intermediate interpretation, though with some doubt, I adopt. The 'for the purposes of the revision of voters lists and register of voters" may mean, purposes of all such acts, ministerial or , as are done by those responsible for ision of voters directly for the purpose of ision. If that is so, the act of a person to be put on the register, or of a person notice of objection, does not come within s of acts contemplated. Sect. 22 has, e, no application to this case, and conse- the notice was sufficient.

ER, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think ent to say, that the words "for the pur- revision," &c., in sect. 22, do not neces- clude a notice of objection, at least, not so ily as to oblige us to hold that they over- plain enactments of a previous statute.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

E (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY ps.); WADMORE (app.) v. DEAN (resp.).

tion — County vote — Freehold interest — s in a bridge — Commissioners appointed blic purposes — Limited authority to convey mes Navigation Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. . 10, sub-sect. 6.

By an Act (12 Geo. 1, c. 36) commissioners were appointed for building a bridge across the river T. from F. to P., after compensating the proprietors of the then existing ferries, and a pontage or toll was granted to and vested in the commissioners, to be by them applied as directed in the Act. By a subsequent Act of Geo. 2, for more effectually enabling the commissioners to complete such work, they were empowered to convey in perpetuity the tolls and income of the said bridge or ferries to such persons as would undertake to erect and maintain the bridge. The commissioners accordingly, in 1728. contracted with thirty persons, who subscribed the necessary funds and became the shareholders of the bridge, to build and maintain the bridge, and compensate the proprietors of the said ferries; and afterwards, the bridge having been built, the commissioners in 1729, by a deed which recited the above Acts, and their powers thereunder, conveyed the said bridge and tolls and all such grounds adjacent and belonging to the same as they had power to convey, by virtue of the said Acts, to certain trustees in fee, in trust to permit the said thirty shareholders to receive the said tolls and income and have the sole management thereof. The management of the property was vested in a committee of management, appointed annually by the shareholders. The Thames Navigation Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 149) s. 10, sub-sect. 6, subsequently vested the bridge and the lands thereunto belonging, and the tolls, &c., in the committee of management and their successors for the time being, subject to the trusts on which the same were held at the time of the passing of the Act.

W. and certain other persons, who all deduced their title from the thirty persons above-mentioned, and were respectively the holders of a share or part of a share, duly claimed to be registered as voters in respect of the said share or part of a share, for the county of M. and the county of S., these being the counties in which F. and P. were respectively situate. In each case the share or part of a share so held was of the clear annual value of 40*s.*

It having been decided in Tepper v. Nicholls (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 509, and 34 L. J. 61, C. P.), before the passing of the above-mentioned Thames Navigation Act 1870, that the commissioners had no power to convey the land belonging to the bridge which had become vested in them by virtue of the said Acts; and that the said shareholders having knowledge of the commissioners' title under the said Acts, acquired nothing more under the said deed than the commissioners could lawfully convey, viz., the tolls and income; and consequently that none of the shareholders had, as such, any freehold estate, which would qualify him for a county vote;

Held, that the above-mentioned section of the Thames Navigation Act 1870, did not alter the nature of the interest which the shareholders had in the bridge so as to qualify them for a county vote.

Tepper v. Nichols considered and explained.

THESE two cases, involving precisely the same question, were stated by the revising barristers for East Surrey, and the Western Division of Middlesex respectively, and were taken and argued together.

WADMORE v. THE OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY.

On appeal from the revising barrister for East Surrey, the following case was stated:

1. At a court holden, &c., James Foster Wadmore, and the several persons whose names appear in the next paragraph, duly claimed to have their names inserted in the list of voters for the Eastern Division of the county of Surrey, and were duly objected to.

2. The said James Foster Wadmore, and the several persons whose names are hereunder written, stated the nature of their qualification to be a share, or part of a share in a bridge. The value of the said shares or parts of shares was over 40s. per annum. (Then followed the names of the other claimants.)

3. In support of the right of the said James Foster Wadmore, and the said several persons, to have their names inserted and placed on the said list, the following documents and facts were duly established in evidence before me.

4. In or about the year 1724, the Act 12 Geo. 1, c. 36, was passed, intituled, "An Act for building a bridge across the River Thames, from the town of Fulham in the county of Middlesex, to the town of Putney in the county of Surrey."

5. By sect. 1 of that Act, certain persons were constituted and appointed commissioners and trustees for designing, directing, ordering, and building such bridge, and for maintaining, preserving, and supporting the same when built, and they were empowered at any time after the 24th June 1726, to design, assign, and lay out, how, and in what manner, the said bridge should be made and built from the town of Fulham to the town of Putney aforesaid, and the ways and passages to and from the same, and to preserve and keep in repair such ways and passages from time to time, and to make contracts, and do all matters and things for carrying on and effecting the purposes aforesaid, and to cause the same to be done and perfected accordingly.

6. And to the intent that the navigation of the said river of Thames might receive no prejudice, by sect. 2 it is enacted that when the said bridge was built across the said river, there should remain free and open passage for the water to pass and repass through the arches or passages under the said bridge of 700ft. at the least within the then present banks of the said river. By sect. 5, bodies corporate and others who were seised of ground in Putney or Fulham, which might be required for the purpose of making convenient approaches to the said bridge, were enabled to convey to the said commissioners and trustees, or to any nine or more of them, or their successors, or as they should appoint, any such ground for the purposes of that Act.

7. By sect. 7 it is enacted:

That it shall be lawful to and for His Majesty, his heirs and successors, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Great Britain, to incorporate all and every the commissioners and trustees appointed by this Act, or who shall be appointed pursuant thereto, to be commissioners and trustees for putting this Act in execution, or such of them as shall be then living, and such others as His Majesty, his heirs or successors shall think fit, to be one body politic and corporate in deed and in name, and they and their successors to have perpetual succession, and a common seal, and such seal from time to time to break, change, make new or alter, as shall be found most expedient; and that they and their successors shall be able and capable in law to have, purchase, receive, enjoy, possess, and retain to them and their successors, messuages, lands, rents, tenements, and hereditaments of what kind, nature, or quality soever, and also to sell, grant, demise, alien, or dispose of the same or any part thereof at their free will and pleasures, to sue and implead, be sued and impleaded, answer and be answered in courts of record or elsewhere, and to choose their successors and officers from time to time, and to do and execute all and singular other matters and things that to them shall or may appertain to do, with such powers and clauses as shall be necessary or requisite for erecting, building, preserving, and supporting the said bridge, and the ways and passages thereto from time to time.

The said commissioners and trustees were never incorporated in pursuance of this Act.

8. By sect. 8 it is enacted:

That it shall not be lawful to or for the corporation or company which shall or may be erected or established by virtue of or pursuant to this Act, as such corporation or company to borrow, or take up or give security for any sum or sums of money payable in less than six months, or to discount any bill of exchange or other bill or note whatsoever, or to keep any books or cash of or for any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, whatsoever other than and except only the proper books, moneys and cash, of the said company or corporation.

9. By sect. 10 it is enacted that certain pontage or toll shall be paid before any passage over the said bridge shall be permitted, and that the said pontage or toll shall be vested in the said commissioners to be by them applied in accordance with the provisions of the said Act towards the expenses of making and maintaining the said bridge, ways, and passages, and purchasing the necessary ground for the same.

10. By sect. 13, the commissioners or any eleven or more, of them were empowered when incorporated by indenture or writing under the common seal, to convey and assure the toll by that Act granted, or any part thereof, as a security for any sum or sums of money by them to be borrowed for the purpose of the Act, and to grant any annuities for one, two, or three lives, or for twenty-one years or a less term, such annuities to be chargeable upon and payable out of the tolls, estates, and revenues belonging to such corporation.

And by sect. 14 it is enacted that such annuities shall be personal estate.

11. By sect. 16 it is enacted:

That it shall be lawful for the said commissioners and their successors, and for such intended company or corporation and their agents or officers from time to time, to remove any shelfs in the said river of Thames, and to make the same river deeper.

12. By sect. 17 it is enacted:

That all stones, bricks, planks, piles, and other materials which shall be made use of for or towards building or making the said bridge, or in or about the same, or for maintaining, repaving, or supporting the same, or for making the said river deeper as aforesaid, shall always be deemed to belong and appertain to the commissioners and corporation aforesaid, and by the 18th section it is provided that if the said bridge should at any time become damaged it shall be lawful for the said commissioners or corporation to set up ferries across the said river near to the said bridge, and to take certain rates and duties for passage by such ferries over the same.

13. By sect. 19 it is enacted as follows:

It shall not be lawful to erect or build the said bridge or any part thereof before or until full and ample satisfaction be made for all such prejudice, loss, or damage, as shall or may be sustained or suffered by any of the owners, proprietors, lessees, or others having any property or interest in the present horse or fleet ferries between Fulham and Putney aforesaid.

14. By sect. 22 it is enacted:

That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prejudice or take away any right, property, or jurisdiction of the mayor, or of the mayor commonalty and citizens of the city of London, to in and upon the river of Thames aforesaid, other than and except to remove any shelf or shelfs, or to deepen or widen the said river where the said bridge shall be built, and to do every other matter and thing as shall or may be necessary for the erecting and maintaining the said bridge.

15. By the Act 1 Geo. 2, c. 18, for explaining and amending the Act above referred to, it is by sect. 1, enacted as follows:

The commissioners and trustees appointed by the said recited Act, and those appointed by this Act or any nine or more of them, and the commissioners and trustees, when incorporated in pursuance of the said former Act, shall have, and they have hereby, full power and authority to contract and agree with any person or persons whatsoever, as well commissioners and trustees as others, to erect and build a bridge across the said river of Thames from the said town of Fulham to the said town of Putney, and to repair, maintain, and support the same when built, in such manner as by the said commissioners and trustees or corporation aforesaid shall be judged proper, and the said commissioners and trustees aforesaid, or any nine or more of the said commissioners and trustees, before such incorporation, have hereby power and authority to grant any annuity or annuities, all which annuities in fee to be granted pursuant to this Act, shall be registered, and shall be assignable and devisable as the said other annuities are by the said former Act, and such annuities in fee shall be deemed personal estates, and shall go as such.

16. And for the more effectual enabling the said commissioners and trustees and corporation aforesaid as speedily as may be to complete and perfect the said work, by sect. 3 it is enacted:

That it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners and trustees, or any nine or more of them before incorporated, and also lawful for such corporation when created, at any time or times, to convey and assign over in perpetuity or otherwise all or any tolls, revenues, profits, or incomes of or belonging to the said bridge or ferries, or which shall in any wise arise, accrue, or belong to the same, unto such person or persons as will undertake, contract, and agree to erect and build the said bridge, and to preserve and keep up the same in good and sufficient repair, and shall give sufficient security so to do to the satisfaction of the said commissioners and trustees and corporation aforesaid, anything herein or in the said former Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

17. By sect. 5 it is enacted as follows:

It shall not be lawful for the said commissioners and trustees or corporation to erect or build the said bridge, or any part thereof, before or until full and ample satisfaction be made for all such prejudice, loss, or damage, as shall or may be sustained or suffered by any of the proprietors of the horse ferries, between the said towns of Putney and Fulham, unless the proprietors of the said horse ferries by writing, under their respective hands and seals should consent and agree with the said commissioners and trustees, or any nine or more of them, or the said corporation, to permit the said commissioners and trustees, or corporation, to build the same before such satisfaction shall be made; and in case such consent of the said proprietors shall be had and obtained in manner aforesaid, that then the said bridge when built, and all tolls, revenues, profits, and incomes belonging or to belong to the same, shall be and are hereby made chargeable and charged in the first place with all such sums of money as are by the said former Act to be paid to the respective owners, proprietors, and persons interested in the present ferries between Fulham and Putney aforesaid, and that upon payment thereof respectively, or tender and refusal, all ownerships, properties, and interests of, in, or to the horse and foot ferries between Fulham and Putney aforesaid, shall be and are hereby extinguished and determined; and the said ferries and passage over the river of Thames there, and the ground and soil adjacent and belonging to the said respective ferries, shall be and are by the authority of this Act transferred to and absolutely vested in the said commissioners and trustees and corporation aforesaid, and their successors and assigns for ever.

All such moneys and payment for the said horse ferries have long since been duly made and paid by the thirty persons who, as hereinafter is mentioned, contracted with the commissioners and trustees of the said hereinbefore-mentioned Acts for the building of the said bridge.

18. Copies of both of the Acts above referred to accompany this case and are to be taken to be and form part of the same for the purpose of reference or otherwise.

19. The ferries referred to in the said Act, on the Putney side of the river, were held and were parcel of the Manor of Wimbledon, and on the Fulham side were held and were parcel of the Manor of Fulham, and previously to the 24th March 1782, Daniel Pettiward and William Skelton had been respectively admitted to and each of them then held in fee by copy of the court rolls of the respective manors, one undivided moiety of the ferries on both the Putney and Fulham sides of the river, and on the 24th March 1728 the sum of 8000*l.* was paid by the said thirty persons who had so, as aforesaid, contracted for the building of the bridge, to the said Daniel Pettiward and William Skelton, in full satisfaction of all damage which they or either of them should sustain by occasion of building the bridge. The rights and interests of all other parties in the said ferries having been previously satisfied as is hereinbefore mentioned.

20. On the 19th Nov. 1728, a contract was duly entered into by the commissioners with thirty persons who had subscribed 1000*l.* each for building the bridge and making the purchases and payments required by the said Acts by which those thirty persons contracted to build and maintain the bridge and the ways and passages thereto, and make the said purchases and payments, and in pursuance thereof the said thirty persons did build the said bridge and make the said payments and purchases.

21. By indenture of bargain and sale, bearing date the 11th Nov. 1729, duly enrolled in Chancery, made between the said commissioners, of the first part, the said thirty persons therein named and described as being all the contractors and subscribers for building the said bridge, of the second part, and certain other persons as trustees, of the third part, after reciting the 1st, 2nd, 5th, 7th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th sections of the Acts first above mentioned, and the 1st, 3rd, and 5th sections of the Acts secondly above mentioned; and further reciting the said contract of the 19th Nov. 1728. And that the said thirty persons had paid all moneys they had agreed to pay, and built the said bridge, the commissioners granted, bargained, sold, assigned, and set over unto the said persons, parties thereto of the third part, their heirs and assigns, for ever, the said bridge, and all the materials wherewith the same was erected and built, and all tolls, revenues, profits, and incomes of or belonging to the said bridge, so built, from the town of Fulham to the town of Putney, or the ferries thereafter to be set up and erected as occasion might be, according to the provision in that behalf made by the said recited Acts, or either of them, or which should in anywise arise, accrue, or belong to the same, with all such ground and soil adjacent and belonging to the then late or then present horseferries, and passage over the said river between Fulham and Putney, as had been, was or should be vested in the said commissioners, and all benefits, advantages, powers, privileges, and authorities, and every other matter and thing whatsoever, vested in or granted to the said commissioners which they are empowered or capable to assign and convey over by virtue of the said Acts, or either of them, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said trustees, parties thereto of the third part, their heirs and assigns for ever, upon trust to permit and suffer the said thirty persons therein named of the second part, their heirs and assigns, to receive and take the said tolls, revenues, profits, and income, and to have the sole management and direction thereof, upon condition that they should thereout pay certain sums of money and expenses specified in the said deed (which condition has been duly performed), and after payment of such sums of money should every year thereafter divide all the then rest and residue of the moneys to be raised by the said tolls, revenues, profits, and income of the said bridge, ferries, and other the premises (if any) unto and amongst the said thirty subscribers and proprietors for the time being, and their respective heirs and assigns rateably and proportionably according to the several sums of money by them subscribed for the purposes aforesaid, and to their several and respective rights, shares, and interests of, in, and to the same to have, take, and enjoy the same as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants.

22. And by the same deed it was provided that in case the tolls, revenues, profits and incomes of the said bridge or ferries, should at any time or times thereafter fall short, and not be sufficient to answer and make good all such sums of money as should be requisite for putting and keeping the said bridge, together with the ways and passages to and from the same, in good repair within a reasonable time to be allowed for making such repairs, or should not be sufficient for the payment of all the matters and things thereinbefore particularly mentioned, and the charges of the trustees in the execution of the trusts; then all such sums of money as shall so fall short or be wanting for the said purposes, should from time to time be paid, and borne by the said thirty subscribers, the parties thereto of the second part, their heirs and assigns rateably and proportionably, and according to the several sums of money subscribed by them respectively towards the purposes aforesaid, and to their several rights, shares, and interests therein.

A copy of the last-mentioned deed accompanies this case, and is to be taken to be and form part of the same for the purpose of reference or otherwise.

23. On the 16th June 1730, by grant of that date, the Archbishop of Canterbury granted to the proprietors of Putney bridge 200 superficial feet of land, part of the churchyard of Putney, for the purpose of making the passage to and from the said bridge more commodious, and the same was used for that purpose, and now forms part of the approach to the bridge.

24. There is no other land in the county of Surrey vested in, belonging to, or claimed by the said proprietors of the said bridge, except what is comprised in the before stated deed of the 11th Nov. 1729, and the last stated grant, and no evidence was adduced before me as to the annual value of or income arising from the said land separate and apart from the income derived and issuing from the said bridge and land together, which said last mentioned income in the shape of tolls, revenues, profits, and income, is sufficient to give to each of the claimants in this case an income of more than 40s. per annum.

25. The interest of the present proprietors in the said bridge is derived from and through the thirty persons parties to the said deed of the 11th May 1729 of the second part, and is identical in all respects with the interests of the said thirty persons under and by virtue of the said deed, save in so far as the same may have been affected or altered, or modified, or enlarged, by the provisions of the Thames Navigation Act 1870 hereinafter mentioned, and such interest has always been conveyed and transmitted as and dealt with as freehold estate, and the shareholders or proprietors in the said bridge are at present about 100 in number.

26. The proprietors meet once a year and select a committee of management of six out of their own body to manage their affairs.

27. The said persons so objected to as aforesaid are respectively the holders of a share or part of a share of such interest as aforesaid, and the sufficiency of the annual money value of such share or part of a share is not now in dispute.

28. The bridge is built partly upon piles driven into the bed of the river, and at either end upon brick foundations, which stand respectively upon that part of the banks between high and low water mark, whence formerly the ferries used to ply from side to side, and part upon land which formerly was ground and soil belonging to the said ferries.

29. There are toll-houses at each end of the bridge at which tolls are collected, and each of them is a structure of brick and stands upon the brick foundations of the bridge referred to in the preceding paragraph hereof.

30. By an Act passed in the 33 & 34 Vict. (The Thames Navigation Act 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. c. cxlix.), reciting, amongst other things, that it was expedient that provision be made for the improvement of Putney-bridge, it was, by the 10th section, enacted that:

10. With respect to the improvement and management of the bridge across the Thames between Fulham in the County of Middlesex and Putney in the County of Surrey (in this section referred to as Putney-bridge), the following provisions shall have effect: (namely),—

(1.) The committee of management for the time being of Putney-bridge (in this section referred to as the committee of management) shall within twelve months after the passing of this Act widen the centre arch of Putney-bridge in accordance with the deposited plans and sections.

(2.) If the committee of management desire to erect a landing place in connection with Putney-bridge, they may do so without payment to the conservators; but so that the same be made at such place, and in accordance with such plans as the conservators approve, and the same shall be subject to the bye-laws and regulations of the conservators.

(3.) In widening the centre arch and erecting the landing place as aforesaid, the committee of management may close Putney-bridge and its approaches to such extent and for such time as in their judgment may be expedient.

(4.) For the purposes of this section the committee of management may raise money not exceeding the sum of 6000*l.* by mortgage of all, or any part of the tolls, revenues, profits, income, or property, of or belonging to Putney-bridge, with such powers of sale, and other incidental powers as the lenders and the committee of management agree on, and the receipts in writing of the committee of management, or of any four or more of shall effectually discharge the lenders from the r lent, and from all responsibility in respect of the ation thereof.

All moneys so borrowed by the committee of gement, shall be applied for the purposes afore-and not otherwise.

The improvements of Putney-bridge, authorised by section, and the same bridge and the lands there belonging, and the tolls, revenues, profits, and ie of or belonging to the same, shall be vested in mmittee of management, and their successors for me being, subject to the trusts on which the same ld at the passing of this Act.

In case at any time Putney-bridge is purchased comrily, under the authority of Parliament, due regard be had in the ascertainment of the amount of com-tion to be paid in respect thereof, to the money ded by the committee of management, in widening ntre arch as aforesaid, and to the costs and charges ed by them in relation thereto.

id by the 11th section of the same Act it was ed that,

The conservators on the one hand, and the pro-rs of the bridge across the river Thames between m, in the county of Middlesex, and Putney, e county of Surrey, commonly called Putney-
, on the other hand, may from time to time for the said objector it was contended that had not respectively such freehold estates ould entitle them to vote for the said

e notice of appeal from my decision was given on behalf of the said James Foster Wadmore, and of the said thirty-five other persons whose names appear in the list in the second paragraph of this case referred to, and I declared that the appeals in all the above-mentioned cases against my said decision ought to be consolidated. And I name Samuel William Aries and George Robert Lillyman, overseers of the poor of the said parish of Putney, to be the respondents in such consolidated appeal.

If the court be of opinion that my decision was wrong, the register is to be amended by inserting the names of the said James Foster Wadmore, and of the said thirty-five other persons, on the register for the said parish of Putney.

WADMORE v. DEAN.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for Middlesex.

The case was set out in exactly the same terms, and the question raised was precisely the same as in the case above set out, except that paragraphs 23 and 24 were omitted.

E. Clarke for the appellant in each case.—The question is whether the proprietors of the tolls on Putney-bridge are entitled to an equitable freehold in the bridge so as to be entitled to the county franchise. The question was decided some years ago against the appellant in the case of Tepper v. Nichols (34 L. J. 61, C. P.; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 509), the court there basing their judgment on the fact that the commissioners had no power to convey the fee simple in the bridge to the trustees for the shareholders; and that the tolls, which were all that had been conveyed, were independent of the land so as to give no right to vote. But, since the decision of that case, an Act has been passed (33 & 34 Vict. c. 149) intituled The Thames Navigation Act 1870, and sect. 10 and sub-sects. 4 and 6, taken in connection with sect. 11, have this effect. The commissioners by whom the bridge was held had disappeared, and the legal estate was outstanding, and the sections just cited have the effect of vesting the legal estate, as well as the mere right to tolls, in the committee of management. The committee of management hold, whatever they do hold, in trust for the appellant and the other shareholders of the bridge. He cited:

Rex v. Inhabitants of Barnes, 1 B. & Ad. 113;
Badger v. South Yorkshire Railway Company, 1 E. & E. 347.

[WILLES, J. cited Stracey v. Nelson (12 M. & W. 535.]

McIntyre, for the respondent in each case.—The Act cited for the appellant does not vest the bridge in the committee of management so as to make it their property, and does not make the shareholders cestuis que trust of the land; simply the committee are to take the tolls on the same trusts as the commissioners had done. (He was stopped by the court.)

WILLES, J.—If this case is to rest on the law as settled by the decision of this court in 1864, in Tepper v. Nichols, there can be no doubt that the claim would have to be rejected, and that the decision of the revising barrister was right, as Tepper v. Nichols is an express decision upon the point. I must confess that I did not at first understand that case. It is, however, now quite intelligible to me. The court did not there decide that tolls cannot be considered free tenement within the statute of 8 Henry VI. All that the court said was, that tolls of a particular description were not a sufficient tenement under that Act. The tolls in this case, though substituted for a right of ferry, must at common law be treated either as toll thorough or toll traverse. In respect of toll thorough, that is to say, the toll paid for the privilege of passing over land which is not in the ownership of the person claiming toll, it is necessary to show a special consideration, In this case no consideration is shown sufficient at common law to justify the claim of toll. In respect of other toll, it is not necessary to prove special consideration, as the nature of the toll implies a consideration. If the claim here were for "free tenement" I should consider it was made out by showing that the appellant had a free tenement of such a description that it might have existed at the time of the passing of the Act of Henry VI., and might come within the terms of that statute. I quite understand that the word tenement includes not only land, but many franchises, as fisheries and the like; and so it may include any tolls of the nature of those in existence at the time of the passing of the Act of Henry VI. There may be such a thing as a tenement, created since that time by Act of Parliament, but no new tenement within the Act can be created by conveyance. But many acts have since been passed by which tenements have been created, which were not such in the time of Henry VI. We had recently to consider the case of pews given to a man and his heirs (Brumfit v. Overseers of Liverpool, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 301; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 224; 39 L. J. 95, C. P.), which might or might not have been a tenement at the time of Henry VI. These pews were held by this court to be no qualification, as they did not exist in the time of Henry VI. So that I now perceive and understand the distinction drawn by this court in the case of Tepper v. Nichols between the right to be deemed the cestuis que trust of tolls arising out of land, and the equitable right given by statute to receive the tolls granted by Act of Parliament to the commissioners. The court in Tepper v. Nichols impliedly decided that the sort of tolls granted by the statute was not a free tenement within 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, but something new, and that they would not consider an act as conferring the parliamentary franchise which had nothing to do with it, but was only intended to substitute a more convenient way of crossing the river for the old ferry. The tolls in this case could only be held as representing the profits arising out of land, and could not be deemed free tenement within 8 Hen. 6, c. 7. The Act of Parliament appointed commissioners to build the bridge, and authorised them to convey the tolls to trustees for the shareholders; but it gave them no power to convey the fee simple of the bridge itself. That is the explanation of Tepper v. Nichols, which perfectly satisfies me. Having that proposition established by Tepper v. Nichols matters now stand thus: There were commissioners in whom the land was vested (though vested perhaps only for the purpose of building the bridge), and these commissioners were authorised to convey, and did convey, the tolls to the persons who claimed the county vote. That claim was disallowed in Tepper v. Nichols. Since the decision in that case an Act has been passed, and the effect of that Act is this: Improvements were to be made in the bridge, and sect. 10. subsect. 6 provides that thereupon "the same bridge and the lands thereunto belonging, and the tolls, revenues, profits, and income of, or belonging to, the same, shall be vested in the committee of management and their successors for the time being, subject to the trusts on which the same are held at the time of the passing of this Act." Unquestionably, the tolls were held at the time of the passing of the Act on trusts, which gave the shareholders the right to receive them, and equally unquestionably the bridge and land were held for public purposes, or the commissioners may be considered as holding the land for such purposes as Parliament might approve. But in no case do they hold the bridge and land in trust for the persons who now claim to vote. The way to read the statute is this, "rendering the trusts applicable to the two distinct species of property (viz., the bridge and land and the statutory tolls) each to the same ends and purposes as before the passing of the Act. That is the way to read the 10th section of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 149. Thus the persons who now claim in respect of these tolls are no better off now than they were at the time that Tepper v. Nichols was decided. I am therefore of opinion that the revising barrister was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. In truth, the last Act (sect. 10, subsect. 6) at first appears as though it vested the bridge and land in the committee of management, in trust for the claimants; it, however, only vests the bridge and land in the committee of management, subject to the same trusts as the same were held on at the time of the passing of the Act. The question, therefore, in this case is the same as was adjudicated on in Tepper v. Nichols. The claimants have gained no additional right since that time. Tepper v. Nichols is a perfectly satisfactory decision, and, in accordance with that case, the revising barrister was right.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WILLES, J., further mentioned the case of Mayor of Nottingham v. Lambert (Willes Rep. 111).

Appeal dismissed.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68—Lands injuriously affected—Special Act containing no provision for compensation—Effect of incorporation in Special Act of Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

The effect of incorporating the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 in a local Act is to entitle all persons whose lands are injuriously affected by the operations authorised by the special Act to compensation, without any special provision being contained in the local Act for that purpose.

By certain sections of a local Act, which incorporated so much of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act as was not modified by or inconsistent with the provisions of the special Act, commissioners were empowered to remove from houses projections into the streets which were existing at the time of passing the Act, and on the rebuilding of projecting houses, to set them back to the line of the street, and the owners, &c., were made entitled to compensation for injuries thereby sustained. By another section, not making any mention of compensation to owners, &c., the commissioners were empowered to alter the level of streets. Certain premises having been injuriously affected by operations carried out under the last mentioned section:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench), that the owner was entitled to compensation by virtue of the provision of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

ERROR from the Queen's Bench.

In this case the Court of Queen's Bench, on the prosecutor's application, awarded against the defendants a writ of mandamus, commanding them to take up the award of one Bannister Fletcher, alleged to have been made under the provisions of the Chelsea Improvement Act 1845, and the other Acts incorporated therewith. A return having been made to the said writ, to the effect that the defendants were not by law bound to take up the award, the prosecutor demurred. By consent of the parties on the argument of the demurrer, no judgment was given by the court; and, by rule of court, it was ordered that the facts be stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench without any pleadings.

The following are the material portions of the case stated in pursuance of that rule:

The prosecutor is the lessee of certain premises situate in a street formerly called Rances-place, but now called Callon-street, in the parish of St. Luke's, Chelsea, for the unexpired residue of a term of 40 years, commencing from the 25th March 1848, and which premises at the time of the defendants' altering the level of the said street, as hereinafter mentioned, were in the occupation of one George Barnes, as the prosecutor's undertenant. The premises consisted of a house and blacksmith's shop, with a shoeing forge contiguous and attached thereto as part thereof. They fronted on Rances-place aforesaid, and had been for many years used as a blacksmith's shop and shoeing forge. Rances-place is a street within the meaning of the Metropolitan Management Acts, and has been an ancient street, and, before the defendants' Acts hereinafter mentioned, had remained at the same level many years.

The defendants are the vestry of the parish of St. Luke's, Chelsea, and as such are the body entitled to exercise the powers and rights, and liable and subject to the duties and obligations of the commissioners mentioned in the statute of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. cxliii., entitled "An Act for better paving, lighting, cleansing, regulating and improving the parish of St. Luke's, Chelsea (exclusive of the district of Hans-town), in the county of Middlesex, and hereinafter referred to as the Chelsea Improvement Act 1845.

By the 83rd section of the said Chelsea Improvement Act 1845, which Act and the Acts incorporated therewith are to be taken as part of this case, it was enacted that so much of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 as was applicable to and was not modified by the said Chelsea Improvement Act 1845, or as was not inconsistent with the provisions thereof, should be held to apply to the improvements by that Act authorized to be made, and should be read and construed as forming part of that Act.

In the month of May 1867 the defendants, acting in execution of the powers vested in them by the aforesaid Act, also under and by virtue of and in pursuance of the powers vested in them by the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, caused the footways in Rance's-place to be improved, and in order to carry out the said improvement, it was necessary that the level of the footway should be altered and raised; and the vestry, in order to effect the said improvement, caused the level of the footway in Rance's-place to be, and the same was altered and raised and heightened, and such heightened footways were flagged and paved; and the effect of the alterations has been to diminish the height of the entrance to the said premises, and especially to the said shoeing forge, to between 3ft. 6in. and 4ft., thus rendering it impossible to lead horses into the said forge to be shod as theretofore, or for a man to walk there from the street, and placing the shop and ground floor of the said premises at a lower level, and thus materially damaging their value, and diminishing and injuriously affecting the value of the prosecutor's estate and interest therein.

A correspondence then took place between the attorneys for the prosecutor and the vestry clerk to the defendants, as to the prosecutor's claim for reasonable compensation for the injury done to his property; and notice was given to the defendants of the appointment of an arbitrator on behalf of the prosecutor. The defendants denied their liability to pay compensation, or to attend before the prosecutor's arbitrator. The reference was then proceeded with before the sole arbitrator appointed by the prosecutor; and on the 13th July 1868 the prosecutor's attorneys received notice from the arbitrator that (as the fact was) he had made his award.

The defendants were thereupon required to take up the award by the prosecutor, but refused to do so, alleging that they were not liable to make any compensation, whereupon the writ of mandamus was applied for and such proceedings had thereon as before mentioned.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the prosecutor was, under the circumstances of the case, entitled to compensation from the defendants or not. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment was to be entered for the Crown, and a peremptory writ of mandamus was to be awarded, commanding the defendants to take up the award, and the prosecutor was to have his costs of suit from the time of the motion for the rule for a mandamus. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment was to be entered for the defendants with like costs of suit.

The Court of Queen's Bench was of opinion that the prosecutor was, under the circumstances of the case, entitled to compensation from the defendants, and awarded a peremptory writ of mandamus, commanding the defendants to take up the award, and that the prosecutor should recover against the defendants his costs of suit. Upon this the defendants brought error.

Sir John B. Karslake, Q.C. (with him Raymond)

for the defendants.—The prosecutor is not entitled to compensation in the present case. The 83rd section of the special Act no doubt makes applicable so much of the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 "as is applicable and is not modified by this Act, or as is not inconsistent with the provisions hereof," to "the improvements authorised by this Act to be made;" but it is submitted that even if the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act gives a title to compensation in cases where the special Act gives no express title to it, the provisions of that general Act are not by the special Act made applicable to the present case. In the first place it is submitted that sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act does not in any case give a title to compensation, but only provides a machinery for assessing it where a title to it is conferred by the special Act which authorises the works. That section provides that "if any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l*., such party may have the same settled either by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury, as he shall think fit," &c. This section does not give a title to compensation, and no compensation is intended to be awarded where the special Act does not expressly or impliedly give it. It only supplies a remedy in those cases where a title to relief is given by the special Act; it does not say that wherever lands are taken or injuriously affected the owner of the premises is to be entitled to compensation. It is different in the case of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, the 16th section of which provides "that in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein, and in the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers." In the second place, even if the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act gives a general title to compensation, it does not do so in the present case, for its provisions are incorporated with the special Act only so far as "not modified by this Act, or not inconsistent with the provisions thereof." Now, sects. 124 and 127 of the special Act, which empower the commissioners to remove from houses projections into the street which were existing at the passing of the Act, and also on the rebuilding of projecting houses, to set them back to the line of the street, expressly provide that the commissioners shall make compensation to the owner, &c., in either case; whereas sect. 104 authorises the commissioners to alter the level of streets without saying anything as to compensating the owners of houses. Further, sect. 83 makes applicable the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act only to "the improvements" authorised by the special Act. The next succeeding section of the special Act (s. 84)(a) provides for taking lands for the purpose of making, widening, and improving streets, which is the leading object of the Act, and the word "improvements" should be read as applying to these alterations only. This would lead to the conclusion that so much only of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is incorporated as relates to the taking of lands. In Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers in the City of London (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 295, L. Rep. 4 Ex. 277), where compensation was given by the special Act in certain special cases of injury to and interference with property, but no compensation was given for the injurious affecting of lands generally, it was held that the plaintiff, whose premises were injuriously affected by works executed by the defendants under the powers of their local Act, was not entitled to compensation; and the court doubted whether, if the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act had been incorporated with the special Act, compensation could have been claimed under it, the plaintiff not being entitled to compensation by any other statutory provision. The case of Broadbent v. The Imperial Gaslight Company (7 De G. M. & G. 436), having been referred to in the argument of that case, Hannen, J. observed, "There the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 15) was also incorporated, which, by sect. 6, supposing it applicable, gave compensation. It was only necessary, therefore, to go to sect. 68 for the method of redress; and it was not contended that, without the former section, sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act would give compensation."

Philbrick (with him H. Tindal Atkinson), for the prosecutor, was not called upon.

Kelly, C B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was right, and should be affirmed. The question raised upon the case before us is whether the plaintiff is entitled to the compensation claimed by him by reason of his house having been injuriously affected by the operations of the vestry of St. Luke's, Chelsea, carried on by them under a local Act of Parliament, that is, by the raising of the level of the street in which the claimant's house was situated, so that access thereto became impeded. Now the case turns entirely on the construction of, or rather on the effect of, the 83rd and 104th sections of the local Act, under the latter of which sections the works in question were performed. [His Lordship read the 104th section of the Act.] Under this section alone certainly no compensation is given by the Act of Parliament, nor do we find in the special Act itself any provision, applicable to the particular operations carried on, for making compensation to persons whose property may be injuriously affected by them. But the operations authorised by this section were made under the authority of an Act which incorporates with itself the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, the 63rd and 68th sections of which latter Act do in terms provide how compensation shall be assessed and recovered. There is certainly nothing in the special Act which expressly, or so far as I can see, impliedly takes away any right or excludes any right to compensation for injuriously affecting property given by the general Act. We must look, therefore, to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act which are incorporated with the special Act, and see whether a title to compensation is given by that Act to persons whose premises may be injuriously affected by the operations carried on under this special Act. The section principally referred to is the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and that section begins with these words, "If any person shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith;" and then follow provisions as to the machinery and procedure by which compensation is to be assessed. Now, it has been observed—and although the observation is somewhat critical in its character I do not say that it is not quite fair to make it—that here no title to compensation is, in express words, given to persons whose property is injuriously affected, the words being, "if any party shall be entitled to any compensation," &c.; but the language of the Act assumes that the party is in fact entitled to compensation by virtue of some Act of Parliament. I forbear to pronounce any opinion as to what would be the effect of this 68th section, if that section alone were included in the special Act in the present case; because I am myself clearly of opinion—and I do not think the matter open to any reasonable doubt—that the numerous provisions as to compensation in the earlier parts of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, especially the 22nd and 23rd sections, clearly, expressly, and necessarily confer a title to compensation on any person whose premises are injuriously affected by the operations of any public body. We have only to look at the numerous sections, beginning with the 18th, if not earlier, by which a machinery is provided, by means of which compensation is to be awarded to persons whose lands are injuriously affected. There is a series of enactments under which, where there is no agreement, notices are to be given, claims to be sent in, and a peculiar procedure is provided for cases where the amount is limited; but in all it is assumed that for the lands taken or injuriously affected compensation is to be made to the parties interested. When we come to the 22nd section—supposing that the matter had been left doubtful by the earlier sections—we find this provision: "If no agreement be come to between the promoters of the undertaking and the owners of or parties by this Act enabled to sell and convey or release any lands taken or required for or injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands, as to the value of such lands or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, and if in any such case the compensation claimed shall not exceed 50*l.*, the same shall be settled by two justices." Now I put the question to Sir John Karslake during the argument, and I must say that I did not get a satisfactory answer, what effect would, according to his argument, be given to the words "injuriously affected?" It is quite clear that the Legislature contemplated two sets of circumstances, first, where lands are actually taken and required for the purposes of the undertaking; and secondly, where lands are not actually taken, but are nevertheless injuriously affected by the execution of the works. Surely the present case comes within the second of these two classes. It appears to me, therefore, that when we find by the 83rd section of the special Act that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act are incorporated, and when we look at the provisions of that Act, whatever doubt might exist if the 68th section had stood alone is removed by the 22nd and 23rd sections. And I cannot but observe that where a case may exist—and the case now before the court may be such a case—in which very serious injury may be done to the premises of the party claiming compensation, we ought to put a liberal construction on the Act of Parliament, and, unless it is made perfectly clear that the language of the various Acts of Parliament is not sufficiently ample to embrace the case in question, we ought to hold the party whose property is injuriously affected—perhaps to a very large extent—entitled to compensation from the public body whose works cause the injury. It is only where we find that there is no provision at all applicable to the case that we ought to hold that any person may sustain an injury without being entitled to compensation for it. Now a number of hypothetical cases and others have been put by Sir John Karslake in his very able argument, in which he says it is clear that no compensation is to be made; one as to the repairing or altering the level of a pavement; and it was urged that from the various statutes referred to authorising those alterations, not only was no provision made for compensating the person inconvenienced, but, on the contrary, the party himself whose property was interfered with has to contribute his portion of the expenses for performing the works. But these are the cases in which it is impossible to suppose, without exaggerating greatly, that any serious injury is done at all. Some slight inconvenience perhaps was sustained, or some slight degree of injury suffered. It is plain that these cases were cases where the injuries were of the slightest kind. But it is impossible to apply the same observations to a case like this, where very serious injury has been sustained. Take the case of such a town as Bath, Newcastle-on-Tyne, or Durham, where the level of the streets varies. Some towns are built on the sides of hills, with steep ascents and descents, and where an alteration of level in the streets would work great hardship to the owners of the houses situated in them. It is quite possible that the pavement might be so raised as to reach the very top of a man's door, so that he would have to alter the whole structure of his house in order to get access to it from the street. It would be impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended to inflict so serious an injury on any individual without enabling him to obtain compensation. Now an argument has been founded on the 124th and 127th sections of the special Act in this case; and it has been urged that, because in these sections compensation is in express terms given for injury done in the cases referred to in those sections, the maxim Expressio unius est exclusio alterius applies, and that in the cases where there is no express provision for compensation made, no compensation is intended to be given. I think if we look at the nature of the inconveniences dealt with by those sections, the argument altogether fails. The 124th section empowers the commissioners to give notice, where a projection or obstruction renders less commodious the passage along any street, to the owner or occupier of the house in front of which such projection or obstruction is placed to remove the same, and in default of his so doing imposes a penalty. This contemplates something which might be considered as a nuisance, and the person inconvenienced is made entitled to compensation. But the observation I would rather make on this section is this, that it might very well be doubted whether the merely bringing back the front of a building could be considered an "improvement" within the meaning of the Act, as the making or altering a street or sewer would undoubtedly be. It may have been doubted by the framers of the Act whether the former could be considered an "improvement" within its meaning, and so, ex abundanti cautelâ, they may have inserted this provision. The same observation might be applied to the 127th section. [His Lordship read the section empowering the commissioners, where a house projecting beyond the ordinary line of the street is taken down to be rebuilt, to compel the owner to rebuild it, so that its frontage may be in a line with the rest of the street, and to compensate the owner, should he sustain any loss or damage by his house being so set back.] Well, then, a further argument, and the only one which remains for me now to deal with, is founded on the several sections of the Local Act following the 83rd, which relate in general only to the purchase of lands, and it is said that the improvements contemplated by the 83rd section are only those large and substantial improvements contemplated by the sections following. But I do not know why we should put so limited a construction on the word "improvement," for though that section is followed by sections dealing with large and substantial improvements, it is also followed by sections providing for other improvements of a minor character. Upon all those sections it appears to me that the grounds entirely fail on which it is contended that the plaintiff in the present case is not entitled to compensation for the injury which he has sustained. Under all these circumstances, and taking the 68th and the 22nd and 23rd sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the 83rd and following sections of the local Act, I think that the plaintiff is clearly entitled to compensation, and therefore that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

(a) This section enacts as follows: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, it shall be lawful for the commissioners to contract for and agree with the owners of lands particularised in schedule (C) for the absolute purchase for a consideration in money of such lands, or such parts thereof as they shall think fit and proper, and of all subsisting leases therein, and of all rentcharges, annuities, mortgages, or incumbrances affecting any such lands, and all other estates, rights, or interests in such lands of what kind soever, and to enter into and take the same for the wise improving streets within the said parish, and the commissioners are hereby empowered to make, widen, and improve such streets as they from time to time shall deem it such necessary."

Willes, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not wish to add anything to the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, in which I quite agree. I desire only to refer to the case of Leader v. Moxon (2 Wm. Black. 924.) That was an action on the case against contractors, employed by certain commissioners, who were bound to pave certain streets, for obstructing the doors and windows of six messuages belonging to the plaintiff. Power was given to the commissioners to lay out a new street within the limits mentioned in the Act of Parliament, "so as the same does not obstruct, hinder, or prejudice the rights or free passage that any person hath to his lands, tenements, or hereditaments;" and, without any such proviso as the foregoing being annexed, the commissioners were also empowered to "pave, repair, sink, or alter the same in such manner as the commissioners shall think fit." The plaintiff's houses having been interfered with in the same way as the plaintiff's premises have been in the present case, he brought an action on the case for the damage done to him, and it was urged on behalf of the defendants that the power of the commissioners was discretionary in these matters, and that they might do what they thought proper within the limits of the Act; but the court came to the conclusion that the commissioners had not an arbitrary discretion in the matter, but one limited by law and reason; and then went on to say that "had Parliament intended to demolish or render useless some houses for the benefit or ornament of the rest, it would have given express powers for that purpose, and given an equivalent for the loss that individuals might have sustained thereby." That is, I think, equivalent to what is done in the present case.

Channell, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Keating, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Pigott, B.—I am of the same opinion. I would only add, with reference to the 124th and 127th sections of the special Act, which in express terms give compensation for injuries sustained by persons from the improvements there authorised, that this may be accounted for by the fact that they follow sect. 123, which deals with a class of nuisances for which a penalty is imposed, and in respect of which it was not intended that any compensation should be made to owners.(a) Then the Legislature, dealing in the next section with the case of "all obstructions or projections of a like kind as those before mentioned which have been erected or placed against or in front of any house or other building in any street or public place before the passing of the Act," may have thought that unless compensation were expressly given, it might be considered that it was intended that it should not be given, and, therefore, ex majore cautelâ, expressly stated in the 124th section that the commissioners "shall make reasonable compensation to every person who shall incur any loss or damage by such removal or alteration."

Cleasby, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment affirmed.

Attorney for prosecutor, Ball and Son.

Attorney for defendants, Lee, Pemberton and Co.

(a) Sect. 123 enacts, "That if the commissioners shall consider any porch, shed, projecting window, steps, cellar, cellar door, window, sign, sign post, sign iron, showboard, window shutter, wall, gate or fence, or any other obstruction or projection hereafter to be placed against or in front of any house or building to be an annoyance, in consequence of the same projecting into, endangering, or rendering less commodious the passage along any street within the limits of this Act, it shall be lawful for them to give notice in writing to the owner or occupier of such house or building to remove such obstruction or projection, or to alter the same in such manner as shall have been directed by the commissioners, or in default thereof such owner or occupier shall forfeit the sum of 40s. for every week that such matter or thing shall not have been removed after such notice as aforesaid."

Reg v. Butterworth.

*Partner—Stealing goods of co-partnership—Indictment—*31 & 32 Vict., c. 116, s. 6.

An indictment framed upon the 31 & 32 Vict., c. 116, s. 1, alleged that B. was a member of a co-partnership consisting of B. and L., and that B., then being a member of the same, 11 bags of cotton waste, the property of the said co-partnership, feloniously did steal, &c., contrary to the statute:

Held that the indictment was not bad for introducing the word "feloniously."

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court.

At the October Quarter Sessions for the Hundred of Salford, in the county of Lancaster,

Thomas Butterworth was arraigned on an indictment of which the following is a copy:

Lancashire to wit.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that after the passing of an Act made and passed in the 31st and 32nd years of our lady the Queen entituled "An act to amend the law relating to larceny and embezzlement," Thomas Butterworth the younger, of Heap, in the county of Lancaster, was a member of a certain co-partnership, to wit, a certain co-partnership carrying on the business of and trading as waste dealers, and which said co-partnership was constituted and consisted of the said Thomas Butterworth and of John Joseph Lee, trading as aforesaid, and thereupon the said Thomas Butterworth, at Heap aforesaid, during the continuance of the said co-partnership, and then being a member of the same as aforesaid, to wit, on the seventh day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy one, eleven bags of cotton waste of the property of the said co-partnership feloniously did steal, take, and carry away, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said lady the Queen, her crown, and dignity.

It was proved that the partnership referred to was a bonâ fide trading partnership constituted by agreement between the prisoner and the said John Joseph Lee.

At the close of the case for the prosecution, the counsel for the prisoner objected that the indictment being framed under the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, should have followed the terms of the said statute, and that it did not do so, and that the said indictment disclosed no indictable offence either at common law or under the said statute, and that the prisoner could not legally be convicted upon it.

The court declined to stop the case, but reserved the above objection for the consideration of this Court.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and the court respited the sentence to the next sessions for the said Hundred of Salford.

The prisoner remains in prison for want of sureties.

The opinion of the Court is requested whether the above indictment is a good indictment under the said statute, and whether the prisoner was properly convicted upon it.

H. B. Higgin, Chairman.

The 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, enacts, "If any person, being a member of any co-partnership, or being one of two or more beneficial owners of any money, goods, or effects, bills, notes, securities, or other property shall steal or embezzle any such money, goods, or effects, bills, notes, securities, or other property, of or belonging to any such co-partnership, or to such joint beneficial owners, every such person shall be liable to be dealt with, tried, convicted, and punished for the same as if such person had not been or was not a member of such co-partnership, or one of such beneficial owners."

Cottingham for the prisoner.—The indictment is bad, because it does not follow the words of the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1. That enactment creates a new offence, one which did not exist at common law. It does not say that the offence shall be a felony, and the indictment is bad for using the word "feloniously." [Lush, J. — If the offence created by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1 is not a felony what is it?] There are offences of stealing which are not felonies, such as dog stealing, and unless the statute makes the stealing a felony, the introduction of the word "feloniously" which is a term of art (Reg. v. Gray, 9 Cox C. C. 417; L. & C. 365) vitiates the indictment. [Lush, J.—The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3 says, that a bailee fraudulently converting property "shall be guilty of larceny"—this statute says that a partner who shall steal property of the co-partnership "shall be dealt with and tried, and convicted and punished as if he was not a partner."] The indictment should have been for a common law larceny.

Reg. v. Jesse Smith, 39 L. J. 112, M. C.; 11 Cox C. C. 511.

The judgment of Willes, J. was also referred to.

Addison for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Kelly, C. B.—The objection to the indictment is really not arguable. The statute expressly enacts that a partner who steals property of the co-partnership "shall be liable to be dealt with, tried, convicted, and punished as if such person had not been, or was not a member of the co-partnership." That is what has been done in this case.

Conviction affirmed.

Reg. v. James King.

Larceny—Property—Evidence.

Prisoner was charged with stealing a mare, the property of E. The evidence was that prosecutor, in presence of the prisoner, agreed to buy of W. a mare for 5*l., and that W. assented to take a cheque for the* 5*l. The prosecutor afterwards sent prisoner to W. with the cheque, and directions to take the mare to Bramshot Farm. On the next day prisoner sold a mare to S., which he said he had bought for* 5*l. Before the magistrate he said he sold the mare to S., with the intention of giving the money to E., but that he got drunk:*

Held, that that was sufficient evidence on which a jury might find that the mare sold to S. was the property of E.

Case reserved for the decision of this Court at the General Quarter Session of the peace for the county of Surrey on Tuesday, the 17th Oct. 1871.

James King was tried on an indictment charging him with feloniously stealing a mare, of the property of William Ellis, upon the following evidence.

William Ellis, of 92, West-street, Bermondsey, corn sampler, on his oath said:

On Friday, 22nd Sept., I saw the prisoner on the Corn Market, in Mark-lane. He told me that he knew where there was a good-bred mare for sale, which would suit the purpose I wanted for breeding. I went to the place, Wilkinson's, St. Mary Axe, and saw the owner of the mare. I agreed to purchase the mare for 5*l*. Prisoner was present. Prisoner came back with me to Mark-lane. I had previously asked Wilkinson if he would take my master's cheque, and he said he would. I gave the prisoner my master's cheque for 5*l*. He was to give the cheque for the mare, and take the mare to my father's farm. I told him the direction on a paper, "Thomas Ellis, Bramshot Farm." Prisoner left me with the cheque. I did not see him till Monday following. On Tuesday the 26th I went to Winkley and Shaw, Green-street, Blackfriars, horse slaughterers. I gave information to the police at Stones End. I found this mare at Winkley and Shaw's. On the following day Shaw gave me this mare. On the evening before I saw the prisoner in custody. I did not give the prisoner any authority to go to Winkley and Shaw. The mare was suffering from an injury; she went slightly lame.

Cross-examined:

I don't think that I should have blamed him if he had found the horse lame and he had brought back the cheque or the money. I knew him two or three months before this transaction. I was told he came to my house on the Tuesday. On the 26th Sept., in the evening, I went with two detectives to the prisoner's house. When I saw the mare at Winkley and Shaw's she did not go more lame.

Re-examined:

I did not give the prisoner any authority to sell the mare to the horse slaughterer. He never told me what he had done with the mare, nor did he give me any money.

George William Shaw, on his oath, said:

I am the firm of Winkley and Shaw. I am a horse slaughterer. I have known the prisoner some time. On a Saturday afternoon in September he brought a horse to my place. The horse was very lame and had a very large wound. He said he bought it on speculation, and found it to be useless. I purchased it. I think he said that he had given 5*l*. for the horse. He asked me to give the most I could for it. I gave him 4*l*. This was on the 23rd Sept., Saturday. On Tuesday following, the 27th, prosecutor called on me. I offered to give up the horse. The horse was taken to the police court. The prisoner was quite sober at the time he sold the horse.

Cross-examined:

I have known him for several years. I believe him to be honest in his position. I have had transactions with him before. He made some remark that he was afraid the society would be at him for taking such a horse about the streets.

Robert Pether, detective M, on his oath, said:

On Sept. 26 I took prisoner into custody. I said I wanted him for stealing a horse. He said he got drunk, met with an accident, and sold the horse to Shaw for 4*l*. 1*s*.

Cross-examined:

I have known the prisoner for years; he is a respectable man.

The prisoner's statement before the committing magistrate was read as follows:

I plead guilty. I found she was too injured, and sold her to Mr. Shaw with the intention of giving the money to Mr. Ellis, but unfortunately I got drunk.

The prisoner's counsel contended that there was not sufficient proof of the indictment; that there was no proof that the prisoner had got the mare from Wilkinson's in exchange for the cheque; and that it was not proved that the mare in question ever became the property of William Ellis.

The court, however, left the case to the jury, but reserved the question for the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, whether there was sufficient proof that the mare was the property of William Ellis.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the court respited judgment until the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

E. RICHARDS ADAMS, Chairman.

Horace Browne for the prisoner.—The indictment charges the prisoner with stealing a mare, the property of William Ellis, but the evidence does not support that allegation. There was no proof that the mare which Ellis saw and contracted for was the same as that which the prisoner took away. The question reserved for this court is, whether there was sufficient proof that the prisoner had got the mare from Wilkinson's in exchange for the cheque, and it is submitted there is not.

Oppenheim, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

KELLY, C. B.—The question was one for the jury. The prisoner had the cheque given to him to go and pay for the mare, and take it to the prosecutor's father, and he, the next day, disposed of a mare to Mr. Shaw. There is no doubt some evidence that it was the mare of the prosecutor, and the sufficiency of the evidence was for the jury.

LUSH, J.—The prisoner's own account was, that he had got drunk and disposed of the money for which he sold the mare, not that the mare was not Ellis's.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. THOMAS BAILEY.

Larceny of writ—County Court warrant—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 30.

A judgment debtor whose goods had been levied upon, and were in possession of a County Court bailif, under an execution, forcibly took the warrant from the bailiff and turned him out of possession, in the belief that it was the actual possession of the warrant alone which entitled the bailiff to remain in possession.

Held, that such taking away of the warrant was for a fraudulent purpose, and a felony within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 30, but not a larceny.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Lush, J.

The prisoner was indicted before me at Oxford, at the last Summer Assizes, under the 30th section of the Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), which enacts that "whosoever shall steal, or shall for any fraudulent purpose take from its place of deposit for the time being, or from any person having the lawful custody thereof, or shall unlawfully and maliciously cancel, obliterate, injure, or destroy the whole, or any part of any record, writ, return, panel, process, interrogatory, deposition, affidavit, rule, order, or warrant of attorney, or of any original document whatsoever, of or belonging to any court of record, or relating to any matter civil or criminal, begun, depending, or terminated in any such court, &c., shall be guilty of felony."

The first count of the indictment charged the prisoner with stealing certain process of a court of record, to wit, a certain warrant of execution issued out of the County Court of Berkshire, in an action wherein one Arthur was plaintiff and the prisoner defendant. Also another warrant of execution out of the same court, in an action Halcombe and Co. against the prisoner.

The second count stated that at the time of committing the offence hereinafter mentioned, one Brooker had the lawful custody of certain process of a court of record, to wit, a warrant of execution out of the County Court of Berkshire in an action between Arthur and the defendant; that defendant, intending to prevent the due course of law, and to deprive Arthur of the rights, benefits, and advantages from the lawful execution of the warrant, did take from Brooker the said warrant, he (Brooker) having then the lawful custody of it.

It was proved that two actions had been brought in the County Court against the prisoner, in each of which judgment had been given against him, and a warrant of execution issued against his goods. The high bailiff of the court made the levy under these warrants, and, having done so, he handed the warrants over to his deputy bailiff, and left him in possession of the goods.

The prisoner, a day or two afterwards, forcibly took the warrants out of the bailiff's hands and kept them. He then ordered him away, as having no authority to remain there any longer, and, on his refusal to go, forcibly turned him out.

The prisoner was convicted; but, as I entertained a doubt whether these facts supported the count for larceny, and whether, as the prisoner's intention in taking the warrants was not to make use of them, but merely to deprive the bailiff, as he supposed, of his authority; and as the validity of the execution was not affected by his taking the warrants, he was guilty of taking them for a fraudulent purpose within the meaning of the statute, I forbore to pass sentence, and admitted the prisoner to bail till the opinion of this Court should have been taken upon the above points.

Robert Lush.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

Cockburn, C.J.—I think that the first count of the indictment which charges larceny will not hold. The facts are these; the prisoner had evidently conceived the notion that it was the possession of the warrant which made the possession of his goods by the bailiff lawful; and that if he could get the warrant away he could denude him of that authority, and the bailiff might be turned out of possession. Under that belief the prisoner forcibly took the warrants out of the bailiff's hands. That was not a taking lucri causâ, but for the purpose of preventing the bailiff from having lawful possession. Neither was the taking animo furandi. I may illustrate it by the case of a man, who, wishing to strike another person sees him coming along with a stick in his hand, and then rushes at him, takes the stick out of his hand and strikes him with it. That would be an assault, but not a felonious taking of the stick. There is, however, a second count in the indictment which charges in effect that the prisoner took the warrants for a fraudulent purpose. The facts show that the taking was for a fraudulent purpose. He took the warrants forcibly from the bailiff in order that he might turn him out of possession. That was a fraud against the execution creditor, and was also contrary to the law. I am therefore of opinion that it amounts to a fraudulent purpose within the enactment, and that the conviction must be affirmed.

Lush, J.—I am of the same opinion. I had a doubt whether or not the taking of the warrant by the prisoner, with the intention of making use of it for his own purpose, was a taking for a fraudulent purpose within the statute, but I am now clear upon the point, and agree with the rest of the Court.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

Reg. v. Newboult and Holdsworth.

Arson—Ownership of house set fire to—Intent to defraud insurance office—Evidence—24 & 25 Vict. c 97, s. 3.

An indictment under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 3, for setting fire to a house, shop, &c., need not allege the ownership of the house.

The evidence in support of the intent to injure was, that the prisoner N. was under notice to quit, and a week before the fire was asked to leave, but he did not. And of the intent to defraud, the evidence was that in 1867 he called on an agent about effecting an insurance, and that in 1871 he called on him again and said he had come to renew his policy for 500*l.*, and paid 10*s.*

Held, that the above evidence was sufficient to prove the intent to injure and defraud.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by Pigott, B.

The prisoners were tried before me at the last Winter Assize for the West Riding of Yorkshire holden at Leeds on the charge of arson.

The substance of the indictment is as follows:—

First count.—That Joseph Newboult and Benjamin Holdsworth maliciously and feloniously did set fire to a shop of and belonging to the said Joseph Newboult, and then being in the possession of the said Joseph Newboult, with intent thereby to injure, against the form of the statute.

Second count was in the same form, except that the intent laid was to defraud.

The third count stated that the said Joseph Newboult and Benjamin Holdsworth unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously did set fire to divers matters and things, then being in and under a certain shop there, of and belonging to the said Joseph Newboult, and then being in the possession of the said Joseph Newboult, with intent thereby and by means thereof unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously to set fire to the said shop, and thereby to injure and defraud: and the said Joseph Newboult and Benjamin Holdsworth, by the overt acts in this count mentioned, unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously did attempt to set fire to the said building in this count mentioned, under such circumstances, that if the same had thereby been set fire to, they would have been guilty of felony against the form of the statute.

At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution, it was objected on behalf of the prisoners, that as no policy of insurance upon the premises was produced, there was no evidence from which the jury could infer an intent to injure the insurance office.

And secondly, that upon the counts of this indictment, it was not open to the jury to convict of an intent to defraud or injure the owner of the premises, inasmuch as the premises were in the indictment alleged to be "of and belonging to Joseph Newboult" himself, and must hence be taken to be his property.

I refused to stop the case, but reserved the question for this court.

The prisoner Newboult was the master and Holdsworth was the servant in the shop at Leeds-road, Bradford, where a general grocery business was carried on, and where a fire occurred on the 5th Oct. last.

The material evidence on which the counsel for the prosecution relied, to show the intent to injure or defraud, was as to the ownership of the premises as follows:—

John Hey stated that he was a trustee of the premises for the landlady, and that Joseph Newboult was under notice to leave, and should have left on the 5th Sept. last, and that the witness, a week before the day of the fire, had asked him to leave the premises, which he had not done.

And as to the other objection, evidence was given that a notice to produce a policy of insurance (effected by the prisoner Newboult on his stock) was served on him, but too late to be complied with, and I held it was insufficient on that ground.

The counsel then called a witness from the insurance office, who said, "Newboult came to me in May 1867, about effecting an insurance, and that on 30th Aug. of the present year (1871) he came again, and said he wished to renew his policy in Leeds-road for 500*l.* (the same amount), and that he then paid me 10*s.*

The stock of goods on the premises at the time of the fire was of the value of 21*l.*

Both prisoners were found guilty.

And I asked the jury if they believed that Newbolt was tenant of the premises, and, further, whether both prisoners had an intent to injure the landlady? And, also, whether they believed they had an intent to defraud the insurance company.

The jury answered that they found both intents.

The questions for this Court are whether: First, there is sufficient evidence of the existence of an insurance to support the finding by the jury of an intent to defraud the office, and, secondly, whether on these counts, it was competent for the jury to find that there was an intent to injure the owner of the premises. If either of these questions are answered in the affirmative, then the sentence which was passed is to be carried into effect, otherwise a verdict of not guilty is to be entered.

G. Pigott.

Waddy, for the prisoners.—The prisoners ought not to have been convicted, for upon this indictment it was not competent to show that the shop belonged to any other owner than Newboult. The indictment alleges that it was Newboult's shop and belonged to him. [Martin, B. The question is whether you cannot strike out the words "of and belonging to Joseph Newboult?" Is it necessary to allege in the indictment the ownership of the shop?] It is and it has always been alleged in the precedents: (2 East, P. C. 1034, c. 21, s. 11.) In Arch. Crim. Plead. 507, the form of indictment given is "a certain dwelling-house, shop, &c., of J. N., situate." The allegation is necessary for this reason, that it is no offence to set fire to one's own house or shop, unless with intent to injure or defraud any person. [Martin, B.—This indictment is under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 3, and that section says nothing about the ownership of the house, &c., set fire to, but only "whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously set fire to (inter alia) any shop with intent thereby to injure or defraud any person, shall be guilty of felony." All that is necessary is to allege and prove a crime within the words of the Act. [Cockburn, C.J.—And sect. 60 enacts that it is not necessary to allege an intent to injure or defraud any particular person. [Keating, J. It would be sufficient, you say, if it had been alleged merely that the shop was in the possession of Newboult. Lush, J.—The words "of and belonging to" would be satisfied by proof of a week's possession; they merely mean that the occupier had some interest in the shop. The indictment is consistent with some one else also being owner.] Here the ownership is alleged to be in Newboult, and it was not competent to prove ownership in anyone else. Then there was no proper evidence of the policy of insurance. [Cockburn, C.J.—There was abundant evidence of that. The evidence is that he came to the agent in 1867 about effecting an insurance, and that he came again to him in 1871, and said he wished to renew his policy for 500*l.*, and paid 10*s.*; that is an admission by him that there was a policy.]

Campbell Foster, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

By the Court.—There was clear evidence that the prisoner had committed an offence against sect. 3 of the Act. The averment in the indictment is not an averment of ownership in fee simple, which it is necessary to prove. It may be rejected as a superfluous averment. There was abundant evidence of the existence of an insurance to support the finding by the jury of an intent to defraud the office.

Conviction affirmed.

It appeared that at one o'clock on the morning of the 4th Oct. 1871 the keepers of Earl Dudley discovered a number of poachers upon the Earl's lands taking game. They were armed with stones, bludgeons, &c., and advanced upon the keepers with whom they had a desperate struggle. Ulti-

Now, under the 1st section the prisoner Curtis was a competent witness for the prisoner Payne, and there is nothing in the 3rd section which prevents him from being a witness. Since that Act, in Reg. v. Deeley (11 Cox C. C. 607) where three prisoners were jointly indicted for robbery with violence, and were given in charge to the jury, Mellor, J. allowed two of the prisoners to be called as witnesses for the other one. And in a case at the Shropshire Assizes Pigott, B. also allowed one prisoner to be called as a witness for another on a joint indictment after they were given in charge to the jury. The same course has also been followed by Lush, J. The reason for the incompetency was the ground of interest, and not of being a party to the suit or proceeding: (1 Phil. on Ev. 68, 8th edit.) In Worrall v. Jones (7 Bing. 395) Tindal, C.J. says that a party to the record would be an admissible witness if he were not interested. [MARTIN, B.—Suppose two persons jointly indicted for murder, what legal interest has one in the conviction or acquittal of the other? Was not the rule that parties to the proceeding were excluded? BRAMWELL, B.—If it was on the ground of interest, that was an objection for the benefit of the party interested which might be waived and the party called, but did anyone ever hear of such a thing being done?] It may be that the rule is qualified to the extent that a party to the immediate inquiry is not admissible. [BLACKBURN, J.—If a prisoner is competent to give evidence for a fellow prisoner, on cross-examination he may be forced to give evidence against himself.] He would be privileged from answering questions tending to criminate himself. In Taylor on Evidence, 1096, it is said that the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, which was intended to remove a doubt, has instead created one by the words "Except as hereinafter is excepted" in section 2. [BRAMWELL, B. —My brother, Cleasby B. suggests that that exception points to sect. 4. Is not the rule of construction, that where the Crown is not referred to in Acts of Parliament they do not apply to the Crown, for the Crown is the prosecutor? COCKBURN, C. J.—The words, "other proceeding," in the statute must be construed as ejusdem generis with the words preceding "suit, action," and would mean other civil proceeding. The exception in the proviso was introduced (probably in committee), ex abundanti cautelâ, and was not intended to enlarge the enactment.] The words of sect. 2 are, any "suit action or other proceeding in any court of justice, or before any person," &c.; and then, sect. 3 goes beyond civil proceedings. The learned counsel then referred to 1 Rus. on Crimes 625. In Reg. v. Smith (1 Mood. C. C. 289), the wife of one prisoner was was held inadmissible to prove an alibi for another prisoner with whom her husband was jointly indicted, on the ground that by shaking the evidence of a witness who had identified both prisoners, she would weaken the case against her husband. But in Reg. v. Moore (1 Cox. C. C. 59, Maule, J. said, of course a wife could not be examined for her husband, but for another prisoner jointly indicted with him for a burglary she might, and admitted her as a witness. And Wightman, J., so held in Reg. v. Bartlett (1 Cox C. C. 105.) The modern legislation encourages the calling of witnesses for prisoners; and to facilitate this the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 3, provides for their being bound over, and sect. 5 for the allowance of their expenses. It would be a dangerous rule to exclude co-prisoners as witnesses, as evidence might be shut out by vindictive persons procuring their committal as accomplices. [Cockburn, C.J.—This danger may be obviated by asking permission to have the prisoners tried separately, and then there would be no objection to calling one prisoner as a witness for another with whom he was jointly indicted.] It ought to be a matter of right for a prisoner to be enabled to call a joint co-prisoner as a witness. The giving of the prisoners in charge ought not to raise any difficulty, for the issue is joined when the prisoners plead: (Reg. v. Winsor, 35 L. J. 121, M. C.; 10 Cox C. C. 276.) [Blackburn, C.J.—The material thing is when the prisoners are given in charge to a jury who are to say whether they are guilty or not guilty. They are the persons who are to determine the issue as well as to hear the evidence. If one prisoner is admissible for another, he must also be admissible against him. The competency of one prisoner as a witness for another is one thing—the privilege not to answer questions tending to criminate himself is another. The refusal to answer only goes to the credit of the witness. Taylor on Evidence, 627 (note), and Reg. v. Jackson and Cracknell (6 Cox C. C., 525), were then referred to.

Streeten (Jelf with him) for the prosecution.—The witness was properly rejected. In Hawksworth v. Showler (12 M. & W. 47), Lord Abinger says: "Nothing is clearer than this, that a person cannot be a witness who is a party to the record, and affected by the determination of the issue, and that the wife of such a person is equally incapable of being a witness." And Alderson, B., said, "The rule is, that a party upon the record against whom the jury have to pronounce a verdict, cannot be a witness before that verdict is pronounced." The modern statutes have not altered that principle. The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, only applies to civil proceedings; and sect. 3 was introduced, lest it should otherwise be thought to extend to criminal proceedings. If Curtis had been allowed to be called as a witness, every word that he said must have been in his own favour as well as in favour of Payne. If a co-prisoner is admissible at all, his fellow prisoner or the prosecutor may compel him to be a witness. [Lush, J.—If he was allowed to be called, he must be cross-examined, and if he declines to answer on the ground that his answers would tend to criminate him, that might have the effect of leading to his conviction. Cockburn, C. J.—Or he might be cross-examined as to his past life, and the result might seriously injure his case. Brett, J.—Is it not a fundamental rule of the law of England that when a prisoner is on his trial, he shall not be examined or cross-examined for or against himself?]

Pritchard in reply, cited Reg. v. Stewart (1 Cox. C. C. 174.)

Cockburn, C. J.—We are all of opinion that the witness was properly rejected at the trial; and we all agree that the proviso in the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, on which the prisoners' counsel relied, was only intended to prevent the statute being supposed to contradict or alter the rule of law as it has existed from the earliest times, according to which rule a party on his trial could not be examined or cross-examined as a witness for or against himself. It is impossible that the Legislature could have intended by such a proviso to do so. And the old law of England in that respect still remains unaltered.

Conviction affirmed.

Reg. v. Ward.

Unlawful wounding—Verdict of—14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5.

To support a verdict of guilty of unlawfully wounding under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 5, the act must be done maliciously as well as unlawfully.

Prisoner, who was jealous of persons going in pursuit of wild fowl, fired a gun, while the prosecutor was on the water in his punt in pursuit of wildfowl, about 25*yds. off, to frighten and deter him from again coming into the creek for the purpose of fowling. As the prosecutor slewed his punt round he was struck by the shots from the prisoner's gun, but if he had not slewed the boat round the shot would not have struck him:*

Held, that the conviction of the prisoner for unlawfully and maliciously wounding the prosecutor under sect. 5 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, was supported by the evidence.

Case reserved for the opinion of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, by Cockburn, C. J., and directed by that Court to be argued before all the Judges.

The prisoner was tried before me at the last assizes for the county of Suffolk, on a charge of unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously wounding one William Job Chatten, with intent to do him grievous bodily harm.

The prosecutor, Chatten, and the prisoner were both fishermen, living at Aldebury, in Suffolk, and both were in the habit of going out in punts to shoot wildfowl in a creek of the river Alde.

The manner of using a punt for the purpose of shooting wildfowl is, that the gunner lies with his face downwards in the boat, extending his arms over the sides, and propelling the boat by means of a pair of short paddles, so as to avoid as much as possible being seen by the birds on the water.

On the evening of the 30th Jan. 1871 the prosecutor Chatten, was on the water in his punt in pursuit of wildfowl. Having been out some time, and finding no birds about, he determined to return, and having put his arm out was using the paddle to slew the punt round for that purpose, when he suddenly heard the report of a gun, and at the same time found himself struck by several shots in the left arm and eye, the effect of which was seriously to injure his arm, and so to damage his eye as to render its total extraction necessary a few days after.

There was no doubt that the shot by which the prosecutor was injured was fired by the prisoner. On the prosecutor calling out on being struck, and asking who had fired the shot, the prisoner who was in his punt, about twenty-five yards off, came forward and said he had fired it, adding that, if Chatten had not turned his boat round as he, prisoner, was in the act of firing, the shot would not have struck him. This being so, the question

Ife, for the prisoner.—The indictment is upon the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 18, which inter alia) that whosoever shall unlawfully iciously by any means whatsoever, wound son with intent to do grievous bodily all be guilty of felony. The jury acquitted ner of the felony, and found him guilty of lly wounding under the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19,
s. 5. The first question is, what is the meaning of "unlawfully wounding;" must it be done maliciously? It is submitted that it must. Sect. 4 of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, now repealed by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 95, after reciting that it was expedient to make further provision for the punishment of aggravated assaults, enacted that if any person shall (inter alia) unlawfully and maliciously cut, stab, or wound any person, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding three years. Sect. 5 enacts "That if upon the trial of any indictment for any felony (except murder or manslaughter), where the indictment shall allege that the defendant did cut, stab, or wound any person, the jury shall be satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the cutting, stabbing, or wounding charged in such indictment, but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged, then the jury may acquit the defendant of the felony, and find him guilty of unlawfully cutting, stabbing, or wounding, and thereupon such defendant shall be liable to be punished in the same manner as if he had been convicted upon an indictment for the misdemeanor of cutting, stabbing, or wounding." The misdemeanor of cutting, stabbing, or wounding was provided for by sect. 4, and that is an unlawful and malicious wounding. The verdict under sect. 5 must be of an unlawful wounding, and the only enactment relating to unlawfully wounding was sect. 4. [BLACKBURN, J.—I think that must be so. The dropping of the word "maliciously" in sect. 5 makes no difference.] Then, to support the finding of the jury in this case, there must be evidence of actual malice or malice in law; but there is none. The prisoner had no intention to hit the prosecutor, but only to frighten him. [LUSH, J.—What the prisoner did, did he not do from a bad motive, to frighten him off the ground? Is not that malice? KELLY, C.B.—Does maliciously mean intentionally?] It is unlawful to fire across a highway; but suppose a person on his own land sees a hare running along the adjoining highway, and, seeing no person, fires at the hare, and happens to hit a person coming along the highway? That, though an unlawful act, would not be malicious. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The prosecutor would not have been hit if the boat had not slewed round.] Suppose some boys were to make a bonfire in a field a short distance from a rick of hay, which would be an unlawful act, and the wind were to carry the sparks away and set fire to the hayrick and destroyed it. That would not be a malicious act. The case of Reg. v. Child (12 Cox C. C. 64; L. Rep. Cr. Cas. Res. 307) was then cited. In M'Pherson v. Daniels (10 B. & C. 272), Littledale, J., defined malice to be "a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse. The wrongful act here charged is the wounding." [PIGOTT, B.—I should say the wrongful act was the firing off the gun close to the man's ear.] In Reg. v. Noon (6 Cox. C. C. 139), Cresswell, J. said, "If the prisoner used the sword intending to do a serious injury, that is such evidence of malice as the law holds to be murder." So in Reg. v. Sparrow (8 Cox, C. C. 393; Bell C. C. 298), there was evidence of intention to support a count for maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm. [MELLOR, J.—The prisoner did an unlawful act, malo animo, to drive the prosecutor off the ground, which he had no right to do. In Foster's Crown Law, sect. 2, malice is defined as the offspring of a wicked, perverse, and incorrigible disposition. KELLY, C.B.—Intentional is applicable to the act done.] Here the prisoner's intention was to frighten, but not to hit the prosecutor.

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

The judges retired to consider their decision.

COCKBURN, C.J., on their return into Court, said: We have considered this case, and are all agreed that, in construing sect. 5 of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, it should be read as though the word maliciously were introduced into it. It is an essential element of a conviction under that section that the act done should have been done maliciously as well as unlawfully. With regard to the question whether in this case the facts stated amount to proof of malice or not, there is a difference of opinion among the members of the Court; twelve out of the fifteen judges are of opinion that there was proof of malice, and that the conviction was right.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by E. STEWART ROCHE and H. PEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 15 and 17, 1872.

SINNETT v. HERBERT.

Will—Charity legacies—Cy près—Fund standing in bank to trust account—Trusts unascertainable.

Testatrix by her will bequeathed her residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust to be applied "in aid of erecting or of endowing an additional church at A." Neither at the date of the testatrix's will, nor at the time of her death, was there any church answering the description of an additional church at A., either in existence or about to be erected:

Held, that "additional church" was not limited to a church added between the dates of the will and the death of the testatrix.

A bequest for the endowment of a future church is a good charitable gift; and also, having regard to the Church Building Act (43 Geo. 3, c. 108), by which testators are enabled to give not exceeding 500l. or five acres of land for church building purposes, and to the alternative power given by the will to the executors of applying the fund in aid of erecting or of endowing an additional church, 500l. of mixed personalty might be applied in building an additional church, and the whole of the pure personalty in endowing it.

An inquiry directed whether the fund or any part thereof could be laid out or employed in aid of erecting or endowing an additional church at A.

Quære, whether the doctrine of cy près applies where there has been a gift to a particular object which fails.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C. (Reported 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 778). The facts were shortly as follows: Mary Morice, spinster, by will bequeathed annuities to certain persons, and charged all and singular her real estates with the payment thereof, and subject to the annuities, she devised her real estate to the Rev. James Hughes in fee. The testatrix also bequeathed several legacies, of which there was one of 3000*l.* to F. R. Roberts and J. Sinnett, upon trust to be applied "in aid of an endowment for the Welsh church now in course of erection at Aberystwith," and the rest of her personal estate, subject to the payment of debts and legacies, she bequeathed to F. R. Roberts and J. Sinnett "upon trust to be by them applied in aid of erecting or of endowing an additional church at Aberystwith," and appointed those gentlemen her executors. The testatrix died in 1866. It was found by the chief clerk that there was not any church answering the description of an additional church at Aberystwith being erected or being about to be erected at the time of the death of the testatrix. The question was whether the gift of the residue for the purpose of endowing a church not in existence was void under 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, as an attempt to bring fresh land into mortmain. Bacon, V.C. having held that the gift of the residue was not intended to provide an endowment except in the event of a church being in course of erection at the death of the testatrix, and that the gift therefore failed, the defendant appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Jessel, Q.C.) and Hemming, for the Attorney-General, in support of the appeal, contended that a gift to erect or endow was good, and that in this case there was a clear gift to a future additional church. The law of remoteness did not apply to charities. They cited

Bristowe, Q.C., Kay, Q.C., Speed, and Fellows for the next of kin, submitted that the court would not hold a fund for an indefinite time. The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—I really do not entertain any doubt as to what is to be done in the present case. As far as I can judge from what has been stated there is a possibility of a church being built at Aberystwith, and therefore I think it very probable that we may never arrive at the application of the cy près doctrine at all. It is plain, from the authorities, that upon the true construction of the will, the bequest itself must be taken to be a for the purpose of aiding in the erecting additional church or endowing an addi- church at Aberystwith. That is the plain n of the testatrix without reference to any

I differ so far from the Vice-Chancellor, ought that she intended by the direction in l to confine her executors to a case in which hould be either an actual church erected and ng endowment, or a church in progress of a at the time of her death. As to the diffi- nat arises upon the possible remoteness of ntion being carried into effect, I think the the Attorney-General v. The Bishop of is a complete answer. In that case the int which arises here was suggested. There sum of 1000*l.* left for a good chari- purpose, namely, for the purpose of hing a bishop in the king's dominions in a. There was no bishop in America. The ing only 1000*l.* was not very likely in itself sufficient to establish a bishop. Nothing more remote or unlikely to happen within nable period than the appropriation of that that particular object. The court did not ny application of the fund according to the doctrine; it would not allow the fund to be rith immediately, but said that the fund emain in hand for a time with liberty to "because it is not known that any bishop established." But that the court would e to retain it for ever, waiting until a should be appointed is, I think, a very l proposition. I was pressed with the y which would arise in a case where the doctrine might possibly apply, as to what done if, after a very long period, the fund seem to be applicable to its purpose in of charities. Undoubtedly there is case se where, if there is anything in esse to the fund of the testator can be properly , an inquiry has been directed as to whether d can be applied in the way directed. the last of that class of cases was in which the testator wished a socialist to be established. There the court held t to be purely bad under the Statute of in. It then directed an inquiry as to what nciples of this particular socialist school order to see whether the principles, so contained anything objectionable with re- the ordinary principles of religion. I sup- ere would be the same sort of inquiry that eed in the case of Thompson v. Thompson, he testator left a fund for the appointment fessor to teach his opinions as contained in ator's printed books which nobody at that d ever read. It was therefore necessary to em, and it being found on the inquiry that as nothing contrary to morality or religion inions contained in those books, the trust was on ordered by the court to be carried out. st inquiry always is, whether the thing s pointed at can be achieved. If it can, all of cy près is at an end, and it is premature nything on the subject. The course, there- t seems to me the plain one to take upon part of this case is to direct an inquiry bers whether or not the funds which are lly given to the trustees for the purpose g in erecting a church or endowing a at Aberystwith, can be so laid out and d, or any, and what part thereof, can be so laid out and employed. Then with regard to the question as to the 500*l.*, I do not entertain any doubt about it. The case stands thus:—Supposing there is nothing in the way of the question of pure or impure personalty, the testatrix having given the whole of her residuary estate for the purpose of aiding in erecting an additional church, or in endowing an additional church, the executors and trustees would be authorised either in applying the whole in erecting a church, or in endowing a church, or such part as they thought fit in erecting, and such part as they thought fit in endowing. The way in which I distinguish this case from that of Girdlestone v. Creed is this;—In that case there was direction to lay out the money in building and endowing. That is to say, they were bound both to build and endow. It being found, however, that there was a certain quantity of impure personalty, it was held in that case that it was a gift which was entirely void.

Bristowe, Q.C.—In Girdlestone v. Creed it was not land.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It was money mixed with land.

The Solicitor-General.—Mixed personalty.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Pure personalty, but with a direction to build a church. Is that it?

Bristowe, Q.C.—I think it was all pure personalty. The testatrix bequeathed a fund for building and endowing churches. There was a previous fund, of which she was the collector.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In that case, in the first place the fund would be handed over to those persons who apparently would not be the trustees, but who would be entitled to the property on trust for building and endowing. They would be at liberty as far as they had a fund which was suitable for those purposes, to do both; and, therefore, they might employ it in a legal way, by either building or endowing at their option. Supposing it to be left to trustees, there are two things that they must do. They must both build and endow. If it went into a general fund there would arise the question, how much was to be devoted to building and how much to endowment. There was no particular direction by the testatrix as to what was to be done in either the one or the other respect. But for the saving statute, the bequest for the building and endowing of schools and churches would, upon several authorities, have been a totally void bequest, because the one bequest could not be separated from the other. Then comes a separate statute which says that you can, to the extent of 500*l.*, apply money towards the building of churches, and the court has said that that can be done. An ingenious argument has been put forward which is this: "Building and endowing" is bad because some part must be employed in building and some part in endowing, but there is a statute which says that 500*l.* may be employed in building. There is then something ascertained which you can hold, and the remainder, therefore, might well have been held good. The Vice-Chancellor being of opinion that there was an option to take one fund to build and apply the other to endowing, it might have been said, "Now I will take the 500*l.* for building (I do not want more), and I will lay out all the rest in endowing." But the difficulty remains that there is nothing in the testatrix's will which directed any such apportionment at all. The statute carries over 500*l.* of her money, but she gives the whole. The court cannot construe the trust by referring to the statute, any more than it can construe a trust by an ordinary reference to the Statute of Mortmain. The will must be looked at and construed irrespective of the statute, and when it is found that there is a trust for building and endowing, it is altogether gone. Then, that being gone, the statute must be looked at which saves 500*l.* out of the wreck, which sum can be applied towards building. But you have not brought yourself a bit nearer any intention as to how much more or how much less should be employed in building. It is not because the statute says that 500*l.* may be taken out of it, that it is to be said that the testatrix's intention was to employ only 500*l.* in building, and to leave the rest for endowing. She imposes upon the trustees a double duty. In consequence of their not being able to be separated, and saying that so much shall be applied in the discharge of one duty, and so much in the discharge of the other, it has been held, on decided cases, to apply to both. Therefore the argument which has been so ingeniously put forward on behalf of the respondents, does not touch a case in which the testatrix has said, "You may take as much of my personal estate as you like, or of my estate, including mixed and pure personalty, and may apply it in such a way as you think fit, either towards building or endowing." If there were any statute at all on the subject, it would authorise them to employ it in such a manner or according to such proportions as they thought fit. Then, the statute being brought into play, it is found that the one thing is utterly prohibited by the existing Statute of Mortmain; and, therefore, the whole scheme would have failed; but the choice being given of devoting the fund to one of two purposes, the whole will be saved for the legitimate purpose, another statute having interposed, enacting that a testatrix may give 500*l.* of a mixed fund, or give the whole mixed fund. The Court of Chancery taking care to draw out the 500*l.*, and to say that all the rest is void under the statute, and the executors being placed in possession of two funds—one of the pure personalty, and 500*l.* of mixed personalty—I do not see any reason why they are not to devote the fund in their hands to either of the two purposes to which the testatrix has directed it to be placed. Mr. Bristowe contended that this was not the way in which the intention ought to be carried into effect; but I think the true construction is that you are to place in the hands of trustees all that they may use for either of the purposes which the testatrix has mentioned. You place in their hands, therefore, all her pure personalty and so much of the mixed personalty as applies to the 500*l.*, and hand over the rest to the next-of-kin. When you have done that, they may apply the 500*l.* if they think fit, wholly in building, and the whole of the other fund, which is pure personalty, towards the other object which the testatrix had in view. Upon that point it has struck me that something might be said as to leaving it to the option of trustees (which the court always objects to very strongly) to say how much shall go to the next-of-kin and how much shall not. The court holds it to be the duty of the trustees to carry out the intentions of the testatrix as they best can. I think it would be the duty of the trustees in this case to apply the fund in the same manner as it would be the duty of trustees to do in the case of infants, when they are directed to apply it towards their maintenance in the most beneficial manner. In this case it will be the duty of the trustees to carry out the intentions of the testatrix as effectually as they can. I shall reverse the order of the Vice-Chancellor so far as it is appealed from, and declare that the sum of 500*l.* and no more shall be set apart by the trustees and executors, out of the impure personalty, towards aiding in erecting an additional church at Aberystwith, and the whole of the pure personalty towards the endowing of such additional church, subject to the inquiry hereinafter directed; and without prejudice to any question in case that inquiry should be answered in the negative. There must be reserved further consideration. It is important that it should be reserved, because then there can be a full discussion if it is found in the negative. It is possible that it may be found in the affirmative. I think I ought to add something to the inquiry. I do not see why the next of kin should be present at that inquiry, because that is really only a matter between the Attorney-General and the estate.

Bristowe, Q. C.—I presume your Lordship would not object to their attending if they chose, at their own expense.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — No. Probably the better way will be to say that the next-of kin need not be served with a summons to attend the inquiry, but to be at liberty to attend at their own expense. The costs of appeal to be costs in the cause.

MANNING v. GILL.

Criminal lunatic—Settlement to avoid forfeiture inoperative.

A person under a charge of felony previous to his trial conveyed all his real estate to his brother, reserving a life interest only, and assigned to his brother all his personal estate absolutely. He was acquitted of the charge on the ground of insanity:

Held, that the settlements were inoperative on the grounds of the lunacy of the settlor, because they were executed under a misapprehension, and because the event which they were framed to meet had not happened.

THIS was an application that a sum of money standing to the credit of the cause might be transferred to the petitioners under the following circumstances.

In 1857 Andrew Gill stabbed a man so that his life was for some time in danger, but he afterwards recovered; for this offence he was tried at the Taunton Spring Assizes of 1857, and found not guilty on the ground of insanity, and was ordered to be imprisoned during Her Majesty's pleasure.

At the time of committing this offence Andrew

Gill was entitled to certain real and personal estate under the will of his father.

On the 30th March 1857 Andrew Gill executed shortly before his trial two deeds; by the one he conveyed all his real estate to his brother Robert Gill in trust for himself (Andrew) for life, with remainder to his said brother Robert in fee, and by the other he assigned all his personal estate to his said brother Robert absolutely.

Part of the income arising from the real estate had been paid to Andrew Gill to provide him with comforts while in the Criminal Lunatic Asylum at Broadmoor, but the residue thereof, together with the income arising from the personal estate, had been accumulated.

Robert Gill, who died in March 1867, by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees in trust to be divided as therein mentioned among his three children.

In May 1869, a suit was instituted for the administration of Robert Gill's real and personal estate, and by an order made in July 1871, it was ordered that the amount of the personal estate, together with the accumulations of interest and income from the real estate which the testator, Robert Gill, held under the assignment from his brother Andrew Gill, be paid into court.

The petitioners, who were the persons interested under the will of Robert Gill, now applied that the fund in court might be transferred to them, alleging that they were absolutely entitled thereto under the deeds of the 30th March 1857, and the will of Robert Gill.

From the evidence it appeared that Andrew Gill (who was still confined as a lunatic) was a person of naturally weak intellect, but sane except when excited by anger or drink, on which occasions he would lose all control over himself, and would not be accountable for his actions. The solicitor's clerk who prepared the deeds stated that having explained to Andrew Gill that the effect of his conviction would be that his property would be forfeited to the Crown, he authorised him to prepare the deeds, and that before executing them he read them over and explained them to him, and that at the time of executing them, Andrew Gill was of sound mind, and fully knew and understood their contents and effect, and freely executed the same.

Kay, Q.C. and Freeling were for the petitioners.

Smart, for Andrew Gill's guardian.—The settlor was not of sufficiently sound mind to make this settlement, nor was the effect of it explained to him: (Phillipson v. Kerry, 9 L. T. Rep, N. S. 40; 11 W. Rep. 1034.) It was also made under the misapprehension that in case of conviction a forfeiture of his property would thereby be avoided (Birch v. Blagrave, Amb. 264; Davies v. Otty, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789; 34 L. J. 252, Ch.), whereas it would have been void as against the Crown: (Saunders v. Wharton, 11 W. Rep. 276.)

W. W. Karslake, F. Webb, and Badcock appeared for other parties interested.

Kay, Q.C, in reply. Although this settlement might have been fraudulent as against the Crown, it is binding on the parties themselves.

Shaw Jeffery, 13 Moo. P. C. C, 432, 454.
Phillpotts v. Phillpotts, 10 C. B. 85.

The settlement is neither void nor voidable.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said: It is clear, upon the evidence, that Andrew Gill, from the age of ten years, was always a person of weak intellect, and incapable of managing himself or his affairs. In 1857 he was tried for stabbing a man, and was acquitted on the ground of insanity. Previously to his trial he executed a voluntary settlement of all his property, the only motive in his mind being to prevent a forfeiture in case he was convicted. Robert Gill, in whose favour the settlement was made, never touched any of the money, as he was aware that he was merely a trustee of the property for his brother. I cannot order payment of this money under such a title as that of the petitioners. The deed under which they claim was purely voluntary and executed under a total misapprehension of the law, and, moreover, the event which it was framed to meet, viz., his conviction, never happened. The deed is inoperative, and the petition must be refused.

REG. v. GLYNNE AND OTHERS.

Bastardy—Affiliation order—Quashed on appeal—Want of corroborative evidence — Decision of quarter sessions — Res judicata — 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 16.

The adjudication of a court of quarter sessions, quashing an affiliation order after the merits of the case have been heard on appeal is final, and bars any subsequent application to justices in respect of the same cause of complaint.

The mother of a bastard child took out a summons, in obedience to which the person therein alleged to be the putative father appeared before three justices, who after hearing both parties and witnesses on either side, made an affiliation order upon the defendant, against which he appealed to quarter sessions. There the respondent and two witnesses, on her behalf, were examined and cross-examined, and at the close of her case the court decided that no sufficient corroborative evidence had been given to support her testimony, and, therefore, quashed the order. She afterwards applied to justices and obtained another summons to the defendant, but when the case was about to be heard his counsel submitted that it was res judicata. The justices agreed in thinking that the decision of the quarter sessions was conclusive, and refused to hear the case.

Held, that they were right.

RULE calling on certain justices of Flintshire, and William Smith, to show cause why the justices, or any two or more of them, should not adjudicate upon a summons dated the 5th May 1871, and issued on the application of Louisa Jackson, alleging William Smith to be the putative father of a bastard child born of her body.

The facts contained in affidavits were as follows: On the 9th Jan. 1871, Louisa Jackson was delivered of a bastard child. She took out an affiliation summons against William Smith, who appeared in pursuance thereof before three justices for the county of Flint, sitting at Hawarden, on the 9th Feb.

Evidence was given by and on behalf of the mother and the alleged putative father; and the justices made an order upon Smith for the payment of half-a-crown a week for the support of the child, together with costs. He appealed to the quarter sessions holden at Mold.

On the 8th April the appeal was heard, and after the respondent and two witnesses called for her had been examined and cross-examined, counsel for the appellant submitted that there was not sufficient corroborative evidence to comply with the provisions of 8 Vict. c. 10, s. 6.

The justices consulted together, and the chairman then said: "The opinion I am about to give is shared in by a majority—a large majority—of the magistrates, which of course is of great importance in a case of this kind. We are now not here to say whether the magistrates at Hawarden were right or wrong, as they had a very different class of evidence to deal with. But what we have to consider is, whether the evidence of the respondent is corroborated, with regard to the main issue, in any material point? A large majority of us are of opinion it is not, and therefore we do not call upon Mr. Smith to reply; the order is consequently quashed. We are bound to take the case as it is presented to us, and that is our decision." The appellant was ready with witnesses to be examined if necessary.

After the determination of the appeal, the respondent obtained a new summons against the appellant in respect of the same subject matter of complaint.

On the 25th May the case came on again for hearing, when the counsel for the appellant objected that it was res judicata, and the justices decided that the quashing of the first order by the quarter sessions was final, and refused to hear the case.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C.) and McIntyre showed cause.—The finding of the court of quarter sessions was conclusive, and no subsequent application to other justices could be made. That court must "hear and determine" according to law: (8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, s. 6.) (a) In Rex v. Tenant (2 Ld. Raym. 1423) the defendant, upon whom an order in bastardy had been made, appealed to the quarter sessions; and the justices at the quarter sessions, upon full hearing of the merits, discharged the order of the two justices, but bound the defendant by recognisance to appear at the next quarter sessions, as it was supposed under an apprehension that better evidence might be procured against him. After this the same two justices made a new order upon the defendant for keeping the bastard child, which last order being removed into the Court of Queen's Bench was there quashed, for as it was said the two justices "having made an order upon the defendant to keep the child, as reputed father, and that order being regularly discharged upon an appeal, upon hearing the merits, the defendant was legally acquitted, and cannot be drawn in question again for the same fact." In Reg. v. Jenkins (Cas. temp. Hard. 301), where two justices had made an order in bastardy, adjudging that the man against whom the application had been made was not the putative father of the child, and acquitted him of the same, Lord Hardwick held that they had no power to make such an order, and said: "If this matter had been examined at the sessions, as it may be; originally by virtue of stat. 3, Car. 1, c. 4, s. 16, it was said that they might have made an order to discharge him, which would be a good order and final; and that therefore by parity of reason the two justices may do the same, for it was said that the words of the statute, which gives sessions jurisdiction, are referring to the manner of proceeding by two justices, and this objection did at first appear to have some weight, for it was true it was determined in Slater's Case (Cro. Car. 470) and Pridgeon's Case (Cro. Car. 341, 350) that two justices or a second sessions could not reverse an order of discharge made before at the sessions." And after also citing Rex v. Tenant (2 Str. 716; 2 Ld. Raym. 1423): "But none of these cases come up to this, for in all of them the order which was taken to be final was made by the sessions, which is the last resort in all these cases, and therefore it was a right resolution; but when their opinion was given, it should not be drawn over again by the same court or by two justices. It would be absurd, when two justices have power by law to make original orders, and the sessions have power upon appeal from those orders, as well as by original application, that two justices might alter their orders when those very orders of alteration may be reversed by the quarter sessions, and it is reasonable that the order of sessions should be conclusive" (p. 302). There are undoubtedly numerous cases it which it has been held that the decision of justices at petty sessions is not conclusive, e.g., Reg. v. Bridgman (15 L. J. 44, M. C.), but they do not apply. In Reg. v. The Justices of Buckinghamshire (18 L. J. 114, M. C.) an application for an affiliation order was heard and dismissed. The mother of the bastard child having removed to another county, made a fresh application at a petty sessions there. Wightman, J. (for Erle, C. J.) says: "A former decision upon the merits in favour of the putative father was an answer to the application, provided it was made out by evidence. This evidence the petty sessions were bound to hear and decide on. It is clear that they had jurisdiction to dismiss the application if the answer was proved; it follows that they had jurisdiction to grant the application and make the order if the proof in their estimation failed" (p. 116). [BLACKBURN, J.

(a) By 8 Vict. c. 10, s. 6, after reciting that by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 3, it is enacted that where any woman shall apply to the justices at a petty session for an order upon the person whom she shall allege to be the father of her bastard child, such justices shall hear the evidence of such woman, and such other evidence as she may produce, and shall also hear any evidence tendered by or on behalf of the person alleged to be the father; and if the evidence of the said mother be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to the satisfaction of the said justices, they may make such order as is therein set forth; and reciting that power is thereby [s. 4] given to the putative father to appeal to the general quarter sessions of the peace against such order, but it is not therein set forth what evidence the said general quarter sessions may hear at the trial of such appeal and doubts have been raised as to whether the said mother can be heard by the said court of quarter sessions; it is enacted that on the trial of any such appeal before any court of quarter sessions the justices therein assembled . . . shall hear the evidence of the said mother, and such other evidence as she may produce, and any evidence tendered on behalf of the appellant, and proceed to hear and determine the said appeal in other respects, according to law, but shall not confirm the order so appealed against unless the evidence of the said mother shall have been corroborated in some material particulars by other testimony to the satisfaction of the said justices in quarter sessions assembled.

All the reasons adduced to show he dismissal by justices at petty sessions is nclusive tend to prove that the decision of ırt of quarter sessions is so. In none of the ed cases on the subject, from the earliest to ıost recent of them, does it appear that an ation has ever been made after an adjudica- ıt the quarter sessions to justices in petty ns. [BLACKBURN, J.—There was ind of nonsuit; the finding of the suit ated to a verdict. It was like a case in a ıal court, where the prosecutor fails to give ıce and the prisoner is acquitted.] The thought there was a lack of corroborative ıce, that does not conclude the merits. In . Harrington (12 W. R. 420) Cockburn, C.J. "I am disposed to agree with the view n out by the judgment of the court in Reg. v. m (14 Q. B. 74), that where an application of ind has been dismissed on the ground of of corroborative evidence required by the e, that is not a decision upon the merits, but ther in the character of a nonsuit." And leg. v. Gaunt (L. Rep. 2 Q. B., at p. where Blackburn, J. remarks: "in Reg. arrington the Chief Justice and I both, ık, said that the previous inquiry was no ıte bar, although the matter had been fully ; but that the justices on a second inquiry to attach so much weight to the previous on as to make it in an ordinary case practi- conclusive." It must be remembered that oman cannot appeal to quarter sessions, but an has the advantage of being able to do so, f bringing the order up whither, perhaps, she t take her witnesses, either because she cannot defray their expenses, or because they may be ill or dead when the appeal is tried. That court is restricted by the same rules in sect. 8 of 8&9 Vict. c. 10 as the petty sessions are, therefore the dismissal of an application by either tribunal has a like effect. The case may have been fully heard at one petty sessions and dismissed, but it has been decided that the applicant may renew her complaint. Yet if the argument for the defendant is to prevail, it will follow that the quarter sessions may do perhaps on less evidence that which the justices below cannot, viz., bar any further proceedings by the mother. He cited

Reg. v. Brisby, 18 L. J. 157, M. C.; 2 C. & K. 962;

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the rule must be discharged, and (as there were no grounds for this application) with costs. The old law, which seemed to be fairly well established by a number of cases prior to Reg. v. Jenkins (Cas. temp. Hard. 301), was, that where an order had been applied for at quarter sessions (I am not speaking of applications to justices out of sessions), and the matter had been adjudicated upon, that decision finally bound the parties, and there could be no new trial, as the adjudication was that of a final court; for interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litis. The judgment delivered in Reg. v. Tenant (2 Ld. Raym. 1423; 2 Str. 716) amounts to a conclusive decision on that very question. There, quarter sessions had decided the case on the merits, and whether that makes a difference is another point to consider. Then in Rex v. Jenkins (sup.) an application had been made to justices out of sessions, and they had refused it, but from the terms of the order it appears that they assumed a power to render the defendant free for ever; and on that the decision of Lord Hardwicke, that where the matter was before magistrates not in quarter sessions the judgment was not final, proceeded. But Lord Hardwicke, so far from overruling the cases he cites from Ventris and Croke, and Reg. v. Tenant (sup.), expressly recognises them, and says, although in quarter sessions an order is final, yet when the case is laid before the justices out of sessions, it is but in the nature of an application for an order, and may be renewed from time to time. Whether that reasoning is sound or not, it is clear he does make that distinction, and his ruling was again confirmed in Reg. v. Machen (14 Q. B. 74, 18 L. J. 213, M. C.), and that again in Reg. v. Gaunt (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 466); and it is now settled in this court as far as it can be that the application to justices out of sessions dismissed by them is not a bar to a subsequent application. In such a case as Reg. v. Gaunt (sup.), in which it appeared that an order adjudging a man to be the putative father of a bastard child had been obtained on evidence given before the justices by persons subsequently convicted of perjury in giving such testimony, the order was held not to be final, expressly on the ground that, as the former order was shown to have been made on false testimony, much weight ought not to be attached to the former order, and to the opinion I there expressed I adhere. The judgment was solely on the ground that the justices had jurisdiction; but although the order seemed perfectly conclusive, yet when it was shown to have been granted on the evidence of perjured witnesses, they should not be concluded by it. Then the same thing, although not so clearly expressed, appears in Reg. v. Harrington (sup.). If the former order were obtained on some slip, too, it would have less weight than if on formal hearing and proper evidence. And I apprehend that is all the Chief Justice said, viz., that the hearing was not on the merits; simply that the former decision was given on evidence that was not so strong, would not be sufficient to prevent its being treated as a practical estoppel, so as to be conclusive. I apprehend that when the quarter sessions have decided on the merits, then, according to all the authorities, the decision of quarter sessions would be a final bar—if it was on the real actual merits, i.e., on the facts, it would decide the matter for ever (not so if it rested on a matter of form, which would not be merits; it is, however, unnecessary to decide that). But when the quarter sessions entered upon this case and heard it, whether it was that the evidence offered in corroboration did not satisfy them, or that the woman did not produce any evidence of corroboration, or the evidence was otherwise deficient, their decision, which was practically a verdict, was as much on the merits as a verdict of acquittal in a criminal court. Therefore I think the order of the quarter sessions final. I know of no case to the contrary, and there is the very strong ground of convenience for saying that it is so, for I think that where the parties have gone before two justices, and there is no appeal, and they have decided, it may well be said they might go before other two justices. But where the case is before the quarter sessions on appeal, the first decision having been in favour of the woman, it is still a rehearing before the superior tribunal, and it would be very inconvenient that where the appellate tribunal have heard the case on the merits it should be capable of being re-opened before two justices, from whom there would be an appeal to the same quarter sessions. That having been the construction adopted from the time of Lord Hardwicke, I see no reason to deviate from it, and, consequently, I am of opinion that the justices have acted rightly, and this rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The law, as it was, is accurately stated in Nolan on the Poor Laws, vol. 2, p. 315—"An order of filiation was made by two justices, and afterwards discharged by the sessions upon appeal, after the merits were fully heard; neither two justices, nor a subsequent sessions, can make a new order for this matter against the same person, for being legally acquitted, he cannot be drawn in question again for the same fault. And it would be absurd that when two justices have power by law to make original orders, and when the sessions have power upon appeal from those orders, as well as by original application, that two justices should have power to alter their orders, when those very orders of alteration might be reversed by the sessions." That was the state of the law formerly. Then came the statute of Victoria, and now we must look at sect. 6 of 8 Vict. c. 10, which declares what shall be done at the hearing of an appeal at quarter sessions, and it is necessary to determine what is a hearing on the merits. Now, the words of the section prescribe that the justices on an appeal at quarter sessions "shall hear the evidence of the mother, and such other evidence as she may produce, and any evidence tendered on behalf of the appellant, and proceed to hear and determine the said appeal in other respects according to law, but shall not confirm the order so appealed against unless the evidence of the said mother shall have been corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to the satisfaction of the said justices in quarter sessions assembled." I think that the Attorney-General rightly stated the effect of that qualification to be that they were to proceed at quarter sessions as before the justices below, but that they should not confirm the order unless corroborative testimony to the satisfaction of the court were adduced. I quite agree with my brother Blackburn, who said that on the appeal against the order either party may go into evidence, and if he fails to produce sufficient corroborative evidence, the magistrates are the judges, and, when they have heard the general merits of the case, and such other corroborative testimony as has been offered, if any be offered, then I think it is to all intents and purposes a hearing on the merits. In every case cited to the contrary it appears that the judgment was not that of quarter but of the petty sessions, which is a plain ground of distinction between those cases and the present. When rightly considered, therefore, I think those cases were correctly decided. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the decision of the quarter sessions quashing the affiliation order was final, and that the matter could not be again investigated by the justices against whom this rule was obtained.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Neither party was concluded by the decision of the petty sessions. If they decline to make an order the woman cannot appeal, and therefore it has, I think, been rightly held that she is entitled to renew her application. If on the other hand an order is made, the man adjudged to be the putative father of the bastard child has a right to go to quarter sessions. Then it is both reasonable and convenient to suppose that the decision of the quarter sessions, being a court of appeal, must be binding on the parties. If Mr. Merewether's argument were to prevail, the woman might now go before the very same magistrates who made the order, with the very same evidence she advanced at quarter sessions, and it would be competent for them to come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the latter court, and so, in effect, to overrule the decision of the superior tribunal. It is impossible that that could be the intention of the Legislature in framing the statute, and I think the judgment of the court of appeal was final and binding. If there had been no authority on the matter I should have come to the same conclusion. But this will not conflict with the other cases; it is in accordance with them. The adjudication of the quarter sessions was a decision on the merits. As to that point, I have never had a moment's hesitation in forming my opinion. It was a judicial conclusion deliberately arrived at in this matter on evidence, and on the very most important point in the case.

HANNEN, J.—As I did not hear the whole of the arguments, I refrain from giving any opinion.

the conviction was proper; that this claim by the appellant did not oust the justices' tion; and that there could not be a legal for such a custom.

a case stated by three of Her Majesty's of the peace in and for the parts of n the County of Lincoln under the Statute ict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining on of the court on questions of law which ereinafter stated.

etty sessions holden at the justice room ton, in and for the division of Winterton d parts, on the 16th June last, an informa- complaint preferred by Joseph Wills, of n, aforesaid, superintendent of police er called the respondent), against James of Winteringham, in the said parts, hereinafter called the appellant), under the Act of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, charging he the said James Simpson on the last at the parish of Winterton, in parts, unlawfully and wilfully did ob- ie free passage of a certain public ere situate by then and there placing a on, contrary to the form of the statute ase made and provided, was heard and d, the said parties being then present. n such hearing the appellant was duly of the said offence, and adjudged for his ce to forfeit and pay the sum of 1*s.*, to nd applied according to law, and also to said respondent the sum of 10*s.* 6*d.* for in that behalf. And if the said several e not paid forthwith, it was ordered that be levied by distress and sale of the goods ls of the said appellant, and in default it distress the said appellant was adjudged prisoned in the House of Correction at the said parts, and there be kept to hard the space of fourteen days, unless the al sums and all costs and charges of the ss and of the commitment and convey- said appellant to the said House of Cor- ould be sooner paid.

ereas the said appellant, being dissatis- this determination, upon the hearing of information and complaint, as being in point of law, had, pursuant to sect. 2 d statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43) duly writing to have stated and signed a case rth the facts and the grounds of such tion as aforesaid for the opinion of this hath duly entered into a recognisance d by the statute in that behalf;

The said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute stated and signed the following case :—

Upon the hearing of the information and complaint it was proved, on the part of the respondent, that on the 9th May last the appellant had erected a stall on the public footpath, by the side of the public carriage way, in the parish of Winterton, upon which he had ginger-beer, biscuits, and other kinds of confectionery for the purpose of sale to the servants attending the statute sessions; and that such stall was supported by tressels which stood on the raised path made and used for foot passengers, and separated from the carriage way by a channel or gutter by which the water was carried down the street. The top of the stall projected about three feet over the footpath, and the path was obstructed by the tressels on which the stall stood, and also by the top of the stall which projected over it, so that passengers on the footpath were unable to pass along freely, and several of them had to leave the footpath and go on the carriage road. The distance between the stall and the buildings in the street was not more than three feet.

The 9th May, the day on which the alleged obstruction took place, was the day of holding the annual statute sessions at Winterton for hiring servants, and a large number of persons were assembled. The statute sessions are held annually at Winterton a few days prior to the 13th May. The day for holding such statute sessions was formerly fixed by the chief constable, and since the office of chief constable was abolished, the local board for the parish of Winterton have fixed the day on which the statute sessions is annually held. The statute sessions for hiring servants is of great antiquity, and was accustomed to be held when the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 4, was passed: (See sect. 48 of that statute.)

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the statute sessions was a fair, and it was proved that it had been regularly held at Winterton for more than twenty years; and that during the period of twenty years stalls had been erected on the footpath on the statute or fair day without interruption; and that was a sufficient answer to the information for obstructing the footpath. In support of this proposition, the appellant's attorney quoted the cases of R. v. Smith (4 Esp. 109) and Elwood v. Bullock (13 L. J. 330, Q. B.).

It was also objected on the part of the appellant that as he claimed a bonâ fide right to do the act complained of, the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted. In support of this proposition, the appellant's attorney quoted the case of R. v. Cross (3 Camp. 224); R. v. Ward (4 A. & Ell. 405); (see Arnold v. Blaker, L Rep. 6 Q. B. 436).

The justices, however, being of opinion that the said statute sessions was not a fair, as contended by the appellant, and that no bonâ fide claim of right had been shown on his part, overruled the said objection.

The appellant then called several witnesses, who proved that the said statute sessions had been held at Winterton regularly for nearly fifty years; that at such statute sessions it had been the custom to have stalls on the highway; that the appellant's stall had been fixed where it stood by the authority of two persons appointed by the Winterton Local Board to arrange the stalls as well as they could for the convenience of the public; and that there was 17ft. 3in. of the carriage way open to the public after the stalls were fixed, in addition to the space between the stalls and the buildings.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that even if there were a custom to erect a stall on the highway on the Winterton statute day, such custom was not good, unless sufficient space was left for the public to pass; and quoted the cases of Elwood v. Bullock (13 L. J. 330, Q.B.), and Goring v. Barfield (11 L. T. Rep. N. S., C. P. 270.)

The justices being of opinion that the said statute sessions was not a fair or market within the meaning of the case quoted by the appellant's attorney, and that the stall erected by the appellant on the footpath was an obstruction to the highway within the meaning of the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 72) convicted the appellant. The questions of law arising out of the above statement are –

Whether under the circumstances the claim made by the appellant was sufficient to oust the justices' jurisdiction in the matter of the said information, and if not, whether the said conviction was legally and properly made by the said justices.

Cave (with Field, Q.C.) for the appellant, contended that as this was a legal custom, and it ought to have been inferred by the justices to have existed from time immemorial, the justices should have given effect to the claim of right. The right presumption was that the highway had been dedicated to the public, subject to the placing of these booths during the statute sessions.

Elwood v. Bullock, 6 Q. B. 383.

R. v. Smith, 4 Esp. 11.

The respondent did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—BLACKBURN, J. delivered the judgment of the court (Blackburn and Quain, JJ.). We think this is not a case in which a claim of right could be set up by the appellant. In the case of a regular market or fair for the sale of goods, there may be a valid right of persons to erect stalls in the market place or street. But these statute sessions are not on the same footing as a fair for the sale of commodities. The origin of the statute fairs was that the justices first fixed the rate of wages, and then notice was given that all persons might attend, and hire themselves according to those rates. But there was no greater reason for saying that persons on those occasions could set up stalls and obstruct the highway than that they could do so on the occasion of holding assizes or quarter sessions. We think there could not be a legal origin for such a right, and the conviction was therefore proper.

Judgment for respondent.

REG. v. THE LORDS OF THE TREASURY; Ex parte THE JUSTICES OF LANCASHIRE.

Mandamus—Costs of prosecutions—Statutory obligation of Lords of the Treasury.

By 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, ss 22 & 23, an order for the payment of costs of prosecutions may be made by the courts before which they are tried. By sect. 24 the order for payment is to be made by the officer of the court upon the Treasurer of the county, who is thereby authorised and required upon sight of every such order forthwith to pay the money in such order mentioned, and shall be allowed the same in his accounts. By sect. 26 the justices at quarter sessions were to make regulations as to costs.

By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, ss. 4 & 5, the power of quarter sessions to regulate costs of prosecutions was transferred to the Secretary of State.

By the Annual Appropriation Acts since 1835 there has been a grant of a gross sum each year for charges formerly paid out of county rates.

By 29 & 30 Vict. c. 39, s. 14, when any sum shall have been granted to her Majesty by an Act of Parliament to defray expenses for any specific public services, it shall be lawful for her Majesty from time to time, by her royal order, under the royal sign manual, countersigned by the Treasury, to authorise and require the Treasury to issue, out of the credits to be granted to them on the Exchequer accounts, the sums which may be required from time to time to defray such expenses, not exceeding the amount of the sums so voted or granted.

The accounts of costs of prosecutions in the county of Lancaster, after having been duly taxed by the proper officers, and paid out of the county rate, were re-taxed by officers of the Treasury, and part of them were disallowed. The justices of the county obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to compel the Lords of the Treasury to pay the disallowed balance to their treasurer.

Held that the Lords of the Treasury had no right to tax these costs after they had been allowed by the proper officers; but that this court had no jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to compel the Lords of the Treasury to pay the balance.

Manisty, Q.C., had obtained a rule nisi, calling upon the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to issue a Treasury minute on authority to the paymaster of civil contingencies, or other proper officer, directing and authorising him to pay, or cause to be paid, to Henry Alison, the treasurer of the county palatine of Lancaster, the sums specified and claimed in affidavits upon which the rule was moved.

It appeared from the affidavits of the deputy clerks of the peace, and the treasurer of the said county, that during the half year ending the 31st Dec. 1870, the costs of all prosecutions in the said county were, upon the charges made by the respective prosecutors in their bills of costs, duly taxed by the proper officers in the county, and under the direction of the courts before which the respective cases were tried. Orders of court in the usual form for the payment of sums expended for these prosecutions at assizes and quarter sessions, including adjudications under the Criminal Justice and the Juvenile Offenders Acts, were duly presented to the county treasurer, who paid the amounts directed by the said orders out of the rates of the said county. The accounts of these payments, amounting to 6747*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, with all receipts, documents, certificates, and vouchers, relating thereto, were transmitted to the Lords of the Treasury on the 26th Jan. 1871. On the 7th Sept. 1871, the sum of 6646*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* was paid to the county treasurer by the Lords of the Treasury; the balance between these two amounts was taxed off, and disallowed by the Board of Examiners of Criminal Law Accounts; and although applications were made by the clerks of the peace, both by letter and in person, the Lords of the Treasury refused to pay this balance, or any part of it, to the County Treasurer. It was stated upon affidavit that it was believed the amount granted by the Appropriation Act 1870 to defray the charges for prosecutions formerly paid out of the county rates, and for other like charges, had not been entirely expended, but the Lords of the Treasury had in their hands a sufficient amount of the said sum to defray the balance claimed on behalf of the county of Lancaster.

The amounts taxed off by the examiners consisted of charges for certificates of previous convictions in cases of acquittal or confession of guilt; of counsel's fee for settling indictment in a perjury case, ordered by Cleasby, B.: of counsel's fees for consultation; of the costs of second indictments not mentioned in the calendars; of the costs of trials of prisoners whose names did not appear in the calendars; and of travelling and other expenses of witnesses, disallowed for various reasons.

The Solicitor-General (Jessel, Q. C.), Brown, Q. C., and Archibald, on behalf of the Lords of the Treasury, showed cause.—This is a case in which a mandamus will not lie. Where the Legislature has constituted the Lords of the Treasury as individuals, to be mere trustees for persons entitled to money specifically granted, the Lords of the Treasury are subject to the jurisdiction of the courts, but in no case can a court of justice interfere with ministers of the Crown acting in that capacity. If a mandamus could apply to a matter of this kind, the management of the public funds would be transferred from the ministers of the Crown to this court. First, therefore, this grant is made to the Lords of the Treasury, as servants of the Crown, and they are not subject to a court of law concerning it; secondly, even if a mandamus to the Lords of the Treasury were within this court's jurisdiction, there is no statutory obligation upon them to pay the sums here claimed. The rule asks to compel the issue of a Treasury minute, i.e., to interfere with the executive management of the Treasury Office. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The minute is only the means for obtaining payment; if there is a duty to pay, it is proper to ask for the performance of a preliminary step.] But there is no duty to pay; the statutory provision relied upon is that contained in schedule B of the Appropriation Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 89.) "Part 7. Civil Services. Class iii. Schedule of sums granted to defray the charges of the several Civil Services herein particularly mentioned, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st March, 1872, viz.:" .... "No. 2. For prosecution at assizes and quarter sessions in England, formerly paid out of county rates, including adjuditions under the Criminal Justice and the Juvenile Offenders Acts, sheriff's expenses, salaries to clerks of assize and other officers, and for compensation to clerks of the peace under the Criminal Justice Acts, and other expenses of the same class, 201,173*l*." This Act is passed annually with the object of restraining the servants of the Crown from expending the sums voted upon other objects than those specified, but does not impose any duty to pay the whole of the amounts. Indeed the amounts are only estimates for the future, and as appears from the preamble to the Act the total is granted to Her Majesty towards making good the supply. The title is "An Act to apply a sum out of the consolidated fund to the service of the year ending 31st March, 1872, and to appropriate the supplies granted in this session of Parliament." To appropriate does not mean to set aside the whole sum specified for particular payments, but to limit its expenditure, or so much of it as is necessary, to those payments only. [COCKBURN, C. J.—When the expenditure is duly incurred for the purpose specified, surely the Appropriation Act was intended to provide that the expenditure should be defrayed out of this sum.] All that the Act says is—the Crown shall not employ this sum for another purpose. It is not by this Act, but by resolution of the House of Commons, that this money gets to the hands of the Lords of the Treasury: (Exchequer and Audit Departments Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 39) s. 14). Thirdly, assuming the Treasury to be subject to the jurisdiction, and the words of the Act to create an obligation to pay the whole sum granted to the objects mentioned, there must be a discretion inherent to the grant of a sum in gross, belonging to the Ministers of the Crown, who have the disposal of it. Mandamus will not lie against a person upon a matter concerning which he may exercise a discretion. [BLACKBURN, J.—Not so: Where a discretion is given by statute we can compel its exercise. Here, as the Treasury, by making no answer to the affidavits, refuse to enter upon the merits of the claim, we must assume that they have plenty of money to discharge all claims which are made upon them.] The Board of Examiners of Criminal Law Accounts was created by the Treasury in the year 1857, and a salary has been annually granted to the members, by resolution of the House of Commons. For fifteen years therefore, the practice of taxing these costs has obtained, and the estimates have been made upon the results of the practice; if the amounts claimed by the counties were paid in full, the grant in the Appropriation Act would not be sufficient. The first reported case of a mandamus against the Lords of the Treasury was in the year 1855, in the matter of Wm. Carmichael Smyth (4 A. & E. 286). There the rule for a mandamus was made absolute, but it was so made expressly upon the ground that the Lords of the Treasury had admitted that the money for paying the amount asked for was in their hands, having been paid to them under an Act of Parliament for the use of Mr. Smyth. There was no appeal from such a decision of this court at that time, but it appears in the argument of a later case, viz., Rex v. Lords of the Treasury, Ex parte Hand (6 N. & M. 512), that the decision would have been questioned in a court of error, had the forms of law permitted. Here the grounds of that case do not exist. [COCKBURN, C. J.—In that case, as in this, the money was voted in other sums.] The provision then in force for regulating payments by the Treasury was 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 13, which has been repealed by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 39, s. 46. Coleridge, J., who took part in the Smyth case, made some remarks concerning it in the case of the Baron de Bode (6 Dowl. 792), and called attention to the particular facts which were expressly the reason for granting the rule. He also calls attention to three other cases reported in the same volume, as being consistent with the first, although in all of them the mandamus was not allowed to issue. They were Re Hand (4 A. & E. 984); Re Smyth (p. 976); Ex parte Ricketts (p. 999.) More lately, application was made by way of mandamus to recover an apportionment of the annuity granted to Queen Adelaide, the widow of William IV.; but although Lord Campbell is reported (16 Q. B. 361) to have thought the application for a mandamus regular, that opinion cannot be taken as a judicial decision, because the Attorney-General expressly waived all objection to the form of the remedy. Moreover, at all events, it is no authority for this case, for Lord Campbell based his opinion upon the sect. 13 of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, which has been since repealed. The last application of this kind for a mandamus was made against the East India Company to obtain alleged arrears of pay: (Ex parte Napier, 18 Q.B. 692.) All the previous cases were there reviewed by Lord Campbell, and the court refused the rule. In the argument of Ellis v. Earl Grey (6 Sim. 220), a case in the Exchequer, not reported, Oldham v. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, was mentioned, in which the assignee of a pension filed a bill to compel the Lords of the Treasury to pay him a new pension which had been granted by the king in lieu of the assigned pension which had been revoked. Graham, B., who delivered the judgment of the court, said, "This bill proceeds on the ground of the fundamental jurisdiction of the court over the consolidated fund; and the purpose of the bill is to call on the court to dispose of the money which has been placed by Parliament at the disposal of the king himself. The jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer extends only to the reaching the moneys which come into the Treasury, while they are in transitu; but after Parliament has disposed of them, and they have reached their destination, the jurisdiction of the barons ceases; and here the king alone can order the payment of the money. The money is granted to the king, his assessors and assigns, and the king himself must be sued by petition of right, if this money is to be got at." There are several American authorities to the same effect, and they may be taken as of greater weight against the jurisdiction here claimed than the English cases, for the ministers in that country occupy positions of more direct and independent power than the heads of departments here. Brashear v. Mason (6 Howard's Rep. Sup. Ct. U. S. 92) was a rule for a mandamus to compel the United States Secretary of the Navy to hand over arrears of pay to an officer of the Texan navy, alleged to have accrued after the annexation of Texas. Nelson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court said at p. 100, "The Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. (Art. 1, s. 9.) And it is declared by Act of Congress (3 Stats. at Large, p. 689, s. 3), that all moneys appropriated for the use of the war and navy departments shall be drawn from the Treasury by warrants of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the requisitions of the secretaries of these departments, countersigned by the second comptroller. And by the Act of 1817 (3 Stats. at Large, p. 367, ss. 8, 9), it was made the duty of the comptrollers to countersign the warrants only in cases when they shall be warranted by law. And all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the treasurer shall specify the particular appropriations to which the same shall be charged; and the moneys paid by virtue of such warrants shall in conformity therewith, be charged to such appropriations in the books kept by the comptrollers; and the sums appropriated for each branch of expenditure in the several departments shall be solely applied to the objects for which they are respectively appropriated, and no others: (2 Stats. at Large, p. 535, s. 1.) In the case of Mrs. Decatur v. Paulding (14 Peters, 497) it was held by this court that a mandamus would not lie from the circuit court of this district to the Secretary of the Navy to compel him to pay to the plaintiff a sum of money claimed to be due to her as a pension under a resolution of Congress. There was no question as to the amount due, if the plaintiff was properly entitled to the pension; and it was made to appear in that case affirmatively on the application that the pension fund was ample to satisfy the claim. The fund also was under the control of the secretary, and the moneys payable on his own warrant. Still the court refused to inquire into the merits of the claim of Mrs. D. to the pension, or to determine whether it was rightfully withheld or not by the secretary on the ground that the court below had no jurisdiction over the case, and therefore the question not properly before this court on the writ of error. The court say that the duty required of the secretary by the resolution was to be performed by him as the head of one of the executive departments of the Government in the ordinary discharge of his official duties; that in general such duties, whether imposed by Act of Congress or by resolution, are not mere ministerial duties; that the head of an executive department of the Government, in the administration of the various and important concerns of his office, is continually required to exercise judgment and discretion; and that the court could not by mandamus act directly upon the officer, and guide and control his judgment and discretion in matters committed to his care in the ordinary discharge of his official duties. The court distinguish the case from Kendall v. The United States (12 Peters, 524), where there was a mandamus to enforce the performance of a mere ministerial act, not involving on the part of the officer the exercise of any judgment or discretion. The principle of the case of Mrs. Decatur is decisive of the present one. The facts here are much stronger to illustrate the inconvenience and unfitness of the remedy. Besides, the duty of inquiring into and ascertaining the rate of compensation that may be due to the officers under the laws of Congress, no payment can be made unless there has been an appropriation for the purpose. And if made it may have become already exhausted, or prior requisitions may have been issued sufficient to exhaust it. The secretary is obliged to inquire into the condition of the fund, and the claims already charged upon it, in order to ascertain if there is money enough to pay all the accruing demands, and, if not enough, how it shall be apportioned among the parties entitled to it. These are important duties, calling for the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the officer, and in which the general creditors of the Government, to the payment of whose demands the particular fund is applicable, are interested as well as the Government itself. At most the secretary is but a trustee of the fund for the benefit of all those who have claims chargeable upon it; and, like other trustees, is bound to administer it with a view to the rights and interests of all concerned. It will not do to say that the result of the proceeding by mandamus would show the title of the relator to his pay, the amount, and whether there were any moneys in the Treasury applicable to the demand; for upon this ground, any creditor of the Government would be enabled to enforce his claim against it, through the head of the proper department, by means of this writ; and the proceeding by mandamus would become as common in the enforcement of demands upon the Government as the action of assumpsit to enforce like demands against individuals." The first important Act of Parliament relating to the payment of taxation of the costs of prosecutions was 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, which provided by sects. 22 and 23 for an order by the court for payment of expenses of prosecutions. By sect. 24 the order for payment was to be made out by the officer upon the treasurer of the county "who is hereby authorised and required, upon sight of every such order, forthwith to pay to the person named therein, or to anyone duly authorised to receive the same on his or her behalf, the money in such order mentioned, and shall be allowed the same in his accounts." By sect. 26 the justices at quarter sessions were to make regulations as to costs and expenses of prosecutions. Each county continued to make regulations for its own costs until 1851, when by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 4, the power of quarter sessions to regulate costs was repealed, and by sect. 5, a Secretary of State may make regulations instead.

Manisty, Q. C. and Gorst supported the rule.—No answer being made on behalf of the Treasury to the affidavits upon which the rule nisi was granted, it must be assumed that there are funds in the management of the Lords of the Treasury sufficient to satisfy all these demands. It is admitted that no remedy except mandamus exists, by which the justices of counties can recover from the Treasury the balance of these costs disallowed by the examiners. It seems that down to the year 1752 there existed no provision for the costs of prosecutions. In 2 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 282, it is said, "That which is a great defect in this part of judicial administration is, that there is no power to allow witnesses their charges, whereby many times more persons grow weary of attendance, or bear their own charges therein, to their great hindrance and loss." By 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, the reasonable expenses of prosecution for any felony were to be allowed to the prosecutor out of the county stock, if he petitioned the judge for that purpose; and by 27 Geo. 2, c. 3, poor persons, bound over to give evidence were likewise entitled to be paid their charges, as well without conviction as with it. By 7 Geo. 4, c. 64, the expenses of prosecutions were to be regulated by justices at quarter sessions. Nine years afterwards, in the Appropriation Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 80), sect. 17, there is an allowance of "110,000*l.* for charges hitherto paid out of county rates for 1835." This amount was granted for the purpose of discharging by the country half of the costs incurred by the several counties. In the year 1846, the grant by the Appropriation Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 116, s. 18. was 239,000*l.* for "charges formerly paid out of county rates." This was to the 31st March 1847, and the grant was made to cover the whole of the costs of prosecutions incurred by the counties. In 1847 the grant for the remainder of the year was 388,000*l.*; the grant for 1848 was 348,000*l.*; in 1849, 258,000*l.*; in 1850, 240,000*l.*; in 1851, 200,000*l.* In this year, by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, ss. 4 & 5, the power of regulating the costs of prosecutions was transferred from the quarter sessions to the Secretary of State, and lists of costs were framed by Sir George Grey under these provisions on 9th Feb. 1858, and on 14th Feb. 1863. In the year 1857, and for several previous years, the amount appropriated for prosecutions at assizes and quarter sessions was 250,000*l.* In the year 1858, the first after the appointment of the Board of Examiners of Criminal Costs, the amount was 150,000*l.*; in 1860, 100,000*l.* This amount increased in subsequent years, and other charges were included in the appropriation; the words in the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 96), Schedule B, Part 7, under which this claim is made, are "Civil Services —Class iii. Schedule of sums granted to defray the charges of the several Civil Services herein particularly mentioned, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st March 1871; viz.:" . . . . "2. For prosecutions at assizes and quarter sessions in England, formerly paid out of county rates, including adjudications under the Criminal Justice and the Juvenile Offenders Acts, sheriffs' expenses, salaries to clerks of assize, and other officers, and for compensation to clerks of the peace under the Criminal Justice Acts, and other expenses of the same class, 200,633*l.*" [COCKBURN, C. J.—You need not trouble yourselves to argue any question except our jurisdiction to interfere.] At present then it will be sufficient to show that this is a case for a return to the mandamus; on that point there is no distinction between this matter and that of Smyth (4 A. & E. 286). Although sect. 13 of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 13, has been repealed, its provisions are re-enacted in 29 & 30 Vict. c. 39, s. 14, which is, "When any sum or sums of money shall have been granted to Her Majesty by a resolution of the House of Commons, or by an Act of Parliament, to defray expenses for any specified public services, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time, by her Royal order under the Royal sign manual, countersigned by the Treasury, to authorise and require the Treasury to issue, out of the credits to be granted to them on the Exchequer accounts as hereinafter provided, the sums which may be required from time to time to defray such expenses, not exceeding the amount of the sums so voted or granted." By paying some of the charges for those prosecutions the Lords of the Treasury admit that all necessary preliminaries required by this Act have been completed, and that they hold the money for the purpose to which it is appropriated. By sect. 6 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, "the amount of such costs, expenses, or compensation, shall be ascertained by the proper officer of the court, according to the regulations made under this Act."

COCKBURN, C.J.—If this case were one in which we in this court could exercise jurisdiction, we should not hesitate to grant a mandamus. Nothing can be more anomalous and unsatisfactory than the present system of allowing the costs of prosecutions. Everyone will agree that the expenses of prosecutions ought to be borne by the public. It is essential that these costs should not fall on the persons who have suffered individual injuries, which are injuries to the public also; because experience shows that if the expense is to fall on individuals they will not prosecute effectively. The old system was that the costs should be paid out of the rates upon the counties, and they were taxed by proper officers. As far back as 1836 this arrangement was altered, and it was settled that half the expenses should be paid out of the revenue of the country, and in 1847 the whole of the expenses were thrown upon the revenue. The same system of taxation, however, still continued, and the same officers conducted it —that is, the clerks of the peace or the clerks of assize. The Lords of the Treasury, however, thought proper to introduce an excrescence upon the law. They have taken upon themselves for the last fourteen years to review the taxation by the proper officers. I am far from saying that the taxation of costs ought not to be vigorously controlled. It would be a monstrous abuse if prosecutors were allowed by taxing officers to extort from the public purse money not properly expended; but it is a very different thing indeed to say that, instead of taxing on the spot, where all the circumstances attending the prosecution are known, and after the matter had been properly investigated by the proper officers, two gentlemen sitting in London should, by the sole authority of the Treasury, review the taxation and strike off whatever, in the exercise of their discretion, they should think fit to disallow. I am at a loss to conceive what is their supposed authority to tax and disallow bills already properly allowed. The monstrous inconvenience of such a course is palpable. Such gentlemen are naturally, in order to show the usefulness of their office, disposed, whenever they have opportunity, to disallow items. But they can not have the same means of forming a proper judgment as those who taxed the bills on the spot, and who are acquainted with all the circumstances. It seems monstrous and anomalous that when the court before which the criminal actions have been prosecuted think it necessary, for the due administration of justice, to order particular expenses to be paid, that then two gentlemen sitting in London should override the authority of the court. It is, however, quite another thing to say that this court has jurisdiction to interfere with it, and it is not because it may be an unsatisfactory state of things that, therefore, there is any remedy except by petition to the Queen or to Parliament. We must start with this unquestionable principle, that where a duty has not been performed by the Crown, this court cannot affect to have any power to command the Crown to do it. The thing is out of the question. We are the court of the Sovereign, and have no power to command the Crown. And where persons are acting as servants of the Crown they may be amenable to the Crown, whose servants they are, but not to us in the exercise of our prerogative jurisdiction. Therefore the question comes to this—whether the Lords of the Treasury, when this money gets into their hands, receive it, and are bound to apply it, as the servants of the Crown. Now there can be no doubt that we must look upon them as the servants of the Crown. The money is voted by Parliament to the Crown. It is true that the money is appropriated to a specific purpose, and it can be applied to no other. It is also true that the particular mode of obtaining the money is prescribed by statute. But when the money is paid to the Treasury it is paid to them as the servants of the Crown; and though, according to the Appropriation Act, they were bound to apply the money—upon proper vouchers being produced—to the payment of these costs, and had no authority to retax the costs, still I cannot see any duty on them to do what, no doubt, they ought to have done, except as servants of the Crown, in which capacity alone they received the money. Though, therefore, I think they have made a great mistake, and though I think the present state of things extremely anomalous and unsatisfactory, I regret to say that, according to the true principle on which this court's prerogative jurisdiction is and ever has been and ought to be administered, I do not see how we can issue the writ of mandamus. The duty of the Treasury is a duty they owe to Parliament and the Crown, and we cannot enforce it in any legal proceeding.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. If we had power to grant the writ, I think it would be right to issue it, as the Treasury have undoubtedly made a mistake. The House of Commons have the exclusive control over the public purse. The House of Lords is practically without authority in such matter, Now, so long as any provision of the House of Commons is, so to speak, in fieri, it cannot be brought into this court, but where the money is once granted, the matter is then a bygone thing; it has become an Act of the Legislature, and we must construe it. The Appropriation Act of 1871 regulates what is to be done, and can be altered only by the King, Lords, and Commons. The Commons have by that Act power to vote nothing but what was heretofore payable out of the county rates. Now, what does that mean? Notwithstanding the contention of the Solicitor-General, my view is still unshaken that the meaning is this, viz., that when once these sums have been duly taxed by the proper officer the county is bound to pay them. The officers may have been liberal, or they may have been stingy, but the county is bound to pay what they have allowed. Then the effect of the Appropriation Act was to indemnify the county against expenses, which they are still bound to pay, but which they would not be recouped, but for this Act. The meaning, then, is, the money should be applied to pay those costs which the counties have been obliged to pay. What was done, in fact, was this, though a particular bill had been duly incurred and taxed on the existing law, and consequently the county was bound to pay it, the Treasury have assumed to advise Her Majesty not to appropriate money to pay back this sum to the county. Now that seems to me very bad advice, being in effect advice to disregard an Act of Parliament. There is a difference, however, between bad advice and malicious advice. Here, no doubt, the advice was honest, though no intelligible ground has been shown for it, but it was advice that ought not to have been given and ought not to have been followed. Had there been a statutory obligation upon the Treasury, I think we ought to have granted a mandamus, for I think that the treasurer of the county rate, who has been obliged to pay the sum originally allowed, has a clear pecuniary interest, and is therefore entitled to say that he is grieved by this conduct of the Treasury, and is the proper person to promote proceedings in this court. But it is a general principle of all law that where there is an obligation upon a principal it cannot be enforced against the servant. Mandamus will not lie against a servant of a railway company, because the company which employ him have failed to fulfil duty. There is also the familiar case of surs of highways, where, though the parish ıt be made liable, neither can they. law does not employ a mandamus to ɔe a duty of the Queen, and where her nts are merely authorised by her, we ıt enforce such an obligation. Such is the ıf all the cases from the time of the case of ?ost Office, in Lord Holt's time, where he ed himself, but where it was held that the naster-General was not liable for non-delivery ters by a carrier. So also it has been held the party aggrieved could not sue the Queen ɔ captain of a man-of-war for running down er vessel. Where the wrong-doer is the nt of the Queen, and the duty is to her and e House of Commons, and nothing more, a mandamus to enforce that duty cannot go. wherever the duty is imposed by Act of ıment, I must disclaim the doctrine of the tor-General that any person, however high ation, is not amenable to the jurisdiction of ourt. That is, wherever there is a duty to persons, but I cannot find that such is the ıere. No doubt in Smyth's case it appears Lord Campbell, then Attorney-General, ad- the Crown to yield, and in the case of v. Lords of Treasury (16 Q. B. 357), he ;ht the 13th section of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, ı specific duty on the Crown. But that is, perhaps, doubtful, and, at all events, statute is now repealed. Mr. Gorst argued great ingenuity that the statutes now in impose a statutory duty upon the Treasury ɔ public; yet I was unable to see, in following through the several sections, but that the y is granted to the Queen, and there is ng to show that the Lords of the Treasury ore amenable to third parties than servants money placed in their hands to pay weekly or with a credit at a banker's, who clearly ıt be proceeded against for not applying it as ed. On that ground only, therefore, I think nnot let this mandamus go.

LLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The t Acts of Parliament, have made no change ɔ relation of ministers to the Crown; though ealousy of Parliament has defined the con- ıs within which they are to act, and ses an indirect authority over them. Still a clear principle that we cannot make perform a duty which they owe to Crown. But I entertain no doubt what- that the money really belongs to the ies. I remember when the first remission ntroduced by Sir Robert Peel as a set-off ɔ landed interest. First, the scale was settled justice, with consent of a judge of assize; vards the justices had power to settle the of costs, and a competent person was sent l to look after the taxation in the interests of ublic. But now, when the costs are taxed, is an obligation on the county to pay them ı they cannot resist. There is no power by ɔ review that taxation when once made. The t of the authority of the Treasury is to require r vouchers that the money so taxed has been ɔt paid. They have got money from Parlia- for the specific purpose of defraying these ses. The true construction of the Act is that unds rated are appropriated to the payment ese sums so far as they go; and I am, therefore, entirely of opinion that the Treasury have misunderstood its duty in altering the quantum; but for the reasons already stated, I think we cannot grant a mandamus.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The applicants have failed to make out any duty between the Treasury and them. The Treasury is not accountable to this court, and there is nothing in the Acts to make them so. I think, nevertheless, their practice of retaxing and reducing the sums allowed is a violation of the Act of Parliament. Before 1865, I should have had greater difficulty in saying what the meaning of the Appropriation Act was, whether of the whole or of part of the sum allowed; but the words of those Acts have been altered since then, I presume intentionally.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I may add that there could be no objection to the sending officers by the Treasury to assist in and control the first taxation of costs, as was done when the system of regulation by the Secretary of State commenced. Or steps might be taken to secure more consistent taxation throughout the country, by means of more definite regulations. When, however, the taxation has been completed by proper officers, the Treasury can have no right to tax the costs again.

WILLMER v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF LIVERPOOL.

5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (Municipal Corporation Act)—Police—Costs of prosecution to vindicate character—Borough fund—Certiorari.

Articles having appeared in a newspaper censuring an inspector of borough police, an intimation was given to him by the watch committee that he ought to take steps to vindicate his character, whereupon he instituted proceedings in a police court for libel against the publisher of the newspaper which were withdrawn upon an apology being made at the suggestion of the magistrate.

The watch committee made an order for the payment to the inspector out of the borough fund of the costs he had incurred in the above-mentioned proceedings; and the council of the borough confirmed the order.

A rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash the order having been granted on the application of the publisher of the newspaper, who, as a ratepayer, objected to the payment:

On cause shown:

Held, that the payment was not such as the Watch Committee were by the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) authorised to order, and that, therefore, the rule must be made absolute.

RULE calling upon the Town Council of the borough of Liverpool to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up an order or resolution of the town council dated the 5th April 1871, whereby the sum of 31*l.* 10*s.* was ordered to be paid to Christopher Southwell to reimburse him the costs incurred in a prosecution for libel against Charles Willmer.

It appeared from affidavits used on the motion for, and argument of the rule, that Southwell was an inspector of the Liverpool Borough Police Force, and had been in that capacity employed in the inspection of public-houses, and it was part of his duty to make inquiries as to the character of persons who applied to the justices of the borough for victuallers' licences.

Acting on information which eventually proved to be incorrect, he recommended an applicant at a licensing sessions as a fit and proper person to receive a licence. The inspector had known the applicant some years before, and was then aware that he was not of good character, but had forgotten the fact when he made the favourable report to the licensing justices.

Several articles subsequently appeared in a newspaper of which Charles Willmer was proprietor and publisher, containing serious reflections on the conduct of the inspector in the abovementioned matter. An intimation was given to the latter by the members of the watch committee as well as by the head constable of Liverpool that it was his duty to vindicate his character; whereupon he took proceedings for libel against the defendant in the Liverpool Police Court. On the suggestion of the magistrate there presiding an apology was made by the defendant and accepted on the part of the prosecution.

The inspector afterwards made an application to the watch committee that the legal expenses he had been put to in clearing his character from the aspersions of the defendant, might be repaid to him.

On the 14th March 1871 the watch committee passed a resolution to reimburse Southwell the costs which he had incurred in the aforesaid proceedings for libel.

On the 5th April following the resolution was confirmed by the town council, who ordered the treasurer of the borough fund to make the payment resolved upon by the watch committee. The borough was then possessed of a surplus fund more than sufficient to satisfy the amount, derived from sources other than rates, and available for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough.(a)

Willmer, as a ratepayer of the borough, formally objected to the payment ordered; and upon his motion, by counsel, the above rule was granted, against which

Milward, Q. C. and Herschell showed cause.—The words in sect. 82, "all other charges and expenses which the watch committee shall, subject to the approbation of the council, direct to be paid for the purposes of the constabulary force . . . ." are comprehensive enough to include the payment in question. In Reg. v. Thompson (4 Q. B. 900; 5 Q. B. 477), it was held that, under the above section the council of a borough cannot make an order that the treasurer shall pay the costs of defending borough constables on a prosecution incurred by them in the discharge of their duty. Such order must be made by the watch committee, with the approbation of the council, and Patteson, J. said, "I am far from saying that the watch committee might not have ordered payment of these expenses under sect. 82; but they have not done it." Here, however, they have done so with the approbation of the council, and it therefore follows that the order is valid. These were the ordinary expenses of keeping the police force in good repute, and, as there was a surplus of the borough fund, it could "be applied under the direction of the council, for the public benefit of the inhabitants" by sect. 92 (Reg. v. The Mayor of Sheffield, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 652), and consequently to defraying these costs, which were incurred for the sake of the inhabitants who are assuredly benefited by the police force being efficient and respected. It could not be argued that if these costs had been occasioned by the inspector clearing his private character, they should be defrayed out of the borough fund. But this prosecution for libel was instigated by his superiors, and undertaken by him expressly for the purpose of vindicating his official character, and so preserving the police force from obloquy, an act just as much done in his official capacity as if he had travelled a long distance to give evidence against an offender, in which case any extra cost of his journey could undoubtedly be repaid to him. "Salaries, wages, and allowances," are the payments which the treasurer is by sect. 82 empowered to make under the direction of the Watch Committee. Then suppose this inspector had been overworked, could he not be justly remunerated by virtue of the enactment? [BLACKBURN, J.—Possibly. If he had done more work than usual they might order a gratuity to be given to him.] Then surely this sum might be allowed as a payment made for the purpose of rendering the force efficient. The Watch Committee rightly thought that an officer with an imputation resting upon

(a) By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (The Municipal Corporation Act), s. 76, "The council of a borough are required to appoint a sufficient number of their own body, who, together with the mayor, shall be the watch committee, of whom three shall be a quorum; and the watch committee are required to appoint a sufficient number of fit men to be sworn in and to act as constables."

By sect. 77, "The watch committee may from time to time frame such regulations as they shall deem expedient for preventing neglect or abuse, and for rendering such constables efficient in the discharge of their duties; . . ."

Sect. 82 enacts "That the treasurer of every borough, appointed under this Act, shall pay to the constables of such borough appointed under this Act, such salaries, wages, and allowances, and at such periods as the watch committee for such borough shall, subject to the approbation of the council, direct, and the council shall order to be paid also any extraordinary expenses which such persons shall appear to have necessarily incurred in apprehending offenders, and executing the orders of any justice of the peace having jurisdiction within such borough, such expenses having been first examined and approved by such justices; and the said treasurer shall also pay such further sums as the watch committee shall, subject to the approbation of the council, award to any of the persons belonging to the said constabulary force, as a reward for extraordinary diligence or exertion, or as a compensation for wounds or severe injuries received in the performance of their duty, or as an allowance to such of them as shall be disabled by bodily injury received, or shall be worn out by length of service; and all other charges and expenses which the watch committee shall subject to the approbation of the council, direct to be paid for the purposes of the constabulary force under this Act."

Sect. 92 directs the application of the borough fund to certain purposes, and provides that "in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council, for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough."

him could not so well perform his duties, and required him to take steps to free himself from a libellous accusation on his public character, which tended to impair his usefulness. They did not believe the charges made against him, and therefore retained him in the force. Consequently it was for the public benefit, and not for the sake of his private character that the proceedings were instituted.

Kirby appeared in support of the rule, but was not called upon to argue.

BLACKBURN, J.—This is an application for a certiorari to bring up an order made by the town council, and recommended by the watch committee of Liverpool, to pay the costs of a certain prosecution, and that such an order may be brought up by writ of certiorari, and examined by this court, if it be an order which they had no right to make, is quite clear. It is also unquestionable that such a writ might be granted on the application of a person likely to suffer by the making of the order. No doubt the applicant in the present instance, who, as one who has to bear the burthen of the rates, would suffer, although perhaps to an almost infinitesimal degree, by the order complained of, has a right to come here for a writ of certiorari. Now the watch committee has the control of the police, and sects. 82 and 86 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, state what may be paid out of the funds at their disposal, viz., "salaries, wages, and allowances." I cannot say that the payment in question is an "allowance," a term which, in my opinion, would rather apply to sums granted for coals, candles, and such things, or possibly might extend to pensions, but certainly not to the costs of a criminal prosecution. Then we read on, "any extraordinary expenses . . . . incurred in apprehending offenders, &c. . . . . compensation for wounds," &c., and, finally, "all other charges and expenses which the watch committee shall, subject to the approbation of the council, direct to be paid for the purposes of the constabulary force under this Act." We must construe those comprehensive words as ejusdem generis with the preceding ones. The expenditure must be for the purposes of the constabulary force at large. But here an individual constable has been accused of personal misconduct while acting as constable, and in one sense that may be said to affect the whole force. It, however, seems to me that the Watch Committee have here ordered a sum of money to be paid which they had no right to order. Mr. Milward argued that, there being a surplus in the borough fund, the order for payment falls within the 92nd section, which, after appropriating the fund for specific purposes, enacts that "In case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied, under the direction of the council, for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough," but it is of course quite out of the question to say that this cost was incurred for the "improvement of the borough," or for the public interest of the inhabitants. It was not. And if it did not come within the 82nd section it was manifestly not within sect. 92. I think, therefore, that the certiorari should go; then there will be a further motion to quash it, and cause shown before the whole court, when there will be more opportunity of fully reviewing the facts, and it may be that the full court will take a different view of them. At present I feel very certain that this was an order which could not properly be made.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think that the certiorari should go in this case. It appears that the inspector received an intimation that it was his duty to vindicate his character, which had been aspersed. Upon that intimation, and without the full sanction of the watch committee, he instituted proceedings. I say without authority, because, from the case of Reg. v. The Town Council of Stamford (4 L. Rep. Q. B. 900, note) it appears that such sanction should be procured. The watch committee gave no such sanction. Moreover it is to be observed that the stipendiary magistrate before whom the proceedings were taken, said that the inspector was "to blame for having forgotten a thing which he ought not to have forgotten, and which it was his business to remember." Therefore the remarks of the newspapers were to a certain extent justified as to that. Now, I cannot find any general words in section 82, which would include such a payment as that ordered in the present case, nor can I discover any express words that would enable the watch committee to order it. The proceedings taken by the inspector were solely for the vindication of his private character. Nor do I think it comes within the terms "for the public benefit of the inhabitants and the improvement of the borough," in sect. 92. In the case of Reg. v. The Mayor of Bridgwater (10 A. & E. 28), a libel had been published of an alderman for an act done by him in the execution of his duty as alderman, and he filed a criminal information, and wanted the expenses thereof to be paid out of the borough fund. But the Court of Queen's Bench held that that was not a public purpose, and made absolute a rule for a certiorari to bring up an order for payment of the expenses. It appears to me a stronger case, and seems to govern the present one. I cannot say that the expense of the vindication of the inspector of police from a charge of this kind (the watch committee having exonerated him from it in limited terms by finding that he did not do the act complained of wilfully) should be imposed upon the public funds of the borough.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Feb. 13 and 14, 1872.

CRUIKSHANK v. DUFFIN.

Vendor and purchaser—Mortgage by executor to building society—Exercise of power of sale—Specific performance.

An executor took shares in and became a member of a building society to obtain advances for the purposes of his executorship, and mortgaged certain leaseholds belonging to his testator to the society to secure the advances and his subscriptions on the shares.

The society sold the property under the power of sale in the mortgage, but the purchaser raised the objection that the mortgage was invalid.

Held, that the mortgage was valid so far as it was a security for the advances actually made to the executor, but that the clauses purporting to secure to the society the payment of instalments due by the executor as a member were inoperative.

JACOB AMOS, by his will, dated the 28th Jan. 1867, appointed Joseph Amos his executor. The testator was at the time of his death entitled to, amongst other leasehold properties, a leasehold house, situate in Alfred-street, Bermondsey.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 28th Jan. 1869, and made between the said Joseph Amos (the mortgagor), therein described as a member of the Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society, of the one part, and the trustees of the society of the other part; after reciting that the said mortgagor was desirous of borrowing the sum of 450*l.* for the purposes of the executorship, and had applied to the directors of the said society to lend him that sum in respect of his fifteen advanced shares therein for the term of twelve years, and had proposed to assure the said leasehold premises at Bermondsey to the said trustees to secure the repayment of such sum in accordance with the rules and bye-laws of the said society, and had also offered to pay a premium for such advance, which, being calculated according to such rules and bye-laws, amounted to the sum of 47*l.* 5*s.*, and according to such rules and bye-laws was to be added to and treated as part of the principal sum so advanced—it was witnessed that in consideration of the sum of 450*l.* then paid to the mortgagor out of the funds of the society, being the full amount of his said fifteen advanced shares therein, the mortgagor demised to the trustees the said leasehold premises at Bermondsey for the residue of the term granted by the lease thereof, except the last two days, by way of mortgage for securing the discharge by the mortgagor in some manner authorised by the rules or bye-laws of the said society of the sum of 497*l.* 5*s.* (being the aggregate amount of the said cash advance and premium), and of all fines, interests, and other sums (if any), which before such discharge might become payable by him or them to the said society under its rules or bye-laws, or by virtue of the said indenture, or in any other way. And it was by the said indenture agreed that if three of the monthly subscriptions therein provided for should be in arrear, or in case of the non-observance by the mortgagor of any agreement, covenant, rule, or bye-law therein contained or incorporated by reference, or if the mortgagor should become bankrupt or insolvent, the trustees should have powers of distress and entry as therein mentioned, and also a power to sell the said premises by public auction or private contract. Under the rules and bye-laws of the society the mortgage could be redeemed at any time on payment of the balance of the principal due, with interest, up to the 30th June or 31st Dec. next ensuing the payment, and of the current year's premium on the shares. The said Joseph Amos had never had any connection with the said society, except in respect of the said fifteen shares, which he took solely for the purpose of qualifying himself to obtain the advance of 450*l.*, which he required to enable him to pay off certain mortgages made by his testator to other building societies, and to pay his testator's debts, and for repairs to the said leasehold premises. Joseph Amos, besides being executor, was tenant for life of part of the said leasehold premises at Bermondsey, and he obtained the consent of the other tenant for life to the said mortgage.

On the 14th April 1870, the trustees of the society, acting under the power of sale in the mortgage, put up the premises for sale by public auction, when the defendant was declared to be the purchaser for the sum of 515*l.*, upon which a deposit was duly paid.

Upon investigating the title the purchaser raised the objection that the mortgage was not such a security as Joseph Amos, in his character as executor, was justified in making, and accordingly declined to complete the contract.

The trustees then filed the present bill for specific performance.

Cotton, Q.C. and T. Smith Osler, for the plaintiffs.—We have a perfectly good title. It is well settled that an executor may not only mortgage his testator's assets, but may also give the mortgagee a power of sale:

Russell v. Plaice, 18 Beav. 21;
Bridges v. Longman, 24 Beav. 27;
Re Chawner's Will, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 569; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 262;
Earl Vane v. Rigden, L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 663.

This being so, no objection can be raised on the ground that in this case the mortgage is to a building society. There is no devastavit here.

Glasse, Q. C. and Lindley, Q. C., for the defendant, the purchaser.—The purchaser cannot take under this power of sale, which is invalid and ultra vires. The Acts relating to building societies do not provide for their undertaking business of this character. The executor has done that with the assets of his testator which he had no authority to do. He had no right to give a power of sale, on the principle delegatus non potest delegare. The executor has entered into personal covenants which are inconsistent with his office. This mortgage amounted to a devastavit. In Sanders v. Richards (2 Coll. Ch. C. 568), before Knight Bruce, V.C., a title under a power of sale granted by an administratrix to a mortgagee was not enforced against a purchaser. That case has never been overruled or doubted, and it was not cited in Re Chawner's Will. At all events this is a doubtful title, which the court will not enforce against a purchaser, especially as the cestui que trusts are not parties: (Webb v Kirby, 7 D. M. & G. 376.)

Cotton, in reply.—In Sanders v. Richards, Knight Bruce, V.C., did not decide this point, because the administratrix and the cestuis que trust were not before the court. As to this being a delegation of a power, in Russell v. Plaice, the Master of the Rolls says that a power of sale must not be considered as a delegation of a power of sale, but as a creation of a new power to sell, not for the benefit of the persons interested in the testator's estate, but of the persons interested in the mortgage, that is, a power to render the mortgage effectual; and that the right to create this power is incidental to the authority of the executor to mortgage. For the purposes of selling the estate of the testator, the executor is the absolute owner, and has all the power incidental to that character. Russell v. Plaice is recognised as a sound authority in Earl Vane v. Rigden. Here the recitals show that the executor mortgaged as executor and nothing else. No one would take a mortgage without a power of sale. The court will not refuse to compel a purchaser to accept a title simply because the point raised may be doubtful:

Alexander v. Mills, L. Rep. 6 Ch. App. 124; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 206.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a bill for the specific performance of a contract to buy a leasehold house, which was put up for sale by public auction on the 14th April 1870 by the plaintiffs. There is no question as to the general title whatever, which is admitted, I understand, to be good. The whole question turns upon the validity of the power of sale, under which the plaintiffs sold the property. The property belonged to one Jacob Amos, who died some time ago, and appointed his brother, Joseph Amos, his executor. The mortgage in question was executed by the executor, Joseph Amos, and contained a power to sell, undre which the property has been put up for sale, and under which it is now proposed to make the title. The question is whether the power of sale is a valid power. If it is, there must be a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. If it is an invalid power, then the bill must be dismissed, and, I suppose, with costs. Then is this, or is it not, a valid power of sale? That the same power which grants a mortgage of property may create a power of sale is not disputed by the defendant's counsel. It is very true that it was formerly held by Knight Bruce, V.C. in the case of Sanders v. Richards (sup.), that where a power of sale was given to an executor upon a mortgage, the title under that power of sale could not be forced upon a purchaser. That case, I find, is cited by Lord St. Leonards in his Treatise on Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit. p. 390 (note), as an authority. But I think — indeed the learned counsel for the defendant has not disputed it — that the doctrine laid down in that case can no longer be maintained as the rule of the court, for in the case of Russell v. Plaice (sup.) the Master of the Rolls decided directly the contrary, namely, that a good title could be made under a power of sale created by an executor. That case of Russell v. Plaice, having been cited before the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices in the case of Earl Vane v. Rigden (sup.), was commented upon by the Lord Chancellor, who expressed his approbation of it, and I therefore think it may be considered as an authority upon the point. There is another case, before myself, of Re Chawner's Will (sup.), in which I was applied to under Lord St. Leonards' Act to give the opinion of the court whether an executor could, in creating a mortgage, properly give a power of sale. I then held that he might; and in doing that I acted on what I am now told is the universal understanding of the profession, that in every mortgage there must be a power of sale, for otherwise the money is hardly obtainable. I think, therefore, it must now be considered as settled that there is no extrinsic objection to an executor giving a mortgage with power of sale. If, therefore, this had been an ordinary mortgage, I understood Mr. Glasse in opening the case for the defence to say that he would not have raised the objection, but would have accepted the title. Then the objection to this power of sale is this, that it is, in point of fact, a mortgage in the usual form of a mortgage to a permanent benefit building society. The general constitution of those societies is well known in this court. This is the first case that I have seen in which an executor, for the purpose of executorship, has become a member of such a society. But it appears that the executor, in taking that course, was not taking a course which he supposed would be disapproved of by his testator, for I find the testator, who was a man in a humble station of life, having leasehold property, did that which is usually done by persons in his station of life — became a member of a permanent benefit building society; and I find by the abstract of title which has been furnished that in 1860 he mortgaged this very property, by an indenture, dated the 9th Oct. 1860, to the trustees of the Southwark Auxiliary Permanent Benefit Building Society in consideration of certain advanced shares, and so on. We know what that means. A man subscribes for a certain number of shares; he has certain monthly instalments to pay on them, and certain fines in default of payment. Upon paying his instalments, and any fines he may become subject to, he becomes a member, and entitled to be advanced. This testator was advanced the sum of 345*l.* by that society. He then executed a mortgage in the usual form to the "trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the time being of the society, for the residue of the term, less three days, at the rent of a peppercorn, free from all incumbrances, and subject to the rules and regulations of the society in respect of mortgage securities, and also to the provisoes therein contained." That was a mortgage, in the usual form, and precisely to the same effect as this, namely, to secure payment of the fees and monthly instalments, and any fines to which he might become subject by their non-payment. That mortgage, like the present, is also redeemable, as all mortgages are, upon payment of the principal, and, for want of notice, of a certain amount of specified interest. In the case of every mortgage carrying interest half yearly, after the time for redemption is over, any mortgagor can redeem his mortgage by paying the mortgagee six months' interest for want of notice. So in this case, the mortgage being in the form I have stated is redeemable at any time by payment to the society of the amount remaining due, together with interest for the current half year. That, therefore, is a form of mortgage which I cannot regard as being objectionable, and which certainly would not raise any fatal objection to the validity of the transaction. The amount of interest secured to the society is not complained of, considering the nature of the property. It is about 6½ per cent., which I cannot consider, with reference to this kind of property, as an inordinate amount of interest, and, indeed, no objection has been taken on that ground. There was an objection taken which at first struck me as being of very serious importance, namely, that this deed is made a security not only for the repayment of whatever might become due from the borrower, Joseph Amos, in his character as executor, but also of all fines and sums of money which might become due from him individually as a shareholder in this society. That at first sight struck me as very objectionable for this reason—the deed recites the lease, and it recites the will, and then it recites that the mortgage is for the object of borrowing the sum of 450*l.* for the purposes of the executorship. It is, therefore, distinctly shown on the face of the deed, that this property is trust property which the executor is dealing with as a trustee, and then the ordinary rules of this court make it absolutely impossible that an executor can give a security upon trust property for his own individual debt. The truth is, that the clause making the mortgage a security for all fines and other sums due from Amos, as a shareholder, was allowed to remain in because it is a clause usually inserted where persons take shares in their own individual right. But it being perfectly clear that the deed could only be a security for that which was borrowed by Amos, as executor, I think that is a totally inoperative clause destroyed by the contents of the deed itself, and that the objection to the power of sale, so far as it depends upon the rules of the court, is entirely removed. That being out of the way, what are the real objections to this power of sale? I say again, this is the first instance I have known of an executor, in his executorship capacity, becoming a member of one of these societies. It did for some time strike me that there were serious objections to it, but when the point comes to be looked into, I do not find there is much in it. This is a kind of property on which there would very likely be very considerable difficulty in borrowing money. It is an important circumstance that when the testator wanted money he himself resorted to a building society. Why, then, should his executor not do the same? It may have been a foolish thing on the part of the executor to render himself individually liable for these fees and fines. It may be a very foolish thing for the executor to enter into a covenant to pay money which no executor, in creating a mortgage, would ordinarily render himself personally liable by covenant to pay; but if he chooses, in creating a mortgage, to render himself individually liable to pay money, no one would say that that is an objection to the mortgage, or an objection to the power of sale which it contains. The result of this is, that this executor, having property in his hands which, I must assume, he felt confident would be, an indemnity to him, becomes a member by taking a certain number of shares in this society by which he becomes liable for certain monthly payments. He says: "I have the property to resort to; there is the power of sale, and I do not mind incurring that risk; therefore, I will individually become liable to pay these instalments. I have the property to resort to; I can at any time redeem by paying half a year's interest, and that is a risk which I am willing to run." Therefore, although this is a building society, notwithstanding the able arguments which have been addressed to me—and the case has been very ably argued on both sides—I come to the conclusion that I can look at the transaction as a mortgage with a power of sale which does not arise in any unreasonable way, and which can only be exercised in default of payment of the instalments. It is not a power exercisable in the same way as powers of sale which are contained in ordinary mortgage deeds. It being considered that an executor may in general create a mortgage with a power of sale, I have only to look upon the whole, and to say this is a mortgage with a power of sale. For the reasons I have stated I do not think there is any substantial objection to it. Although it is the duty of the court to give every due weight to objections to title, and to be very careful that it does not force upon a purchaser a title which he may not be able to hold; yet upon the other hand, I think, it is equally important that persons who enter into contracts of this kind should be compelled to perform them. Mr. Cotton has drawn my attention particularly to a case which was decided by the Lords Justices, in which I am glad to say they, more than they have done in some other cases, have shown an inclination not to give way to frivolous objections to title; I mean the case of Alexander v. Mills (sup.). I am of opinion, therefore, that, having regard to all the circumstances, this is an objection which has no substantial foundation; and upon the whole, I come to the conclusion that the power of sale is well created and has been well exercised, and that there must be a decree for specific performance.

Cotton.—Of course, to make the defendant's title better, he must pay the costs.

Glasse objected.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Knight Bruce, V.C. who is a great authority upon the subject, says that for the sake of the title the purchaser ought to pay the costs. As Mr. Glasse objects to pay them, I cannot say that I think the point was so unreasonable an objection to take that I ought to make the purchaser pay the costs of the suit. I confess that my opinion has undergone considerable fluctuation during the arguments. I therefore make no order as to costs.

Re BRISCOE'S TRUSTS.

Charitable gift — Insufficient description—Latent ambiguity—Parol evidence.

Testator bequeathed 1000*l. to The Victoria Hospital. There was no hospital strictly answering this description, and the legacy was claimed by* (1) The City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, which was situate at Victoria-park, and (2) The Victoria Hospital for Sick Children, which was situate in Chelsea. It appeared that the testator had subscribed to the former, and taken an interest in it, and that he sometimes called it "the Victoria Hospital." It was alleged on the other hand that the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children was the only one publicly known as "The Victoria Hospital," and it appeared that letters so directed were always forwarded there by the Post-office.

Held, that the description in the will was not sufficiently complete to exclude parol evidence; and the court holding it to be clear that the money was intended for the hospital in Victoria-park, ordered it to be paid accordingly.

JOHN BRISCOE, by his will, dated the 4th Aug. 1870, bequeathed a legacy of 1000*l.* to the Victoria Hospital. The testator died on the 16th Aug. 1870.

On inquiring it was found that there was no hospital which accurately answered the above description; but there was a hospital called the "Victoria Hospital for Sick Children," situate at Gough House, Queen's-road west, Chelsea, in the county of Middlesex. The legacy was also claimed by the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, situate at Victoria-park.

The executors accordingly paid the money into court and a petition was presented by the treasurer of the latter hospital for payment of the money to him.

It appeared from the evidence in support of the petition that between the year 1850 and 1864 the testator gave donations to the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest to an amount which entitled him to be a life governor of that hospital. It also appeared that he recommended nts to the hospital, that he corresponded with fficers of the hospital, and that his wife visited . The name of the testator had been pub- l as a steward at the annual dinners of the tal. It was stated that in speaking of this tal he was accustomed to call it "The Vic- Hospital," and that in giving instructions he legacy in his will he spoke of the "Vic- Hospital in Victoria-park."

om the evidence filed by the respondents, on f of the Victoria, Hospital for Sick Children, was situated in Chelsea, it appeared that estator had been solicited to take an active in the establishment of that hospital, and that nnual reports had been regularly forwarded m. It was stated that letters intended for fficers of the hospital were frequently ad- ed "Victoria Hospital," and that letters so ssed were always delivered at the hospital in ea by the Post-office authorities. A test so addressed and posted in the Victoria- district had been delivered at the hospital in ea. According to the Guide to the London ties the only institutions in the names of the word "Victoria" occurred were the Victoria Patriotic Asylum and the Victoria ital for Sick Children. It was alleged that ords "for sick children" did not form any of the name of the letter, and that its real was the Victoria Hospital. It was contended, fore, that inasmuch as there was one charity which completely answered the description in ill, parol evidence was not admissible to ex- the gift.

nming, for the Attorney-General.

VICE-CHANCELLOR said that a testator having athed 1000*l.* to the Victoria Hospital, the was claimed by two parties. The petitioner sented the City of London Hospital for ses of the Chest, which was situate at Vic- park; and the respondent represented the ria Hospital for Sick Children, which was e in Chelsea. The claim of the latter was ed on this, that it was the only hospital answered to the description of the Victoria ital. The former claimed on the ground that gh the name of this hospital was not the Vic- Hospital, yet that name was frequently applied and it was known as such by the testator. weight no doubt was to be attributed to the ent derived from the name of the hospital elsea, and it was supported by the principle had been laid down in Re Kilvert's Trusts, lows: "Wherever a bequest, whether made erson or a charity, is perfect and unequivocal its parts, no parol evidence is admissible to n it; and if in the present case there had a society completely answering the descrip- n the will, that society must have taken the ." If then the description in the will of the y had been complete and unequivocal, that would have applied, and parol evidence would been inadmissible. Thus if the words "for hildren" had been added to the words "the Victoria Hospital," then there would have been no doubt. The words of the will would have unmis- takeably included the hospital in Chelsea as the object of the gift, and excluded the hospital in Victoria-park, and it would have been impossible to go out of the words of the will. But the de- scription was general—"the Victoria Hospital," and these words might have meant in the mind of the testator either of these hospitals. Now his Honour had to ascertain what was in the mind of the testa- tor, for this was the principle which had been applied in Kilvert's Trusts, and had also been applied in that case by the Lords Justices, though with a slightly different result. It was clear in the present case that the testator intended the legacy for one of these two hospitals. The hos- pital in Victoria-park had a general object; but the hospital in Chelsea confined itself to the treat- ment of sick children. The evidence showed that for twenty years the testator had given donations to the hospital in Victoria-park, that he was a life governor, that he had allowed his name to be used as a steward at their dinners, and that in every possible way he had supported it and taken an interest in its welfare. The evidence on behalf of the respondent on the other hand did not amount to more than that the testator had been asked to sub- scribe to the hospital in Chelsea. It was not shown that he had ever subscribed one penny to it; he scarcely knew of its existence, and he was a total stranger to it. Now, did the testator intend to give this legacy to a charity which he supported, or did he intend to give it to a charity of which he knew nothing? It was a question of intention, and his Honour had no doubt as to what the testator really intended. The cardinal rule in the con- struction of wills was to ascertain the intention, and to carry that into effect, if possible. The re- spondent had this legal point in his favour, that the words used by the testator were a more accu- rate description of the hospital in Chelsea than of the hospital in Victoria-park. Parol evidence of the instructions given by the testator for his will could not be received; but, looking at the words of the will itself, his Honour was clearly of opinion that when the testator used the words "Victoria Hospital" he meant the hospital situate in Victoria- park. The argument on behalf of the respondent had really been a general argument in favour of charitable objects. Where a testator had imperfectly described a charity, it was a rule that in order to ascertain what charity was meant, the court would take into consideration what the charities were with which the testator had been connected, and in which he had been interested. It was always the wish of the court to hand over the gift to a charity with which the testator had been connected, rather than to a charity to which he was a stranger, even though the latter might be more accurately de- scribed. His Honour had applied these rules in the cases of Coles' Will, which was only reported upon a question of legacy duty (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 221), and he should also apply them in the present case. While, therefore, he thought that if the testator had used the words, "The Victoria Hos- pital for Sick Children," the respondent would have been entitled; yet, inasmuch as the testator had used only the words, "The Victoria Hospital," the money must be paid to the petitioner. The costs of all parties would be paid out of the fund.

V.C. BACON'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER and T. H. CARSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Feb. 27 and 28, 1872.

TELFORD v. METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

Right of re-purchase—Scheme under Metropolitan Commons Act 1866 in contravention of right—Injunction to restrain promotion of scheme—29 & 30 Vict. c. 122, ss. 6, 14, 15.

A court of equity will not restrain a person from applying to Parliament on public grounds; but where a man is acting in violation of a contract personal to himself, and with which public interests have nothing to do, the relief which the court would grant if no question were raised about Parliament, will not be refused on the ground that an application to Parliament is about to be made.

D. and F. purchased the interest of the lords of the manor in a common, with a view of dedicating the same to the public as a recreation ground, and by the deed of conveyance rights of re-purchase were reserved to the owners of certain equitable interests in the common, in case the whole of the common should not be so dedicated. D. and F. subsequently transferred the purchase to the Metropolitan Board of Works, upon the terms expressed in the above conveyance. The board presented to the Inclosure Commissioners a memorial under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866 praying that a scheme might be prepared for the dedication of the common to the public, and it was stated in the memorial that part of the common might be advantageously sold by the board

The commissioners having requested the board to prepare a scheme, a scheme was prepared by them in one of the provisions of which power was given to the board to acquire any rights of re-purchase affecting the common, first making compensation for the same, and also power to sell or let a certain part of the common. This scheme was afterwards published by the commissioners as a scheme under the Act.

On a bill filed by one of the parties to whom a right of re-purchase had been reserved on the original conveyance to D. and F., an injunction was granted restraining the board from promoting or supporting the above scheme, or any other scheme inconsistent with the terms on which the common was conveyed to D. and F., and from doing anything to prejudice the right of re-purchase reserved to the plaintiff.

THIS was a suit to restrain the Metropolitan Board of Works from promoting a scheme under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, for converting Tooting Beck Common into a public park or recreation ground.

The plaintiff was entitled to certain lands which had been laid out for building adjoining Tooting Beck Common. He was also entitled to an equitable interest in one-twelfth part of an undivided moiety of Tooting Beck Manor, the legal estate in which moiety was vested in Henry Willis, as trustee under the will of Elizabeth Keymer, for the plaintiff and certain other parties. The fee simple of the remaining moiety of Tooting Beck Manor was vested in Robert Hudson.

On the 30th Nov. 1866, a memorial was presented to the Metropolitan Board of Works by Berish Drew, Philip William Flower, and William Carpmael (since deceased), stating that on behalf of the inhabitants of Streatham, they had entered into negotiations with the lords of the manor of Tooting Beck with a view to preserving the common of Tooting Beck for the use of the inhabitants of the metropolis; and that ultimately they had agreed on their own responsibility to purchase the manorial rights. The memorial stated that since this agreement the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866 had come into operation, by which the Metropolitan Board of Works was empowered to act as the local authority in respect to all commons within the metropolitan area; and the memorial prayed that the Board would take such action as should ensure the said common being dedicated to the public as an open space for recreation.

At a meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works, held on the 30th Nov. 1866, the above memorial was referred to the works and general purposes committee for consideration, and on 3rd April 1868, that committee reported, that in their opinion it was desirable that the board should comply with the prayer of the memorial, and take steps for securing the common for public advantage. A resolution of the board was passed in accordance with the opinion of the committee to the effect that the board should acquire the interest of the lords of the manor in the common of Tooting Beck, with a view to a scheme being prepared and sanctioned under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, for the advantage of the metropolis. And the matter was referred back to the works and general purposes committee to carry out the necessary arrangements.

The agreement for the purchase by the memorialists, Drew and Flower, of the rights of the lords of the manor in Tooting Beck was carried into effect by an agreement, which was dated 10th July 1868, and made between Hudson of the first part, Willis of the second part, the persons beneficially interested under the will of Elizabeth Keymer (including the plaintiff) of the third part, and Drew and Flower of the fourth part. The agreement recited that the plaintiff was largely interested in lands adjoining the commons or waste lands belonging to the manor of Tooting Beck, and that it was considered by him that it would be greatly to his interest that such commons or waste lands should not be built upon, and on that ground he had been induced to enter into that agreement, and recited also that the other persons beneficially interested under the will of Elizabeth Kymer, also considered that it was for their interest that such commons or waste lands should not be built upon, and on that ground had been induced to enter into that agreement; and Hudson and Willis, with the consent of the persons parties thereto of the third part, thereby agreed to sell, and Drew and Flower agreed to purchase, at the price of 10,200*l.*, the said manor of Tooting Beck, with its appurtenances, subject to (amongst others) the following stipulations:—

9. In the event of the commons or waste lands belonging to the said manor not being given or dedicated to the public as a park or recreation ground under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, entitled, "The Metropolitan Commons Act 1866," or any other Act of Parliament, and in such way that no part thereof be at any time without the consent in writing of the said Charles Telford" [and of the other persons interested under the will of Elizabeth Keymer], "their respective executors, administrators and assigns, sold or let, or building or any other lease, for the purpose of building the expenses of making or maintaining the said park, or for any other purpose whatsoever, and so that no house or any other building be erected on such commons or waste lands except such lodges or other buildings as may be necessary for the maintenance or management of the said park or recreation ground within a period of five years from the date of the conveyance to the purchasers, then at the expiration of such period of five years, the said Charles Telford shall purchase, and the present purchasers shall convey to him, one undivided 24th part or share of the hereditaments and premises hereby contracted to be sold at or for the price or sum of £425, being an amount equal to that which he the said Charles Telford, will receive under this contract of the said sum of £10,200.

And a similar right of pre-emption of their respective shares of the manor was reserved to the other persons interested therein under the will of Elizabeth Keymer.

10. The contract for purchase by the said several parties mentioned by the 9th Article shall not interfere with the power of the parties hereto of the 4th part, or the survivor of them, or his heirs or assigns, as lords or lord of the said manor, to memorialise the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales and the Metropolitan Board of Works, or the local board, as the case may require, to cause or authorise the said commons to be enclosed under the provisions of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, provided that the scheme be not inconsistent with this agreement, and to act in all respects as lords or lord of the said manor in relation to such enclosure. And all parties hereto shall, if and so far as may be necessary, concur in the memorial and consequential proceedings under the Act.

11. If at any time within the said period of five years the dedication in manner aforesaid of the said commons or waste lands to the public shall be found to be, in the opinion of the purchasers, or of the survivor of them, impracticable, then the purchasers, or the survivor of them or their or his heirs or assigns shall be at liberty to give the respective vendors aforesaid, or the heirs, executors, or administrators of such of them as shall be then dead, notice in writing that the appropriation and dedication of the said commons and waste lands in manner aforesaid to the public has been found to be impracticable, and immediately upon the giving of such notice the provisions in the 9th Article shall come into operation and take effect as if the said period of five years had then expired and the commons and waste lands had not been dedicated to the public in manner aforesaid."

By a deed of conveyance dated the 17th Dec. 1868, the manor of Tooting Beck was conveyed to Drew and Flower. The deed was executed by Hudson and Willis, but the plaintiff and the other persons interested in the manor, under the will of Elizabeth Keymer, refused to execute the deed on the ground that the provisions were not in accordance with the agreement of the 10th July 1868. Accordingly an indenture dated the 31st May 1869, was indorsed upon the deed of the 17th Dec. 1868, and executed by all the persons interested, by which provisions substantially the same as those contained in the agreement of the 10th July 1868, were incorporated with the deed of conveyance.

On the 2nd Dec. 1868, in anticipation of the purchase by the Metropolitan Board of Works of the said common from Drew and Flower, a draft memorial from the Board to the Inclosure Commissioners of England and Wales was settled by counsel on behalf of the board. The memorial prayed for the preparation of a scheme, under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, respecting Tooting Beck Common, and was similar to the memorial set out below, except that no mention was made therein of a proposed sale, by the board, of any part of the common.

On the 8th Feb. 1869, a meeting of the Works and General Purposes Committee of the Metropolitan Board of Works was held, at which a report of W. W. Smith, the solicitor of the Board of Works relating to the purchase of the manorial rights in Tooting Beck Common was read. Mr. Smith discussed the form of the contract to be entered into for the purchase of these manorial rights by the board, and also mentioned a suggestion which had been made by the solicitors of Messrs. Drew and Flower that it would be advantageous to the board to sell a small piece of the waste of the manor which had been separated from the rest of the common by the West London and Crystal Palace Railway. Mr. Smith further drew attention to a report which had been made in Nov. 1866, as to the purchase of Tooting Beck Common, by Mr. Vulliamy the superintending architect of the board, which stated that if the board could sell certain parts of the common it might expect to be recouped 4000*l.* or 5000*l.* towards the purchase money.

On the 12th Feb. 1869, a meeting of the Board of Works was held, at which the report of the committee on the purchase of the manorial rights in Tooting Beck Common from Messrs. Drew and Fowler was presented. The contract for the purchase and also the draft memorial to the Inclosure Commissioners which had been settled by counsel as above-mentioned, were approved.

The contract for the purchase of the manorial rights was carried into effect by an agreement which was dated the 25th June 1869, and made between Drew and Flower of the one part, and the Metropolitan Board of Works of the other. This agreement recited the above-mentioned agreement of the 10th July 1868, and that the last mentioned agreement was entered into by Drew and Flower, with the knowledge and approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works, to the intent that the commons or waste lands belonging to the said manor might be dedicated to the public as a park or recreation ground under the provisions of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866. And that the said manor and premises were conveyed to Drew and Flower by an indenture dated the 17th Dec. 1868, subject to stipulations authorised by the said articles of agreement as modified or explained in an indenture dated the 31st May 1869, indorsed on the said conveyance. And that the Metropolitan Board of Works intended to take proceedings under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, in reference to the said commons or waste lands. And by the agreement of the 25th June 1869, it was agreed between the parties thereto that Drew and Flower, in pursuance of the object with which they bought the said manor, and to the intent that the same might be dedicated to the public as above mentioned, would transfer their purchase of and all their interest in, the said manor, commons, and waste lands under the thereinbefore recited agreement and conveyance, and the indorsement thereon respectively, to the Board of Works, and the said Board of Works would accept the transfer thereof upon the terms mentioned in the same agreement, and all the terms of the agreement should be considered as embodied mutatis mutandis, in the agreement now in statement, Drew and Flower assuming the place of the vendors, and the said Board of Works assuming the place of the purchasers in the recited agreement. And it was also agreed that Drew and Flower should, if required by the board, concur in the memorial to be presented by the board under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, for a scheme in reference to the said commons or waste lands, and in all consequential proceedings under such Act, and the said board should defray all the costs and expenses of Drew and Flowers, as well as of the board, in relation to such proceedings. A proviso was also contained in the agreement of the 25th June 1869, which enabled the Metropolitan Board of Works to determine that agreement, in case at any time before a scheme as to the said commons or waste lands should have been confirmed by Act of Parliament, the board should be of opinion that there would become payable under a scheme under the said Act in respect of any rights and interests not comprised in the said therein-recited agreement sums exceeding the sum of 4000*l.*, or in case a scheme as to the said commons or waste lands should not receive the sanction of Parliament under the said Act within three years from the date of that contract.

Having regard to the suggestions by the solicitor of Messrs. Drew and Flower as to the sale of a part of the common, and also to Mr. Vulliamy's report, it was considered desirable to introduce into the memorial to be presented by the board to the Inclosure Commissioners some reference to such a sale. The draft memorial was accordingly again settled by counsel on behalf of the board; and ultimately, in July 1869, a memorial was presented to the commissioners, of which the material parts were as follows:—

To the Inclosure Commissioners of England and Wales.

The Memorial of the Metropolitan Board of Works,

Sheweth,—That your memorialists, by the Act entitled the Metropolitan Commons Act, are declared to be, and are empowered to act thereunder, as the local authority of the metropolis in respect to all commons which are wholly or in part within the area defined by the Metropolis Management Act 1855.

That the common of Tooting Beck is within such area. The said common consists of about 144 acres, exclusive of the portions thereof occupied by two railways which run through it.

That Messrs. Beriah Drew and Philip William Flower, both residing within the parish of Streatham, some time since entered into an agreement with Messrs. Robert Hudson and Henry Willis, the lords of the manor of Tooting Beck, and the other persons interested under the will of Elizabeth Keymer, to purchase for the sum of 10,200*l.* the manor of Tooting Beck, with its rights, members, and appurtenances. . . . .

That it was represented to your memorialists by the said purchasers, that their object in making the said purchase was the having the said common dedicated to the public as a place of recreation, and such purchasers applied to your memorialists to take their purchase off their hands.

That your memorialists, having taken the matter into their consideration, and considering that the case was one in which a scheme might properly and with great advantage to the public be applied for under the provisions of the said Act, have entered into a contract with the said purchasers, the effect of such contract being substantially to take their place under the first-mentioned contract, your memorialists reserving power to cancel the agreement should a scheme not be obtained.

That the said purchase includes the purchase in fee-simple of the said common with the exception of the rights following. . . . . There is a small piece of the common separated from the remainder thereof by the West London and Crystal Palace Railway, which might be advantageously sold or let by the board, provided certain rights of pre-emption in case of the common not being wholly devoted to public purposes, should not be an obstacle to their so doing, and it may be desirable to deal with this in any scheme under the said Act.

Your memoralists pray that you will be pleased to take this memorial into your favourable consideration, and will direct such examination and inquiry as you may think necessary or proper in relation to the subject-matter thereof, and that if on examination and inquiry you should think fit so to do, you will be pleased to prepare the draft of a scheme under the said Act respecting the said common, and that thereupon such proceedings in reference to such draft scheme as are in that behalf provided by the said Act may be taken and had, and that a scheme may be finally settled and approved of by you in such form as you may think expedient as will be in conformity with the said Act, provision being made therein for your memoralists acquiring and making compensation for the rights above mentioned.

On the 17th Aug. 1869, a letter was written by order of the commissioners to the board, requesting the latter to prepare and forward a draft scheme under the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, for the dedication of Tooting Beck Common to the public.

A draft scheme was accordingly prepared on behalf of the board in Oct. 1869, and having been approved at a board meeting held on the 10th Dec. 1869 was forwarded to the commissioners on the 15th Dec. 1869.

In May 1870 a printed draft scheme was issued by the commissioners, which purported to be a draft scheme pursuant to the provisions of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866 for the establishment of local management with respect to Tooting Beck Common. Such scheme was in all respects identical with that prepared on behalf of the Metropolitan Board of Works. It recited the agreement of the 10th July 1868 and the agreement of the 25th June 1869; and recited also that the commons or waste lands belonging to the said manor were delineated on the plan annexed to the schedule to the scheme, and were in such plan coloured green and blue respectively; and that the piece of common delineated on the said plan and coloured blue, being of small extent, and being separated from the other and larger portion of the said commons or waste lands by the West London and Crystal Palace Railway, its dedication to the public would be of but slight advantage, and being property which could be sold or let to advantage, it would be more desirable if the same were sold or let with a view to the proceeds arising therefrom being applied in manner thereinafter mentioned; and that under the circumstances aforesaid it was desirable that such powers to sell or let such small piece of common should be conferred on the Metropolitan Board of Works as thereinafter appeared. And recited that it was intended that the Metropolitan Board of Works should carry into effect the said agreement of the 25th June 1869, and take a conveyance to the board of the said manor and premises thereby agreed to be sold, and should acquire all estates, interests, and rights of a profitable or beneficial nature, in over or affecting the said commons or waste lands, making or providing compensation for the same (if necessary) as provided by the 15th section of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866. The material provisions which were proposed by the draft scheme were as follows:—

From and after the completion of the said purchase by the board, the portion of the commons or waste lands delineated on the said plan, which is thereon coloured green (which portion is in this scheme referred to as "the common"), shall be, and is hereby dedicated to the public, as a park, common, or recreation ground, and shall for the purposes of this scheme, be regulated and managed by the board.

The powers of the board generally as to appointing officers and servants, and paying them under the al Acts applicable to the board, shall apply to all persons as, in the judgment of the board, may be sary and proper for the preservation of order on, he enforcement of bye-laws, with respect to, the land coloured blue, referred to in the draft e, and which it was thereby proposed to ow the board to sell or let, was the part of mmon separated from the remainder by the London and Crystal Palace Railway, as to le of which a suggestion had been made by the solicitors of Messrs. Drew and Flower, as above mentioned, and to which a reference had also been made in the memorial to the commissioners. This piece of land immediately adjoined the building land to which the plaintiff was entitled.

The scheme was promoted and supported by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and it was alleged in the bill that they intended to apply to Parliament for an Act to confirm the above scheme under the provisions of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866.

On the 24th June 1870, the plaintiff filed a bill against the Metropolitan Board of Works and Drew and Flower, charging that any opposition to the above scheme on his part either before the Inclosure Commissioners or in Parliament would, whether successful or not, be attended with considerable cost to the plaintiff, for which he would have no adequate remedy, and to which he ought not to be exposed. The bill prayed that the Metropolitan Board of Works and the other defendants, their respective officers, servants, and agents, might be restrained from promoting or supporting the aforesaid scheme, or any other scheme under or purporting to be under the provisions of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, whereby a part only and not the whole, of Tooting Beck Common aforesaid, or other the commons or waste lands of the said manor, should be dedicated to the public as a park or recreation ground, or whereby any part of Tooting Beck Common, or other the commons or waste lands of the said manor, should be sold or leased or made saleable or leasable, without the plaintiff's consent, or which should be otherwise inconsistent with the provisions contained in the agreements of the 10th July 1868, and the 31st May 1869, and from doing or causing or permitting to be done any other act or thing whereby or by means whereof the right of purchase, reserved as aforesaid to the plaintiff by the said agreements, or either of them, might be defeated, taken away, or prejudiced.

The material sections of the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866, being those referred to by the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, were as follows:

6. A scheme for the establishment of local management with a view to the expenditure of money on the drainage, levelling, and improvement of a metropolitan common, and to the making of bye-laws and regulations for the prevention of nuisances, and the preservation of order therein, may be made under this Act, on a memorial in that behalf, presented to the commissioners by the lord of the manor or by any commoners, or by the local authority, or in case of a common extending into the districts of two or more of the bodies described in the first schedule to this Act, then by any one or more of such bodies.

14. Every scheme shall state what rights (if any) claimed by any person, or class of persons, are affected by the scheme, and in what manner and to what extent they are affected thereby, and whether or not the scheme has been in relation thereto consented to by that person or class of persons, or any of them.

15. No estate, interest, or right of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting a common, shall, except with the consent of the person entitled thereto, be taken away or injuriously affected by any scheme, without compensation being made or provided for the same, and such compensation shall, in case of difference, be ascertained and provided in the same manner as if the same compensation were for the compulsory purchase and taking or the injurious affecting of lands under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts Amendment Act 1860.

16. If any person claiming any estate, interest, or right in, over, or affecting the common to which any scheme relates, is dissatisfied with any determination made or implied by the commissioners, or by the scheme concerning any estate, interest, or right in, over, or affecting the common, every such person may obtain a decision thereon in an action at law in the manner provided by sect. 56 of the general Act to facilitate the Inclosure and Improvement of Commons, passed in the session of the eighth and ninth years of the reign of her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and eighteen.

Kay, Q.C. and Stevens for the plaintiff, contended that the Inclosure Commissioners were exceeding the powers given them by the Metropolitan Commons Act 1866 in issuing a scheme containing the clauses of which the plaintiff complained. If the court would restrain the commissioners from issuing such a scheme, it would also restrain the Metropolitan Board of Works from promoting it. The court had jurisdiction to grant such an injunction.

Speer v. Crawter, 17 Ves. 216;
Prewin v. Lewis, 4 Myl. & Cr. 249.

It was alleged by the board that they were acting as the local authority under the Act. But their action was really based upon the private interest which they acquired under the agreement of the 25th June 1869.

Eddis, Q.C. and Charles Hall for the defendants, the Metropolitan Board of Works.—First, the injunction prayed would be entirely nugatory, as the matter has passed out of our hands; the Inclosure Commissioners are the persons who are acting, and who ought (if anybody) to be restrained. Secondly, we say that we are acting in this matter as the local authority under the Act, and this is really an application to the court to interfere with a body having public powers for the purpose of performing public duties. No injunction will be granted to restrain such a body from making an application to the Legislature for a public purpose.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I have no reason to doubt that the Board of Works have acted as they think right in the discharge of a public duty. I desire to make no observation which can in the least cast any imputation upon them for anything that they have done. The plaintiff also, as it seems to me, has acted for the clear protection of his legal rights. No attempt has been made, and no attempt could well be made, to find fault with any part of the conduct that he has thought it right to pursue. Having said that, the case is one which in its nature and elements is of the simplest possible kind. One of several persons, proprietors of Tooting Common, being also an owner of land which had been laid out for building purposes, and who, therefore, is naturally interested in the condition in which Tooting Common shall be kept—he and the other owners enter into a contract with two gentlemen, who seem to have acted from public motives, for the sale to them of Tooting Common, in order that it might be (for that was the ultimate object) devoted to the recreation and enjoyment of the public. That being his plain object, and the object of all the other landowners, and having in view his own interests also as an owner of land laid out for building purposes, he and they enter into the agreement which is stated in the bill. The agreement is as plain as it need be; perhaps it might have been expressed with greater distinctness, but it is sufficiently plain. The object of it is to provide, after regulating the terms of the purchase, that if by any accident the objects which the vendors have in view cannot be accomplished, namely, dedication to the public, and not omitting, as I cannot omit, circumstances which appeared of special interest to Mr. Telford, the plaintiff—if those objects cannot be accomplished, then the right to have back again that which they agreed should be sold should be reserved to the vendor, without reference to the particular nature of this property. That is a stipulation which a vendor might easily make in almost any instance of this kind. That is the agreement, and the plain agreement. If it is not dedicated to public purposes in the way that is shadowed out rather than expressed in the agreement, then we are to have it back again. Upon those terms Mr. Drew and Mr. Flower make this purchase. After having made the purchase, they communicate to the Metropolitan Board of Works, which is properly called the local authority by the Act of Parliament, that they have made this purchase; and in a memorial, which is in evidence, they state their motives for making the purchase, the object which should be accomplished by its being completed, and suggest to the Metropolitan Board of Works that in the discharge of their public duty they cannot do better than take the bargain off their hands. The Metropolitan Board of Works took that view of the subject themselves; and then we find an instrument set out in the pleadings which is as distinct as anything can be, namely, a contract between the Metropolitan Board of Works and Mr. Drew and Mr. Flower, which is made with reference to the original agreement. In express and explicit terms the Metropolitan Board of Works contract that if they became the purchasers (for in certain events they might not) they will take it in the same manner, and with the same rights and no other, and subject to the same obligations as Mr. Drew and Mr. Flower would have been if they had continued the owners. If Mr. Flower and Mr. Drew had remained the sole owners of this property, could it be argued for a moment that they could have shuffled off this obligation which they had taken upon themselves at one time? Of course no such contention could have been raised. Can it be said, since the Metropolitan Board of Works were competent to contract, and have contracted to be in the very shoes of Mr. Drew and Mr. Flower, that they can relieve themselves from the obligation which they have contracted? I cannot see any reason in law—certainly there cannot be any in morals or justice—why they should be heard to say so, or why they should say so. I take it that unless there is some principle beyond the law, or some rule with which I am unacquainted which shall be applied in favour of the Metropolitan Board of Works, there can be no grounds upon which they can be heard to say that they are entitled to do anything which is in contradiction of this very plain agreement. The proceedings which took place afterwards are all quite inconsistent with it. The first memorial to the Inclosure Commissioners which is drawn up recognises the rights of the vendor. By the time the second memorial came to be drawn up, another view had occurred to the Metropolitan Board of Works. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, although it has not been much dwelt upon, that it is in evidence that Mr. Vulliamy in his report had suggested to the Metropolitan Board of Works that that part of the land which is coloured blue, and which is the subject of this suit, might be profitably employed by them for the purpose of building, which would have been wholly subversive of the intention of the parties who entered into the agreement, and plainly detrimental to the interests of the public. Now that notion having been suggested, if that was the origin of it, whether that was regular or not, they in their new memorial addressed to the Inclosure Commissioners suggest that they might make useful employment of some part of the land which is not wanted for public purposes, and they have in view that the proceeds of it might be applied in diminution of the purchase money which they had paid. Now upon this application, when the commissioners were desired, as under the Act of Parliament it seems it ought to be original with them, to prepare a draft scheme, they requested that a scheme should be prepared. It is in consequence of that request that the memorialists took upon themselves, not unwillingly I dare say, to prepare that scheme which was afterwards submitted to the commissioners, and in which that stipulation which the plaintiff objects to was introduced. To say that the commissioners have suggested this would be merely to do violence to the very plain facts of the case. For saying that even in the memorial itself there is any pretence on the part of the Metropolitan Board of Works, in the discharge of public duties, to acquire the land and to get rid of the obligation, there is no foundation whatever. The Metropolitan Board of Works have only a plain duty to perform. The Act of Parliament points it out distinctly, and as distinctly points out the duty of the commissioners. What the Metropolitan Board of Works want, in plain English, is to make money by this transaction. They do not conceal it. If they had attempted to do so it would have been in vain, because it is plain upon the face of it. They say they are acting in pursuance of the Commons Inclosure Act of 1866. Now see what the nature of the Act of 1866 is. It first of all takes away the power which the Inclosure Commissioners had to inclose commons. There is to be no inclosure of metropolitan commons, but instead of that, to maintain the useful objects which the Legislature have in view, the commissioners are authorised to make schemes for the management of commons. The first section having taken away the power to which I have referred, the sixth section, which seems to me to be most important, is this. (His Honour read the sixth section of the Act.) That is the only power which I can find. The memorial presented to the commissioners does not follow that provision of the Act of Parliament. It is not that they desire the approbation of the commissioners either for the local management or the expenditure of money in draining, levelling, and improving the common, all of which are perfectly within their power, but what they do ask is this: We have entered into an agreement to buy as if we were individuals (not in the exercise of our powers as the Metropolitan Board of Works) for a sum of money this common; we desire your assistance under this Act of Parliament for draining, levelling, managing, preparing bye-laws, and so on; and, besides that, we beg to communicate that, although the Act of Parliament gives you no power to deal with this subject at all, yet, if by twisting further words (which are hereafter to be referred) to you can put us in a way to make some money by this transaction, we desire to have the authority, protection, and guarantee of your power in order to enable us to do that thing. We did enter into a bargain; we are tired of it, we think we can make money by breaking it, and we ask you to help us to do that. That is the plain English of the transaction. The Act of Parliament is invoked. The Act of Parliament provides, with perfect reason and propriety, the means by which it shall be done. The commissioners ought to have prepared the scheme themselves. It is of no great importance that they did not, but they trusted the Metropolitan Board of Works to make the scheme. For two months after that they were to receive objections in writing, but no question arises about the time, because the objections were sent in in sufficient time. They are to consider any suggestion or objection that may be made. (His Honour then read the 14th section of the Act.) The scheme here referred to is a scheme for the establishment of local management, and expenditure of money in draining and levelling, and making bye-laws for the preservation of roads, and so on. What other scheme is contemplated by this Act of Parliament? The meaning of the word "scheme" in the 6th section is in point of fact confined to a scheme of this nature; and I am of opinion that it must be so confined in every other provision of the Act of Parliament upon which so much reliance has been placed. They are wholly inapplicable to this case. (His Honour then read the 15th section of the Act.) Then by the 16th section, if any person claiming any estate, and so on, shall be dissatisfied with the determination of the commissioners, then they may bring an action under the old Act of Parliament. I was at a loss during the argument to find out for myself any reason why the Metropolitan Board of Works could, with any reason, ask the commissioners (under the pretence that there was some interest, profitable or beneficial, the extinction of which was necessary to making that scheme) that the only scheme which the Act of Parliament authorised to be made should be abrogated, or that the persons who had entered into that agreement should be absolved from the performance of it. In my opinion there is nothing in the Act which at all justifies any such view of the case. The main stress of the argument which Mr. Eddis has urged so ably and so fully is, that no such relief as the plaintiff asks in this case can be given to him, because it would in fact be restraining an application to Parliament by a public body in the discharge of a public duty, and in which public interests are concerned. I thought that the law on this subject was at least as well settled as any other law of this court. You cannot restrain a man from going to Parliament on public grounds; you cannot usurp that authority which rests only with the Legislature; you can shut no man's mouth; but if he is going on in violation of a plain contract, which is personal to himself, with which the public interests have nothing whatever to do, you cannot under the pretence that he is going to Parliament refuse the relief which, if there were no question about Parliament, this court would be bound to give. That I take to be this case. I am not sure that there ever will be any application to Parliament. I am quite sure that there is no application to Parliament now in sight, because the commissioners, although they have been induced, to a certain extent, to adopt the draft scheme which has been sent them, have done so only for the purpose of inviting objections which may be made to it. In most express terms by their draft scheme they invite objections to be made to it; they take on themselves no responsibility; they have not exceeded their authority, or confirmed in the slightest degree any scheme which is laid before them. On the contrary, on the face of their scheme, which is not their affair, but the affair of the defendants, the Metropolitan Board of works, they state broadly the grounds by which anybody who might read the paper might see that these objections might be taken. They furnish information, and then ask if anybody has any objection to make to it. That is all that passed; that is the state of things so far as the Inclosure Commissioners are concerned. I do not find any fault with the Inclosure Commissioners. They have performed a sort of ministerial office in the manner which might be expected from them. They seem, moreover, if I may take the liberty of saying so, and I only make the remark because they are absent persons, to have properly exercised their discretion in the matter. They have not decided in favour of the one or the other, but have left the whole matter entirely open. I cannot consider that this case is within the scope of those authorities which have been referred to, all of which decisions, be it observed, were pronounced by the court with evident reluctance, and dislike, only yielding to what is the law and authority of this court; but their own sense of right ran directly opposite to it. I can find no certain necessity for going to Parliament. Nothing in the injunction which is here asked, either in terms or effect, seeks to control the power which the Metropolitan Board of Works, or any body else in this country, has to go to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining an Act, if they can, to authorise them to do the thing which they wish. I am obliged, admitting the entire and full authority of all those cases, to disregard them as inapplicable to this case. The real question in this suit is whether the Metropolitan Board of Works can, by a strong hand, by the construction which they put on this Act of Parliament, which I think is a wrong one, and which is unusual, place this plaintiff in this position;—that he must go before the commissioners, fight his battle with them as best he can, and then, in the event of a Bill being carried into Parliament, present his petition against it there, and there encounter difficulty, trouble, and expense, which no success would adequately recompense him for; and that for no reason but because the Metropolitan Board of Works have taken it into their heads that they can make a profit out of this piece of land purchased, and make a profit in a manner different to that which was contemplated by them when they entered into the contract, and totally opposed to that power which the Act of Parliament enables them to derive from the purchase which they have made. Mr. Charles Hall argued that, being the local authority, it was in their power to present a memorial to the commissioners whenever they thought fit. I cannot restrain any lawful power which they may possess; but in granting the injunction, as I do, in the terms in which it is prayed by the bill, I simply preserve a plain, honest, distinct contract between a vendor and purchaser, and refuse to permit the purchaser to take more under the contract than he fairly bargained for, or intended to pay for. An injunction must therefore be granted in the terms of the prayer of the bill, and the costs of the plaintiff must be paid by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The costs of the defendants, Drew and Flower, will be paid by the plaintiffs, who will add them to their own.

PRESTON v. THE CORPORATION OF GREAT YARMOUTH.

Corporation—Mortgage of rates—Local Act—Provision for repayment by ballot—Right of mortgagee to repayment of principal — Account — Receiver.

The corporation of a borough were, by their local Act, authorised to raise a certain sum of money for the purposes therein mentioned, by mortgage of the general district rates. In the form of mortgage prescribed by the Act no time was specified for the repayment of the money; and the only mode of repayment mentioned in the Act was that the corporation should yearly and every year pay off 100*l.*, at the least, of the moneys borrowed on the credit of the Act, and the particular mortgage to be paid off was to be ascertained by ballot.

On a bill filed by a mortgagee to have the principal moneys owing to him paid off and for a receiver,

Held, that the mortgagee was not entitled to be paid the principal sums owing to him, except by the means and in the manner provided by the local Act.

Semble, the court will not appoint a receiver of parish rates.

THIS suit was instituted by Isaac Preston on behalf of himself and all other the mortgagees of the general district rates of the town of Great Yarmouth, except such of the mortgagees who did not wish to be paid off, against the corporation of that town, and Mary Leeds, who represented the mortgagees who did not wish to be paid off.

By the Great Yarmouth Local Act (50 Geo. 3), certain commissioners were appointed to carry the Act, which was entitled "An Act for the better Paving, Lighting, Cleaning, and Watching the Town of Great Yarmouth, in the County of Norfolk, and for Removing Nuisances and Annoyances therein, and for making other Improvements in the said Town," into execution.

For the purpose of raising money to defray the charges and expenses of obtaining the Act and carrying the same into execution, it was (by sect. 76) enacted that the commissioners should, and they were thereby authorised and required, once in every year to rate and assess the several landlords and owners, and the several tenements and occupiers of all houses, buildings, and other hereditaments within the town of Great Yarmouth which were rated or assessed to the relief of the poor of the parish, in any sum not exceeding 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. By sects. 78 and 84, provision was made for the appointment, by the commissioners, of assessors for making the rates and assessments from time to time, and of collectors for receiving, levying, and recovering payment of the same. By sect. 96 it was enacted that in order to enable the commissioners to carry the Act into immediate execution it should be lawful for them from time to time to borrow such sum or sums of money so as that the sum borrowed should not at any one time exceed in the whole the sum of 20,000*l.*, as they should judge necessary for the purposes of the Act, upon the credit of the rates, assessments, and moneys to be made, levied, collected, and received by virtue of the Act, and by writing under their hands and seals to assign all or any part of the said rates, &c., to such person or persons as should lend or advance any money thereon as a security for the principal money to be advanced, with interest for the same.

By the form of mortgage prescribed by the Act the commissioners granted and assigned unto the mortgagee such proportion of the rates to be raised and collected by virtue of the Act, as the sum advanced should bear to the whole sum borrowed "to be had and holden" until the sum advanced, with interest, should be repaid and satisfied; but there was no time specified in the mortgage for the repayment of the principal moneys so advanced. All the assignments were to be numbered consecutively, and "every such security shall be good, valid, and effectual, and shall entitle the person or persons to whom the same shall be made his, her, or their executors, administrators, and assigns, to the payment thereof, and to all profit and advantage thereof, according to the true intent and meaning of this Act."

The commissioners were also empowered by sect. 97 to raise any part of the money to be borrowed by virtue of the Act by granting life annuities.

By sect. 99 it was enacted that the commissioners should yearly, and every year after the expiration of three years from the commencement of the Act, pay off and discharge the sum of 100*l.* at the least of the moneys borrowed on the credit of the Act, together with the interest due thereon; and the particular mortgage to be paid off was to be ascertained by ballot, but nothing therein contained was to be construed to extend so as to enable or require the commissioners to pay off and discharge any of the annuitants until all the other creditors on the rates should be paid off and discharged.

The next section provided that if the commissioners could at any time borrow money at a lower rate of interest than the assignments which should be then in force should bear, it should be lawful for them to charge the rates with such sum of money as they should think proper, to pay off and discharge the assignments bearing a higher rate of interest. And it was enacted (sect. 101) that all the moneys to arise by virtue of the rates, &c., to be levied by virtue of the Act, and which might be borrowed on the credit thereof, or advanced for annuities, should be paid to the treasurer to the commissioners, or such other person as they should appoint, and should be applied in the first place in paying and defraying the charges and expenses incident to the obtaining and passing of the Act, and in the next place in carrying out the purposes for which the Act was passed, "and for such other uses and purposes as are herein expressed, and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever."

In exercise of the powers contained in this Act, the commissioners in the year 1837 borrowed various sums of money, amounting altogether to about 15,000*l.*

By an order of the General Board of Health, made in pursuance of the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, and confirmed by an Act passed in 1851, the Mayor and Corporation of Great Yarmouth were instituted the local board of health for that town, and the powers, authorities, and duties under the local act, so far as they were not thereby repealed, were vested in the local board of health, and thereupon the powers and duties relating to the mortgages of the rates became vested in the present defendants.

In 1869 the plaintiff gave the defendants notice to pay off the mortgages which he held.

This the defendants refused to do on the grounds that they were not bound by the provisions of the local Act to pay off more than 100*l.* per annum.

The plaintiff then filed his bill by which he prayed for an account of what was due to himself and the other mortgagees of the rates, for an account of the rates levied since 1851, and for a receiver.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said: I have now heard this case argued at very great length. If I thought any further consideration would induce me to change the opinion I have already formed, of course I should consider my judgment; but I must say that it appears to me very reasonably clear that the plaintiff's claims in this suit cannot be sustained. That the case is one of entire novelty is not be disputed, unless, indeed, Drewry v. Barnes (3 Rus. 94) is to be called an exception to that universal novelty. In this country there are numerous municipal corporations and other such like bodies, who are authorised to execute certain public purposes, and have given to them the power of levying rates for the purpose of accomplishing those purposes, and as an incident they have very commonly, indeed, almost universally, the power of borrowing money. The question in this suit is as to the repayment of the money, and that question is, in my opinion, to be determined wholly upon the provisions of this Act of Parliament of 1837. The cases upon railways and tolls, and market places, where the beneficial interest in the tolls is vested in the owners of the property, are altogether distinguishable from the present case. The commissioners originally but now the corporation are to derive no kind of benefit from the rates. Their duty is to make a rate and to provide by that rate for the payment of all that is properly payable out of the rate, but not one shilling more. And when Mr. Eddis insists that the instances of granting receivers have been very numerous, there is not one to be found that I know of in which it has ever entered the mind of the court that it could appoint a receiver of parish rates. Nor do I see how it would be practicable, not even if resort were had to that machinery provided by the Railway Acts and by the Local Board Act in this case of applying to the justices to appoint a receiver; because the duty of making a rate as incidental to the discharge of that duty ought to be limited by the payments necessary to be made out of the rates; and if it could be brought to an arithmetical nicety and point they ought not to levy by rates one sixpence more than is enough to pay for paving, lighting, and watching, the salaries of the officers whom they are required to appoint, and all the other expenses incidental to the discharge of the public duties which are intrusted to them. And if a receiver were appointed what would the receiver do, whether justices appointed him or this court? There would be nothing for him to receive, for it is admitted, that whenever in a railway case you appoint a receiver, you must authorise him first to pay all the going expenses of the railway, and he can only pay into court that which is profit belonging to the company. This Act of Parliament, the recital of which is that the streets and so on of Yarmouth are not properly paved and watched, and that they are much incommoded by various annoyances and encroachments, goes on to constitute commissioners for the purpose of performing the repairs and doing other things which are necessary, and it empowers the commissioners to enter into contracts for that purpose, that is to say, to incur expenses, and do a variety of other things which are incidental to the office imposed upon them by the Legislature. In ordered to do this they are empowered to borrow money upon the credit of the rates. They are directed to make rates with the help of assessors, and the manner in which the rates are to be made is pointed out in the Act of Parliament. I need not particularly refer to the clauses, but they are rates for the purpose of completing and executing this Act of Parliament and the purposes mentioned in this Act of Parliament. The 96th section is the first which enables the commissioners to borrow money. In order to enable the commissioners to carry this Act into immediate execution, they may borrow sums not exceeding 20,000*l.*, upon the credit of the rates to be made and levied by virtue of this Act, and then there is a form of assignment by which they are to assign the rates for the purpose of securing payment of the money which is set out in the 96th section. The form has been read, and it is unnecessary to repeat it, for it is in the universal form, assigning the whole of the rates. It directs that they shall be numbered, commencing with No. 1, and so on, and shall entitle the person to whom the same shall be made to the payment thereof, and to all profit and advantage therein according to the true intent and meaning of this Act, words which do not appear in the Bill, and which have been very little attended to in the course of the argument. But that part of the 96th section, which points out that the payment of the rates is to be according to the true intent and meaning of this Act, makes it, as I have said, a question upon the construction of this Act. Then the 97th clause provides for payment of annuities. The 99th is, in the marginal note, called a provision for the repayment of creditors by ballot, and it goes on to provide that "The commissioners shall every year pay off and discharge 100*l.* at the least of the moneys borrowed on the credit of this Act." And with that exception there is not a word in the Act of Parliament about the payment of the moneys advanced. The payment of the interest is most carefully provided for, but the payment of the principal is nowhere suggested, nor was it within the meaning of the Legislature in passing this Act nor within the meaning of the persons who lent their money. It is said that it is very hard they should have to wait 150 years before they are paid. That is a somewhat exaggerated mode of putting it, because if the commissioners choose to make a larger rate, or their bonds were drawn by ballot, they might be paid off earlier. However that may be, it would alter the construction of the Act of Parliament, which, as I read it, is very distinct and clear; and I beg to draw attention to the 101st section of the Act, which provides that all money to be raised and which may be due and acquired thereon, or advanced on notes, and so on, shall be paid and expended for public purposes, and the clause ends with "and for such other uses and purposes as are herein expressed, and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatever." The commissioners no doubt have power and are obliged to pay off the bonds to the extent of 100*l.* a year at least, and they are empowered, if they think fit, and the circumstances of the borough should render it expedient, so that in the discharge of their duty they may recommend it, they may raise more money, and if they do, they may pay off the bonds. But beyond that the moneys raised are to be applied for no other use, intent, or purpose whatever than is expressed in this Act of Parliament. I cannot read in this Act of Parliament any intention on the part of the commissioners, or the Legislature, or the lenders, that there should be any other mode of payment than that which is prescribed by the ballot section, nor can I believe that there was any such intention. It would be monstrous to suppose that those persons who lent 15,000*l.* for the present exigencies of the town of Yarmouth, should be able at the end of six months to insist upon payment from its then existing occupiers of houses of the whole 15,000*l.* which was borrowed. The other is a reasonable and proper construction, to pay off 100*l.* a year—that is not less than 100*l.* a year, and as much more as they can afford which relieves the general burden. In the meanwhile, what hardship can the lenders be under? They can transfer their securities, I do not say they are obliged, but I say that the security in their hands is the most easily con-le security possible, and it removes entirely hem the suggestion that they lie under any ıip, because they cannot compel present pay- ıt the end of six months if they choose to give requiring payment. Then is this in the est degree like the case of railways? A rail- r beneficial enjoyment of tolls, or a corpora- rhich has houses in the town, and cattle and stalls in a market place, draws a ıe from it, and nothing can be more reason- ıan that a receiver should be appointed for But what can be so unreasonable as that a er should be appointed of these rates, and so useless and absurd? If they do that, and no more, or if they ɔut a very small sum beyond, that is all ding to every principle in which receivers ɔpointed in railway cases), the bondholders sist upon having paid to their receiver. I do op to dwell upon the great inconvenience of ıting a receiver. I do not know how the er would discharge his duty, nor how, under ces' order, he would levy distress upon the ten- nd so on. Perhaps he might be able to do that; ıis I am persuaded of, no justice of the peace ly advised would appoint a receiver unless w there was something to be received, and it was right that what was to be received l be applied in the way which is here sug- l. The only case which has any application matter at all was that case of Drury v. s (3 Rus. 94.) The other cases were all d the question. The case most relied on, ɔpkins v. The Worcester Canal Company ep. 6 Eq. 437), is not to be disputed for nent. They might make a rate which did not le for the interest upon the money, and in ase in the Court of Queen's Bench a manda- would, as the Lord Chancellor, then the Master of the Rolls, pointed out, ordinarily lie. Not only the mandamus might be obtained there, compelling the commissioners to make a proper and sufficient rate, but the court would then decide whether that rate should comprehend the payment of any of those moneys which had been lent, and direct the application of a rate when levied and received. That is a plain, familiar, and easy remedy. That is, as Lord Lyndhurst pointed out, the remedy that ought to be applied for in Drury v. Barnes; and to ask this court to prescribe to the commissioners what sort of a rate they shall make, and of what amount, would be asking this court to do what it never has done and never can do. The case of Fletcher v. Gibbon (23 Beav. 212), just as little applies to this case. In the case of Gibbon v. Fletcher, the bill was dismissed with costs by Lord St. Leonards, but after the Vice-Chancellor had made a decree which was much more favourable to him, directing certain accounts. Fletcher v. Gibbon was a totally different case, there being a ballot clause in the Act there, and Mr. Fletcher insisting that he ought to have been paid as well as the other persons who had had the benefit of the ballot; he had been baffled by the objections of Mr. Gibbon and the other people, on which he filed a bill complaining that the commissioners had misapplied the moneys that came into their hands, by which means he did not receive his share, and the Master of the Rolls so decided, and he not only so decided, but he decided there should be an account taken of the moneys which the commissioners had received, which would include all that they ought to have distributed by ballot, and to ascertain whether any of the money remained in their hands, or for which they were accountable, a very plain and distinct relief; but the Master of the Rolls stopped there. He did nothing as to further rights, nothing in the way of appointing a receiver. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that this proceeding has been wholly misconceived, that the effect of the Act of Parliament has not been comprehended; that the relief asked is a relief which this court in this case cannot grant, and that the bill therefore must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

SAVILE v. KILNER.

Nuisance—Glass works—Smoke and vapour—Delay—Injunction.

The owners of certain glass works which were erected in 1845, erected in the year 1847 and subsequent years down to 1863 seven new furnaces, which largely increased the amount of smoke and vapour which was emitted from their works. The plaintiff who was the owner of property adjoining the works which he and his predecessors in title had enjoyed long antecedent to the erection of the works, had at considerable expense prepared a portion of his estate for building purposes, but in consequence of the smoke and vapours from the glass works he had been unable to let the land for that purpose.

Upon a bill filed in March 1870, for an injunction to restrain the emission of smoke and vapours from the new works,

Held, that the plaintiff was not barred by delay, but that he was entitled to an injunction as to the whole of the new works, although one of the chimneys was erected more than twenty years before the filing of the bill.

THIS suit was instituted by Mr. Henry Savile, the owner of an estate called the Thornhill estate, near the town of Dewsbury, to restrain the defendants, the Messrs. Kilner, from causing or permitting dense black smoke and vapours to be emitted from their works, to the damage and injury of the plaintiff and his tenants, and for damages.

The defendants were the proprietors of certain glass works, called the "Providence Glass Works," situate at Thornhill Lees on the south and west sides of the Thornhill estate.

These glass works were first commenced about the year 1845, when one furnace was erected. In the year 1847 another furnace was erected, and these two furnaces were commonly called "the old works." In addition to these, other works, commonly called "the new works," had, since the year 1847, been constructed near the old works. These new works comprised seven furnaces, which were erected at the following periods: one in the year 1847, one in the year 1853, two in the year 1859, one in the year 1861, and the remaining two in the year 1863.

The fires in these furnaces being kept burning day and night, inclusive of Sundays, there was scarcely any cessation of the smoke from these works. The plaintiff alleged that this smoke issued in dense black clouds and spread over his estate, especially over a certain portion of it, which was rising ground, the chief value of which consisted in its being well adapted for the erection of villa residences and dwelling houses of a superior character, but which land, in consequence of the smoke from the defendants' works, he was not able to let for that purpose, and that the vegetation on the estate suffered considerably. In 1862 the plaintiff's agent, Mr. Lipscomb, spoke to the defendants about their works being a nuisance to the plaintiff's property.

In March 1866 the defendants promised to ascertain if there were any means by which the smoke could be prevented, and if there were to adopt them, but nothing was done by them towards lessening the nuisance. In Nov. 1868, Lipscomb wrote to the defendants, stating that two years had elapsed since they promised to abate the nuisance, and that during that time instead of the smoke having diminished it had greatly increased. To this letter Lipscomb received a reply that they had been trying to reduce the amount of smoke, but found it quite impossible, but that they were quite willing to adopt any plan that was feasible.

From inquiries which Lipscomb made he ascertained that there was a process which had been invented by a Mr. Siemens for the consumption of smoke, and in March 1869, he referred the defendants to Mr. Siemens for further information on the subject. Finding, however, that the defendants took no steps to lessen the nuisance, Lipscomb, in September 1869, informed them that he should put the matter into the hands of the plaintiff's solicitor, and on the 2nd March 1870, the present bill was accordingly filed.

The defendants by their answer denied that any nuisance was caused to the plaintiff by the smoke from their works, but that the smoke arose from other works upon and adjacent to the plaintiff's land, and they submitted that the plaintiff was barred by his acquiescence from obtaining the relief which he now sought. The facts appear more fully in the judgment.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—In this case a landed proprietor, who has at great expense prepared his land for building purposes, finds that his expectations are frustrated by reason of the existence of what he calls a nuisance in the neighbourhood. He files his bill to be relieved against that nuisance, and he alleges in his bill that the nuisance consists of the emission of smoke and noxious vapours, to an extent which is destructive of, or injurious to, vegetation, and he further says that, the consequence of the existence of the nuisance is, that the enjoyment by him of his land is interfered with, that he is unable to apply his land to the purposes for which he desires to do so, and therefore he asks for relief. That is a case, so far as I have stated it, which, if it is made out in evidence, most perfectly justifies the application to the court, and leaves the court no alternative but to accede to the complaint which is made. A great deal has been said about the allegations in the Bill not being sufficient. In my opinion they are quite sufficient, not only to state the complaint, but to let in every kind of evidence, however particular or minute it may be, which is not in conflict with, or different from, the complaint which is made in the bill. I say so in the beginning before I go into the evidence, because a great many observations which have been addressed to me have been upon the ground that the defendants were taken by surprise in some degree by reason of the sort of evidence that was adduced against them; and, moreover, that the relief asked was more extensive than the statement in the bill justifies. The defendants, in the 12th paragraph of their answer, describe the mode of carrying on their manufacture: "The metal or materials for glass in each furnace are first founded or fused together, and then worked into glass bottles, two processes which are distinct, and carried on by two distinct sets of workmen. The founding occupies from ten to fifteen hours, and is carried on principally during the night, and while it is being carried on, the furnace in which it is so carried on is fired; that is to say, the fire therein is made up and supplied with fuel at intervals of about fifteen to twenty minutes, and the founding is necessarily continued during Sundays, because, if it were not, the metal would cool;" and so on. "When the founding is complete, and the metal is ready for the glass bottle makers, which does not take place at any particular time of the day, the glass bottle makers are summoned and begin their work which they carry on until the metal is worked up, except that they do not work during Sundays. The working up of each batch of metal, the result of each founding, is termed in the trade a journey, and there are usually five foundings and five journeys at each furnace in each week, and each journey usually occupies about eleven hours, and during each journey the furnace at which the same is being carried on is fired usually at intervals of about every three hours." The 14th paragraph is this: "During the founding, visible smoke usually issues from the chimney of the furnace in which the founding is being carried on, and this becomes somewhat denser when the furnace is fired, and for a short time afterwards, but the smoke is not unusually dense or continuous, and is usually dissipated before it reaches the said rising ground on the plaintiff's estate, though some part of it occasionally in a visible form extends over the lower and nearer portions of the plaintiff's estate, but not so as to occasion any nuisance thereto. During the bottle making there is usually a cessation of visible smoke, except shortly after the furnace is fired." I have read that for the purpose of showing what the nature of the works carried on by the defendants is, and what the plaintiff alleges to be a nuisance. To make that description complete, it is necessary to refer to the evidence of Mr. Cocker, who is employed to inspect nuisances in the district in which this manufacture of glass bottles is carried on. He says that "the issue of dense black smoke from one or more of the chimneys in the said glass works occurs daily, and during a great part of each day, and is so frequent at times as to be almost continuous, whilst some are sending out black smoke others less recently fired emit dense vapours of a blueish colour, which are sulphurous to the taste and smell. From my knowledge of manufactories in general, and having had my attention specially directed to the conditions under which black smoke is produced in them, I say that the nature of the defendants' said works, the size and extent thereof, and the vast quantity of coal which they use, and which I know to be for the most part the smallest refuse coal, are causes which necessitate the issue of black smoke for a great part of each day and night, and in great volume." He says the defendants consume 50 tons of coals a day, and, from observations which he made, he states that during 663 minutes out of the thirteen hours comprised in the periods of observation, there was dense smoke issuing from the said new works. In a further paragraph he says: "The quantity of smoke issued from the said works is so great, and the duration of the issue thereof is such as to bring a large portion of the estate of the plaintiff under the influence of the said smoke, especially that portion of it which lies east, north-east, and south-east from the said works, because the wind is more frequently in a quarter to carry the smoke in one of those directions than any other." He further says "I should have laid an information against the defendants before any other person on account of the nuisance caused by the smoke from their said works being far greater than any other case I have had to deal with, but I have not yet been in a position to prove to the magistrates as required by the Sanitary Amendment Act 1866, that the defendants do not as far as practicable consume the smoke from their said works, having regard to the nature of their trade." That refers to the Sanitary Act, under which there is a summary proceeding to be taken before the magistrates, or, if necessary, there may be an indictment. The proceeding before the magistrates is that which he particularly alludes to here, for the magistrates sitting in petty sessions would not have authority to entertain any complaint made to them unless it could be shown that the parties summoning the defendants as they have been called, had neglected to do all that was by them practicable to consume their smoke, having regard to their trade. Now that is the nature of the nuisance complained of, and that is the working described by the defendants themselves in their answer. In my opinion it is a nuisance which is indictable at law; but then, to that is added the evidence of several other witnesses, who say that they have traced, and examined, and watched the smoke coming from the defendants' factory, and they have ascertained, by taste and smell, that it is sulphurous, and unpalatable. Other witnesses prove that for a very considerable distance a volume of this, which is proved to be dense smoke, and in very large quantities, extends itself over, in whatever direction the wind may be, from the defendants' works. That, in my opinion, goes very far to prove the case which the plaintiff has alleged. In addition to that, there is a piece of evidence which is of very considerable weight. It was said by the plaintiff, in the first set of affidavits, that tenants had been injured, and crops had been damaged, and the attention of the defendants is drawn to that when they are preparing their evidence. A man named Rufus Mann, who was the tenant of two farms, part of the Thornhill estate, and very nearly adjoining to the defendants' works, said that his father had suffered for years from this; that he had complained—not that he had complained to the defendants—but that he himself had complained of it; that, his complaint being unattended to, he had got a valuer to ascertain the amount of the damage which had been done to his crops by reason of the smoke issuing from the defendant's factories, that he had demanded payment, that they had refused it, and that he had brought an action for it. The defendants, in their answer, admit that he has brought an action, but they deny that they have done any injury whatever to his crops. But in their affidavit they are also required to state, and are compelled by the truth and exigency of the case to state, that with respect to three other tenants, only a little nearer to them than Rufus Mann, they have been for years in the habit of making compensation for the damage which their smoke has done to the agricultural land, sometimes in the shape of a solid payment of money as compensation for damage, sometimes by buying the damaged crops at the market price. There is a great deal of other evidence to which I need not advert more particularly, by persons resident in the neighbourhood, driving along the roads, visiting at the plaintiff's house, and particularly the evidence of Mr. Wilmot, who says, that on Sundays, at a time when the other factories were not working, he traced and saw the issuing of the smoke, the direction it went in, the mischief it did, felt the unpleasant consequences of it, and proved in the clearest possible manner, almost to demonstration, that the nuisance complained of did and does exist, and that it is caused solely by the defendants' works and manufactory. He says, moreover—and that leads me to another topic which has been greatly discussed—something as to the injury done to the trees. Now, I have said that the general complaint in the bill shows that enough injury has been done for an action at common law, and I know not why it is not enough for a bill in this court. It is proved, and it is not disputed, that the trees in the plaintiff's grounds had been some of them killed, and others of them injured by the smoke proceeding from the defendants' factories. It is suggested that, inasmuch as there is another plantation in the neighbourhood where the trees, in the opinion of some of the defendants' witnesses, are not so much damaged as to justify the plaintiff's complaint in that respect, that therefore the trees in the plaintiff's grounds cannot have been so much injured as he says. But, consider for a moment. If that was the defendants' case, they would only have to say, "let us look at your trees, give us access to your plantations, let us offer evidence on the same subject." Nothing of the sort is done; and it is not in their mouths now to say that the evidence on the subject is imperfect. They have not cross-examined the plaintiff and his witnesses on the subject of the trees. They are content to leave it on the statement as he makes it, only saying, there is another plantation in which the trees have not been damaged, and we do not believe your trees are so much damaged as you say. The mischief done to the vegetation, including agricultural lands, and the injury which is done to the trees is made out, in my opinion, with perfect distinctness. The personal injury is not much relied upon. It is suggested in the bill, but only in the way of an annoyance. But if the defendants' dense smoke does produce disagreeable tastes in the mouths of the people who are passing that neighbourhood, why are they not to be protected against that nuisance as well as any other? It is only necessary you should prove it is hurtful to life and that it diminishes the ordinary enjoyments of life. No man has a right to interfere with the supply of pure air, which is as much the right of the plaintiff as is the right to the soil of which he is owner; no man has a right to interfere with it, and that it is interfered with the evidence establishes beyond all doubt. It is suggested that there are manufacturers in the neighbourhood who employ sulphur in their works to a very considerable extent, and that the effect of the sulphur so employed by them may have been to destroy the trees. One of those men, Mr. Wormald, has been examined as a witness and he says, "We did and still do use a great quantity of sulphur, but as it was found to be injurious we now dispose of it, by sending it up a certain chimney and in other ways it is effectually carried off." If there was any ground for the suggestion that is made in argument, would it have been possible for the defendants, with such a case as I have now suggested, to refrain from cross-examining Mr. Wormald? If Mr. Wormald's statement upon that had contained an evasion or equivocation, it would have been exploded with the first five minutes of cross-examination. They do not choose to do that, and the evidence comes before the court on a positive statement by a credible witness that that which has once been a nuisance, if nuisance it was, has been effectually cured. In my opinion, that evidence and that view of the case effectually disposes of all that has been said about the possibility of this inconvenience proceeding from Cook and Wormald's factory. Then, as to the injury and the diminution of light to the plaintiff's property, it is proved without contradiction. Several witnesses prove that the land is well adapted for building purposes, that it might be beneficially enjoyed by the plaintiff if it could be so applied, and he is prevented from so applying it simply by the nuisance which the defendants have brought upon the place. Upon every ground, therefore, I think the plaintiff has established a case upon which he is entitled to the relief for which he asks. It was suggested in the course of the argument, that if he cannot build houses there he may build cottages. That is really no answer; because it is for the plaintiff himself to decide what to put upon his land; and, if his right is that the air is his as much as the land, it is not for anybody to prescribe to him how he shall build. He has stated a very satisfactory reason why he wants to apply the land to the particular purpose to which he intends to apply it; and the defendants are bound to leave him in the enjoyment of that which is his own, and to carry on their manufactory in some way which will not inflict upon him the great and grievous nuisance which is complained of by the bill and proved by the evidence. It is now only necessary to observe what has been said about delay and acquiescence. Now, the ground of acquiescence has been mentioned in the cases, all of which are perfectly familiar, of which, perhaps, the case of Tipping v. The St. Helen's Smelting Company (L. Rep. 1 Ch. 66) is, I do not say the most remarkable, but a case where the matter was discussed with great care, and in which the principles of the law are stated with the greatest clearness and force. The plaintiff is accused of having delayed, for such a time as to deprive him of his right. I am at a loss to understand exactly what that means. In the old practice of this court you came for an interlocutory injunction, the court let it stand over or refused it, and gave you leave to go to law to establish your right, and would not interfere on your behalf until you had established your right. When you had established it, on what ground did the court refuse to interfere? On what ground could it do so, except that which is peculiar to the doctrines of the court of equity, namely, that there has been such acquiescence as deprives the plaintiff of the right to enforce that which otherwise would unquestionably be his right? There is no such thing here. All that was said here was, that the plaintiff knew one chimney had been built, and that from time to time some additions were to be made to the others, and that the man was laying out his money for that purpose. That is no such acquiescence as would entitle the defendant to avail himself of that and say, I have by acquiescence got a right better than a prescriptive right, because you have stood by and seen me build a factory that might become a nuisance, or probably would become a nuisance. There is no such law that I know of in this country. The delay is not fatal under almost any circumstances. I am obliged to express myself with a qualification here, lest I should be saying something too positive, but in almost any circumstances delay cannot be a reason. I cannot conceive any ground on which it could be a reason. It would not be an answer to an action—it would be no answer to an indictment. I confess I do not think delay has anything to do with the principle upon which this case should be decided; but if it had, I find there has been no delay here de facto. I find by evidence uncontradicted, that long before the year 1866 the plaintiffs were in motion. I find that in 1862 the thing was designated as a nui ance at that time. I find by the correspondence that in the year 1866 remonstrances are made about this nuisance, not enlarging any claim, not introducing any new circumstances, still harping on the old string. I find the letters are answered, as of course between neighbours they would be, civilly but evasively; and I find no desire on the part of the plaintiff to press matters to extremity if by any means he could induce the defendants to do that which by law he thinks they are bound to do. And so time goes on; everything, in my opinion, well and honestly accounted for up to the period when he finds that further remonstrance is unavailing, that any other application would be fruitless; and then he is driven to file his bill. When the bill is filed it is preceded by a correspondence, in which he suggests, "You ought to do this because the means of doing it effectually exist. I have a right to ask for it, and you are bound to do it." The manager of works similar to the defendants, at Bristol, is referred to, and Siemen's Patent is mentioned, and the defendants do not avail themselves of that at all—they drop the subject. They do not even say that they cannot do it; but they say that if they knew how to do it they would. That the means of doing it exist I cannot doubt, not from any opinion of my own, but from the evidence before me. It is a fact sufficiently proved in this case, that the means of removing this nuisance exist, and are within the defendants' power. Then it is suggested that by granting the injunction here I should be putting a stop to a valuable and important trade. If I am obliged to do so, I should do so, as I need hardly say, with the greatest reluctance. But I am satisfied it will have no such effect, because the evidence, as far as it goes—I do not say is conclusive—but is enough to satisfy me that the defendants can cure this great and grevious nuisance; and that there is no reason why they cannot do as has been done by other manufacturers whose manufactories were just as much a nuisance, and just as inconvenient to the neighbourhood, as the defendants' is now said to be. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that upon none of the grounds which have been mentioned can the defendants justify the continuance of the nuisance which has been so plainly proved to exist. The defendants could have cross-examined at any time they liked, but they have chosen to bring the case into court upon the evidence. The evidence is, to my mind, as a matter of fact, conclusive; and if I were sitting exercising the functions of a jury, I should hold that the nuisance was clearly proved. The only thing I can do is to grant an injunction as prayed.

Asphett, Q.C.—The injunction will be, I presume, as to six out of the seven chimneys. One having been erected for more than twenty years before the filing of the bill, we have a prescriptive right to it.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The injunction will go to the whole of the seven chimneys.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

MOGER v. ESCOTT.

Parliamentary election — Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 2, ss. 5 and 27)—*Occupation of premises in succession—Payment of rates by the landlord—*2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 28.

The 28*th section of the Representation of the People Act* 1867 does not deprive the occupier of a house in immediate succession within the year, and which house is of less value than 10*l. per annum, of the right to the franchise, such person having paid the rates in respect of the premises so occupied by him.*

Held also, that the actual payment of the rates by the landlord is a legal payment by the tenant where the payment is made by the landlord by virtue of an agreement existing between them.

THE following case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas by the revising barrister for the city of Bath:—

At a court held by me, one of the barristers duly appointed to revise the lists of voters for the city and borough of Bath, Thomas Moger claimed to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the said city and borough.

Thomas Moger's name appeared upon the list of claimants for the parish of St. James as an occupier of houses in immediate succession from one to the other in the following form:

Christian Name and Surname of the Claimant at full length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, lane, or other place in the parish where the property is situate and number of the house (if any).
Moger, Thomas.	7, Taylor's-court, Bath.	Houses in Succession.	7, Taylor's-Court, from 13, Paradise-street, Lipscombe and Widcombe.

The facts proved before me were, that Thomas Moger, up to Feb. 1871 and for a long time previous, had occupied a house in Paradise-street, in the said city and borough, for which he paid an annual rent of 6*l.*, and was duly rated to all rates made for the relief of the poor during the time of his occupation, and had paid all rates payable by him in respect of the premises so occupied by him. That in the month of Feb. 1871 he removed direct into and occupied a house in Taylor's-court, in the said city and borough, for which he agreed to pay an annual rent of 8*l.*, his landlord agreeing at the same time to pay the rates. That in the month of April in the same year a rate was duly made for the relief of the poor of the parish in which the said house in Taylor's-court is situate, in which rate the name of Thomas Moger did not appear, nor did Thomas Moger make any claim to have his name placed upon the rate book, nor were any shown which would enable him to avail himself of the benefit of the 19th section of the Poor-rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869; but all rates payable in respect of the premises occupied by him were, previous to the 20th July 1871, paid by his landlord.

It was contended on behalf of Thomas Moger, that since, by the 59th section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, this Act so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof should be construed as one with the enactment for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people, and with the Registration Acts, in all cases of successive occupation as referred to in the 26th section of the same Act, although the annual value of the premises occupied be under 10*l*., the right to be registered depends not upon the occupier having been rated in respect of the premises occupied by him during the time of such occupation as required by the 3rd section of the same Act, but upon the fact that all poor rates which shall have become payable from him have been actually paid, as in the case of the successive occupation of houses of the annual value of 10*l*. under the 28th section of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45.

I was of a different opinion and disallowed the claim of Thomas Moger on the ground that he had not been rated, had not claimed to be rated, and was not within the operation of the 19th section of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869.

If the court shall be of opinion that I was wrong, then the register is to be amended, and Thomas Moger's name is to be inserted in the list of voters for the said city and borough of Bath.

The names of twenty-two other persons, whose names and places of abode and particulars of qualifications as set out in a schedule hereunto attached, claimed to have their names inserted in the lists of voters for the said city and borough, or were duly objected to under similar circumstances, and disallowed the claims and removed the names from the list of voters for the said city and borough.

If the court shall be of opinion that I was wrong in disallowing the claim of Thomas Moger, the register is to be amended by inserting their names also in the same lists.

Due notice of appeal from my decision was given, and I ordered the appeals in all the before-mentioned cases to be consolidated.

T. W. Saunders for the appellant.—The question is whether a party, who claims a vote under the Representation of the People Act 1867, on the ground that he occupies two houses in immediate succession, his landlord paying the rates of the second house, is entitled to a vote. If the claimant had paid all rates in respect of his second house, although he had not been rated owing to his landlord having paid, he is entitled to a vote. By the 28th section of the Representation of the People Act 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45), premises, in respect of the occupation of which any person shall be entitled to be registered and to vote in an election, are not required to be the same, but may be different premises occupied in immediate succession during the twelve months previous to the last day of July, if he has paid the poor rates and taxes which shall have, previous to the month of April, become payable for the premises so occupied by him in succession. I say he need not be rated for the second house, but only for the first which he occupied: (Rogers v. Lewis, 7 C. B., N. S. 29; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 68.) In that case it was decided that it is not necessary that the party's name should appear on the rate; it is enough that he has paid the rate. [BRETT, J.—To meet this case you have to make out that a payment of rates by the landlord is a payment by the tenant.] It clearly is, for if the landlord pays the rates, the tenant, in consequence, pays more rent. The claimant is entitled to a vote under the Representation of the People Act 1867, for that Act was passed to enlarge the scope of the former Acts, and to confer franchises in addition to, and not in substitution of those already in existence.

Gorst for the respondent.—This case is clearly within the Representation of the People Act 1867, which has nothing to do with the old Reform Acts, except so far as they are incorporated into it. Here there were two different premises occupied in immediate succession; but a party has no right to a vote in respect of such occupation, unless he has been rated to each. The 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, sub-section 2 provides that every one is entitled to a vote who is on the last day of July in any year, and has during the whole of the preceding twelve calendar months been an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling house within the borough, and the 20th section of the same Act says that different premises occupied in immediate succession by any person as owner or tenant during the twelve calendar months next previous to the last day of July in any year shall, unless and except as therein is otherwise provided, have the same effect in qualifying such person to vote for a county or borough as a continued occupation of the same premises in the manner therein provided. Sects. 56 and 59 are saving clauses so far as each is consistent with the tenor thereof, but nothing is repealed. He must, therefore, have not only paid the rates, but have been rated to such rates, and the claimant here has not fulfilled either obligation—for his landlord has paid the rates for him—nor has he been rated. [WILLES, J.—The question for us comes to this, whether sect. 28 of the Representation of the People Act 1832 is to be read into the later Act.]

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by BRETT, J.:—

Feb. 9.—In this case Thomas Moger claimed to have his name inserted in the list of voters for the city and borough of Bath. His name appeared upon the list of claimants as an occupier of a house 7, Taylor's-court, in immediate succession to his occupation of a house, 13, Paradise-street. It was proved that the claimant had occupied 13, Paradise-street, for a long time previous to, and up to, Feb. 1871, at a rent of 6*l*. per annum, and that he was duly rated to all poor rates made during the time of his occupation. In Feb. 1871 the claimant moved direct into, and occupied 7, Taylor's-court, for which he agreed to pay an annual rent of 8*l*., his landlord agreeing to pay the rates. A poor rate was made in April 1871, in which the claimant's name did not appear; he did not claim to be rated; he was not entitled to the benefit of sect. 19 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869; but all rates payable in respect of 7, Taylor's-court, were, previous to the 20th July 1871, paid by his landlord. The revising barrister disallowed the claim. It was contended on behalf of the claimant that this decision was erroneous, that it was not necessary that the claimant should be rated in respect of the second house, if he paid all rates payable in respect of it; that he had by the hands of his landlord paid all rates. It was contended on behalf of the respondent, that, according to sects. 3 and 26 of the Representation of the People Act 1867, it was necessary, in order to entitle the claimant to be registered, that he should not only have paid all rates payable in respect of the second house held in immediate succession, but that he should also have been rated to such rates, and further that the claimant had not paid in this case the rates payable in respect of the second house. As to the first point, inasmuch as both houses occupied by the claimant were below the annual value of 10*l.*, the question is whether sect. 26 of the Act of 1867 deprives the occupier of a house in immediate succession within the year, and which house is of a less value than 10*l.* a year, of the privilege contained in the proviso to sect. 28, 2 Will. 4, c. 45, as interpreted in Rogers v. Lewis (7 C. B., N. S., 29.) According to that proviso, as interpreted by that case, it is sufficient for such an occupier to have paid all rates due in respect of the second house, that he be not rated in respect of such house, if he has been rated in respect of and has paid all rates due in respect of the first house. Now by sect. 3 of the Act of 1867 the inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house, in order to entitle himself to be registered, must have occupied it, i. e., the one dwelling-house, for twelve months, &c., and must have been rated in respect of it, and must have paid all rates payable in respect of it. Sect. 26 deals with one only of these conditions, namely, that of the occupation, and enacts that the occupation of different premises in immediate succession shall have the same effect as a continual occupation of the same premises. There are added the words, "in the manner herein provided." These words might at first sight seem to refer to an occupation accompanied by a being rated and a payment of rates. But these conditions are not the manner of occupation; they are other conditions required to be fulfilled when the claimant has satisfied the condition as to occupation. These words seem to refer to the necessity of a separate as distinguished from a joint occupier. Sect. 26, therefore, does not interfere with any obligation or any privilege attaching to the questions of being rated, and of the payment of rates. Those obligations and privileges are regulated by other enactments. By sects. 3 and 26, if there were no other enactments applicable, it would seem that the occupier of two houses in immediate succession, claiming to be registered in virtue of the qualification contained in the Act of 1867, must have been rated and must have paid the rates in respect of both houses. But by sects. 56 and 59 of the Act of 1867 the proviso in sect. 28 of the 2 Will. 4, c. 48 is applicable to the case of houses occupied in immediate succession according to the Act of 1867, unless it be inconsistent with sect. 26 of the new Act. According to the interpretation we have given sect. 26 of the new Act, with reference to sect. 3 of the same, there is no inconsistency between it and the proviso to sect. 28 of the old Act. It follows that the proviso is applicable to the cases of occupation in immediate succession under the new Act; and that in such cases the occupier may be registered if he has been rated and has paid all rates in respect of the first house, and has paid all rates payable in respect of the second house, though he has not been rated in respect of it. The reasons given in Rogers v. Lewis for the distinction between the first and second houses is as applicable in the case of successive occupation under the new as under the old Act. The second point is whether the claimant can be said to have paid the rates payable in respect of the second house. He has not paid them with his own hand, and he has not been released from payment, nor can he be deemed to have paid by virtue of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869. The question is whether, without recourse to that, or any other statute, he can be said to have legally paid the rates. We are of opinion that it can properly be said that he has legally paid the rates. By virtue of the agreement between him and his landlord the actual payment of the rates by the landlord in this case is a legal payment by the tenant: (Cook v. Luckett 2 C.B. 168.) We are of opinion in the result that the claimant was entitled to be registered, and that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong and must be reversed. The claimant's name must be inserted in the register.

HILL v. COCK.

Easement—Excessive user by proprietor of dominant tenement—Prevention—Least injurious mode to be used.

The plaintiff, having a prescriptive right to a flow of water, led by means of a gutter laid in a mill-stream at a point where an ancient weir was erected, lengthened the gutter for the purpose of irrigating more land.

The flow of water down the defendant's mill-stream was diminished, and the defendant in consequence pulled down the ancient weir, which prevented the water from flowing down the plaintiff's gutter:

Held, that no suspension of the plaintiff's right to the enjoyment of the flow of water as it had formerly existed was caused by his having become a wrongdoer, and the defendant was not justified in stopping the plaintiff's excessive user by means which altogether prevented his enjoyment of the water, but only in stopping it by the least injurious means in his power.

Semble, that if there had been a confusion of rights, the defendant would have been justified in abating the nuisance.

THIS was an action on the case for wrongfully pulling down an ancient weir whereby the right of the plaintiff to irrigate his meadows was injured.

The first count of the declaration stated that the plaintiff was the occupier of certain meadow land in the parish of North Molton, in the county of Devon, situate near a certain stream or water course, and that before the grievances hereinafter mentioned a great part of the water of the said stream or watercourse did of right run and flow, and ought of right to have run and flowed, and still of right ought to run and flow therefrom into and along a certain gutter or channel through and over the plaintiff's closes for the irrigating and watering of the same, and for the benefit and improvement of the soil. Yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, wrongfully pulled down and removed a certain weir or dam there lawfully standing and being in and across the stream or watercourse, for the purposes of diverting and turning the part of the water there, into, and along the gutter or channel through and over the closes of the plaintiff, and kept and continued the weir so pulled down and removed for a long space of time from thence hitherto, and wrongfully drew off and diverted a great part of the water of the stream which might and would have run and flowed, and hindered and prevented the same from running and flowing into and along, and by means of the gutter or channel through and over the closes of the plaintiff, whereby the closes have been impoverished and lessened in value, and the plaintiff has been prevented from enjoying the same in so ample and beneficial a manner as he otherwise might and would have done.

The fourth count was a countin trespass for breaking and entering a close of the plaintiff in the parish aforesaid forming part of the bed or channel of a certain stream there, and breaking and destroying therein a weir or dam of the plaintiff lawfully standing and being in and across the stream.

The other counts of the declaration were not material to the points in question.

The defendant pleaded fifteen pleas, of which the following are material:

Fourth plea: That before and at the time of the alleged grievance he was possessed of a certain mill, the occupiers whereof for twenty years before this suit enjoyed, as of right and without interruption, the right of diverting and using the water of the stream or watercourse for the working of the mill, and of removing all obstructions which might hinder the flow of the water for the working of the mill, and of removing the weir or dam when occasion required for the better working of the mill, and the grievance and pulling down of the weir was in use of the said right.

Sixth plea: That the defendant was seised in fee of a mill, and he and all those whose estate he then had therein from time immemorial enjoyed the right of diverting and using the water of the stream for working the mill, and of removing all obstructions which might hinder the flow of the stream and of removing the weir as occasion might require.

Fourteenth Plea: The defendant as to the fourth count of declaration, says, that at the time of the alleged grievances he was possessed of a mill adjoining and contiguous to the stream or watercourse for working the mill, and for the more convenient occupation and enjoyment thereof, and that the plaintiff had at the time aforesaid diverted and forced back and penned up the water of the stream, and prevented the same from flowing, and hindered the flow of the same on to the said mill of the defendant, and thereby interfered with and prevented the lawful working of the mill by the defendant, whereupon the defendant caused and procured the water of the stream so diverted, forced back, and penned up, again to flow on to defendant's mill, as it had been used and accustomed to do.

Replication and new assignment that the plaintiff sued not only for the trespasses admitted, but also for other trespasses.

Issue joined.

The plaintiff was the occupier of certain lands in the parish of North Malton, in the county of Devon, past which a natural stream of water ran, which ultimately found its way to and worked the defendant's mill. The plaintiff had a prescriptive right to take water by means of a gutter or channel from the stream at an ancient weir, a point considerably above the plaintiff's mill, for the purpose of irrigating his land. It was proved at the trial that the plaintiff had wrongly extended his gutter from the original place to which he was entitled to the flow of the water; and was thereby enabled to irrigate more of his land than he was formerly able to do, and the refuse water, instead of returning to the original stream, and flowing down to the mill, ran away in another direction; the consequence being, that the defendant lost the benefit of its assistance in turning his mill. This had been effected by the plaintiff lengthening the gutter and carrying it for a greater distance through his land. The result of this act of the plaintiff was, that the defendant was unable to obtain sufficient water to work his mill, and he accordingly went up the stream to the ancient weir and pulled down the stones and brushwood of which it was composed. The level of the stream being reduced below the mouth of the plaintiff's gutter, all water ceased to flow in that direction, and he was unable to irrigate his meadows.

The defendant claimed a prescriptive right to throw down the weir when necessary for the purposes of the mill.

Upon the trial of the case at the late Devonshire Summer Assizes, before Mr. Justice Willes and a special jury, the jury found, in answer to a question from the judge, that the pulling down of the weir was not reasonably and practically necessary to abate the nuisance caused by the lengthening of the plaintiff's gutters; and a verdict was directed to be entered for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to move to set it aside, and a verdict entered for the defendant on the ground that he was justified in doing the act complained of in consequence of the plaintiff having exceeded any right to which he was entitled, and thereby caused a suspension of such right.

Kingdon, Q.C. having obtained a rule accordingly.

Cole, Q.C., Lopes, Q.C. (Pinder with him) showed cause.—It is contended on behalf of the defendant, if the party who is possessed of the dominant tenement creates an excessive user of his enjoyment, that the owner of the servient tenement may put a stop to the right altogether; but I apprehend the true law is, where an encroachment is separable that it must be so separated: (Cawkwell v. Russell, 36 L. J. 34, Ex.). It was not necessary for the defendant to pull down the weir. I admit the principle that is laid down in Lawton v. Ward (1 Ld. Raym. 75), that under a right of way over a close to a particular place, a man cannot justify going beyond that place, and if he goes farther an action would lie. But if there are two ways of abating a nuisance, the least mischievous must be chosen, as laid down by Blackburn J., in his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber in Roberts

v. Rose (L. Rep. 1 Ex. 82; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 471.) In abating a private nuisance a party is bound to use reasonable care that no more damage be done than is necessary for effecting his purpose:

Gale on Easements, 4th edit., pp. 55 584;
Arlett v. Ellis and others, 7 B. & C. 346;
Yard v. Ford, 2 Wms. Saund. (edit. 1871). p. 521.

In the case of Tapling v. Jones (11 H. of L. Cas. 290), the plaintiff enlarged the windows of his house, so that it was impossible to obstruct the light to the new windows without at the same time obstructing the light which had previously passed through the old windows, and the House of Lords held that the defendant was not entitled to obstruct the ancient passage of light. [GROVE, J.—Yes, but the opening of a new window was not an illegal act, and therefore distinguishable from the extension of the gutter.]

Kingdon, Q.C., Montague Bere, Q.C., and Mortimer in support of the rule.—If the defendant had stopped up the gutter, and caused the water to overflow on the land of a third party, he would have been liable to an action, and he chose the safest plan he could adopt by cutting off the water at the fountain head. The case of Tapling v. Jones is distinguishable, and has no bearing on this case. That case decided that the erection of a new light was not unlawful in itself, and that no one could prevent the erection, but here it is not disputed that the defendant might by some means prevent the excessive user. Whether the right to the water be prescriptive or riparian, the proprietor is bound to return it to the stream without appreciable diminution: (Imbray and another v. Owen, 6 Ex. 353). If he takes it for other purposes, such taking is illegal, and the whole right becomes forfeited; so where water is running away you are entitled to go to the fountain head and stop the water by raising and repairing the weir: (Lawton v. Ward, 1 Ld. Raym. 75.) The whole character of the flow was changed by the excessive user. So if a man abuses his rights, he becomes a trespasser ab initio; and if a man have a right of way for carriages from D. to Blackacre over my close, and afterwards he purchase lands adjoining to Blackacre, he cannot use the aforesaid way with carriages to the land adjoining, though he go first to Blackacre and from thence to the land adjoining: (Skull v. Glenister, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 826; 16 C. B., N. S., 81.) In Luttrell's case (Coke Rep pt. 4, 86*b*) it is said, supposing a tenant holds land under an obligation to repair the lord's hall, as in 10 Edw. 3, 23, if the hall falls and the lord rebuilds the hall in the same place and of such bigness, the tenant is bound to cover it; but if it is built of greater length or breadth, so as prejudice may come to the tenant; or if it is built in another place, he is not bound to cover it, for the nature of the tenure cannot be altered, nor of the tenant's service. The case of Greenslade v. Halliday (6 Bing. Rep. 379) is distinguishable, as there there was no excess in the right claimed and used, and it is for the excess that I say the defendant is entitled to the verdict. The defendant would have, if obliged to go on the plaintiff's land and obstruct the gutters, to select the exact spot at which the excess commenced. Why may he not say, I know you have exceeded your rights at the ancient weir, for more water flows down the gutter than formerly, and at that spot I will stop the nuisance. Cawkwell v. Russell (36 L. J. 34, Ex.) is distinctly in point.

WILLES, J.—The point was reserved by me at the trial, because it might have been the case that defendant was entitled to judgment, there being a confusion of a prescriptive right. The flow of water to defendant's mill was injured by the alteration of the gutter, and the plaintiff had thereby destroyed the measure of his right over the old course, and created a confusion of his ancient right. If the whole of the defendant's enjoyment had been interfered with as it was in the case of Cawkwell v. Russell, where the person who had a right to send clean water through his gutter sent down foul water, so that the nuisance could not be stopped without interfering with the enjoyment; if that had been the case, then the taking down of the weir would have been a reasonable mode of destroying the plaintiff's enjoyment. However, he is bound to abate the nuisance in the most reasonable manner, and subject to there being no confusion of the rights created, the jury have found that it was not practically necessary for the purpose of abating the nuisance to pull down the weir. If the extent of the excess was so great that it was reasonably impossible to abate the nuisance, then I should say there exists a right on the part of the proprietor of the servient tenement to interfere with the whole. In Luttrell's case Lord Coke refers to 7 Edw. 4, 27A, "that if a man have estovers by grant or appendant to an ancient house, he shall not have them to an house which he new builds." And a little further on he says, "For although in case when mills or houses, which have watercourses or estovers or other things appendant or appurtenant to them, be overthrown by the wind, or burned by wildfire, or fall by any other act of God, that if the owner rebuild them in the same place and in the same manner that they stood before, they should have the same ancient things, appendants, and appurtenants to this new mill or house, because the act of God shall not prejudice any; yet, if they be erased by the party himself, or fall through his default, the ancient appendants thereby are lost, for by his own act he cannot extend the prescription or grant, which was in a manner appropriated to the old house to a new house." The defendant has abated the nuisance, but in such a manner as he has no right to do, as he might have stopped the excessive enjoyment by blocking up the gutter at the spot where the old gutter terminated.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think there is such a confusion of rights as to make it necessary for us to interfere. The defendant, instead of bringing an action, takes the opportunity of abating the nuisance, and by a wrong method.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. One cause of action on which the plaintiff relied was, that he had a prescriptive right to the flow of water in the old gutter. The question, therefore, comes to be whether the defendant can justify his act? The jury found there was a damage done to the defendant's mill, and that the plaintiff himself had become a wrongdoer. The learned counsel's argument for the defendant is, that as the plaintiff had already become a wrongdoer by excessive user of an enjoyment to which he was entitled, the defendant is not obliged to go to any expense, or take any trouble to find where the plaintiff's wrongful act began, nor can he complain if it is abated by an encroachment in return. The fallacy in the case is, that such right of total abatement arises only when the rights cannot be practically separated. In Cuckwell v. Russell no jury could have found otherwise, for there was no possible way for defendant to abate the nuisance than by doing what he did, but here the defendant ought to have confined himself to stopping up the gutter.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The current of authorities show where, in cases of excessive user, an excess can be separated, that method should be chosen; and, if the defendant can stop the excess without interfering with the plaintiff's rights, he is bound to do so. The learned counsel puts it that the flow of water may be altered at the weir by the lengthening of the gutter, and it would be a very sound argument that there was a confusion of the right if the jury had not found that it was not reasonable to remove the weir, but what the plaintiff did was an excess, and cannot be justified so long as there is any other remedy.

SHARP v. POWELL.

Negligence—Illegal act at commencement—Remoteness of damage—Police Regulation Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 54.

The defendant's servant washed his master's van in frosty weather in the public highway, which was admitted to be an illegal act and against the provisions of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54.

The surplus water ran from off the road into the gutter, which was its normal course, and from thence towards the mouth of the common sewer. The mouth of the sewer being choked, the water again ran over the road and there froze. The plaintiff's horse passing at the time, fell down and was injured.

In an action to recover damages for the injury to the horse:

Held, that although the defendant was generally answerable for the natural consequences of his negligence, yet that he was not liable, for the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff was not such as might be reasonably expected to result from such negligence; and also that the damage was too remote.

THE declaration stated that the defendant wrongfully caused a certain van of his to be washed in a public highway in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and thereby created a public nuisance, and caused large quantities of water to be collected together, whereby the said water became frozen and dangerous to the traffic of the said highway, and the plaintiff's horse, whilst lawfully passing along the highway, slipped upon the ice and fell with such violence that its knee was broken, and it became necessary to kill the horse, and the plaintiff was deprived of the use of the same, and was hindered in his business, &c.

The defendant pleaded not guilty; upon which plea issue was joined.

Upon the trial, which took place before Keating, J. and a common jury, last Hilary Term, the following facts were proved in evidence.

The defendant occupied a stable and coach-house in Felton-street, Hoxton, where he kept his van. Owing to the greater convenience, the defendant's servant was in the habit of washing his van in the public highway outside and opposite to his stables: and on the 22nd Nov. last the servant, according to his usual practice, washed the van in the road. At this time there had been a very severe frost, which had lasted for about a fortnight. The water with which the van was washed ran over the road and part of it froze on the road, and the rest ran down the kennel between the road and the kerbstone of the pavement for a distance of seventy-five feet, where there was the grating of a sewer for the purpose of conveying the water away underground. It was proved that all the water that was used for washing the van ran into the kennel, which was its natural course; but that on its reaching the grating of the sewer, owing to some stoppage, the water again overflowed on to and over the road, where it accumulated in some holes in the road, and rapidly became congealed into ice. The plaintiff's horse passing at this time, stepped upon the ice, fell down, and was so injured in consequence that it had to be destroyed.

At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, the learned judge stated that he was of opinion that the damage done to the plaintiff's horse was too remote, and he therefore nonsuited the plaintiff, reserving leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for 25*l.*, the sum agreed between the parties, if the court should be of opinion that the defendant was liable; power being also reserved to the court to draw inferences of fact.

Metcalfe having obtained a rule, in accordance with the leave reserved,

Henry James, Q.C. (Lanyon with him) showed cause.—I am willing to admit that the defendant, by his servant, was committing a wrongful act in washing his carriage in the public highway, and an act against the provisions of the Metropolitan Police Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54, sub-sect. 1), (a) yet the water which was used to wash the defendant's van ran into the gutter and would have flowed down the sewer in the ordinary course if it had not been stopped up. The plaintiff is trying to make the defendant liable for the improper construction of the sewer; but the defendant is only liable for a wilful act of negligence and for the natural consequences of such act, and such consequences as an ordinary person could reasonably anticipate would be the result of his negligence. He referred to Scott v. Shepherd (1 Smith L. C., 6th edit., 417.) The damage must be the proximate cause of the defendant's wrong, and must immediately, and according to the common course of events, follow from the defendant's wrong; the wrong would not have been followed by the damage, if some facts had not intervened for which the defendant was not responsible: (Hoey v. Felton, 11 C. B., N. S., 142; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 354.) Thus the water would have flowed into the sewer if it had not been stopped, and although we were

(a) And be it enacted, that every person shall be liable to a penalty of not more than forty shillings, who, within the limits of the Metropolitan Police District, shall in any thoroughfare or public place commit any of the following offences (that is to say)—Every person who shall, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers . . . . clean, make, or repair any part of any cart or carriage, except in cases of accident where repair on the spot is necessary.

Metcalfe, in support of the rule.—It will be conceded that the defendant would be liable to an action if the horse had slipped where the van was being washed; and this act was a nuisance by the common law, as laid down in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, Book I. c. 75. The cause of the accident was in consequence of the water being poured down the gutter, and this was a nuisance: (Brown v. Bussell, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 251.) The case of Smith v. The London and South-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 14; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 678) is in point; there the defendants left some dry grass on the bank of the railway, which becoming ignited by a passing engine, set fire to the plaintiff's cottage, which was situate 200 yards away across a stubble field and a public road. There the court decided that if the defendants were negligent in leaving the dry grass on the embankment, they were responsible for the injury that resulted from their conduct to the plaintiff, although they could not have reasonably anticipated that such injury would be the result of their neglect. So the plaintiff is responsible, being a wrongdoer ab initio. We are not to look to see whether the defendant might with reason anticipate an accident as the consequence of his act, but if it were an unlawful act he must be made liable; besides which, the frost had continued a fortnight, and was very severe on the morning of the accident. He referred to

The Lords Bailiffs Jurats of Romney Marsh v. The Corporation of The Trinity House, L. Rep. 5 Ex. 204; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446.
Reynolds v. Clarke, 2 Ld. Raym. 1399.

BOVILL, C. J.—There is no doubt that a person who does a wrongful act is liable for the consequences, but generally he is not responsible for more than the ordinary consequences, unless it can be shown that there is a likelihood of such a result. There was no likelihood here, nor was the defendant's act the proximate cause of the accident. It seems to me that if there had been no obstruction in the grating of the sewer the water would have passed away. The frost had been in existence about a fortnight, but this would not lead the defendant to suspect any stoppage, and there was no evidence to show that the plaintiff had any knowledge that the gutter was so stopped, and without the stoppage the water would not have run over the road and become ice, and no damage would have occurred. It cannot be said that it was a reasonable thing to expect that the washing of the van would lead to such consequences and become the cause of such a disaster. In this case we have power to draw inferences of fact, and amend the record if necessary; and it is impossible to say the defendant is guilty of negligence to make him liable in this action, when the plaintiff sent out his horses in severe weather, a fortnight after the commencement of the frost, without taking the precaution of having them roughed. That appears to me to be a complete answer to the action; but as there seems some doubt if that point was intended to be left to us, I am content to found my judgment on the other question.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The negligence of the defendant was neither the immediate nor the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff; nor do I think it within the ordinary scope of the Act of Parliament. The word natural has been used in the course of the argument with reference to the course of the water, but it is equally natural for water to overflow at one place as at another, and the correct word to be used, when referring to the course of a stream of water, should rather be normal than natural. If the water had been allowed to accumulate close to where the carriage was washed, then the overflow would have been brought under the notice of the party washing the carriage, and I should perhaps have been of a different opinion; but here the water has gone back to its normal channel, and the defendant is not bound, having got the water back into its ordinary place, to go below the stream to see whether any accident may be occasioned, which would just as much have occurred under ordinary circumstances, and if the defendant had not washed his carriage in a place improper for the purpose.

KEATING, J.—I am still of the same opinion as I expressed at the trial. The proximate cause of the accident was from the accumulation of water, and from it becoming frozen. Having reserved power to the court to draw inferences of fact, we are at liberty to go into the question of contributory negligence; yet that point not being particularly mentioned and adverted to at the trial, I prefer to base my judgment on other grounds. The defendant was ignorant of the stoppage at the mouth of the sewer, nor was he answerable in any way for it. It may be said that if the defendant's servant had not thrown the water down it could not have accumulated, and the accident never would have happened; but if we were to agree with such an argument, the question would arise, how are we to limit the doctrine of liability? It is not traceable to the unlawful act of the defendant, which appears to me to be too remote, and I think therefore with the rest of the court, that this rule should be discharged.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

VIGAR v. DUDMAN.

Tithes—Modus—Conversion into "tillage."

Before the Tithe Commutation Act 1836, an award was made under certain Enclosure Acts, by which the tithes of the land in which the plaintiff was a landowner, and the defendant the rector, were commuted. By this award a yearly modus payable in lieu of hay and adjustment tithe payment, and also larger sums to be paid yearly for the same lands when occupied by non-resident or converted into "tillage," were fixed by the commissioner.

A house had since been built upon a portion of a field of the plaintiff mentioned in the award, and a further portion to the extent of twenty-two perches was converted into garden ground, and the remainder of the field made into an orchard.

The defendant put in a distress for the larger sum fixed by the award to be paid for this field, on the ground that part of it had been converted into "tillage."

Held by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn and Mellor, JJ., Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.), affirming the decision of the Court of Common Pleas, that the garden ground and orchard being accessories to the house, there had been no conversion into "tillage."

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas on a special case stated in an action of replevin: (See ante, p. 149; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 734; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 470; 40 L. J. 229, C. P.)

By an award made under the General Enclosure Act (41 Geo. 3, c. 109), and the Pitney Enclosure Act (42 Geo. 3, c. 15) (private) the tithes of Pitney were commuted for a corn rent-charge. It was provided by the said Pitney Enclosure Act that lands exempted from the payment of tithes in kind by valid moduses, or customary payments, should not be affected, but that such moduses or customary payments should continue payable as if the said Act had not been made. And the award stated that in order to ascertain what lands were so exempt from the payment of tithes, a schedule of the same, entitled the "Pitney Modus Schedule," was annexed, wherein were set forth the said lands with the amounts of the moduses or customary payments payable thereout, and also, inasmuch as such exemption extended only to the said lands when occupied by the owners thereof, or by persons residing within the parish of Pitney, and such lands were subject to the payment of tithes when occupied by non-residents, or when converted into "tillage," the tithe money payment to be thereafter payable thereout in the event of such lands being occupied by non-residents, or being converted into "tillage." The part of the schedule relating to the land in question was as follows:

No. on plan, 422; property and premises; Matthews, John, sen., Stawey Foot; computed acres, 1 acre; modus payable yearly, 1*d.*; actual measure of land, 1a. 1r. 3p.; yearly rent to be paid to the rector of Pitney when the modus lands shall be occupied by non-residents, 4*s.* 9*d.*; payment per acre, 3*s.* 8¾*d.*; corn payment at 8*s.* 7¼*d.* per bushel, 4 gall. 3½ pts.; yearly rent to be paid to the rector of Pitney when the modus lands shall be converted into tillage, 12*s.* 8½*d.*; payment per acre, 10*s.*; corn payment at 8*s.* 7¼*d.* per bushel, 1 bush. 3 gall. 6½ pts.

About forty years before the action was brought a house was built upon a portion of the field, and a further portion (to the extent of 22 perches) was converted into garden ground by the then owner, who fenced off the house and garden from the rest of the field, the remaining portion being orchard. No claim had ever been made on the plaintiff for payment of any other sum than the modus payment of one penny, mentioned in the schedule, until Oct. 1869, when the collection of the tithe having been placed in the hands of new agents, they called for payment of 3*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, being six years' arrears of the corn rent, on the ground that there had been a conversion into "tillage," and breach of the modus. The plaintiff refused to pay the sum claimed, but subsequently tendered 9*s.*, being six years' arrears in respect of the 22 perches actually converted into garden. Afterwards, a distress for the amount having been put in, the plaintiff replevied his goods and commenced the action in the Somersetshire County Court, whence it was removed into the Court of Common Pleas by writ of certiorari, and, by consent of the parties, a special case without pleadings was stated for the opinion of the court. Judgment having been given for the plaintiff, this appeal was brought.

E. Jones for the defendant.—I submit that "tillage" must be taken to mean any change of cultivation which would have entitled the parson to tithe in kind. A parson is entitled to tithes in kind for garden produce and orchards which are generally attached to houses. The definition of the word "tillage" in Johnson's Dictionary is "husbandry, the art or practice of ploughing, or culture." In Webster's Dictionary we find: "Tillage—the operation, practice, or art of preparing land for seed, and keeping the ground free from weeds which might impede the growth of crops. Tillage includes manuring, ploughing, harrowing, and rolling land, or whatever is done to bring it to a proper state to receive the seed; and the operations of ploughing, harrowing, and hoeing the land, to destroy weeds and loosen the soil after it is planted; culture; a principal branch of agriculture." [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is no cultivation except the momentary planting of trees.] He cited:

Comyn's Digest, title Dismes, E. 20;
Bedingfield v. Feak, Cro. Eliz. 467; 1 Rolle's Abr. 651, l. 35.

A. Charles, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I quite agree in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas. The land was subject to a modus which was liable, according to the award, to be put an end to if the land was converted into "tillage," and I agree with the learned judges in the court below, for the reasons stated in their judgments, that what took place did not amount to a conversion into tillage.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. REEVE AND ANOTHER.

Evidence—Confession—Inducement—Admissibility.

Two little boys were in custody on suspicion of obstructing a railway train, and the mothers and a policeman were also present. One of the boys' mothers said, "You had better, as good boys, tell the truth." Whereupon, both the boys confessed. Upon the trial, they were convicted upon evidence of that confession.

Held, that the evidence of confession was rightly received.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Byles, J.

The prisoners were children. One was eight years of age, and the other a little older. They were convicted at the Worcester Assizes of an attempt to commit a misdemeanour, by obstructing a railway train.

The evidence was that Hancock's mother, Reeves' mother, and a policeman being present after they had been apprehended on suspicion, Mrs. Hancock said, "You had better, as good boys, tell the truth;" whereupon, both the prisoners confessed, and on this confession were both convicted.

The question for the Court of Criminal Appeal is, whether the confession was admissible against both the prisoners or either.

No counsel argued for the prisoners.

Streeten for the prosecution.—The evidence of the confession was properly received. The inducement to the prisoners to tell the truth was in the nature of an admonition and an exhortation, and was not in the nature of improper influence to procure a confession. This case is not so strong as Reg. v. Jarvis (10 Cox C. C. 574; 37 L. J. 1, M.C.), where one of the prisoner's employers having called him into his private room said, "I think it right that I should tell you that besides being in the presence of my brother and myself, you are in the presence of two police officers; and I should advise you that to any questions that may be put to you, you answer truthfully, so that if you have committed a fault you may not add to it by stating what is untrue;" and having shown a letter to him which he denied having written, added, "Take care, we know more than you think we know," and the prisoner thereupon made a confession which was held admissible. [He was then stopped.]

KELLY, C.B.—We need not trouble you any further. The cases excluding confessions on the ground of unlawful inducement have gone too far for the protection of guilt. The case of Reg. v. Jarvis was much stronger in its circumstances than the present. In that case a good deal was said by one of the prosecutors that might have operated on the prisoner's mind, and led him to confess. In the present case, the inducement was simply what a mother would say to her son under the circumstances.

(Before KELLY C.B., WILLES J., CLEASBY B., GROVE and QUAIN JJ.)

REG. v. WOLLASTON.

Indecent assault—Consent.

A man induced two youths above the age of fourteen years to go out with him in the evening to an out of the way place, where they mutually indulged in indecent practices on each others persons. The youths were willing and assenting parties to what was done:

Held, that under these circumstances a conviction for an indecent assault could not be upheld.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Cockburn, C. J.

Thelwall Wollaston was tried before me, at the last Assizes for the county of Sussex, on an indictment under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 62, for an indecent assault on one William Rickard with intent to incite the said William Rickard to commit an unnatural crime. There was a similar count for an assault, with the like intent on one Douglas White.

There were also (besides other counts which altogether failed on the evidence) counts for an indecent assault on each of the two parties before named.

The facts did not admit of dispute. It appeared that the defendant had induced two youths, William Rickard and Douglas White, by the expectation of pecuniary reward, to go out with him in the evening to an out of the way place, and had, &c. (The facts showing the indecency practised were then set out.) After having passed some time in the gratification of this unnatural propensity, he, without attempting or suggesting anything further, voluntarily left, not having been interrupted or become conscious of being observed. It was plain that the two youths had accompanied the defendant with a full knowledge of what was about to take place—this not being the first time that the defendant had carried on such practices with one of them—and had been perfectly willing and assenting parties to all that had been done.

There being thus no evidence to establish the intent necessary to support the counts framed on the statute, the counsel for the prosecution very properly gave up that part of the case and relied for a conviction on the counts for the indecent assault. But on the part of the defendant it was contended that, as it was admitted that the parties on whom the alleged assault had been made had been consenting to all that had been done to them, that which would otherwise have been an assault became divested of that character; that this was not a mere submission, which, it was true, might not make a touching of the person less an assault, but an actual consent, knowingly and intentionally given, which was inconsistent with the essential character at law of an assault, and that in this respect there could be no difference in point of principle between an assault committed in furtherance of a natural desire, and one committed in furtherance of a lust however unnatural and detestable.

In support of the general doctrine that where there is consent there cannot be an assault in point of law, the case of Reg. v. Martin (2 Moo. C. C. R. 123) was referred to. The case appeared to me to be in point, and on the whole I was disposed to think that the contention of the defendant's counsel was well founded. But as the point had never been decided in a case like the present, I directed the jury to find the defendant guilty on the counts for indecent assault, reserving for the consideration of this court whether upon the facts of the case those counts could be upheld. Upon this point I now request the opinion of the court.

I admitted the defendant to bail, to come up for judgment, if required, at the next Sussex Assizes.

Parry, Serjt. (R. E. Webster with him) for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. The indictment is framed upon the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 62, which enacts that whosoever shall be guilty of any indecent assault upon any male person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. There was no evidence to support the finding of the jury on the fifth and sixth counts of the indictment, the counts for an indecent assault. The charge is one at common law, and in substance for a common assault—the offence of an indecent assault being statutable. There is no allegation of ad communie nocumentum and no charge of indecent exposure. [WILLES, J. referred to Reg. v. Watson (2 Cox C. C. 376), where an indictment which alleged an exposure of the person to one person only was held bad.] There was nothing of the kind here to constitute an exposure. [KELLY, C. B.—The only question is whether this can be called an assault at all? What was done was done not only with the consent of the youths, but they were willing participators. Of what age were the youths?] Above the age of fourteen. [He was then stopped by the court].

Barrow, for the prosecution.—The case of Reg. v. Martin, relied upon at the trial, was no doubt a decision to the effect that an attempt to commit the misdemeanour of having carnal knowledge of a girl between ten and twelve years old is not an assault if the girl assent. But in such a case it is no offence in law on the part of the girl to give her consent. The old cases establish that where two people meet to commit that which is an offence in the eye of the law, consent is immaterial. In such cases the indictment charges that each committed an assault upon the other, and that seems to show that when an indecent assault is charged to which the patient offers no opposition his consent goes for nothing, and that the law will not regard it. (The case of Lord Audley 3 Howell's St. Trial 402) [WILLES, J.—In an action for criminal conversation the declaration alleges that the defendant assaulted the wife though she was a consenting party.] An indecent assault is an act to which the law will not permit a party to consent.

KELLY, C.B.—It is clear that, upon the circumstances of the case, there is nothing which constitutes an assault in law. If anything is done by one being upon the person of another to make the act a criminal assault, it must be done without the consent and against the will of the person upon whom it is done. Mere submission is not consent, for there may be submission without consent, and while the feelings are repugnant to the act being done. Mere submission is totally different from consent. But in the present case there was actual participation by both parties in the act done, and complete mutuality. We should be overturning all the principles of law to say that in this case there was any assault in law. The cases referred to in the argument of the counsel for the prosecution are founded on this, that the law does not recognise consent to commit a felony. In this case there is nothing in the nature of an exposure of the person charged which is within the purview of the law. Anything of the kind in question done before two or more persons would have amounted to an indecent exposure, and consent would have been no defence. Consequently, under the circumstances of this case, the conviction must be quashed.

The rest of the Court concurring.

Conviction quashed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Jan. 26 and 31, and Feb. 12, 1872.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

BECKETT v. THE CORPORATION OF LEEDS.

Highway—Ownership ad medium filum viæ—Presumption.

In opposition to the claim of the owners of houses abutting upon an ancient street in a town that they were entitled to the soil of the street ad medium filum viæ, evidence was adduced, that the lords of the manor used formerly to receive tolls in respect of markets held in the street, which tolls they subsequently sold to the corporation of the town; that in 1694 they had, in consideration of a yearly rent of 3l., granted a licence to certain persons to dig up any streets of the town in order to lay pipes for the purpose of supplying the town with water, which rent of 3l. was paid to them down to 1836, when it was bought up by the corporation for 75l.; and that payments had on several occasions been made to the lords of the manor by owners of houses abutting on the street in question in respect of encroachment made upon the soil of the street:

Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the evidence of ownership in the lords of the manor was sufficient to rebut the presumption of law, that the owners of the lands abutting upon the street were entitled to the soil of the street ad medium filum viæ, and that consequently the lords of the manor had shown a good title to the soil in question.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The suit was instituted by the lords of the manor of Leeds to enforce specific performance of an agreement dated 20th Dec. 1867, and made between the plaintiffs of the one part and the corporation of Leeds of the other part, whereby the plaintiffs undertook to convey to the corporation the soil of so much of the ancient street called Briggate, in the town of Leeds, as would be required to enable the corporation to complete certain contracts for sale into which they had entered.

On the 2nd Dec. 1867 the corporation of Leeds, acting under the powers conferred upon them by the Leeds Improvement Act 1866, had offered for sale by public auction two plots of land on the west side of and abutting on Briggate, undertaking to grant to the purchasers of these lots the right of forming cellars under and extending fourteen feet into Briggate, and co-extensive with the frontages of the lots.

The lords of the manor disputed the right of the corporation to make any such grant of the right of forming cellars under Briggate, and claimed to be themselves the owners of the soil under the street.

Under these circumstances the agreement of the 20th Dec. 1867 was entered into, by which it was agreed that it should be referred to an arbitrator to determine the value of the soil agreed to be sold.

The corporation having alleged that the lords of the manor did not show any title to the soil in question, and that they (the corporation) themselves were the owners of it in fee, the lords of the manor instituted the present suit to enforce specific performance of the agreement.

The chief clerk of the Master of the Rolls having certified that the lords of the manor had made out a good title to the soil in question, the corporation took out a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, and the Master of the Rolls reversed the decision of his chief clerk.

The lords of the manor now appealed from the decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The land upon which the greater and older portion of the town of Leeds now stands is within the manor of Leeds, and anciently formed part of the demesne lands of the manor, and the street called Briggate is in that part of Leeds which is within the manor. Briggate is the principal and one of the oldest streets of Leeds, and it passes through the centre of the town to a bridge over the river Aire, upon which the town is situated. It is a very wide street, being on the average about 65ft. across, and at the part where the land in question in this suit lies it is 63ft. in width.

The lords of the manor of Leeds from time to time exercised acts of ownership upon the soil of the ancient streets in Leeds. Fairs and markets used formerly to be held in Briggate, and in other old streets of the town, and the stallage and pickage and other tolls in respect of those markets were regularly paid to the lords of the manor down to the year 1854, when they sold the same to the corporation of Leeds.

By a deed dated the 22nd Sept. 1694, the lords of the manor, in consideration of the sum of 3*l.* for ever to be yearly paid as therein mentioned, granted license, leave, power and authority, to Henry Gilbert and George Sorrocold, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns for ever, to dig up any of the streets and highways within the town of Leeds, to lay pipes and do all other things necessary for the carrying on and managing certain waterworks which were about to be made for supplying the town of Leeds with water.

In the year 1853 these waterworks were transferred to the corporation of Leeds, who regularly paid the annual rent of 3*l.* down to 1858, when an arrangement was made between the lords of the manor and the corporation, by which the corporation paid the lords of the manor 75*l.* for the purchase of the annual rent of 3*l.*

The plaintiffs adduced evidence of several cases in which the owners of houses in Briggate had made payments to the lords of the manor in respect of encroachments made upon the soil of the street.

The defendants also adduced evidence of cases in which such encroachments had been made without any payment having been made to the lords in respect thereof.

The Solicitor-General (Jessel, Q. C.), Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and North, for the appellants, contended that the evidence of acts of ownership on the part of the lords of the manor showed conclusively that they were the owners of the soil in question, and that the evidence was sufficient to rebut the general presumption of law that the defendants, as owners of the houses, were entitled to the soil of the street ad medium filum viæ. Sir Richard Baggallay Q. C. in reply.

Lord Justice JAMES:—In this case I am of opinion that the lords have made out a very clear and very satisfactory title to the piece of ground in question. A good deal of the argument has turned upon what is supposed to be the rule of law as to the presumption that closes extend ad medium filum viæ, and it is said that that presumption is to be applied to such a house as this in Leeds, with respect to that wide space between the house and the houses on the other side. The rule, as laid down in the case of Lord v. The Commissioners for the City of Sydney (12 Moo. P. C. Cas. 473), in which the matter was probably more fully considered than in any other case, is, that in all these cases you must have regard to the circumstances under which the words of grant are used. The learned judge who there gave the judgment of the court, the Right Hon. Sir John Coleridge, says this: "If lands were described as bounded by a house, no one could suppose the house was included in the grant; but if lands granted were described as bounded by a highway, it would be equally absurd to suppose that the grantor had reserved to himself the right to the soil ad medium filum in the far greater majority of cases wholly unprofitable." I should, myself, if it were necessary to determine it, be very slow to come to the conclusion that where there is a road going through an estate, and a site is granted by the roadside for the erection of a cottage or house, and a cottage or house is built upon that site, the mere conveyance, or grant, or demise of a piece of land as the site, and for the purpose of the site of a house, is in presumption of law a grant up to the middle of the high road, the frontage of which is probably the origin of the house being built on that space. It appears to me that a great many inconveniences might arise, which one could easily point out, from the notion that a mere grant or demise of such a site would of itself raise a presumption of law which would deprive the owner of the estate of his possessory title, or of his freehold in respect of the half of the highway. But the present case stands in this way. These were really not originally, according to the evidence before us, houses built by the side of a mere highway to which the rule could be at all applied. It appears now quite clear that this street is a very wide open space—I mean very wide having regard to the purpose for which the space was used between the houses—60ft. wide; it is a space which was kept and used for fairs and for markets of all kinds and descriptions, which fairs and markets were the fairs and markets of the lord of the manor, and continued to be the fairs and markets of the lord for several centuries after the time when the place came into existence. It appears to me that in such a case as that, to presume that where the lord of the borough had allowed his dependent burgesses to have a thing called a "toft" fronting towards the market and fair place which was also used as a road, that where the lord granted or permitted to his burgesses to have each such a toft as that, and then by a grant enlarged the tenure of that toft into a fee simple tenure in borough English. To presume that, in such a case, the lord intended to grant, or the tenant intended to take, the half of the vacant space between the one row of tofts and the other row of tofts, is, to my mind, a presumption inconsistent with common sense, and inconsistent with the sense which the common usage of mankind would apply to such a grant. Then we have this —there being nothing but the presumption, or supposed presumption, in favour of the owner of the house—there is, beyond all question, the fact that the lord has received for a great number of years a substantial money payment for the use of part of the soil itself of the road in question. It was a sum of 3 guineas a year, and, no doubt, that is not a very large sum, but it is a substantial sum which the lord has received, and has received latterly from the corporation, before that from a joint stock company, and before that from individuals who were speculatively engaged in establishing works for the benefit of the town, and which must have been received, as it appears to me, with the full knowledge of everybody connected with the town of Leeds at the time. Then, in addition to that, the lord has received a sum in respect of encroachments upon part of this very street itself, one or two upon the street called Briggate, and one or two more upon that which is doubted as being part of Briggate, but which, at all events, is a continuation of the same line of road leading from the bridge upwards towards the country, as against which proofs of ownership, to my mind, there is no evidence of enjoyment of any profit, or of any right, which can be considered as adverse to the title of the lords. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that a good title was shown; and, having regard to the offer which was made to furnish evidence of the material facts, I am of opinion that a good title was shown before the institution of the suit.

Lord Justice MELLISH. I am of the same opinion. Looking at the nature of the property, namely, a road which passes between two rows of houses, you cannot of course expect to prove the property in it by the ordinary acts of ownership, of its having been let and enjoyed in that way. You can only expect the sort of evidence that can be produced in such a case, and, having regard to the nature of the property, I am of opinion that the lord has really made out an extremely strong case. In the first place, I agree that, looking at what we know about the property in ancient times, there is no presumption that the tofts went to the middle of the highway, or to the middle of the space between them and the tofts on the other side. What we know about it is this: I think it is clearly to be presumed that the road between must have existed from time immemorial, because the fairs and markets must be presumed to have been held from time immemorial. As regards the markets, it is expressly recited in the charter of Charles I. that they had existed from time immemorial, and the fairs must have existed likewise from time immemorial, because there is no trace of any grant. Then this being in fact in the time of King John, you have a small town with a market-place and fair-place in the middle of it, and probably a small portion of it only occupied as a highway at that time, but with spaces between used for the common benefit of the public, and the enfranchisement of the markets and fairs appears to have been permitted by the lords. Then you find that at some time, certainly before the reign of King John, there were granted out tofts simply as burgage tenements in the first instance, and then, as it appears to me, as tenements at will. Is it to be presumed that the lords intended to grant the actual soil of all that space which was granted to the use of the public, and which was to be used for the purpose of markets and fairs? It appears to me to be extremely improbable that it could have been their intention at that time to do so, and that, whatever may have been the presumption at that time, the acts of ownership have been very strong indeed. The lords having granted the right to lay down water pipes in all the streets in Leeds, and having received an annual payment for years, is very strong evidence of ownership. So also is the granting of liberty to make encroachments in the streets and receiving payments, some fixed and some annual, for doing so. They were very strong acts of ownership: and so also was receiving profits in respect of the soil of the streets. Then there was the moot-house in the middle, and also the copyhold house going down. When these copyholds were granted or erected we do not know; but it all goes to show the general intention of the lords to reserve and keep a considerable dominion over the soil of the streets. Then, what is there on the other side? Nothing but the most slight evidence of encroachments in modern times; and really, as to the Acts of Parliament, I cannot see that there is anything inconsistent in them; and we have to decide this case in fact, as jurymen, and say whether, on this evidence, we ought to find in favour of the lords of the manor. I can only say that I am convinced in my own mind that the soil in the ancient streets did belong to the lords, and that up to a very modern period, that was the universal opinion in Leeds, and everyone acted upon it, and it is only in modern times that doubts have been cast upon it. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that a jury would come to the conclusion in favour of the lord; and I am also of opinion that, if the jury found against the lord upon the evidence, a common law court would send down the case for a new trial.

HARDY v. THE METROPOLITAN LAND AND FINANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Building society—Breach of trust by directors—Unauthorised investment—Suit to recover moneys improperly paid—Jurisdiction in equity.

A benefit building society from time to time deposited moneys with a finance company, whose manager and some of whose directors were also manager and directors of the society. Portions of the moneys were at various times repaid to the society, and ultimately the company gave a cheque to the manager for the repayment of the balance to the society. The manager misappropriated the money, and afterwards died. The trustees of the society thereupon, with the sanction of the directors, who were not made parties, filed a bill against the company to recover payment of the money:

Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls) that the cheque was given to the manager as the agent of the company, and that he held it as such agent till he had paid it over to the society, but as he never paid it to the society the money must be treated as still in the hands of the company, and as it had come into their hands by means of a breach of trust, a suit for the recovery of it could be maintained in equity.

Decree accordingly for repayment by the company with interest.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The suit was instituted by the trustees of the London Benefit Building Society, to recover from the defendant company, a sum of 375*l.*, alleged to have been improperly received by them under the following circumstances.

The building society was formed under the provisions of the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, with which was incorporated the Act 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, and its rules were duly certified and enrolled.

By these rules the City Bank were appointed the bankers of the building society.

The defendant company was incorporated for the purpose, among other things, of raising and borrowing money at interest, and receiving deposits.

Joseph Dutton, the then manager of the building society, and also the manager of the defendant company, was permitted by the directors of the building society to deposit part of the society's moneys with the defendant company. These deposits were made from time to time, between Feb. 1866, and March 1869, when a balance of £375 was standing to the credit of the building society in the books of the defendant company.

On the 23rd March 1869, the defendant company drew a cheque for the balance in favour of the building society and handed it to Dutton, to pay it to the society. This cheque was signed by two of the directors of the company and countersigned by Dutton as manager of the company.

Dutton did not pay the money to the society, but appropriated it to his own use, and soon afterwards died.

The present suit was instituted by the trustees of the benefit building society, pursuant to a resolution of the directors. The bill alleged that the deposit of the society's moneys with the defendant company was unauthorised and illegal, as they had no power to lend money otherwise than on real and heritable securities, and that in fact the society and its officers were expressly prohibited by the above mentioned Acts of Parliament, and by their rules, from investing money on deposit with a joint stock company; that the defendant company had notice through their manager of such illegality; that the repayment to Dutton was made without any authority from the directors of the building society, and without taking any proper receipt; and that the defendant company were liable to repay the amount. And it prayed that they might be decreed to repay it accordingly.

The defendant company, by their answer, submitted that they had no notice through their manager or otherwise that the investment was unauthorised. They alleged that they had duly repaid the 375*l.* to the building society, by a cheque given to Dutton, the manager of the society, and that the society must be taken to have adopted Dutton as their agent for the purpose of receiving repayments, inasmuch as from 1866 to 1869 repayments of deposits to the society had always been made by means of cheques given to Dutton; and they submitted that the remedy of the plaintiffs, if any, was at law, this being a mere money demand.

Evidence was adduced on behalf of the plaintiffs that the directors of the society had not given any authority to Dutton to apply for or receive the 375*l.*, and that they did not know that he had received it until May 1869, after his death.

The society made a claim for the 375*l.* against Dutton's estate, after his death.

The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill with costs, on the ground that it was a mere money demand.

In delivering judgment, his Lordship said: I am of opinion that this suit fails. It is brought nominally by the trustees of the London Benefit Building Society, but really by the directors, to make the defendant company repay the sum of 375*l.* lent to them by the directors of the building society. The suit either rests upon a breach of trust, or it does not. If it rests on the ground of a breach of trust on the part of the directors in lending the money to a finance company, then the directors were as guilty in lending the money as the company was in receiving it. Mr. Davey argued that it being a breach of trust to advance the money, the defendant company, by dealing with the building society, must be taken to have known of the breach of trust, and are therefore liable to repay the money. If that were so, then I am of opinion that it would be impossible for the directors of the building society to proceed against those to whom they themselves advanced the money, and make them liable to repay it to the trustees, who are only formal parties to the suit. The case of Gray v. Lewis (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 582; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 526) does not apply at all. If such a suit is instituted alleging a breach of trust, it must be brought by some parties complaining of the directors and of the defendant company, and seeking to make both liable. But the prayer of the bill in the present suit is not framed on the ground of a breach of trust; and, that being so, it is reduced to a mere money demand, and the question then is whether the money has or has not been actually repaid; but that I do not go into. There is no foundation for the proceedings in equity, and the bill must be dismissed with costs, without prejudice to any proceedings at law.

From this decision the plaintiffs appealed.

Southgate, Q.C. and Davey, for the appellants.—We contend that this suit can be maintained, the moneys deposited with the company being trust moneys, and the company having at least constructive notice of the trust: (Bridgman v. Gill, 24 Beav. 302.) The deposit of the money with the company was not a common banking account, the society having by their rules to keep their banking account with a certain bank; but it was an investment of the money and an investment which was not authorised by the rules, and therefore it was a breach of trust on the part of the directors of the society. The company must be taken to have had notice of the rules, for they were enrolled, and we submit that at least the fact of the society and the company having common directors, and a common manager, fixes the company with constructive notice that the deposit was a breach of trust. [Lord Justice MELLISH.—In Re The Marseilles Extension Railway Company (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 858; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 161), we held that although two companies had common directors, and a common solicitor the lending company was not affected with notice of any illegality in the purpose to which the money borrowed was to be applied.] That was a different case from the present, for the lending company had power to lend, but here the society had no power to deposit its money in this way. Ernest v Croysdill (2 L. T. Rep N. S. 616; 2 De G. F. & J. 198), is strongly in favour of our claim, for there as here the claim proceeded upon the right to recover moneys affected by a trust which had got into the hands of other persons with notice of the trust. We contend that our claim to relief in equity cannot be resisted on the ground that it is a mere money demand, and that we have only a remedy at law. Dutton was not our agent for the purpose of receiving repayment of the money, therefore the company are not released by having paid it to him, and it must be taken to be still in the hands of the company. We contend that it was not necessary to make the directors of the society parties to the suit, for McGachan v. Dew (15 Beav. 84) shows that it is not necessary to make all the parties to a breach of trust parties to a suit seeking redress, but the injured persons can proceed against some of the persons guilty of the breach of trust without making them all parties. But even if they ought to have been made parties, that was a defect easily remedied, and not a ground for dismissing the bill. They also cited, Ernest v. Nicholls, 6 H. L. Cas. 401;

Fountaine v. The Carmarthen Railway Company, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 316;
Grimes v. Harrison, 26 Beav. 435; 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32.

Swanston Q.C. and Montague Cookson, for the respondents.—We contend that the company was discharged from its liability by paying the money to Dutton, who we contend was the agent of the society. The society admitted this by making a claim against his estate. But we contend that the deposit was not a breach of trust; it was merely a banking transaction, and not an investment. It was therefore a legitimate transaction and, if so, there was no trust; it was a simple banking operation. It is said that the society had bankers of its own; but there was nothing to prevent it from changing its bankers, or if there was, we had no notice of it. No case decides that a person dealing with a building society is bound with notice of everything in its rules. Indeed the provision of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 8, that all the members of a building society shall be deemed and taken to have full notice of its rules, shows that persons not members are not affected with notice of them. This case is reduced to a mere money demand, and we contend that the bill was rightly dismissed.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice JAMES said: The argument satisfies me that the court has jurisdiction to do what is clearly the right thing to do, namely, to make the defendants repay this money which they clearly received, and of which they have not discharged themselves. For assuming them to have been indebted in the sum of 375*l.* to someone on behalf of the London Benefit Building Society, the mode in which they state that they discharged themselves of that sum is utterly without validity. According to the defendants' own account of the transaction, their directors were in the habit of acting upon the information of the manager as to the deposits to be withdrawn at any time, and then of drawing cheques for the amounts which they left in his hands to pay to the persons in whose favour they were drawn. According to this practice, he represented to them that the building society had by some proper authority or other required payment of this sum of 375*l.* Upon that representation the directors drew a cheque for the amount, and he countersigned it, and it was left in his hands to be paid over to the building society. It appears to me that that was no payment to the London Benefit Building Society, until the cheque passed into the hands of someone authorised to receive it, and give a receipt for it on behalf of the society. And in spite of all that has been said about the usual mode of transacting business between the company and the society, and the resolution of the directors of the society, Dutton clearly had no authority to receive the money on behalf of the society. Till he paid the cheque over to the society he held it in exactly the same capacity as that in which he had countersigned, that is as manager of the defendant company, who were not discharged by handing the cheque to him. That being so, the only question is, whether this is such a clear money demand that this court has no jurisdiction to give relief. At first it appeared to me that there would be great difficulty in the way of granting relief in equity, and the Master of the Rolls was of opinion that the difficulty was insuperable. However, it appears to me beyond all question that these moneys were moneys belonging to the London Benefit Building Society, who had no power by their rules to deposit the moneys in this way with the defendant company. But as the money was lent by the directors in a manner unauthorised by the rules, it was trust money placed by an improper act in the hands of the defendants, and, as, in my view of the case, it has not been repaid, it is trust money still in the hands of the defendants, and having been improperly placed there by trustees, it is competent to the cestuis que trust to come here and file a bill requiring repayment of the trust money. If the money had really been paid to persons authorised to receive it, more investigation would have been necessary as to how far the defendants had notice of the breach of trust committed by the directors of the society in depositing the money with them. But in the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to investigate that question. On the whole I am of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, this court has jurisdiction to grant relief, and that the order of the Master of the Rolls must be discharged. The order will be that the defendant company do pay the 375*l.* with interest at 4 per cent., together with the costs of the suit up to and including the hearing before the Master of the Rolls.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion. The Master of the Rolls decided the case upon the ground that it was a mere money demand. But it appears to me, looking at the Act and the rules of the society, that the directors of the building society were guilty of a breach of trust in depositing the money with the defendants. If it was intended as a permanent investment the directors had no power by their rules to make any such investment, and if not looked upon as a permanent investment, but only as a temporary deposit, it was equally contrary to the rules by which the City Bank were appointed the bankers of the society. There is no doubt, therefore, that it was a breach of trust on the part of the directors; and, that being so, the question is whether this suit can be maintained. I am of opinion that it can. It appears to me that if the money is still in the hands of the defendants, they are liable to repay it, whether they had notice of the breach of trust or not. I am of opinion that it must be considered to be still in their hands, and therefore the question of notice does not arise. The payment to Dutton cannot be treated as a payment to the building society. Till he handed over the cheque to the society he held it as the defendant's agent, as he did in the ordinary course of business. But it is alleged that the society treated him as having received the money on their behalf by making a formal demand for payment of it upon Dutton's personal representatives. The mere fact of such a demand having been made could not be evidence that the money was really received by Dutton on behalf of the society. Therefore, as this money is trust money which came into the hands of the defendants by a breach of trust, and as it is still in their hands, I am of opinion that a suit to recover it can be maintained.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by G. WELBY KING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 19 and 28, 1872.

GAUNT v. FYNNEY.

Nuisance—Heat—Noise—Vibration—Delay—Damages—21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, s. 2.

The defendant, in Jan. 1865, erected a steam engine in a shed adjoining the stable belonging to the plaintiffs, by which the stable was rendered unfit for horses, and some inconvenience occasioned in the plaintiffs' dwelling-house. No complaint was made by the plaintiffs until June 1870.

Under the circumstances, the court refused to grant an injunction to restrain the defendant from working the engine, but directed an inquiry as to what damages should be awarded to the plaintiffs in respect of the injury to the dwelling-house and stable.

THE plaintiffs were the owners and occupiers of a dwelling-house and outbuildings at Leek, in the county of Stafford, which had been erected by their late father, Richard Gaunt, in or about the year 1811, and also of a two-stalled stable, originally two cottages, which were conveyed to the said Richard Gaunt in 1817, and converted by him into a two-stalled stable and harness room in 1830.

In 1855 the defendant purchased a piece of land lying to the east of the plaintiffs' dwelling-house, upon which a mill was built for the purpose of manufacturing silk, leaving a small strip of land adjoining and lying to the east of the plaintiffs' said stable. This mill was connected with another silk mill belonging to the defendant, which he had acquired in 1849, and which had been used for many years previously in the manufacture of silk. Both these mills were worked entirely by hand power up to the month of Jan. 1865, and no steam power was used upon the defendant's premises before that time. In the latter part of the year 1864, and in Jan. 1865, the defendant and his late partner raised a part of the wall, which inclosed the strip of land on the west, boarding up the lower half of the east wall of the plaintiffs' stable, and converted it into a boiler and engine house and placed a boiler and steam engine in it for the purpose of working the machinery in the mills, such engine house being about 60ft. distant from the plaintiffs' residence. The plaintiffs alleged that from the time when the engine began to work, the noise occasioned by it caused some slight inconvenience to them, but in, and for some short time prior to, the month of June 1870, the noise and vibration occasioned by the engine and the machinery connected with it had increased to such an extent as materially to interfere with the health and comfort of the plaintiffs, and their enjoyment of the dwelling-house and premises, and to be a nuisance and injury to them, and that the stable was rendered unfit for horses, and wholly useless as a stable, in consequence of the heat from the boiler and the noise and vibration of the engine. They also stated, that until the month of Oct. 1870, they believed that the engine was in some part of the defendant's mill, and that they had no idea or suspicion that there was any engine or machinery in the space between their stable and the defendant's mill.

A considerable mass of evidence, of a somewhat contradictory nature, was adduced upon the question of nuisance, but, as will be seen from the judgment, the court was of opinion that the existence of the nuisance was clearly proved.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C. and Rowcliffe, for the plaintiffs, referred to Crump v. Lambert (L. Rep. 3 Eq. 409).

The Solicitor-General (Sir G. Jessel, Q.C.), Fry, Q.C. and A. G. Marten for the defendants.

LORD ROMILLY.—In this case the plaintiffs complain of the nuisance produced by the erection of a steam engine in the shed or yard adjoining their stable, by which their stable, as they allege, has become useless. They also complain of it as creating a serious inconvenience in the house in which they themselves reside. I think, having regard to the evidence, these two cases must be considered, for the present at least, separately. One thing is very material, particularly with reference to one of these cases, namely, that the engine was erected in Jan. 1865, and that no complaint was made of it till June 1870, five years and a half afterwards. The plaintiffs allege that the reason of this is the constant increase of the nuisance, which has gone on every year augmenting, and which became so considerable as to be unendurable at the beginning of 1870. A great deal of evidence is gone into on both sides, part of which relates to the dwelling-house, and part of which relates to the stable. Now, first of all, I will take the evidence which relates to the stable. The evidence is, as usual in these cases, very contradictory, and shows signs of exaggeration on both sides; but, on considering the effect of the whole, I have arrived at the conclusion that the nuisance is such as to render the stable unfit for the abode of horses; and that until they have become accustomed to the noise, the tremor, and warmth produced by the engine, it is not a fit place for horses, and probably excitable or nervous horses may be seriously affected and injured in getting enured to the effects of the engine. In addition to this, the defendant has made the window of the stable, which used to admit light and air, useless as to air, and also considerably interfered with as to light. The defendant says in excuse for this, first, that this window is not required for the stable, because the stable has a window on the other side, and also a door, and that there is plenty of air and ventilation in the stable. Now I am of opinion that that is not a matter to be gone into, or a question which I have to determine, and that a person has no right to shut up another person's window and then say it is not required. The next question which has been argued is, that the window was shut up by the sanction and concurrence of the agent of the plaintiffs; but, in my opinion, the evidence fails in proving this. The only person mentioned as the agent is Mr. Brealey, who, unfortunately, died before the suit came to a hearing. That he did act as the agent of the plaintiffs in various matters is unquestionably true. He was originally a clerk of Mr. Crusoe, and has since acted as the plaintiffs' agent in various matters. I do not think that there is any evidence to prove that he did sanction the closing of the window; but of this I am quite clear, that, if he did so sanction it, it was not within the scope of his authority, and that he had no authority from the plaintiffs to perform that office. It is also clear from the defendant's evidence that the boarding up of this window was essential, in his own view of the case, for the exclusion of the noise and heat of the engine from the stable of the plaintiffs. In that state of things, I am of opinion that they are entitled to some relief in respect of the stable. It is true five years and a half have elapsed since the engine was erected, but it is positively sworn by the plaintiffs, and I believe correctly, that they were ignorant of this fact relating to the stable until it was brought to their attention in 1870. Whether this was by reason of the increased nuisance, or by the complaint of the visitor whose horse suffered, or from their accidentally observing it, I do not know, and cannot ascertain from the course of the evidence; but putting it in a way least favourable to the plaintiffs, I am of opinion they are not barred by time, and that they are entitled to relief in respect of that. It is true that the time would prevent them from having an interlocutory injunction, and accordingly that view was taken in the previous stage of the case; but in other respects I am of opinion that they are entitled to apply to the court for relief. Before I proceed to the case of the dwelling house, which I take separately, I have to consider (and I have considered very carefully), what sort of relief the plaintiffs would be entitled to, if the case of the stable stood alone. In this case, so considering it, I am of opinion that I must have regard to these facts. The defendant's capital has been engaged in this business for a great number of years, and was engaged in it for five years and a half without any complaint being made, and an injunction stopping the engine would, I think, upon the evidence, destroy the business of the defendant and put an end to it in that place. I think that if the case stood in the stable alone, a fit case would arise for the application of the provisions contained in the 2nd section of the Act of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, which section I will read. It is very rarely I have had occasion either to consider it or to deal with it. The section is this: "In all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract, or agreement" (this is not any one of those), "or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act" (which this is), "or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract, or agreement, it shall be lawful for the same court if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to, or in substitution for, such injunction or specific performance, and such damages may be assessed in such manner as the court shall direct." I think if the stable stood alone, this would be a case for damages; and I am of opinion that the injury occasioned by stopping the business of the defendant is, in the ordinary sense in which this court treats such a thing, irreparable, but that the evil produced by putting an end to the stable is not irreparable, at least as far as I can understand it. Another stable further off still exists, and, assuming that they must have a stable to supply the place of this, I am by no means clear that that might not be enlarged and increased without injury, and that it might easily be ascertained what the damage was. Therefore, I should in that case think fit to say that the amount of damages should be ascertained in this court, and I would not enforce specific and irreparable injury upon the defendant. In considering that, of course I must consider the purpose for which the Act was passed. After the Act passed a person was not entitled, by obtaining an injunction, to inflict an irreparable injury upon a defendant, even though the defendant occasioned the nuisance himself, when in fact the plaintiff could be paid for any damage which he had sustained. Having so considered it, I now consider the question of the house. The house raises a new question, because the question is this with respect to the house, "Is the house made uninhabitable, or is it so seriously inconvenienced as to render it such that an ordinary person would naturally quit the house and reside somewhere else?" because, if so, that I consider is an irreparable injury. If the question were a question between the abandonment of the house and the abandonment of the factory for carrying on the business, I should consider both injuries irreparable, but I should not hesitate between them, because the injury would have been created by the defendant, and, therefore, the injury to the house would be a case for an injunction. I have stated this in order to explain, if the case goes further, the principles which actuate me in the course I am about to take in the matter. Therefore the question is whether the abandonment of the house or the abandonment of the factory, is a necessary consequence which follows from the working of this engine. Upon this part of the case the evidence is very material, because the evidence here, as in the case of the stable, is very contradictory; indeed, more contradictory in the case of the house than in the case of the stable. In addition to that there are some marks of exaggeration, which there always are in these cases, and naturally enough, because persons who go there to give evidence give it, in a great measure, as partisans. But then the question of time becomes of very material importance indeed, because this is certain, that for five years and a half the plaintiffs have not complained. That is a very strong observation to show that if the nuisance has been the same, they did not conceive it to be very serious for five years and a half, and therefore it could not be of such a nature as to drive them out of the house, if it was so. For that purpose I have looked very carefully at the evidence of what took place during the period of that five years and a half, and the evidence, I think, conclusively shows that the engine has been kept exactly the same for five years and a half. It is a very small engine, but I am of opinion that it is quite large enough to produce the injury I have mentioned in the stable; I am now talking, however, of the house. During that time not only has this engine been worked exactly in the same way, and by the same man, but I have got the bill for coals in which I do not conceive that they have concealed anything from me. I am bound to assume they tell the truth; and from that it appears that the same amount of coals has been used for five years, and that the same man has worked it. This is certain, that according to whether the engine is kept clean or not, it makes a greater or less noise; and that if it is kept carefully oiled, it works more easily and with less tumult. In addition to that, the state of the wind may produce considerable effect, and for aught I know the state of the atmosphere may have a good deal of effect upon it. But I believe, in reality, that the effect on the house is very slight. That there is some noise is quite clear to my mind. One gentleman says, he never perceived any, and that he endeavoured in vain to perceive it; but on the evidence of the others, there must have been some, which an impartial person would have perceived. Unquestionably it is very small under the particular circumstances I have mentioned, that is, when the wind is blowing in a contrary direction, and the engine is kept in a perfect state so as to work as easily as possible. Then I come to the evidence respecting the tremor. One gentleman has taken the course usually adopted, I believe, by astronomers, of making an horizon of quicksilver, and ascertained in that way the amount of the tremor. It is notorious that, with respect to astronomers, the very slightest tremor disturbs their observations. Still, no doubt, there is something susceptible, because, I think, the evidence upon that subject is quite distinct; although I doubt whether that would have been sufficient to have induced this court to have interferred, if it had rested upon that alone. I am disposed to think it would not, and if it stood there alone, I should have allowed the matter to stand for the plaintiffs to bring such action as they might be advised in a court of law, and I should have reserved the costs till I had ascertained whether substantial damages had been given in the action or not. That is what I should have done under the old system. I have quite made up my mind that it is proper to give a direction as to the stable, and therefore, although I do not think it right to grant an injunction upon that, it is quite fit to include the house in that direction, and to direct an inquiry as to what is proper to be allowed for damages for such injury as is inflicted upon the plaintiffs by the steam engine with regard to the stable, and also with regard to the house. I think the injury has been occasioned by the defendant, and he must pay the costs of the suit up to and including the hearing; any further costs I shall reserve, and consider what I shall do with them. I shall direct that inquiry to be taken in chambers, and it will be dealt with in chambers subject to any appeal to me. Of course this does not interfere with the right which the plaintiffs may have, if they think fit, of carrying this case to a superior court for the purpose of obtaining a positive injunction, but I think the injury inflicted on the defendant would be greater than, under the circumstances, the plaintiffs are entitled to inflict, and that it could only be used, as is sometimes done, for the purpose of extorting larger damages than I think they would be entitled to receive; whereas, if I take the other course, I shall, according to my view of the case, subject to correction by a superior court, be able to give such damages as I think adequate compensation for the injury done.

V. C. WICKENS' COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, March 14, 1872.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS v. MARQUIS OF SALISBURY.

Thames Embankment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 93), s. 62—Suit in equity—Award—Compensation—Action at law—Injunction to restrain.

Where, after an award had been made compensating the plaintiff for injury done to his property by the defendants, the plaintiff, considering that certain rights had not been included in the award, instituted a suit to enforce them, and at the same time commenced an action at law to recover the amount of compensation awarded,

The court, at the instance of the defendants, granted an interim injunction to restrain the action until the hearing of the cause.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the plaintiffs in the above suit for an injunction to restrain the defendant from prosecuting an action at law for the sum of 10,645*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* The facts were these:

By the 62nd section of the Thames Embankment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 93), "full and free rights of communication and access and egress at all times to and from the land reclaimed and inclosed" under the Act were reserved to the Marquis of Salisbury, "his heirs, sequels in right, or assigns," with respect to Cecil-street and Salisbury-street, and the Board of Works were to "provide and construct such convenient means of communication therewith as might be necessary for giving to the Marquis, his heirs and assigns, and his, and their lessees and tenants, such access accordingly."

Under subsequent Acts the embankment was laid out as a garden, and a claim was made by the marquis, under his reserved rights, to a carriage road to the embankment road from Cecil and Salisbury-streets. Matters in dispute relating to the question of damage and compensation for injury done to the marquis's inheritance, were referred to an arbitrator, who, in May 1871, awarded him the sum of 8875*l.* for the injury to the inheritance, and 1770*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* for interest thereon, making together the 10,645*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* in question.

The marquis considered that the award did not include his claim to the carriage-way, and instituted a suit to enforce his right. The defendants, however, insisted that the 10,645*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* would not have been awarded, but on the consideration by the arbitrator that it covered the right of way. Pending the suit to enforce the grant of the carriage-way, the marquis brought an action at law to recover the sum awarded.

The plaintiffs now moved as above.

The question on the motion substantially was, whether the arbitrator had present to his mind when he made his award the 62nd section of the Act of 1862.

Greene, Q.C. and Charles Hall, contended that the marquis must elect whether he would sue in this court for the carriage way, or at law for the compensation awarded. He could not continue proceedings in both courts. If he succeeded both at law and in equity, he would be compensated for that which he had never lost, and, in fact, would be paid twice over for the same thing. The whole of the question, under the 62nd section of the Act, was before the arbitrator, and there was no doubt that the sum awarded was intended as compensation for the want of carriage access. If a mistake had been made by the arbitrator, the court had jurisdiction to rectify it, especially as such mistake must have arisen through the misrepresentations of the marquis himself. The Board of Works were perfectly willing to allow the whole matter to be referred back to the arbitrator, but at all events they were entitled to ask that all proceedings in the action should be stayed until the result of the suit had been determined. They cited

Penny v. Penny, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 227; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 13;

Duke of Buccleugh v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, L. Rep. 5 Ex., 221;

Re Dare Valley Railway Company, L. R. 6 Eq. 429; 4 Ch. 544.

Eddis, Q.C. and W. W. Karslake, for the Marquis of Salisbury, argued that the court had no jurisdiction. It could not alter the award, except on the ground of mistake or misconduct on the part of the arbitrator. There was nothing of that kind here. The award was made with full knowledge by the arbitrator of the provisions of the 62nd section, and without reference to the Marquis's right of access under it. The Marquis, therefore, had two distinct claims against the Board of Works, and was perfectly justified in the course he had pursued to establish them. If the Marquis succeeded in his action, the money was perfectly safe in his hands, and no injury would arise if it should be eventually decided that he was not entitled to it. The plaintiffs had altogether failed to establish a case for an interim injunction. They cited

Read v. Victoria Station and Pimlico Railway Company, 32 L. J. 167, Ex.;

Mills v. The Master, Wardens, and Society of Bowyers, 3 K. & J. 66, 72;

Brandon v. Brandon, 1 B. & P. 394.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider that the arbitrator's award includes compensation to the Marquis for the want of access to his property. The Metropolitan Board of Works say that according to the true construction of the 62nd section of the Thames Embankment Act the Marquis has no right to carriage access; the Marquis maintains that he has, and with the view of establishing his right has filed a bill in Chancery. He has also brought an action at law for the full amount awarded by the arbitrator. If he succeeds both in the suit and the action, he will be compensated for what he has not lost. I consider that this court has jurisdiction to prevent the injustice of double compensation being recovered; and although perhaps it cannot set aside the award, still it will find some means of doing justice. I will therefore grant an injunction to restrain the action until the hearing of the cause, or further order, and the Board of Works must pay the money awarded into court.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF BATLEY.

Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c 76), s. 92—Borough fund—Purchase of chain for mayor out of—Injunction.

The purchase of a gold chain for the mayor of a borough out of the borough fund is illegal.

THIS was a motion on behalf of the Attorney-General and the relators in the above suit, for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants, their council, treasurer, officers, and agents from purchasing, or otherwise providing out of the borough or district rates, or out of any other rates levied or to be levied for public purposes within the borough of Batley, a chain and badge, or any similar or other decoration for the personal use or adornment of the mayor for the time being of the borough. The facts were these:

In Nov. 1871 the general purposes committee of the borough of Batley passed a resolution suggesting to the town council the necessity of providing a gold chain for the mayor of the borough, and recommending that one should be purchased at a cost not exceeding 200*l.* Designs were afterwards submitted and approved, and at a meeting held on the 23rd Dec. a design for a chain and badge was selected. The chain was to be 48in. in length, to weigh 30oz., and to cost 200*l.* The emblems on the chain were to be—a bale of wool, or shoddy, in the centre; a sheaf of wheat on the right, and a fleece on the left. It was also determined that the names of the past and present mayors, with their years of office, and the future mayors as they served the office, should be engraved on the chain.

As soon as the resolution became publicly known in the borough several of the ratepayers objected to the purchase being made out of the borough rates, and a meeting was held, at which the proposal was condemned. Subsequently the question was formally put in the town council, and the result was that eleven voted in favour of the purchase, and eight against it. Thereupon the dissentients instituted this suit to restrain the purchase as a misapplication of the rates.

They now moved as above.

The arguments principally turned upon the interpretation of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), the 92nd section of which, after providing that all corporate property shall be brought within the borough fund, and applied, first to payment of debts contracted previously to the passing of the Act, then to the payment of the salaries of the borough officials, the costs of prosecutions, the maintenance of the borough gaol, and the payment of constables, enacts that "all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for, which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act, and in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council, for the public benefit of the inhabitants, and improvement of the borough."

Greene Q.C. and W. Barber, in support of the motion, contended that the defendants had no power under the Act to expend the funds of the borough in the manner contemplated by the resolution. The defendants stood in the position of trustees with regard to the fund. They cited

Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Lichfield, 11 Beav. 128;
Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Plymouth, 1 W. R. 445;
Attorney-General v. Mayor of Wigan, Kay 268;
Attorney-General v. Aspinall, 2 Myl. & Cr. 613;
Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Norwich 1 Keen 700.

Karslake, Q.C. and Ince, for the defendants, after contending that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was by writ of certiorari in the Court of Queen's Bench, argued, on the construction of the Act, that the defendants were fully justified in charging the expense of the chain and badge upon the borough rates. They referred to,

Reg. v. The Mayor of Warwick, 8 Ad. & E. 926;
Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Liverpool, 1 M. & Cr. 171; Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Wigan, 28 L. J. 429, Chan.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion that the borough fund is a trust fund held by the Corporation upon a public trust, which is not a charitable one. The Legislature has provided that in certain cases where there has been abuse in dealing with the fund the remedy shall be by writ of certiorari, and it has therefore been contended that the Court of Queen's Bench is the proper tribunal for dealing with the question in dispute. I consider, however, that this court has ample power, and is fully as competent to deal with a case like the present as a court of law, and that being so I shall certainly not send it to be tried over again before another tribunal. Then comes the question whether the proposed expenditure upon the chain and badge is within the terms of the Municipal Corporation Act. Giving the most liberal interpretation to the statute, and construing it so as to allow the Corporation, acting as trustees, every possible charge and every reasonable and justifiable latitude in reference to the due discharge of their duties, and allowing them everything which could be "reasonably" included in their costs, charges and expenses under the Act, I still find it impossible to hold that the expenditure in question is authorised by, or can be brought within the Act. It is said that the sum in dispute is so small as to be beneath the attention of the court; but it would be a matter of considerable regret if that were so. The money will have to be raised by a number of small payments, contributed by a number of persons of various positions in the social scale, and varying also in their pecuniary means; and it becomes the duty of the court to see that money so contributed is not wantonly spent or wasted. Forms and ceremonies, no doubt, have their uses, and some persons may be, and are, perhaps, more impressed by them than others. But to suppose that any reasonable human being would pay more respect to a mayor because he wears a gold chain, a chain bought for him out of the rates, a chain for which he has not paid himself, and which is not even, therefore, a proof of his own personal solvency, is a supposition beyond the possibility of belief. I have, in fact, throughout the argument, found great difficulty in regarding the case as a serious one; but as I have been asked to adjudicate upon it, and as—as I have already said—the amount in dispute, though small, is no objection to the interference of the court, I shall grant an injunction in the terms asked, restraining the corporation from applying the borough funds in the manner proposed.

SECOND COURT.

REG. v. ST. IVES UNION.

Order of removal—Status of irremovability—Breach of residence.

The pauper, an old woman of seventy, had lived twenty-eight years in the parish from which she was ordered to be removed; during the last four years she was at intervals in the workhouse, and had no other place of residence. Upon leaving the workhouse in 1870, she was for six weeks in domestic service in the parish; after which, finding herself too old for such service she left, saying that she wished at any rate first to have a holiday. She stayed six days out of the parish with a son and a friend, both of whom were too poor to continue to entertain her. She then returned to the workhouse of the parish, from which she was afterwards removed to her place of legal settlement.

Held, that this was not such a breach of residence as to destroy the pauper's status of irremovability in the removing parish, although she had no place of residence in that parish to which she could return, during her absence.

Reg. v. Glossop Union (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 227) discussed and qualified.

THIS was an appeal against an order of removal, which was heard at the quarter sessions, held in and for the county of Middlesex on the 29th April 1871. The court confirmed the order, subject to the following case:—

The only question raised was, whether the pauper, Mary Parnell, was or was not removable from the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green.

The facts were that the pauper was about 70 years old, and was the widow of William Parnell; that she and her husband lived in St. Matthew for about twenty-four years, continuously, until March 1866; that owing to the illness of her husband she then went into the workhouse in that parish, into which also the husband was received a few months afterwards; that both were, from time to time, discharged and received again until the 23rd Dec. 1868, when the husband was removed to York Lunatic Asylum, where he died in Jan. 1869.

Until that time both remained continuously in the parish of St. Matthew, and after the removal of the husband to the asylum, the wife remained in the workhouse of St. Matthew until the 24th Oct. 1870. She then went as a domestic servant into the service of the chaplain of the workhouse, who lived out of the workhouse, but in the same parish of St. Matthew. Before she went into his service she was supplied with a stock of clothes by the officials of the workhouse; she was hired as a yearly servant in the ordinary way. She continued in his service in the same parish for about six weeks, when being too old for service, she left the chaplain, saying that she wished at any rate first to have a holiday. Upon the day of leaving the chaplain, she took all she possessed, consisting of her clothes only, with her, and went to visit her son, who was living out of the parish, and stayed with him for three days. The son was a married man, had only one room, was very poor, and both he and his mother proved that she only went on a visit, with no intention of staying. Upon leaving the son she went on a visit in the same way to Mary Clarke, who also lived out of the parish, and there she stayed for three days. She then went for one day to a friend living in the parish of St. Matthew, and on the next went into the workhouse of that parish, where she remained until the making of the order. Whilst out of the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, she endeavoured to get employment, and if she had succeeded in getting employment out of the parish she would not have returned to that parish. When the pauper left Mrs. Clarke she asked Mrs. Clarke to let her, the pauper, know if she should hear of any work to suit her, and said she was going back into the workhouse.

The respondents contended that a break in the residence was established by her absence from the parish during these two periods of three days each, inasmuch as it could not be said that she was constructively resident in St. Matthew, Bethnal-green; she having no house or residence in that parish during such absence to which she could return.

The appellants contended that there was no break, inasmuch as she did not leave with the intention of residing out of the parish, but simply to visit friends temporarily.

The question for the court is: Was there a break in the residence or not? If there was a break, the order to be confirmed. If not, the order of sessions and the original order to be quashed.

Poland, for the respondents, relied upon the case of The Queen v. Glossop (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 227), in which Blackburn, J., said, "There must be both a place which he has a right to return to and an intention to return, to constitute a constructive residence; and where a man has gone away and left no residence, though he means to return at a future time, the animus revertendi is immaterial." This was in accordance with the previous cases of Hartfield v. Rotherfield (17 Q. B. 746), and Reg. v. The Stourbridge Union (34 L. J. 179, M. C.); and contained a clear and definite principle which would be more useful for the guidance of quarter sessions than the various considerations required by the case of The Guildford Union v. St. Olave's Union (25 L. T. Rep. 803).

Metcalfe appeared for the appellants.

BLACKBURN, J.—We need not trouble Mr. Metcalfe. The question is whether this pauper was constructively residing for a year before she became chargeable in the respondent parish. She was not bodily present in the parish during six days out of the year. I think myself that when a person is clearly shown to have been residing in a parish, the onus of proof is upon those who wish to establish that a break of the residence has occurred. Primâ facie, no doubt, the fact of departure is evidence of a break of residence; this, however, may be rebutted by proof of an intention to return. When an actual residence is abandoned, as, for instance, when a house, which has been occupied, is given up altogether, the presumption is strong that there is no intention to return. In the same way, when a house is retained, there is strong ground for assuming that the occupier intends to return. But neither of these things is of itself absolute proof of intention. The real test of a break of residence is whether the person going out of the parish entertains an intention to remain away permanently or for some indefinite time. I think in the case of Reg. v. Glossop the woman's intention was to come back to the place of her residence only in case she should be discharged from her service; and the fair inference was that she intended to stay away indefinitely. If, as in this case, a person leaves a parish with no object but to pay a short visit, I think we may infer that there was no intention to stay away indefinitely. There must always be a difficulty in deciding a matter of more or less, but it would be monstrous to hold that a definite intention of being absent for a few days only should create a break of residence merely because there is no particular house to which the absent person has a right to return. Mr. Poland properly pressed upon us the language which I am reported to have used in Reg. v. Glossop; but whatever words I actually used in that case, I was conscious at the time, and I am clear now, that those contained in the report are not the law; all that I meant to say was that the fact of having a residence or no residence to return to should be a strong element in determining the intention to return. A complete break of residence would be established if the person departing had begun to reside elsewhere, or even if he had gone away with a clear intention to reside out of the parish in which he had been stationed. A dwelling-house to which he might return must be an important element in determining what was his intention, but is not essential for either conclusion. Here, I think, there was no break of residence, and the order must be quashed.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears that the pauper intended to have a few days of holiday before going back to the workhouse of her parish. This is what I understand from the case, and I do not think she meant to continue her absence long enough to constitute a break of residence.

QUAIN, J.—I also am of the same opinion. Each case must depend upon its particular circumstances. Here the old woman had lived continuously in the parish of St. Matthew without relief for twenty-four years; for six years afterwards she remained in the parish, and was at intervals in the workhouse. Being unable to carry out some employment which she had found in the parish, she said that before she returned to the workhouse she would have a holiday at any rate; and if she could find work to suit her, she seems to have meant to take it. But she found no work, and after six days' absence she returned, as she intended, to the workhouse. It would, in my opinion, be a very sad thing if we were bound to hold that this absence was a break of residence, and to send the old woman into the country away from all the people and places to which she had for so many years been accustomed. According to the authorities, however, I think there was no break of residence.

Order of sessions quashed.

GUEST (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF EAST DEAN (resps.).

Poor rate—Rateability of surface land, &c., connected with iron mines—Surface land valueless apart from mines.

Appellant, grantee under the Crown of gales or rights to work certain iron mines, also rented from the Crown certain surface land over the mines, on which he erected buildings, machinery, railway, and tramways; the surface land being practically valueless apart from their use in connection with and for the purposes of the mines.

Held, that the appellant was rateable in respect of the surface land, and the buildings, &c., erected on it, though occupied in connection with a non-rateable subject, and though practically valueless except in connection with and for the purposes of such non-rateable subject.

THIS was a case stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, on an appeal to the Gloucestershire Quarter Sessions, against a poor-rate for the township of East Dean.

Sir Ivor Bertie Guest, Bart., is the owner and occupier, in the manner and under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, of certain mines of iron ore called Westbury Brook and Dean's Meend, in the township of East Dean.

By 24 & 35 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, the grant of a gale of coal or iron shall be deemed to have conferred, and shall confer, on the galee and his assigns, a licence to work the mine, and shall be deemed to have conferred on the grantee and his assigns, an interest in the nature of real estate, such licence being conditional on the payment of royalties to the Crown.

By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43, s. 25, the commissioners may grant to any galee leases for terms not exceeding thirty-one years, of the uninclosed waste land of the Forest of Dean, for the purpose of erecting thereon any house, building, or machinery for the convenient working of any mine, or for any purpose connected with any mine or work, not more than one and a half acres of land to be included in any such lease.

Pits or shafts have been sunk for working the said iron ore, and the same is worked in the usual manner pursued in mining operations, namely, by subterraneous working.

Some of the surface lands are above the said mine of iron ore, and other parts of such surface lands are distinct and separate from the said mines.

The mines extend over an area of about 310 acres, and the surface lands over an area of 2a. and 16p.

The pit included in the rate is an oval or egg shaped shaft, about 222 yards deep, and 16ft. long, and 8ft. wide; it is partly lined with stone or brickwork. In the centre of the shafts are guides or frames to steady the cage on which the carts containing the ore are brought to bank.

At one or both ends of the shaft are three sets of pumps about 14in. in diameter, for pumping the water from the workings near the pit; and on the said demised surface lands, is a large stone building which contains an engine of 170 horse power, used for pumping water by means of the pumps in the shaft.

There is also another building containing an engine of fifty horse power, used for bringing the ore from the mine.

There are boilers set in masonry, and a large chimney to the furnaces for heating the boilers. The boilers belong to the engines. All these are absolutely necessary to bring the iron ore to bank.

The other buildings, plant, and tramway comprised in the rate consist of one office, two workshops, and two storehouses, a weighbridge fixed in the land capable of weighing up to 7 tons, and 745 yards of railway laid in the land in the usual manner, which railway is used for bringing coals to the boiler furnaces, and for conveying the ore away from the pit mouth; all which offices, workshops, storehouses, and weighbridge are constructed on the said surface lands so as aforesaid demised.

The said surface lands and buildings, and the said railway, tramway, plant, and machinery are occupied and used by Sir Ivor Bertie Guest solely for the purposes of the said mines called Westbury Brook and Dean's Meend, and are necessary for such purposes, and without the mines the said surface lands, buildings, railway, tramway, plant, and machinery would be practically valueless.

The overseers of East Dean, by a rate made the 12th May 1870, and by another rate made the 8th Oct. 1870, rated Sir Ivor Bertie Guest, Bart., in the following manner:—

Land containing iron ore within the boundary of the Westbury Brook, gate of iron ore, rateable value, 1419*l.*; surface land with the pit, buildings, machinery, plant, tramways, and other workshops connected therewith, rateable value, 500*l.*

Sir Ivor Bertie Guest appealed to the assessment committee of the Westbury-on-Severn Union against both those rates, which decided that the said properties were rateable, on which he gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions for the county of Gloucester, on the grounds (inter alia) that he is overrated in respect of the yearly value of the land occupied by him in the said township; that in the assessment, although he is nominally rated for land containing iron ore, he is in reality the occupier of an iron mine where he works iron ore, and the land mentioned is in truth and in fact such iron mine for which he is in law not rateable. That the surface land, with the pit and other buildings, machinery, plant, houses, and workshops connected therewith, as mentioned in the second item of assessment, are the pit, buildings, machinery, plant, tramways, and workshops connected with the said iron mine, and used exclusively for the purposes thereof as aforesaid, and that the machinery is used for getting the iron ore out of the pit, and pumping water therefrom, and forms part of the mine itself; that the other matters mentioned in the said assessment are greatly overcharged and overrated.

The building, machinery, plant, houses, and workshops mentioned in the said assessment are on the surface, and occupy land.

The said award of the Dean Forest Mining Commissioners, and the rules and regulations for working same, and the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 40, form part of this case.

The questions for the opinion of the Queen's Bench are whether Sir Ivor Bertie Guest is liable to be rated to the poor rate for the properties mentioned in the said assessment, or either of them; and if for the said surface land, on what principle is the same to be assessed?

If the court should be of opinion that the appellant is liable to be rated for the said property, or either of them, or any part thereof, he agrees that judgment in conformity with such decision may be entered by the respondents at the sessions next or next but one after such decision shall have been given (it being agreed that the case should be remitted to the said sessions for the purpose of ascertaining the rateable value) and for such costs as the court shall adjudge. If the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the respondents agree that a judgment in conformity with the decision of such court, and for such costs as the court shall adjudge, may be entered on motion of the appellant at the session next or next but one after such decision shall have been given.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Macnamara), for the appellant.—The question as to the rateability of the iron mine may be considered as disposed of by the decision of the House of Lords in Morgan and others v. Crawshay (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 889), and the only question to be discussed is as to the rateability of the surface land. It is submitted that the surface land in question has no value whatever, and is consequently not rateable. The case comes within that of Rex v. Bilston (5 B. & C. 851), in which case it was held that where the owner and occupier of an ironstone mine erected an engine for the purpose of drawing the water from the mine and used it for no other purpose, he was not rateable to the poor in respect of the engine. "Here," said Bayley, J., "a person working a mine on his own land has erected an engine for the purpose of working that mine, and which is of no other use. The occupier of the mine, as such, is not rateable under the provisions of the 43 Eliz. c. 2. In many such mines there are railroads under ground which greatly enhance the value of the mine, and, therefore, of the land; but they cannot be rated, and in principle they are on the same footing as this engine. This is a mode of drawing the water from the mine; the railroad is to facilitate the conveyance of the ore to the foot of the shaft. Each is of use in carrying on the mining operations, but of no other use." So here the surface land is of no use whatever out of relation to the mine below. To the same effect Holroyd, J., observed, "The engine was not profitable, but burdensome, except as it respected the mine itself. As it regarded the land, independently of the mine, it was clearly burdensome. Now the profits arising from the mine are exempt from taxation under the 43 Eliz. c. 2. The engine is, therefore, in like manner exempt."

James, Q.C. (with him Anstie) for the respondents.—The question as to the iron mine will not, after the decision of the House of Lords referred to, be argued. But a portion, at all events, of the buildings erected over the mine, cannot be brought within the decision in Rex v. Bilston (ubi sup.); and as to those portions which do, it is submitted that the decision in Rex v. Bilston is an unsatisfactory one, disapproved in other cases, and therefore not a binding authority. In The Talargoch Mining Company v. The Guardians of St. Asaph Union (9 B. & S. 210; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 478), where the appellants, for the purpose of working the machinery connected with a lead mine, diverted a stream from its natural course, paying the owners for such diversion, and paying certain small sums for the occupation of the land by the watercourse, which was about a mile and a half in length, being partly open, partly tunnelled, and for about 350 yards in pipes, it was held that the appellants were rateable to the poor rate in respect of the occupation of the watercourse at the value of the land enhanced by its capability of conveying water; and that it was not exempt from rateability by reason of its connection with a lead mine, though that is not rateable under the 43 Eliz. c. 2. This decision in principle overrules that in Rex. v. Bilston. "The value of the land," said Cockburn, C.J., "is increased by the buildings or works erected on it, and by the water brought over it. Suppose, instead of the present state of things, the company had not the occupation, either of the land or the works constructed for the watercourse, and they wanted the water, they would have to pay so much rent to the proprietor of the land for the use of the watercourse and the works accessory to it, and that rent would be the rateable value of the land covered by the water. Assuming the rate is made on that basis it would be right, and there is nothing in the case to negative that." As to the decision in Rex. v. Bilston, Blackburn, J. in the same case said: "It was decided that, the mine in that case not being rateable, an engine used for the purpose of drawing water from it was not rateable either. There was, however, nothing to show that the engine occupied land; if it did I should hesitate in agreeing to that decision. In the present case the watercourse cannot be said to be part of the mine. Its value is enhanced by its affording facility for conveying water to the mine and the works attached to it, and we have to consider what would be the rent which might reasonably be expected from a tenant from year to year, &c." [COCKBURN, C.J.—The difficulty I feel as to the surface land in the present case is this. Assuming that it is liable to be rated, what is its value? It is practically valueless, apart from the mine]. The rateable value, it is submitted, is the value of which it is to the appellant for the purpose to which he applies it, although that purpose itself is exempt from rateability. Suppose that a branch railway were constructed for the purpose of carrying the ore to the nearest railway station, that branch railway would be useless except for the purposes of the mine, but could it be contended that it was not liable to be rated? In Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 15; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348), where the Board, in pursuance of their statutory powers, constructed sewers and other necessary works, namely underground sewers, a wharf and engine house, layby for barges, tramways, coal shed and dwelling house, all which they occupied for the purposes of the main drainage scheme, the Board deriving no pecuniary advantage from the sewers and other drainage works, it was held that the sewers were not rateable to the poor rate, on the ground that they were not the subject of a beneficial occupation, but that the rest of the property had an occupation value, and that the Board were rateable in respect of them, as there was nothing in the statutes exempting them from rateability. This case is a direct authority for the respondents in the present case. "The wharf," said Lush, J., delivering the considered judgment of the court, "and engine house in Norman-road, and the pumping station, land wharf, lay by for barges, tramways, engine houses and appurtenances in North Pole, have an occupation value. The Board must have rented such premises if they had not become the owners of them, and a tenant might easily be found to take them if the board were willing and able to let them. A distinction was attempted to be drawn in favour of the pumping apparatus, as being a necessary adjunct to the sewers, and it was contended that as the sewers are not rateable, this adjunct must be exempted as being part of a non-rateable subject. But we cannot accede to this view. The machinery stands on land which is valuable for occupation, and which would undoubtedly be rateable in the hands of any other occupier; and its rateable quality cannot be affected by the particular use to which it is applied by the board. The reason why the engine and engine pit in Rex v. Bilston were held to be exempt was that the pit was dug and the engine erected in, and that they formed parts of an ironstone mine, which was itself not a rateable subject; but that reason does not apply to the present case." [He was here stopped.]

Manisty, Q.C., in reply.—The true principle of the cases is that if a thing has in itself a rateable value, independently of its use in connection with a mine, it does not lose that value by being used for the purposes of the mine. If the surface land in the present case had any independent value, it would not lose it by reason of the land being used for the purposes of the mine below, but it is found as a fact that it is in itself valueless, and, therefore, it is submitted it is not rateable.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that upon the only question on which our decision is now asked it ought to be in favour of the respondents. It must be taken to be now settled law, there having been a decision of the House of Lords upon the question, that the iron mines of the appellant, which it was proposed to assess, are not liable to be rated. This case shows that there may be, as we know there may otherwise be in point of law, a separation of the soil from the minerals below it; and I think we must consider this case with a view to what would have been the state of things if there had been such an entire separation here of the ownership of the soil from that of the minerals. Indeed, we have learned that Sir Ivor Guest is the mine owner in one right, and the owner of the surface in another, the ownership of the mine being one thing, the ownership of the surface another. Why should we not in this case maintain and act on the same substantial distinction between the ownership of the mine and the ownership of the surface, which is acted on in other cases? Suppose that by the testamentary or other disposition of the owner, in whom was vested the entire soil as far as it can be reached into the depths of the earth, the minerals had been granted to one person and the surface to another. The grantor of the minerals, if he desired to work them, would have to make a bargain with the owner of the surface in order to obtain from him the right to use the surface for the purpose of the mining occupation. In the present case it seems that Sir Ivor Guest, having in himself, though through different titles, both surface and mines, has got the surface into a condition in which it is no longer available for agricultural purposes; but it is available for the purpose of tramways, and otherwise for the purposes of the mines. If the surface were not in his hands he would be under the necessity of saying to the owner of the surface, "on what terms will you let me the surface for the purpose of working the mines?" and it would be as clear, in such a case, that the surface would have a value in its use by the owner of the minerals below; and the use of the surface would not be allowed, except on a given consideration. It is clear that the owner of the minerals would be compelled to give, and that he would be quite willing to give, a consideration for the use of the surface. The owner of the minerals would, to a certain extent, be placed at the mercy of the owner of the surface, as the mines could not be used without some use of the surface. The surface owner would, however, defeat his own object if he were extortionate in his terms; and the result would be that common sense and a common interest would bring the parties together. In settling between themselves what the terms of the bargain should be, each party would take into account all the circumstances of the case. It seems to me, therefore, that, in point of principle, there is no reason why the surface should not be assessed according to the value which should be set upon it by such a settlement between the parties, if such were here practicable. It certainly never was intended, in point of principle or policy, that the surface should be withdrawn from contribution to local burdens. Rex v. Bilston (ubi sup.) has decided that a different rule is to be adopted where the surface is merely subservient to the purposes of the mines below. I must say that that case seems to me not a satisfactory one, as being at war with the general principle on which all lands are assessable; and I think that the reasonings of the judges in it are not at all convincing. Bayley, J. based his decision on the ground that the engine was to be considered as part and parcel of the mine itself; Holroyd, J. on the ground that as regarded the land independently of the mine, the engine was not profitable but burdensome; the reason for Littledale, J.'s, judgment not being stated. Where we see that the surface is essential to the working of the mine, and would have a value distinguishable from the mine itself, I think we are quite justified in holding that it is assessable to the poor-rate. On this point of the case, therefore, our judgment must be for the respondents.

BLACKBURN J.—I am of the same opinion. Iron mines have been held not to be rateable, on the constructon of the statute of Elizabeth; and it follows that whatever is a portion of an iron mine is not rateable either. Bayley J., in Rex v. Bilston (ubi sup.), seems to me to have thought that the engine in that case was part of the mine itself; and if he were right in point of fact as to that, I should agree with him as to the law applicable to it. But Holroyd J., as pointed out by the Lord Chief Justice, does not seem to have thought so, but appears to have rested his judgment on the ground that the engine was a thing useless and of no value apart from the mine; and this opinion has been repeatedly overruled as to things which are, in themselves of no value. In the present case the great difficulty is to settle what the rateable value of the surface would be. The Parochial Assessment Act gives a test of easy application in some cases. The rent which would fairly be paid by a tenant from year to year, is made a test which it would be easy to apply wherever the land is actually let. In such a case the rate can easily be ascertained, but a difficulty exists where the land is not actually let, and we have not the test of experience as to its letting value. We have to see what would be the hypothetical rent which would be paid by a hypothetical tenant. To judge of that we have to see what are the benefits which the hypothetical tenant would have, and to set-off against them all that he would have to pay in the way of disbursements, giving himself a fair tenant's profit; the balance would be the rateable value. That has been done in cases of rating railways and things of that sort, where there is no tenant at all. Then comes the case—where what Sir Wm. Erle used to call "the complex problem" arises—where a thing in its entire state would have a value, but it is split into two parts, one of which, regarded by itself, is intrinsically of no value; for instance, a watercourse which in one parish may be a morass or a nuisance; in another parish there is the main pipe, which is by itself wholly valueless; and in a third parish there are supply pipes, which, without the water, would be valueless; but when the three are taken together you get a very large rent. There is always in such cases a difficulty in ascertaining the value of the thing in each parish, though it may be easy to tell the value of the entire thing. I have never been able to see any satisfactory rule for such cases, though in practice rules of thumb have been applied. In the present case there is an iron mine, which is not rateable at all. There is also the surface ground, of which Sir Ivor Guest is the lessee, and on it are engines, buildings, railways, &c., which are very valuable to the occupiers of the mine, and of no value to anyone else. The mine owner, however, cannot do without them. We have, therefore, to consider how much of the entire value is to be considered the value of this surface land. It is a question very difficult to solve. However, we have only to lay down the principle applicable to the case, and I agree with what the Lord Chief Justice has said as to the test to be applied. Suppose there were two owners, or suppose that the same person has the mine as owner in fee simple, and the surface as lessee of it, and is in occupation of both. Suppose he died intestate, leaving a widow and children who are minors, and the Court of Chancery sanctions the letting of the mine and the surface to a good tenant. If a man offered a certain sum per annum for both together, but will not give anything for either separately, it would be referred to a master or chief clerk to determine how much of the rent would go to the next of kin under the leasehold interest and how much to the heir-at-law under the freehold interest. It would be argued before him that the surface owners might act the part of the dog in the manger, and prevent any practical use being made of the mine without his consent; and on the other hand the mine owner would argue that the surface apart from the mine was valueless. The master or chief clerk in Chancery would have to perform the very difficult task of apportioning the rent between the parties; but I have no doubt that he would have the common sense to apportion it fairly. That is exactly what the sessions have to do in the present case. The guess may be a rough one, but it must be made, and on it will depend the amount at which the surface is to be rated.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. In order to work out the Parochial Assessment Act in a case like this, we must suppose that the surface land, which is undoubtedly a rateable subject, is in the market to be let. It may be that the owner of the mine would have no competitor, but we know that it would be worth his while to make an offer, because the surface is essential to the working of the mine: we know, therefore, that the surface has a value. As to the amount of that value I quite agree with the observations already made, that we must send that matter to the sessions to determine, and to settle what is the fair and reasonable amount which the owner of the mine, and the owner of the surface, would have to pay respectively (a).

SECOND COURT.

FOULGER (app.) v. STEADMAN (resp.).

Wilfully trespassing—Premises connected with railway station—3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16.

Respondent, a cabdriver, had been charged before a magistrate under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, for that he unlawfully and wilfully did trespass upon certain premises connected with the Fenchurch-street Railway Station. The magistrate found in the special case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that the respondent refused to move away his cab from a place, for the use of which, as a cab stand, certain other cab drivers paid the railway company 4s. a week each; that this place presented the appearance of a public street, was opposite certain shops, and although stated to belong to, was not proved to be, the private property of the company; that no bonâ fide claim of right to occupy this place was made by the respondent; and that the respondent was not wilfully trespassing.

Held, upon appeal from the dismissal of this information, that the only ground upon which this proceeding could be found to be not a wilful trespass was that the respondent had a bonâ fide claim of right. The case, therefore, was ordered to be re-stated.

THIS was a case stated by one of the aldermen of the City of London, being one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said city and the liberties thereof, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with his determination upon the questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated on the 14th March 1870, at the Mansion House Justice Room in the said city; the appellant having duly entered into a recognisance to prosecute the appeal.

(a) The rule drawn up was as follows: "That the appellant is liable to be rated in respect of the surface land, with the buildings, machinery, plant, tramways, and other workshops connected therewith, and that he is not liable to be rated in respect of the residue of the property; that the principle on which the surface land, with the buildings, machinery, plant, tramways, and other workshops upon it, is to be rated, is to assume the mine and the surface to belong to separate owners, and then say what rent the owner of the mine would give to the owner of the surface for the surface la d, with the building, machinery, plant, tramways, and other workshops upon t."

Upon the hearing of an information preferred by the appellant, the inspector of the police of the Great Eastern Railway, against the respondent, a cab driver, under the Act for regulating railways, the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, for that the said respondent "on the 1st March inst., in Railway-place, Fenchurch-street, in the said city, unlawfully and wilfully did trespass upon certain premises there connected with the Fenchurch-street Station of the said railway, and did refuse to quit the same upon a request to him for that purpose, made by an officer of the said railway company." The alderman dismissed the same.

The section of the statute referred to is as follows:

XVI. And be it enacted that if any person shall wilfully obstruct or impede any officer or agent of any railway company in the execution of his duty upon any railway, or upon or in any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, or if any person shall wilfully trespass upon any railway or any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, and shall refuse to quit the same upon request to him made by any officer or agent of the said company, every such person so offending and all others aiding or assisting therein shall and may be seized and detained by any such officer or agent or any person whom he may call to his assistance, until such offender or offenders can be conveniently taken before some justice of the peace for the county or place wherein such offence shall be committed, and when convicted before such justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorised and required upon complaint to him upon oath to take cognisance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises) shall in the discretion of such justice forfeit to Her Majesty any sum not exceeding 5*l*., and in default of payment thereof, shall or may be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two calendar months, such imprisonment to be determined on payment of the amount of the penalty.

It was proved by a constable employed by the railway company, that the respondent, on the 1st March instant, drove a cab into Railway-place, the sides of which next to the kerb of the footways, the railway company allow to be occupied as cab-stands, by cabs, the drivers of which paid to the witness for the company 4*s*. per week for that privilege.

That about forty cab-drivers pay that sum, and that there is room for fifteen cabs thereon at one time.

That the respondent is not one of such cab-drivers; that he refused to move therefrom when requested by the witness; and that by occupying a place in the stand he was depriving another cab-driver, who had paid for the privilege, from the advantage of being upon the stand.

A plan was put in evidence, from which, and from the magistrate's own local knowledge, he found as facts that the place occupied by the respondent's cab was not in or opposite the railway station, but opposite some refreshment and other shops, and between them and certain other houses, some of which houses and shops did formerly, but do not now, belong to the company.

That Railway-place is not a cul de sac, but presents the appearance of an ordinary public street, and that the only fact to mark it as being railway property, and not a public street, is that an iron post stands at each corner of one end thereof, where Railway-place runs into Fenchurch-street, on which posts the words "Blackwall Railway" are cast, but that these posts otherwise present the appearance of ordinary street posts.

It was also proved that at one time, some years ago (how long, however, was not shown), a chain was occasionally stretched from one post to the other, but that this has not been done for some years.

That foot-passengers pass through Railway-place as if it were a highway on their way to other streets, or to the public-houses and shops in the neighbourhood of the station; and that besides cabs and carriages going to the station, others pass through Railway-place at all hours to take up or set down at the shops or houses in the neighbourhood, or to proceed to other streets.

That the stand is not paved or kerbed differently to the rest of the carriage pavement on Railway-place, and is not a regular cab stand.

That Railway-place is paved, cleansed, and lighted by the railway company; but that there is nothing in the paving or lighting so peculiar in appearance as to distinguish it from the paving and lighting of an ordinary public street.

The freehold of the place was said to belong to the company, but no deeds were put in to prove that it was their private property, nor, as the Alderman said, "should I have received evidence thereof, as I should have declined to try that question, if it had arisen."

Lastly, from these facts that the place presented the appearance of a public street, and there being neither gates nor walls around it, but shops, public-houses, and private houses and offices, with the foot pavement in front thereof abutting on to the place, the Alderman was satisfied that no person who was not familiar with the history of the locality, or the title of the property, and being guided in forming his judgment by the appearance of the place, would have considered it other than a public street.

On the part of the respondent it was contended: (a) that the section of the statute under which the information was laid was intended to enable railway officials to remove from their stations and premises used for railway purposes disorderly and objectionable persons, who were not passengers, and who had no business to detain them there; (b) that Railway-place was a public thoroughfare, and that the respondent was not a wilful trespasser; (c) that it was not a railway station, or works or premises, connected therewith.

On the part of the appellant opposite views were held and contended for. The Alderman was, however, of opinion: (a) that the section of the statute was not intended to apply to the case before him: (b) that the respondent was not wilfully trespassing; and (c) that the locality on which the offence was alleged to have been committed was not within the words of the Act, being neither a railway station, works, or premises connected therewith.

The questions of law arising hereupon are set out in the preceding paragraph, and the opinion of the court is requested thereon, and as to whether the magistrate ought to have convicted the said respondent upon the facts before him.

Giffard, Q. C. (with him Marriott) for the appellant.—The magistrate ought, upon these facts, either to have convicted the respondent, or to have refused to adjudicate. He says he should have declined to try the question of the railway company's property in the land if it had arisen; we may assume, therefore, that the respondent made no bonâ fide claim of right to keep his cab standing here, in which case, whatever the appearance of the place, the respondent was a trespasser, and should have been fined. If, however, the magistrate considered the facts he finds to have constituted a bonâ fide claim of right, he ought to have held that his jurisdiction was ousted. In either event he was wrong in dismissing the information.

Brown, Q. C. for the respondent.—The magistrate found that the respondent was not wilfully trespassing, and was therefore justified in dismissing the information. In Jones v. Taylor (1 E. & E. 20), the magistrates had refused to convict under this very enactment; and this court held, on appeal, that they were not bound to convict, inasmuch as it was competent to them, if they thought fit, to decide that the person charged was not a wilful trespasser. Reg. v. Bent (1 Den. Cr. Cas. 157) is an authority that the omission of the word "wilfully" in an indictment is material when that word is contained in the statute upon which the indictment is framed. There is another question which was here open to the magistrate, viz., whether this place was the station or premises connected therewith: he has practically held that this was not such a place. [QUAIN, J.—The only ground upon which this proceeding could be held to be not a wilful trespass was, that the respondent made a bonâ fide claim of right. The magistrate, therefore, ought to have either convicted or refused to adjudicate.]

Giffard in reply.—In Hudson v. M'Rae (33 L. J. 65, M. C.), it was held upon an information for unlawfully and wilfully fishing, that the bonâ fide belief of the defendant that he had a right to fish does not prevent his being convicted, a guilty mind not being a necessary ingredient to constitute the offence.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that in this case there are some points which we can decide at once, although the whole matter must go back to the magistrate, in order to determine the result. Notwithstanding the case of Jones v. Taylor, I think that the respondent, by staying at the place in question after being ordered off, or by refusing to move therefrom when requested by the appellant, if the place formed part of the premises connected with the railway station, was wilfully trespassing, even if he acted honestly in the belief that he had a right to be there. If he based his defence upon a bonâ fide claim of right to be upon the land, the magistrate's jurisdiction was ousted, and he ought to have stayed his hand, and neither convicted the respondent nor dismissed the charge. It appears from the case that there is no reason for saying that this place is not the property of the railway company; the magistrate's finding is merely that it is not in or opposite the station, but presents the appearance of an ordinary public street. I cannot see that on this account a cabdriver would have a right to keep his cab standing there. Another point taken by Mr. Brown was that this was no part of the premises connected with the station. I should apprehend from the plan that this was part of the station. The fact that the railway company have disposed of the surrounding houses would not prevent it, but if this point were intended to be raised, the magistrate should have stated more than he has done. The case must be remitted to the magistrate, in order that he may more clearly state the facts which he finds.

SECOND COURT.

JENKIN AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. KING (resp.).

*Poaching—Proof of having taken game—Evidence sufficient for conviction—*25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, s. 2.

The appellants, a mason and a carpenter, were together upon a highway about nine o'clock of a misty winter evening; one had a net for game, which was wettish, under his arm. Two policemen who met them about 100 yards from their houses, which adjoined each other, had heard a dog yelping just before, and one of the police said he saw a dog with them, but this they denied. They did not say where they had been, but afterwards they asked the police to say nothing about the matter. Justices convicted the appellants of poaching under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, s. 2.

Held, that proof of having actually taken game was not necessary for a conviction; and that these facts constituted evidence from which the justices might infer that an offence under the Act had been committed.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and the Poaching Prevention Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 114).

At a petty sessions holden at Launceston, for the division of East North, in the county of Cornwall, on the 2nd Jan. 1872, Samuel Jenkin and William Dennis were charged by a certain information and complaint of James King, one of the constables of the county police, for that they the said Samuel Jenkin and William Dennis, on the 16th Dec. 1871, at the parish of Altarnum, in the said county, being on a certain highway or public place there situate, and with good cause suspected of coming from lands where they had severally and respectively unlawfully been in search or pursuit of game, and aiding and abetting each other, had in their possession a certain net used for unlawfully killing and taking game, and prayed that the said Samuel Jenkin and William Dennis might be summoned to answer the said information and complaint; and the said parties respectively being present, the said James King upon his oath said: "I am stationed at Lewannick. I know the defendants Samuel Jenkin and William Dennis; the former is a mason, and the latter a carpenter. I recollect the 16th Dec. last; from information I received I went to Altarnum, on the highway between Altarnum village and the Rising Sun. I was going along the road with P. C. Cole. I heard a dog yelping at some distance; near half a mile. We stopped about to see what we could see. About half an hour after, we met the defendants together on the highway; it was getting dark then; it had been good moonlight; it was about half-past nine; I had a lamp and opened it on them. I saw Dennis had a net (which I produce) under his arm. They were in their working deshabille. I charged them both with being out poaching. They denied it—I did not see any dog with them, I searched them both; the only thing found was the net. They did not say where they had been."

The defendant's attorney declined to ask this witness any question.

The other constable, John Cole, upon his oath said: "I was with King on this occasion at Treween Eve; heard a dog yelping. A little time after I saw defendants come along the road with a dog, a lurcher, half greyhound. The sergeant threw the light on them, and took possession of a net which Dennis had under his arm. I said they had a dog; Jenkins denied it, and said the only dog he had was the little one. Jenkins took us home to his house, about 100 yards off, and showed us a hole, and his little dog was inside. I told him he had a lurcher there some weeks, which he denied. A few minutes after, we saw the dog go into Dennis's house. He drove him out of his house, and he went through the hole into Jenkins's house. We told him we heard the dog yelping. evidently driving a rabbit or hare, just before. Jenkins said, 'Twas not that dog. I've seen him drive a rabbit to-day, and he won't yelp at all.' Jenkins asked the sergeant several times to look the affair over, and say nothing about it. There had been a mist. The net was wettish."

Cross-examined: "I heard the men whistle to the dog just before we came up to the men. The dog was before them. There is a difference between a dog yelping at a rabbit or at a sheep."

On re-examination Coles said, "It was a hare net."

The net was produced; it was a regular gate net for game, loaded at the corners. This was the case for the prosecution.

The defendants' attorney contended that there was no evidence that either of the defendants had been upon any land in search of game, or for any other purpose, or that they had used the net for unlawfully taking game, or at all. Nor were they in possession of game. That it is not unlawful within the Poaching Prevention Act to be seen in possession of a dog. That there was no evidence that a dog of the defendants was the dog which the policeman had previously heard yelping. Nor that either of the defendants knew that any dog had been upon any land for any purpose; nor was it shown upon what land, or whose land, the yelping dog had been. The defendants are tradesmen—heads of families. They were, when detained and searched upon the public highway, within 100yds. of their own homes, and at a reasonable hour of the evening.

The justices, having heard the said charge and defence, adjudged that each defendant should be fined 1*l.* with costs. And the said Samuel Jenkin and Wm. Dennis, respectively alleging that they were dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied to the justices to state and sign the preceding case for the opinion thereon of the Court of Queen's Bench.

If the court shall be of opinion that on the above evidence the justices might infer that the appellants had used the net for unlawfully killing or taking game, the convictions are to remain—otherwise they are to be quashed as against one or both appellants, as the court shall see fit.

Pinder argued for the appellants.—25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, s. 2, enacts that "It shall be lawful for any constable or peace officer in any county, borough, or place in Great Britain and Ireland, in any highway, street, or public place, to search any person whom he may have cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, or any person aiding or abetting such person, and having in his possession any game unlawfully obtained, or any gun, part of gun, or nets or engines used for the killing or taking game; and also to stop and search any cart or other conveyance in or upon which such constable or peace officer shall have good cause to suspect that any such game or any such article or thing is being carried by any such person; and should there be found any game or any such article or thing as aforesaid upon such person, cart, or other conveyance, to seize and detain such game, article, or thing; and such constable or peace officer shall in such case apply to some justice of the peace for a summons, citing such person to appear before two justices of the peace assembled in petty sessions, as provided in the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, s. 9, as far as regards England and Ireland, and before a sheriff or any two justices of the peace in Scotland; and if such person shall have obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or shall have used any such article or thing as aforesaid for unlawfully killing or taking game, or shall have been accessory thereto, such person shall, on being convicted thereof, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, and shall forfeit such game, guns, parts of guns, nets, and engines; and the justices shall direct the same to be sold or destroyed, and the proceeds of such sale, with the amount of the penalty, to be paid to the treasurer of the county or borough where the conviction takes place; and no person who, by direction of a justice in writing, shall sell any game so seized, shall be liable to any penalty for such sale; and if no conviction takes place, the game or any such article or thing, as aforesaid or the value thereof, shall be restored to the person from whom it had been seized." There have been two cases upon the evidence necessary for conviction under this section; Brown v. Turner (13 C. B., N. S. 485), and Evans v. Botterill (33 L. J. 50, M. C.); although in each case the evidence was held to justify conviction, it was far stronger than that in the present case. In Brown v. Turner the four men charged were found together early one Sunday morning on the high road. One had rabbits which were recently killed in his pocket; the second had a net, and his clothes were marked with blood and rabbits' fur; the third had sold a rabbit that morning; and the fourth was very wet and dirty as to clothes and shoes. The Court of Common Pleas held that it was not necessary to prove that either of the parties had been seen off the high road, and that the evidence was sufficient to convict the first three, but not the fourth, of the men charged. In Evans v. Botterill the Court of Queen's Bench affirmed that decision with respect to proof of being off the high road, and held that the justices might have convicted; but the men charged were found with a hare and rabbits, besides stakes and nets, upon them. In no case has a conviction under this section been maintained unless the persons charged were found to have game in their possession. Crompton, J., is reported to have said in the Queen's Bench case, "There is plenty of evidence on which the magistrates might have found that these parties, on whom both game and nets were found, were guilty of the offence either of having been unlawfully on land in pursuit of game, or of having used the nets for unlawfully taking game, because it is but reasonable to infer that the one was the produce of the use of the other. The possession possibly of game without the nets, or of the nets without the game, might not lead to this conclusion, but the two together might very well have justified the magistrates in coming to an adverse conclusion against the defendants; though I am far from saying they were bound to do so."

Stone for the respondent.—The Act does not require proof of the actual taking of game to justify conviction; and it is sufficient if either game or an article used for killing game be found upon a suspected person. Here the facts, taken together, were quite enough to prompt the justices to infer that an offence had been committed under this section.

Pinder in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—I confess I have some doubt, but I think there is here just some evidence upon which to convict the appellants. I am inclined myself to think, from the facts stated, that the men had used the net for unlawfully killing or taking game. The facts I rest my conclusion upon are the net found upon them, which was probably carried for the purpose of use. This net was wettish, as if it had been used in the mist; there was evidence of their having a lurcher with them, which had been heard yelping, as if driving a hare or rabbit. I wish to say pointedly that I do not consider success a needful element of a case for conviction. It is sufficient if the justices may infer from the facts that the person charged has used any of the articles mentioned for the purpose of unlawfully killing or taking game, although he may not have killed or taken any.

SECOND COURT.

COOK (app.) v. MONTAGU (resp.)

Nuisance—Owner of premises—Receiver of rents— 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121—29 & 30 Vict. c. 90.

An order by justices was made against the appellant under the Nuisances Removal Act 1855, sect. 12, as the owner of premises upon which a foul and offensive privy existed so as to be a nuisance. The appellant was receiver of the rent of the house as agent of the ground landlord, from a person called Hancock, who held a lease of the whole house for twenty-one years: this lessee had underlet a part of the house to a Mrs. Kingston as yearly tenant. The privy was within the part of the house let to Mrs. Kingston, and was used exclusively by her, Hancock having no access to it:

Held, upon a case stated by the convicting justices, that the appellant was not the owner of the premises on which the nuisance arose, within the definition of the word in sect. 2 of the Act of 1855.

THIS was a case stated by three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the city and borough of Bath, in the county of Somerset, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated.

Upon the hearing of a certain complaint, laid by the respondent as inspector of nuisances, acting for and under the direction of the local board of health for the said city and borough, against the appellant, and instituted under the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), and the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), charging "that in or upon certain premises, situate at and being No. 13, Union-street, in the city and borough of Bath, in the district of the said local board under the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855, the following nuisance exists: a foul and offensive privy, for want of a syphon pan and supply of water, and that the said nuisance is caused by the act or default of you the said George Henry Cook;" the said parties being respectively then present, the majority of the justices present made the following order:

"To George Henry Cook, as the owner of the house and premises situate at and being No. 13, in Union-street, in the city and borough of Bath, within the meaning of the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855, and to the local board of health for the said city and borough of Bath, and to his and their servants and agents respectively, and to all whom it may concern:—

"Whereas on the 27th Feb., 1871, complaint was made before John Hulbert, Esq., mayor of the city and borough of Bath aforesaid, and one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the said city and borough, by Henry Graham Montagu, inspector of nuisances, acting for and by order of, and on behalf of, the local board of health for the said city and borough of Bath, that in or upon certain premises, situate and being No. 13, in Union-street aforesaid, in the said city and borough, in the district under the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855 of the local board aforesaid, the following nuisance then existed, that is to say: a foul and offensive privy, for want of a syphon pan and supply of water, and that the said nuisance was caused by the act or default of the said George Henry Cook, the owner of the said premises.

"And whereas the said George Henry Cook, the owner within the meaning of the said Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855, hath this day appeared before us justices, being three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the city and borough aforesaid, sitting in petty sessions at our usual place of meeting, to answer the matter of the said complaint.

"Now upon proof here had before us that the nuisance so complained of doth exist on the said premises, and is a nuisance injurious to health, arising from the defective construction of a structural convenience; and that the same is caused by the act or default of the said George Henry Cook, as owner of the said premises, within the meaning of the said Act. We, in pursuance of the several Acts in this behalf, do order the said George Henry Cook, within fourteen days from the service of this order, or a true copy thereof, to abate the said nuisance. And that the said George Henry Cook do within the same period effect and properly execute all such structural and other works as may be necessary to abate the said nuisance; and especially and for the purpose of abating such nuisance, and so prevent the recurrence of such or the like nuisance, we do order that the existing trunk of the said privy, and stop trough, and ashlar drain, be ved, and that a syphon pan and proper y of water and stoneware drains to connect aid syphon pan with the main sewer, be ded as a substitute for the privy and drains e said premises now complained of. And we rther order that the said works be performed, ted, and carried out by the said George y Cook, under the direction and with the nt or approval of the local board of health for ity and borough of Bath, so that the said shall no longer be a nuisance or injurious to h as aforesaid. And if the above order for ment be not complied with, then we do rise and require the said local board of h, from time to time, to enter upon the said ıage and premises No. 13, in Union-street, ıe said city and borough of Bath, and ve or abate the said nuisance, and to do all works, matters, and things, as may be sary for carrying this order into full execu-ccording to the Act aforesaid.

iven under the hands and seals of us, three of Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the and borough of Bath aforesaid, this 13th 1871. "John Hulbert, L.S.
"Wm. Hunt, L.S.
"Wm. Thompson, L.S."

d the appellant being dissatisfied with the order and determination, as being erroneous int of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said e (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43) duly applied in writing, te and sign a case setting forth the facts and ıds of such determination as aforesaid for the ɔn of this court, and also duly entered into a nisance, as required by the said statute in ehalf.
ıerefore the said justices, in compliance with ıid application and the provisions of the said e, stated and signed the following case.
on the hearing of the complaint it was ted by both parties, and it is the fact, that the r, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of acting by the council of the borough, are the board of health for the city and borough of and as such are the nuisance authority within mits of the city and borough of Bath.
d the justices found as facts ıt there was on the 7th Feb. 1871, and there ıued to be and was on the 27th of the same ı of February, being the day on which the nation in the matter of this complaint was on the premises No. 13, Union-street, Bath, ı the district of the local board of health for ıid city and borough of Bath, a foul and offen-ırivy, so constructed and in such a state as to ıuisance, and injurious to health.
ıt by reason of the defective construction of ırivy, and of the trunk, stop trough, and drain, respectively leading therefrom, and ant of a proper and sufficient supply of water e said privy, the said nuisance was likely cur so long as the defective construction ned unaltered.
ıt the removal of the trunk of the present and of the stop trough and ashlar drain, ıe substitution therefore of a syphon pan and rovision of a proper and sufficient volume of falling from a sufficient height effectually to the said syphon pan when fixed, and the works ordered in lieu of the trunk, stop h, and ashlar drain, were works needful to the nuisance, and prevent its recurrence.

That by an indenture, dated 8th June 1853, and made between the Rev. John Allen of the one part and Richard Hancock of the other part, the said house and premises, No. 13, Union-street, Bath, had been demised by the said John Allen (since deceased) to the said Richard Hancock, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of twenty-one years from Midsummer 1853, at a rack rent.

That on the said 7th and 27th Feb. 1871, the said Richard Hancock continued to be and was the lessee of the whole premises under the said lease, having for upwards of three years then last past paid, and continuing to pay, the rent reserved by the said lease to the appellant, who received it as agent for the representatives of the said John Allen, deceased.

That on the 7th and 27th Feb. 1871, and during upwards of four years then last past, the said Richard Hancock had occupied the entrance or shop floor only of the said house and premises.

That by a verbal agreement the said Richard Hancock had during that time underlet the residue of the said house and premises (including the privy complained of) to one Mrs. Emily Kingston, as yearly tenant thereof to him at a rack rent, which she paid to him; and that on the several days aforesaid she continued to occupy the premises so underlet to her. That the privy complained of provided the only closet accommodation for the said Emily Kingston, her family and inmates, and that the said Richard Hancock had no access to and did not use it.

That in pursuance of directions given to him by the local board of health for the city and borough of Bath, acting upon reports made to them by the respondent after inspecting the condition of the said privy, the respondent on the 7th Feb. 1871, caused due notice to be served on the appellant to abate this nuisance within seven days.

And lastly, up to the day of the said complaint being heard before the justices, no steps had been taken subsequently to the service of the said notice to abate the nuisance or prevent its recurrence.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the alleged nuisance did not arise from either the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, nor were structural works required so as to render it necessary that notice should be served on Mr. Cook, the appellant, who (it was contended) was a mere ground landlord. That the works ordered to be performed and effected were not structural works. That Mrs. Kingston the occupier and yearly tenant at rack rent under Hancock, was the person by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance the alleged nuisance arose and continued, and that as it was caused by her proximate act and default she was the proper party to be summoned; if not, then, that Hancock, as the lessee for twenty-one years, and the receiver of the rent from his tenant was the "owner" within the meaning of the said Acts of Parliament; and that he, Hancock, as such, was the proper person to be summoned. And that he had, by his lease, duly executed and accepted by him, covenanted well and substantially to repair, uphold, amend, maintain, cleanse, and keep in repair, during the said term, the said privy, sinks, drains, &c., when and as often as need or occasion should require.

It was contended, on the part of the respondent, that the works to the want of which the said nuisance was attributed were "structural works;" that the nuisance did arise from the want or defective construction of a structural convenience, and that that being so, the justices were right in making an order against the appellant as the "owner" within the meaning of the Acts of Parliament.

The justices were of opinion that the appellant came within the terms of that part of the interpretation clause of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 2, which enacts that "the word 'owner' includes any person receiving the rents of the property in respect of which that word is used from the occupier of such property on his own account, or as trustee or agent for any other person, or as receiver or sequestrator appointed by the Court of Chancery, or under any order thereof, or who should receive the same if such property were let to a tenant," and that therefore under the provisions of the statute he was, for the purpose of the proceedings before them, an "owner" of the premises.

The justices considered that the works which they found to be needful to abate the nuisance and to prevent its recurrence, and to the want of which they found the nuisance to be due, were structural works within the meaning of the Acts, and that the nuisance complained of arose from the want or defective construction of a structural convenience.

They considered that as the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, s. 21, 1st proviso) enacts that where a nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, notice under the section shall be served on the owner of the premises, the Legislature must be taken to have intended that some actual result should be obtained from the owner, and not that a mere formal and barren ceremony should be performed; and that it consequently must be taken that a statutory duty was cast by the notice under the stated circumstances upon the owner, and that a default in compliance with the duty so cast upon him was substantially such a default or sufferance on the part of the owner as was contemplated by the Nuisances Removal Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 12).

They were further of opinion that under the stated circumstances they were, by the enactments of the second Act, compelled to hold that the local board of health could only look to the owner and not to the occupier, and that they could not regard either the contents or conditions of the lease; and that the fact that the lessee Hancock did not actually occupy the part of the house to which the privy was attached, was immaterial.

And that as it was proved to them that the appellant was the receiver from Hancock of the rents of the premises, he was properly before them as owner within the meaning of the statute, and it was therefore competent for them to deal with him as such, and that even if it might be possible also to include Hancock, the lessee, within the meaning of the word "owner" in the interpretation clause, yet that they had no power to discharge one person from a liability which they considered to be cast upon him by statute, by reason only that a second person might be equally, or in some other way, liable to him.

They were, therefore, of opinion that the de*fendant in the* case, the now appellant, was in default, and amenable to the provisions of the 12th and following sections of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121; and they made the order upon the appellant hereinbefore set forth.

The questions of law arising out of the above statement for the opinion of the court therefore are:

First. Whether the works ordered to be effected are structural works?

Secondly. Whether the appellant was the statutory "owner" of the premises on which the nuisance arose; and, if so, whether, under the stated circumstances, he was, as such, liable to an order to effect structural works for the abatement thereof?

Thirdly. Whether they were correct in point of law in their determination, and had power to make the said order of the 13th April 1871?

Bailey for the appellant.—The justices have proceeded against the wrong person. By the Nuisances Removal Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 12, "In any case where a nuisance is so ascertained by the local authority to exist, or where the nuisance in their opinion did exist at the time when the notice was given, and although the same may have been since removed or discontinued, is in their opinion likely to recur or to be repeated on the same premises, or any part thereof, they shall cause complaint thereof to be made before a justice of the peace; and such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person by whose act, default, permission or sufferance, the nuisance arises or continues; or if such person cannot be found or ascertained, the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to appear before any two justices in petty sessions, assembled at their usual place of meeting, who shall proceed to inquire into the said complaint; and if it be proved to their satisfaction that the nuisance exists, or did exist at the time the notice was given, or if removed or discontinued since the notice was given, that it is likely to recur or be repeated, the justices shall make an order in writing under their hands and seals on such person, owner, or occupier, for the abatement or discontinuance and prohibition of the nuisance as hereinafter mentioned, and shall also make an order for the payment of all costs incurred up to the time of hearing or making the order for abatement or discontinuance or prohibition of the nuisance." By the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), which by sect. 14 is to be construed as one with the Act of 1855, it is provided in sect. 21 that "the nuisance authority or chief officer of police shall, previous to taking proceedings before a justice under the 12th section of the Nuisance Removal Act 1855, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or if such person cannot be found or ascertained, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to abate the same, and for that purpose to execute such works, and to do all such things as may be necessary within a time specified in the notice: Provided, first, that where the nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, or where there is no occupier of the premises, notice under this section shall be served on the owner; secondly, that where the person causing the nuisance cannot be found, and it is clear that the nuisance does not arise and continue by the Act, default, or sufferance of the owner or occupier of the premises, then the nuisance authority may itself abate the same, without further order; and the cost of so doing shall be part of the costs of executing the Nuisances Removal Acts, and borne accordingly." By the interpretation clause, sect. 2 of the Act of 1855, "the word 'owner' includes any person receiving the rents of the property in respect of which that word is used from the occupier of such property on his own account, or as trustee or agent for any other person, or as receiver or sequestrator appointed by the Court of Chancery, or under any order thereof, or who would receive the same if such property were let to a tenant." The case of Brown v. Bussell (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 251), was decided upon the question who was the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arose or continued. According to sect. 12 of the Act of 1855, the court held it was the person under whose control, or by whose act the nuisance was continued or caused, and according to that decision the proper person to summons would here have been Mrs. Kingston. She, too, was the occupier of the premises, and the appellant was not the receiver of her rent, and therefore could not be the owner within the meaning of this definition:

Evelyn v. Whichcord, E. B. & E. 126;
Lady Holland v. Kensington Vestry, 35 L. J. 105, M. C.; Mourilyan v. Labalmondiere, 1 E. & E. 533;
Tinkler v. Wandsworth District Board of Works, 2 De G. & J. 261.

Further, the justices have no power to order the substitution of a water closet for a privy. (The court called upon the respondent to answer the first point, as to the appellant's liability.)

H. James, Q. C., (with him Murch,) for respondent.—Hancock was the occupier of the house, and the appellant received his rent as agent for the landlord. Mrs. Kingston was only a weekly tenant of part of the premises. and the whole house was one structure with a privy appurtenant to the whole.

Bailey was not heard in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the justices have here mistaken the person against whom proceedings ought to have been taken. We need not say anything as to other points which the appellant might raise. The Acts give power to a justice to summon the owner of the premises on which the nuisance arises. The definition says "owner" includes any person receiving the rents of the property, in respect of which that word is used, from the occupier of such property as agent for any other person. I take it that the object of the Legislature was to enable the nuisance authority to come upon the receiver of rents, who would probably be a substantial person, in the case of an occupier not being worth the powder and shot. Here the appellant did not receive the rents from the person who occupied the part of the premises on which the nuisance arose, and therefore cannot be included under the word "owner" so as to be liable to conviction upon these facts under this section.

HANNEN and QUAIN, JJ., concurred.

Judgment for appellant.

SECOND COURT.

REG. v. MUSSETT.

Certiorari—Conviction for malicious injury—Reasonable claim of right—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52.

A conviction by justices, under the Malicious Injuries to Property Act 1861, cannot be brought up upon a writ of certiorari on the ground that their jurisdiction was ousted by a mere bonâ fide claim of right.

The proviso in sect. 52, that "nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of" impliedly restricts the exemption of bonâ fide claims of right from summary jurisdiction to cases where the justices are satisfied of the fairness and reasonableness of the claims.

A RULE nisi had on the 25th Jan. last been obtained on behalf of the defendant calling upon the prosecutor, Alexander Bean, to show cause why a certain conviction, under the hands and seals of John Watson Lay and George Edward Thompson, Esquires, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Essex, bearing date the 3rd day of June 1871, whereby the defendant was convicted for that he on the 10th May, 1871, at the parish of West Mersea, in the said county, did unlawfully and maliciously commit damage, spoil, and injury to certain growing grass then and there growing on certain lands, the property of the said Alexander Bean, by then and there trampling down the same, thereby doing injury to the said Alexander Bean to the amount of 1s., contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, should not be quashed for the insufficiency thereof.

Upon the hearing before the magistrates at Petty Sessions, it was proved that the present defendant, together with Samuel Pullen, who was charged with him, were on the day alleged playing cricket on a marsh belonging to the complainant, and that they did damage to the grass by so doing. It was proved that a cricket club had paid rent about thirty years ago for the right to play on this marsh, and that at various times leave to play had been given by the occupier for the time being. It was also proved that for nearly half a century up to the present time rent, rates, and taxes, were paid by the occupier of the said land and his predecessor; also that the defendant Pullen was convicted and fined upon the same charge, under similar circumstances, about a year before, and although at his request a case was granted and drawn for the opinion of a superior court concerning the legality of that conviction, he declined to go on with and abandoned the same, and paid the costs thereof. A great number of witnesses were called for the defence, who had played cricket at this place for years without having obtained leave or paid rent to the occupier or landlord.

The affidavit of one of the magistrates who convicted the defendants upon the present occasion concluded thus: "Under all these circumstances, upon a careful consideration of all the evidence adduced, we came to the conclusion as a matter of fact that the said defendants did not, nor did either of them act or consider they acted under a fair and reasonable belief that they had a right to do the act complained of; and by adjournment on the 3rd June last, we unanimously convicted the said defendants of the said charge so brought against them."

Denman, Q.C. (with him R. E. Turner) appeared to show cause against the rule on behalf of the prosecutor; but the court called upon the other side to explain how a writ of certiorari could apply to the case.

Brown, Q.C. (with him Purcell) argued for the defendant.—The justices had no jurisdiction to determine this case. There was a substantial and bonâ fide claim of right by the defendant, and there was nothing to show that what he did was a wilful and malicious act. In the case of Reg. v. Nunneley (E. B. & E. 852), the court upon certiorari quashed a conviction for non-payment of church rates upon affidavits, showing that the justices had no reasonable ground for disbelieving the bona fides of the defendant's contention that the rate was invalid.

BLACKBURN, J.—I should entertain no doubt upon this matter even if it were new, but last term this court determined that the effect of the proviso in sect. 52 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97 was to restrict the application of the general exemption of bonâ fide claims of right from the jurisdiction of magistrates; the words are "Provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of, nor to any trespass, not being wilful and malicious, committed in hunting, fishing, or in the pursuit of game." In White v. Feast (argued on the 17th Jan. last, 20 W. R. 382), we held that these words excluded any further implied exception to the justices' power of dealing summarily with trespassers to land where claim to title is involved. It is the business of the justices who investigate a charge under this Act, not only to consider whether the party acted upon a real and bonâ fide claim of right, but also whether the supposition of his right was fair and reasonable; and unless they are satisfied that the defendant's claim is fair and reasonable as well as bonâ fide, their jurisdiction is not ousted. White v. Feast was a special case stated by the justices for the purpose of raising this point, and the effect of it must be to prevent a conviction under this statute from being brought up upon this ground under a writ of certiorari. The justices may, of course, raise the question of the propriety of their decision upon a special case.

MELLOR J.—I am of the same opinion. Under this statute the justices must inquire whether a bonâ fide claim of right is fair and reasonable, and if they doubt, they must state a case; but their jurisdiction cannot be otherwise questioned.

Rule discharged.

SECOND COURT.

SKINNER (app.) v. USHER (resp.)

Hackney carriage—Plying for hire—Standing appointed—Public place—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 4—6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, ss. 2, 3, 29, 30, 33.

The appellant, a licensed driver of a hackney carriage, had been convicted under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 33, of plying for hire elsewhere than at some standing or place appointed for that purpose. He was the servant of a cab proprietor, who was also the occupier of a public house immediately opposite the Putney railway station. In front of the public house, and between it and the road, is an open piece of ground, part of the land attached to the public-house, and private property. Here the appellant stood with his master's cab, and when hailed from the station drove across the street and picked up a fare. This place was not appointed by the Commissioners of Police as a standing for hackney carriages under sect. 29:

Held, upon a case stated by the convicting magistrate, that these facts did not constitute an offence under this Act, and 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, which is to be read with it.

AT the Police Court for the Wandsworth Metropolitan Police District on the 27th Nov. 1871, Robert Skinner, a licensed driver of a hackney carriage, hereinafter called the appellant, appeared before one of the metropolitan police magistrates to answer to a summons which charged that the appellant did on the 17th Nov. inst. at the parish of Putney in the county of Surrey, and within the metropolitan police district, unlawfully ply for hire with the said hackney carriage elsewhere than at some standing or place appointed for that purpose. The magistrate convicted the appellant in the penalty of 1*s.* and 2*s.* costs; whereupon the appellant, being dissatisfied with that decision as being erroneous in point of law, duly required the magistrate to state for the opinion of this honourable court the following case.

The facts proved or admitted were as follow: The appellant is the servant of James Yeoman Clipson, who is a cab proprietor, and the occupier of a public house situate in High-street, Putney, immediately opposite to the railway station of the London and South-Western Railway there.

In front of the principal entrance of the said public house, and between the same and the main street, is a vacant piece of uninclosed ground, which is and has usually been for many years occupied with the said public house, and is open to the street and frequented by the public, but is private property, and not subject to any right of passage by them.

The said James Yeoman Clipson has for many years been used to cause his cabs to stand upon the said piece of uninclosed ground ready for the conveyance of passengers.

On the said 17th Nov. the appellant, by the orders of the said James Yeoman Clipson, was in charge of a licensed hackney carriage, ready for the conveyance of passengers, standing upon the said piece of uninclosed ground. He was hailed by a person at or near the said railway station, upon which he drove the said carriage across the street, and took up the person so hailing him, drove away, and after an interval of about twenty minutes returned and remained with the said carriage upon the said piece of uninclosed ground, ready for the conveyance of passengers as before.

No part of the said piece of uninclosed ground has ever been appointed by a lawful authority as a standing whereon hackney carriages may ply for hire; but there is a place so lawfully appointed at a short distance therefrom, and in the said High-street.

On behalf of the complainant it was contended that the facts above set forth were evidence of a breach of the provisions of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 33.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that there was no evidence of any plying for hire in a public street or place, and that, in order to create a breach of the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 33, there must be a plying for hire in a public street or place.

The following were the grounds of the magistrate's decision :—

1. That the appellant having his carriage ready for the conveyance of passengers in a place frequented by the public was a plying for hire, although the place was private property.

2. That it was not necessary, in order to constitute a breach of the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 33, that there should be a plying for hire in a public street or place.

3. That, if it was so necessary, the facts above set forth disclose evidence on which it might be lawfully found that there was a plying for hire in a public street or place.

If the court should be of opinion that there was any evidence on which the magistrate could lawfully convict the appellant of a breach of the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 33, then the conviction was to be confirmed, otherwise it was to be quashed.

Edward Clarke argued for the appellant.—The section under which the appellant was convicted is 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 33, which enacts "that every driver of a hackney carriage who shall ply for hire elsewhere than at some standing or place appointed for that purpose, or who, by loitering or by any wilful misbehaviour, shall cause any obstruction in or upon any public street, road or place; and also every driver or conductor of any metropolitan stage carriage who by loitering or any wilful misbehaviour shall cause any obstruction in or upon any public street, road, or place, or shall improperly delay such carriage on any journey, or wilfully deceive any person in respect to the route or destination thereof, or who shall refuse to admit and carry at the lawful fare any passenger for whom there is room, and to whose admission no reasonable objection is made, or who shall demand more than the legal fare for any passenger, or who, for the purpose of taking up or setting down a passenger, or except in case of accident or other unavoidable necessity, shall stop such carriage opposite to the end of any street, or upon any place where foot passengers usually cross the carriage-way, or who shall ply for hire or passengers by blowing a horn or by using any other noisy instrument, within the limits of the metropolis as defined by the said Act of 2 Will. 4; and every conductor of a metropolitan stage carriage who shall allow any person besides himself, not being the hirer or a person employed by such hirer, to ride on the driving box; and every driver or conductor of any metropolitan stage carriage who shall smoke whilst acting in such capacity, after an objection taken by any person riding in or upon such carriage; shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 20s." By sect. 2, the words "hackney carriage" shall include every carriage (except a stage carriage) which shall stand on hire or ply for a passenger for hire at any place within the limits of the city of London, and the liberties thereof, and metropolitan police district." By sect. 3, certain provisions of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, are extended and applied to hackney carriages within the meaning of this Act. By sect. 29, the commissioners of police of the metropolis may from time to time appoint standings for hackney carriages, and at their discretion alter and make regulations for the same. By sect. 30, "No standing shall be appointed for hackney carriages, either within the metropolitan police district or within the City of London, by virtue of this Act, or of any other Act, except in the centre part of the street, unless in the case of a street with houses only on one side of such street." Amongst the provisions of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, incorporated by sect. 3 of the Act of 1843, are sect. 4, "that every carriage with two or more wheels, which shall be used for the purpose of standing or plying for hire, in any public street or road, at any place within the distance of five miles from the General Post Office, in the City of London, whatever may be the form of construction of such carriage, or the number of persons which the same shall be calculated to convey, or the number of horses by which the same shall be drawn, shall be deemed and taken to be a hackney carriage within the meaning of this Act;" and sect. 35, "That every hackney carriage which shall be found standing in any street or place, and having thereon any of the numbered plates required by this Act to be fixed on hackney carriages, shall, unless actually hired, be deemed to be plying for hire, although such hackney carriage shall not be on any standing or place usually appropriated for the purpose of hackney carriages standing or plying for hire." By the latter part of that section, a driver shall forfeit 40*s.* for refusing a fare, upon his failure at the hearing of a complaint to prove that he was hired by someone else. In Case v. Storey (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618; L. R. 4 Ex. 319), the respondent was the driver of a hackney carriage, standing on the private ground of a railway station, and he refused to drive the appellant who required him, the appellant not having come by train to the station. The court held that he was not liable under sect. 35; for the words "in any street or place" in that section must mean "in any public street or road" as used in sect. 4. Reading these two Acts together, as provided by sect. 3 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, sects. 2 and 33 can only apply to a driver who shall ply for hire in some public street or place elsewhere than a standing or place appointed for that purpose. Two recent cases, Clarke v. Stanford (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 389; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 357), and Allen v. Tunbridge (24 L. T. Rep. 796; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 481), have been decided upon 32 & 33 Vict, c. 115, s. 4, but they are not in point here. [The Attorney-General. — We say they are precisely in point.] They are both, like Case v. Storey, charges of plying for hire on the private grounds of railway stations, but by 32 & 33 Vict. c, 115, s. 4 "'hackney carriage' shall mean any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire within the limits of this Act, and is not a stage carriage." Both courts observe upon the omission of the words "public place" from the definition of the previous Acts, and Cockburn, C.J., said (p. 359), "this appears to have been done intentionally and advisedly." The Court of Common Pleas in Allen v. Tunbridge merely followed the authority of the Queen's Bench.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge Q.C.) (with him Archibald and Beasley), argued for the respondent. The definition of hackney carriages in the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, is substantially the same as that in 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86. [BLACKBURN, J.—The words are not the same, and the only question is whether "place" in the earlier Act means "public place."] The words are simple, and there can be no ground for adding to the definition the words "in some public street or place," which must be done to maintain the appellant's contention. In The Blackpool Local Board of Health v. Bennett, (4 H. & N. 127), the Court of Exchequer interpreted the same words in a bye-law according to the respondent's view. By allowing the appellant to ply for hire, Mr. Clipson would obtain an undue advantage over other cab proprietors.

Clarke in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 1st.—BLACKBURN, J. delivered the judgment of the court. (Blackburn, Hannen, and Quain JJ.) [After stating the facts.] The magistrate expressed his opinion, which however he has submitted to our consideration, that this was a plying for hire in a public street or place. It is obvious that, if the appellant were liable to a penalty on that account, we should have to affirm the conviction; but what we think is that the Legislature did not intend, in the year 1843, to prohibit what the appellant did in this case, and did not consider such a proceeding a plying for hire in a public place. There are three Acts of Parliament on the subject; the first is 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, but we need not consider the effect of the words used there; the Court of Exchequer has decided in Case v. Storey that the words "any street or place," in sect. 35, must refer only to a public street or road, as used in sect 4. That decision is binding on us unless strong grounds can be shown for coming to a different conclusion; we, however agree with that decision, and we think that the Act refers only to plying for hire in a public street or road. Then came the Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, under which this conviction took place. It incorporates some of the provisions of the former Act, but it varies the definition of a hackney carriage; by the former, every carriage which shall be used for the purpose of standing or plying for hire in any public street or road, at any place within the distance of five miles from the General Post-office, shall be deemed and taken to be a hackney carriage; by the latter Act "hackney carriage," shall include every carriage which shall stand on hire or ply for a passenger for hire at any place within the limits of the City of London, and the liberties thereof, and metropolitan police district. We think that this second Act was not intended to alter the definition of "place" at all, but merely extended the limits of the application of the Act from five miles round the post-office to the whole of the metropolitan police district. If that be once clear, the meaning of the Act seems to follow; by the 33rd section, every driver of a hackney carriage who shall ply for hire elsewhere than at some standing or place appointed for that purpose shall forfeit the sum of 20*s*. Taking "place" in the definition of hackney carriage to mean public place, this section must make a driver liable only if he plies for hire on some public ground other than a cab stand, and the place on which the appellant's cab was standing would not be such as the Act contemplated. Drivers who stand and ply at railway stations, or upon ground belonging to private persons, are not liable under the 33rd section. This is confirmed by the enactment in sect. 30, that no standing shall be appointed except in the centre part of a street, unless in the case of a street with houses only on one side. We cannot read this section, unless with our interpretation of place, to mean anything but a positive prevention of any plying for hire at a railway station. We cannot believe that the Legislature ever intended by a side wind and incidentally, to put an end to the custom for cabs to wait for passengers at railway stations. An argument has been used to the effect that, by this construction of the statute, the owner of the appellant's cab gets an unfair advantage over other owners and drivers who have not private grounds so conveniently situated; but that may well be a matter which the Legislature has left to public competition, and I do not think we are bound to provide otherwise. It has also been said that our decision in Clarke v. Stanford is inconsistent with our opinion in this case; but we still consider that case was rightly decided. The question raised was upon another and a later Act, and the words used to define a hackney carriage in that Act—the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, s. 4—are different from those in this Act. They are, "Hackney carriage shall mean"—not include, as here—"any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire within the limits of this Act;" there is nothing about standing places, either public or private, in the definition of offences, and the conviction was obviously right. The result is, that our judgment is for the appellant.

Conviction quashed.

CAMPBELL v. EAST LONDON WATERWORKS.

Statutory duty to supply water—Exemption from liability—10 Vict. c. 17, s. 38; 16 & 17 Vict. c. clxvi., ss. 62 and 79.

Sect. 79 of the East London Waterworks Act 1853, provides that the company shall, at the request of an owner or occupier of any premises situate in or adjoining any street in which any main or service-pipe of the company is or shall be laid, and who requires a supply of water, afford a supply of water. The plaintiff declared upon this section, and stated that he was such an owner and occupier, and that he requested and required a supply of water; but notwithstanding the fulfilment of all conditions the defendant wrongfully, improperly, and negligently made default in affording to the plaintiff the said supply, by reason whereof he was unable to extinguish a fire which destroyed his premises. The defendants pleaded that the said main or service pipe had a certain fire-plug properly fixed in it, and that the said fire-plug was opened for the purpose of supplying water for extinguishing another fire, which was the cause of default. They also pleaded that they were prevented from affording the said supply of water from unavoidable cause or accident.

Held, upon demurrer that the former of these two pleas was good, but that the latter was bad.

In this case the plaintiff demurred to two of the defendant's pleas.

The first count of the declaration stated that after the passing and coming into operation of the East London Waterworks Act 1853, the plaintiff, being an owner and occupier of premises adjoining a certain street in which a main or service pipe of the defendants was laid, required a supply of water by measure for purposes other than the purposes in respect of which rates in the said statute are provided or limited, and requested the defendants, in accordance with the provisions of the said statute, to afford him a supply of water. And the plaintiff said that although all conditions were fulfilled necessary to entitle, and nothing happened to disentitle, and there was nothing to disentitle the plaintiff to have the defendants afford to him the supply of water, and keep him supplied with the same; yet the defendants wrongfully, improperly, and negligently, and in violation of the provisions of the statutes in that behalf made and provided, made default in affording to the plaintiff the said supply of water, and in keeping him supplied with the same, and left him unsupplied with the same, and by reason thereof the plaintiff was unable to obtain water to extinguish, and was unable to extinguish, a fire which extended to and was burning on the plaintiff's said premises; and by reason of the same the premises, sheds, buildings, property, and goods of the plaintiff which were then upon the said premises were damaged, burnt, and destroyed. And the plaintiff was otherwise greatly damnified and injured.

The defendants pleaded to this first count, fourthly, that the said main or service pipe had a certain fire plug properly fixed in it, and that the said fire plug was opened for the purpose of supplying water for extinguishing a fire which had broken out in certain premises adjoining the street in which the said main or service pipe was, which was the cause of the default in affording to the plaintiff the said supply of water in the said first count complained of.

The defendants pleaded to this same first count, fifthly, that they were prevented from affording the said supply of water, from unavoidable cause or accident.

The plaintiff demurred to the fourth plea, on the ground that it was no answer to the charge of negligence and improper conduct; and that it did not show any valid excuse for the breach of the statutory obligation disclosed in the first count.

The plaintiff demurred to the fifth plea on the grounds that it did not deny negligence, but on the contrary, admitted it; and that unavoidable cause or accident was no excuse for not performing the statutory obligation disclosed in the first count.

The defendants' points were: First, That the fourth plea was good because the Water Works Clauses Act 1847, which is incorporated with the East London Waterworks Act 1853, exempts the defendants from all liability for a non-supply of water, arising out of the circumstances mentioned in the plea; secondly, that the fifth plea was good, inasmuch as the exemptions mentioned in the plea apply to a supply of water under section 79; and thirdly, that the declaration disclosed no grounds of action against the defendants.

Sir G. Honyman, Q.C. (with him Cohen) argued for the plaintiff:—By sect. 79 of the East London Waterworks Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. clxvi.) it is enacted "that the company may, at their own instance, and shall at the request of any owner or occupier of any premises situate in or adjoining any street in which any main or service pipe of the company is or shall be laid, and who requires a supply of water, by measure, for purposes other than the purposes in respect of which rates are by this Act provided or limited, and by means of communication pipes, and other necessary and proper apparatus to be provided, laid, and maintained at the cost of the person requiring such supply, afford a supply of water by meter, or other fit and sufficient instrument or mode for measuring and ascertaining the quantity of water so supplied, and may charge for such supply not exceeding" certain rates therein contained. The fourth plea is no answer to the negligence imputed by the declaration; for although the fire-plug might be properly fixed and properly opened for the purpose alleged, it might have been consistently with the plea improperly and negligently left open after the alleged purpose was accomplished. [BLACKBURN, J.—The plea alleges that the opening of the plug was the cause of default; if it turns out otherwise, the issue upon the plea will be in the plaintiff's favour.] At all events the imputed negligence is not answered by the fifth plea. [Stopped by the court.]

Pollock, Q.C. (with him Lanyon) for the defendants.—The fourth plea is founded upon the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17), s. 38, which enacts that the "undertakers, at the request of the town commissioners, shall fix proper fire plugs in the main and other pipes belonging to them, at such convenient distances, not being more than the prescribed distance, or if no distance be prescribed, not more than 100 yards from each other, and at such places as may be most proper and convenient for the supply of water for extinguishing any fire which may break out within the limits of the special Act, and also upon sect. 42, "the undertakers shall at all times keep charged with water, under such pressure as aforesaid, all their pipes to which fire plugs shall be fixed, unless prevented by frost, unusual drought, or other unavoidable cause or accident, or during necessary repairs, and shall allow all persons at all times to take and use such water for extinguishing fire, without making compensation for the same." These sections impose upon the defendents and all undertakers a public duty which overrides all private contracts. Section 62 of the private Act 1863, supports the fifth plea; "provided always that the company shall not be liable to any penalty for not laying down any such main pipe or communication pipe, if they be prevented so doing by any unavoidable cause or accident, or for not supplying water if the want of such supply arise from frost, unusual drought, or other unavoidable cause or accident." [BLACKBURN, J.—This plea would be proved by establishing any unavoidable cause or accident whatever, but the section exempts the company only from a cause or accident ejusdem generis with frost and drought.]

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the fourth plea is a good answer to the first count of the declaration, but the fifth plea is too general, and cannot be supported.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. I. F. COOKE and T. H. CARSON, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, March 8, 1872.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. STEWART.

Charity—Scheme cy près—Application to restore money to original purpose.

When a scheme for the regulation of a charity has been settled by a decree of the court, and acted upon for a number of years, no alteration will be made in the scheme, except upon the clearest evidence that great benefit will result from the change.

Money was subscribed in 1809 to provide a Gaelic service in London for Highlanders "who could not speak English." An information was filed in 1827, and in 1830 a decree was made confirming a scheme by which the money was applied in payment of a clergyman who conducted a Gaelic service in London until 1844, when he resigned. On a reference being made to the master, he found in 1846 that a fit and proper person could not be found to undertake the duty: that Gaelic preaching was not required or desired in London: and he approved a scheme for the application of the money in educating Scotch children at the Caledonian Asylum. The master's report was confirmed by decree, and the money was applied accordingly until 1871. A petition was then presented (in the suit, and also under 52 Geo. 3, c. 101.) by three Highlanders residing in London, alleging that a fit and proper person could now be found to conduct a Gaelic service, and praying that the money should be so applied.

Held, that the money must be considered as raised for the benefit of those "who could not speak English sufficiently to attend an English service with profit:" And no evidence having been given of there being any such persons in London, and the Attorney-General opposing the application, the court refused to make any alteration in the scheme.

THIS was a petition presented in the above suit, and also under Sir S. Romilly's Act (52 Geo. 3, c. 101), with reference to the application of the income of a fund which was raised under the following circumstances.

In 1809 a subscription was opened "for the purpose of providing a place of public worship in London, for persons coming from the Highlands of Scotland who could not speak English, where divine service should be performed in the Gaelic language." A large sum was subscribed, and from 1812 to 1822 the income was applied in support of a Gaelic service in London. The arrangements then broke down, and the money, which at that time amounted to £2790 was invested in exchequer bills by David Stewart and Archibald Campbell.

In 1827 an information was filed by the Attorney-General with reference to this fund, and by the decree the money was ordered to be paid into court, and a reference was made to the master to approve of a scheme for the application of the fund to the purpose for which the same was subscribed, or as near thereto as circumstances would admit.

The master, by his report dated the 15th June 1829, found that the Reverend John Lees, a clergyman of the church of Scotland, the schoolmaster of the Caledonian Asylum, who was well acquainted with the Gaelic language, and a man of high character, had entered into an arrangement with the persons composing the committee of management of the Scotch church in Chadwell-street, Spa Fields, whereby the said committee had agreed to grant to the said John Lees the use of the said church every Sunday afternoon at three o'clock, for the purpose of performing divine service in the Gaelic language, in consideration of the said John Lees paying to them the sum of £20 per annum, towards the expenses of the said church: and he also found that the then relators and also the defendant Alexander Fraser, who was one of the original subscribers to the said fund, conceived that as the said fund was not sufficient for the purpose of a chapel and payment of a salary of a clergyman for the special purpose of having divine service in the Gaelic language performed therein, that performance of such service in the Gaelic language on every Sunday afternoon was the nearest approach that could be made towards effecting the object of the said original subscription, and would accomplish it so far as the limited means then applicable to the purpose would allow it to be done. It was further found that the then relators proposed the following scheme for the application of the funds subscribed, that is to say, that the said exchequer bills should be sold, and that the produce of such sale and the sum of 265*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* cash then in the bank in the name of the said Accountant-General in trust of the said cause, after the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of the said suit should be laid out in the purchase of 3*l.* per cent. Reduced Annuities in the name of the said Accountant-General in trust in the said cause, and that the dividends to arise therefrom should be from time to time paid by the said Accountant-General to the said John Lees so long as he should perform divine service in the Gaelic language in the said church in Chadwell-street, and that the master had considered of the said proposed scheme, and did approve thereof.

By two orders made in this suit, and dated the 11th June 1830 and the 21st of June 1830, the report of the master was confirmed, and the dividends on the fund were ordered to be paid to the Rev. John Lees until further order.

The Rev. John Lees accordingly received the income of the fund, and Gaelic service was regularly conducted in London by him until 1844 when he resigned the office.

No other person having been found to succeed him, a petition was presented in 1845 by the relators in the suit, and by an order made on their petition it was referred to the master to approve of a fit and proper person to perform divine service in the Gaelic language in the room of the Rev. John Lees, and to approve of a new scheme.

The master, by his report dated the 17th June 1846, made in pursuance of the last mentioned order, found that he had caused advertisements for a preacher to be inserted in papers both English and Scotch, but no applications had been received in consequence of such advertisements; and various inquiries having been made of those supposed to be able to give information as to persons qualified for the situation without success, it was the opinion of the relator James Alexander Simpson that no clergyman could be found who would undertake the proposed appointment. And the master found that it did not appear, from past experience, that Gaelic preaching was required or desired in London, for during the time that Gaelic was preached in the chapel in Cross-street, then some years ago, not more that half a dozen persons on an average attended, and that before the removal took place to the National Scotch Church, in Regent-square, the Gaelic language ceased to be preached, and the said master found that after the removal to the latter place there were still very few who attended to hear the Gaelic service, sometimes not more than three, and that there were very few persons in England who then spoke or understood Gaelic so as to induce them to attend to hear divine service in that language, and he found that the Caledonian Asyum, which was incorporated in 1815, for supporting and educating the children of soldiers, sailors, and marines, natives of Scotland, who had died or been disabled in the service of their country, and of indigent Scotch parents resident in London not entitled to parochial relief, formerly received only boys, but the charity had since been extended and there were then 34 girls, and plenty of room and accommodation for more, and it would be very desirable that the dividends on the fund in court in the said cause, should be applied in aid of the Caledonian Asylum and the extension of its charity, the children being all those of natives of Scotland who were strictly educated in the religion of the Scotch church. And the master found that there was then standing in the name of the said Accountant-General in trust in the cause, to the account of the Attorney-General v. Stewart (Gaelic Chapel) in Reduced Annuities 3310*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.*, and in cash 150 15. 9*d.*, and it had therefore been proposed before him on the part of the said relators, that in approving of a new scheme for the future application of the trust fund, he should approve of the dividends payable in respect thereof being applied for and towards the charitable purposes of the Caledonian Asylum for supporting and educating the children of soldiers, sailors, and marines, natives of Scotland, who had died or been disabled in the service of their country, and of indigent Scotch parents resident in London not entitled to parochial relief: and having considered the said proposal, he was of opinion, and found that a fit and proper person to perform divine service in the Gaelic language, in the room of the said John Lees, could not be found; and he therefore approved of the following new scheme, corresponding as nearly as possible under all the circumstances to the purpose for which said subscriptions were originally raised, for the future application of the said trust fund, that was to say, that the dividends in respect of the said 3310*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* Reduced Annuities should in future, until further order of this honourable court, be applied for and towards the better providing religious and general education, and instruction, under the direction of the Corporation of the Caledonian Asylum, of the children supported by that Institution.

By an order made in the suit, on the 26th June 1846, on the petition of the relator, James Alexander Simpson, it was ordered that the master's report, dated the 17th June 1846, be confirmed. And it was ordered that the scheme by the said report approved of, be adopted and carried into effect, and after providing for the payment of the costs as therein mentioned, it was ordered that the dividends to accrue due on the said sum of 3310*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* Reduced Annuities should from time to time, as and when the same should accrue due, be paid to the treasurers of the Caledonian Asylum, for the time being, to be applied by them or him towards the charitable purpose of the said Caledonian Asylum, for and towards the better providing religious education and instruction, under the direction of the Corporation of the Caledonian Asylum for the children supported by that institution.

In pursuance of the last-mentioned order the income of the fund was paid to the treasurer of the Caledonian Asylum until Oct. 1871. This petition was then presented by three persons, named McCallun, McGregor, and Macphee, one of whom has been a member of the congregation of the Rev. John Lees. The petitioners stated that they were persons coming from the Highlands of Scotland, who lived in London and spoke the Gaelic language, and that they were desirous of having opportunities of attending divine service in London performed in that language. They alleged that there were a considerable number of Highlanders living in London speaking the Gaelic language, to whom divine service performed in that language would be a great benefit. They further stated that the Rev. David Reid, who was a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, could now be obtained to conduct a Gaelic service in London; that the use of a church could also be obtained for the purpose, and that the cost of the service would not exceed the amount of the income of the fund; and they submitted, that inasmuch as the income could now be applied for the purposes for which the money was originally subscribed, it ought no longer to be paid to the Caledonian Asylum. The petition therefore prayed (1) that the dividends on the fund in court might be paid to the Rev. David Reid until further order, or so long as he should perform divine service in London in the Gaelic language; (2) that if necessary a scheme might be settled for the application of the dividends for the future to providing for the performance by a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, divine service in London in the Gaelic language, for the benefit of the Highlanders in London speaking that language, and that if necessary, trustees of the said fund and charity might be appointed.

The petition was supported by the evidence of a number of persons coming from the Highlands of Scotland who resided in London, and held various positions, as clergymen, officers in the customs, and domestic servants. They all expressed their wish for a Gaelic service; but there was no evidence that any one resided in London who was unable to understand English.

Cotton, Q.C. and Kekewich, for the petitioners, contended that this was money devoted to a charitable purpose, for which there was a trust. This charitable purpose had been sanctioned by the scheme adopted in 1830. The court in 1846 had changed the old scheme and applied the money cy près, on the ground that it was impossible to carry into effect the original purpose, for no clergyman could be found to conduct a Gaelic service in London. That impossibility no longer existed; the money should therefore be restored to its original purpose.

Glasse, Q.C. and Freeling, for the Caledonian Asylum.—The petition is presented under Sir S. Romilly's Act, and also in the suit. Under Sir S.

Romilly's Act the petitioners must have a direct interest in the charity (Re Bedford Charities, 2 Swanst. 518), which these petitioners have not. This money was originally subscribed for those who could not speak English; but there are no such persons now resident in London. The only person who can move in this matter is the Attorney-General, and he is opposed to this application. But, even if the application were properly made, the court will not take money from its present useful purpose and apply it for such a speculative and sentimental scheme as that proposed by the petition.

Hemming, for the Attorney-General, submitted that such an application as the present, to vary a scheme which had been already settled by the court, should be made by the Attorney-General, and not by any private individual. Differences of opinion must exist in the case of every charity; and if the court would change a scheme upon a mere statement of opinion, every charity would be exposed to continual petitions presented by those who wished for a different application of the funds, and every petitioner would expect his costs out of the funds of the charity. It was open to every one to apply to the Attorney-General for the purpose of having steps taken by him to procure a change. He referred to Attorney-General v. Bishop of Worcester, 9 Hare, 328.

Cotton, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR stated the facts and reviewed the evidence which had been filed in support of the petition. He said that all the persons who had given evidence stated that they wished for a service in Gaelic; but it appeared that they were all acquainted with the English language. He was of opinion that every possible advantage which they could derive from a service in Gaelic they could also derive from a service in English; and he must regard the application as having been made for a speculative and sentimental purpose. But, supposing the Gaelic service to be established, the income of the fund, which only amounted to 90*l.* a year, would not be sufficient to support it. It was said that subscriptions would increase; but it was only too probable that this zeal for a Gaelic service would languish and die away, as it had languished and died away before. Treating it, therefore, as a practical question, there would be no advantage gained by acceding to the prayer of the petition. The only result would be the establishment of a scheme which would end in failure. So much for the merits of the question; he had further to consider the technicalities. This scheme had been settled for twenty-six years, and ought he now to interfere with it? He was of opinion that nothing could be more beneficial than the present application of the money, and was it wise to divert it from that application? On this subject he should refer to the Attorney-General v. The Bishop of Worcester. The facts of that case were not relevant, but the case was important on account of the general principles which it laid down. Turner, V.C. there said in his judgment (9 Hare, 361):—"But although it is thus in my opinion competent to the Attorney-General to apply to the court for alterations in schemes which have been settled under its directions, it is obvious, I think, that the court must proceed upon such applications with the utmost possible caution; that what has been done by the court must not be disturbed, except upon the most substantial grounds and upon the clearest evidence, not only that the scheme does not operate beneficially, but that it can by alteration be made to do so, consistently with the object of the foundation. Incalculable mischief will ensue to all the charities in the kingdom if this rule be not strictly observed, and if the court ventures in such cases to interfere upon speculative views as to the result of alterations, or in matters of discretion or regulation—matters on which the opinion of each succeeding Attorney-General and of each succeeding judge may well be permitted to differ." Those observations were completely applicable to the present case; and on the principles there laid down he would not be justified in changing a scheme, unless he were satisfied by the clearest evidence that great benefit and advantage would result from the change. He was not so satisfied; on the contrary, he was satisfied that the proposed change would result in failure. The money had been subscribed for the benefit of "those who could not speak English," and much had been said as to the meaning of those words. There was no one now to be found in London who could not speak English. He was of opinion, however, that those words were not to be taken strictly, but that their fair meaning was "for those who could not speak English to such an extent as to enable them, profitably, to attend a service in London conducted in English." But whether the words were construed strictly, or whether a liberal interpretation were placed upon them, there were no persons who came within that description for whose benefit he could apply the money. But further, in a case like the present, where a scheme had been settled by the court and acted upon for a number of years, an application to change the scheme should be made with the consent of the Attorney General. On this point he would again quote the observations of Turner, V.C. (9 Hare, 360), where he said: "I am not prepared to hold that it is not competent to the Attorney General, in a charity case, to call upon the court to review a scheme which has been settled under its decree, if he is satisfied that the scheme does not operate beneficially for the charity, and thinks that he can satisfy the court that the interests of the charity can be better promoted by an altered scheme, consistent with the foundation, the usage, and the law. In such a case, I think it is not only competent to the Attorney General, but it is his duty, to apply to the court for an alteration in the scheme. . . . The Attorney General, it must be remembered, acts in these cases on behalf of the Crown as parens patriæ, and represents all the objects of the charity. The court, in these cases, cannot look to any right or interest of the relator, but can regard the suit only as instituted by the Attorney-General, and all the objects of the charity are thus, in effect, plaintiffs through him." Now the Attorney-General was most strongly opposed to the present application; and on the whole he considered that he should be failing in his duty if he were to interfere with a useful charity, and devote this money to the purposes of a speculative and sentimental scheme. The petition would therefore be dismissed, and the petitioners must pay their own costs. The costs of the Attorney-General and the Caledonian Asylum, as between solicitor and client, would be paid out of the funds of the charity.

HUNTER v. BULLOCK.

Will—Charitable bequest—Direction for repair of gravestones.

Testator, after certain directions as to the graves of himself and his niece, desired his executors to pay to the trustees of the Tailors' Institution, Haverstock-hill, 1000*l.* "for the following use, that is, to pay the required amount for painting and keeping in repair the gravestone or gravestones in Kensal-green Cemetery or elsewhere, for the 15*th June yearly, if required, and to divide the balance that may remain into two equal parts," to be applied as therein mentioned for the benefit of the pensioners in the institution:*

Held, that there was a good gift of the whole sum of 1000*l. to the charity, discharged from any obligation to repair the gravestones.*

THIS was a question which arose upon further consideration in a suit instituted to administer the estate of the testator, John Hunter.

By his will, dated 8th Oct. 1869, the testator gave his residuary property to his niece, Elizabeth Hunter, for life, with remainder over; and the following clauses occurred in a subsequent part of the will:

I further desire that my executors Mr. John Bullock and the Rev. William Thomas Bullock shall not be held responsible for any lawful loss occasioned to the property, and that they will have my own and my niece Elizabeth Hunter's inscription of death placed on the stone of the grave at Kensal-green Cemetery, provided we have been buried there; if elsewhere to have a stone inscribed placed on the grave, the charge to form part of the funeral expenses . . . .

I further will and desire that my executors do pay to the trustees of the Tailors' Institution, Haverstock-hill, a further sum of 1000*l.* Three Per Cent. Stock, duty free, for the following use, that is, to pay the required amount for painting and keeping in repair the gravestone or gravestones in Kensal-green Cemetery or elsewhere, for the 15th June yearly, if required, and to divide the balance that may remain into two equal parts, to be divided half yearly between the pensioners equally, all married men to receive two shares, single men one share, viz., on the 22nd Jan. in memory of my dear father and wife, and on the 15th June to commemorate my own birthday.

Doubts having arisen as to the validity of the above bequest, the question was reserved for the opinion of the court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that the case of Fisk v. The Attorney-General was an authority in point. —If the direction to repair the gravestones created a trust, the trust was void; and the Journeyman Tailors' Institution was entitled to the whole of the 1000*l.* legacy.

REG. (on the Prosecution of the Trustees of Wolverhampton (resps.) v. CASWELL (app.)

Rating—Market tolls—Tolls for cattle coming into market place.

Tolls payable (by virtue of an Act of Parliament) in respect of cattle brought into a market place for sale, as soon as the cattle are brought in, and before they are put into a pen or tied up, are not in the nature of stallage or tolls payable in respect of the use of the soil, but are mere market tolls, and are not to be taken into account in assessing the lessee of the market and tolls to the poor-rate, as enhancing the value of his occupation.

THIS was an appeal against a rate for the relief of the poor for the parish of Wolverhampton, as to which the quarter sessions gave judgment for the respondent, subject to a special case.

The corporation of Wolverhampton, as the local board of health, are possessed of an inclosed market place, situate at Cleveland-road and Bilston-street, Wolverhampton. By the Wolverhampton Local Act the local board had power to maintain markets, and levy tolls, as in the schedule to that Act annexed, and also power to grant leases of the markets, market places, tolls, &c., for any period not exceeding seven years.

In 1868 they leased the cattle and pig market, being the inclosed market place above mentioned, to the appellant, and the tolls as then existing or thereafter altered, for the term of five years.

The lease included the "cattle market tolls," and one of the three classes of such tolls, was a toll for animals brought into the said market-place for the purpose of sale, another class for animals placed under covered spaces, or in pens or sheds in the market-place, and a third class for animals remaining at night in the market-place.

The Wolverhampton Improvement Act 1853 was repealed by the Wolverhampton Improvement Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. cxxxi.). By sect. 410 of this latter Act, all leases, &c., under the former Act are to continue valid. By sect. 193 the corporation have power to continue and establish markets and fairs, and, inter alia "the cattle market and fat pig market" before mentioned, and may "demand and receive tolls, stallages, and rents," as specified in the 7th schedule to the Act. By sect. 194 it is declared that the limits of the markets and fairs of the corporation shall be the same as the limits of the borough.

By sect. 200, sales of cattle, except in the cattle market, are prohibited under a penalty. By sects. 202 and 203 the tolls in the markets and fairs in respect of the occupation of stalls, &c., or of articles sold, are payable not only by the original taker or seller, but also by any subsequent taker or seller during the same day.

By sect. 204, "the tolls in respect of cattle brought to the market for sale, shall become due as soon as the cattle in respect whereof they are demandable are brought into the market place, and before the cattle are put into any pen or tied up in such market place; and if the cattle be not removed within one hour after the close of the market, another toll shall become due in respect of the cattle so omitted to be removed."

By Table F., sched. 7, the payments for bringing cattle into the market are termed "cattle market tolls," and the other payments are termed respectively "shed and pen rents" and "lodging rents." The cattle market tolls are—for every horse or mule under 13 hands high, 4*d.*, above 13 hands, 6*d.*; for every foal, ass, or calf, 2*d.*; for every bull, cow, steer, or heifer, 4*d.*; for every sheep, lamb, or goat, 1*d.*; for every pig not exceeding 20lb., ½*d.*: exceeding 20lb. and not exceeding 200lb., 1*d.*; exceeding 200lb., 2*d.*

By the rate the appellant was rated as the "occupier of the cattle and pig market."

The estimated area was stated to be 3a. 2r. 25p., the gross estimated rental as 1100*l.*, and the rateable value as 880*l.*

The sole question on appeal was whether the first class of "cattle market tolls," received by the appellant for cattle brought into the said market-place for the purpose of sale, may be taken into account in estimating, for the purpose of the rate, the yearly value of the appellant's occupation of the said market-place.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the toll in question was an incorporeal hereditament, and did not arise by virtue of any occupation of the soil. On the part of the respondents it was contended that although the toll per se might not be rateable, yet as the appellant was rated for the market-place, and the toll taken within the market-place enhanced the value of the occupation to the appellant, it should be taken into account in estimating the rateable value of the market-place.

If the court should be of opinion that such tolls may be taken into account in estimating such rateable value as aforesaid, then the judgment aforesaid should stand confirmed, but if the court should be of a contrary opinion then the said judgment was to be reversed, and the rate was to be amended and reduced to 275*l.* 15*s.*, as the gross estimated rental, and to 220*l.* 15*s.* as the rateable value.

J. O. Griffits (with him Gane) for the respondents, contended that though the tolls were not per se rateable, yet the appellant should be rated at the enhanced value of the occupation of the market by reason of the power given him of taking these tolls. The occupation of the market was clearly enhanced in value by the power of taking these tolls, and a higher rent was obtainable in consequence of it. In Reg. v. The North and South Shields Ferry Company (1 E. & B. 140), it was held that though the ferry tolls could not be rated either directly as being connected with real property occupied in the township or indirectly by taking them into account as profit of the land, yet the land should be rated on an estimate of the rent which might be obtainable for it in consideration of its being available for the purpose of earning the tolls. In the Earl of Durham v. Bishopwearmouth (2 E. & E. 230) it was held that the anchorage and beaconage tolls in that case were not tolls in gross, but tolls connected with the occupation and use of the soil of the port, and were therefore rateable to the poor rate in the parish and the townships on the port into which the ships paying them came. In Reg. v. The Rhymney Railway Company (4 L. Rep. Q. B. 276), where the owners of docks and wharves let the wharves to a railway company, who became the sole occupiers of them, this being reserved to the landlords in the agreement of letting certain wharfage dues payable on all goods shipped or unshipped at the wharves, which wharfage dues were paid direct to them by the owners or consignees of the goods, it was held that the railway company as sole occupiers of the wharves were liable to be assessed to the poor rate in respect of the full rateable value of the premises, including the wharfage dues, without regard to the amount of benefit which they themselves derived from the occupation. New Shoreham v. Lancing (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 489) was also referred to. Roberts v. Aylesbury (1 E. & B. 423), which will be relied on for the appellants, is distinguishable. In that case the appellants were rated to the relief of the poor in the market house, with the grounds belonging thereto, used and occupied for the tolls of the markets and fairs. It was admitted that under that description they were rated not only for the market house, but also for the tolls on merchandise sold in the market, and for payments made to the lord and his lessees for goods not sold, but exposed for sale, on the stalls and otherwise, which payments from time immemorial were charged according to the situation of the stalls and other circumstances, according to the discretion of the lord and his lessees, and also for payments to use temporary theatres and shows. None of the stalls, &c. were in any way affixed to the soil; the lord was the owner of the soil of the market; the tolls were from time immemorial received in the market house; and the appellants were lessees for a term of years under the lord. The court held that the tolls on goods sold were not the subject of a rate, and the fact that such tolls were paid in the market house made no difference, but that the other payments were in the nature of compensation for the use of the soil, and that they and the market house were properly rated. Lord Campbell, C.J., said, "the person using a stall has for the time being the use and occupation of that part of the soil on which it stands. The compensation which is paid to the owner of the soil, or his lessee, for the use of the soil in this way, is quite different in its nature from the toll payable to the lord of the market for goods sold; that toll is quite irrespective of the ownership or occupation of the soil. Then, on general principles, whatever profit is made by the occupation of the soil is properly rated. I do not see on what principle the payments made in respect of the use of the stalls are to be distinguished from the tolls payable for way-leases in the coal districts of the north which are always rated." The tolls which were held not to be rateable in this case were for goods in reality exposed for sale in the public streets, though within the ambit of the market; whilst in the present case the tolls are for cattle entering the market place, the soil of which is vested in the appellant as occupier. In the unreported case of The Mayor of London v. St. Sepulchre, which will be relied on for the appellant, the tolls were not for anything which could be said to occupy the soil, but merely for provisions carried into the

There is nothing to give this toll a corporeal quality;" and Bayley, J., added, "Bell is assessed in the rate for corn tolls, which it is plain, from the statement of the case, were mere market tolls and not incident to the soil. In Haddey v. Welhouse (Moor. 474) the distinction is well taken; for, it is said, if the King grant a fair or market with toll certain to one and his heirs, to be holden in land, which is borough English, and the grantee die, the heir at the common law shall have the market and the toll; but the younger son shall have the stallage and pickage, with the soil, by the custom." The Mayor of Northampton v. Ward (1 Wils. 107) is an authority to the same effect. The fact that the tolls in The Mayor of London v. St. Sepulchre were for dead beasts, whilst in the present case they were for live ones, does not make any difference, for both tolls are payable merely for admission into the market and not for the use of the soil. In The Mayor of Yarmouth v. Groom (1 H. & C. 111), Martin, B., said that if a person carried goods in a basket into a market for sale, and happened to place the basket on the ground, such a use of the ground would not be stallage. "It would be nothing more than using the market for hawking, and it might as well be said that cattle in a market, which it is impossible to keep stationary, have an exclusive occupation of one spot of ground, and therefore stallage is payable in respect of them." [He was stopped by the court.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think we need not trouble you further, Mr. Poland. We think this toll, payable in respect of the admission of cattle into the market, is not properly the subject of a rate. A distinction has been taken which, I think, is much to be regretted, between market tolls and stallage. The man who occupies the soil of the market ought, I think, on principle, to be liable to be assessed to the rates, and to contribute to the local burthens. But this distinction has been taken, probably, upon some principle of ancient law, and we are bound by it. The distinction is that tolls payable simply as market tolls are not liable to be rated, whereas those paid for the use of some stall or similar erection which occupies the soil of the market are liable to be rated. Now, in the present case, the toll was payable, not for the use of a stall or other thing erected in the market, but simply for admission to the market place, independently of any use of the soil, whether in the shape of shed, stall, &c. It is simply a toll in respect of the admission of cattle, and, as such, is a market toll. It therefore comes within the distinction to which I have referred, and is not rateable.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I see in the manuscript note of what I said in the case of The Mayor of London v. St. Sepulchre, that I there pointed out that the distinction between tolls payable in respect of the use of the market and those payable in respect of the use of a stall which occupies the soil, was one not particularly intelligible to an ordinary mind, and one which the Legislature might well reconsider. But the distinction stands, and we must give effect to it. In The Mayor of London v. St. Sepulchre the question was whether, upon the construction of the London Act, it was the intention of the Legislature to make the tolls for commodities brought into the market a mere franchise, and not tolls in respect of the use of the land, so as to be rateable. The sections of that Act, which enabled the appellants to levy the tolls, were essentially identical in terms with sect. 204 of the present Act. The present a this case the court of Queen's Bench (Cock- J., Blackburn and Lush, JJ.) held that the Cor- a of London were not liable to be rated in respect which, by virtue of 23 & 24 Vict. c. cxciii, s. 32, are empowered to levy in respect of all meat, , and other provisions, brought into the market r the Corporation, nor in respect of tolls which shall become due and payable immediately on at or poultry or other provisions, in respect of such tolls are to be taken, entering or being into the said market, from any person bringing e, or causing the same to be brought into the " case is identical in all respects with that, except that there the tolls were leviable in respect of provisions to be sold, whilst here they are leviable in respect of cattle—things which would, in general, be privileged. But I confess I cannot see the distinction between the principle of that case and the present. I agree with the opinion of Martin, B. (Mayor of Yarmouth v. Groom, 1 H. & C. 111), that live animals driven into the market cannot be said to occupy the soil any more than a living person. It seems to me that this was also what the Legislature intended, for a toll of a halfpenny is imposed on every pig not exceeding 20lb. weight, which would apply to sucking pigs that could not be driven into the market, but must be carried. The Legislature meant the tolls to be similar to those in the St. Sepulchre case. They cannot, therefore, be taken into account in rating the market place.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the payment is made for the use of the market or for the use of the soil on which the market is held. For the reasons already given, I think that the former is the case, and therefore that the payments made are market tolls.

SECOND COURT.

ELLIOT AND OTHERS (apps.) v. MAJENDIE (resp.).

Gunpowder—Store magazine without lightning conductor—Forfeiture and fine—23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, ss. 2 and 4.

The appellants, makers of gunpowder, neglected to provide thunder rods or lightning conductors in connection with a store magazine where gunpowder was kept by them, in breach of the Gunpowder Act 1860, s. 2, regulation 9. Upon an information, justices ordered the powder therein to be forfeited, and fined the appellants 1*s. for every pound so forfeited; such forfeiture and penalty being imposed by sect.* 4 upon persons making gunpowder contrary to the Act, or keeping in any mill or place gunpowder contrary to the provisions thereinbefore contained:

Held, upon a case stated, that for this offence the appellants could not be liable to this forfeiture and penalty.

THIS was a case stated by four of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Cornwall, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on the questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter mentioned.

At a petty sessions holden at Liskeard, in and for the division of the hundred of West, in the said county of Cornwall, on the 15th March last, an information and complaint which had been preferred by Borlase Childs, of Liskeard, gentleman, as the attorney for Vivian Deering Majendie, hereinafter described and called the respondent, against Samuel Eliott and others, trading under the name, style, and firm of The East Cornwall Powder Company (hereinafter called the appellants), was heard by the justices, and the following is a copy of the information:

"Be it remembered that on the 9th March 1872 at Liskeard, in the county of Cornwall, Borlase Childs, of Liskeard, in the said county, gentleman, the attorney for Captain Vivian Deering Majendie, R.A., of 23, Victoria-road, Old Charlton, in the county of Kent (a person duly appointed by Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Home Department under and in pursuance of the Gunpowder Act 1860, to inspect gunpowder manufactories), personally cometh before us, the undersigned, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county of Cornwall, and being duly authorised by the said Captain Majendie, in that behalf, informeth us that Samuel Eliott, of Trafalgar House, Plymouth, in the county of Devon, merchant, and others trading under the name, style, and firm of The East Cornwall Powder Company within the space of six calendar months last past, to wit, on the 7th Feb., at a certain gunpowder manufactory in their occupation at the parish of St. Pinnock, in the county of Cornwall, being makers of gunpowder, did have a store magazine for the keeping of gunpowder, and in which a certain gunpowder was then kept by them, the said Samuel Eliott and others, they not having caused to be erected or provided good and sufficient thunder rods or lightning conductors in connection with such store magazine for the protection of such magazine from the effects of lightning; and did thereby make and keep, and cause to be made and kept, gunpowder contrary to the said Act; wherefore the said Borlase Childs prayeth the consideration of us the said justices in the premises, and that the said Samuel Eliott and others may be summoned to appear before us and answer the premises, and make their defence thereto.

"Exhibited before us the day and year and at the place first above written.

"JAMES GLENCROSS,
"W. R. C. MARSHALL."

At the hearing both the applicants and the respondent were represented by their respective attorneys.

The Gunpowder Act 1860, under which the foregoing information was laid, sect. 2, paragraph 9. runs as follows:

Every maker of gunpowder shall cause to be erected or provided good and sufficient thunder rods or lightning conductors in connection with every store magazine where gunpowder is kept by him, for the protection of such magazine fom the effects of lightning.

It was admitted by the appellants, as the justices found the fact to be, that they were makers of gunpowder trading under the name, style or firm of "The East Cornwall Powder Company," and that on the 7th Feb. last, at a certain gunpowder manufactory, then in their occupation, at the parish of St. Pinnock, in the county of Cornwall, they being then such makers of gunpowder, did have a store magazine for the keeping of gunpowder, and in which a certain gunpowder was then kept by them, and that they the appellants had not caused to be erected or provided good and sufficient thunder rods, or lightning conductors, in connection with such store magazine for the protection of such magazine from the effects of lightning. They also found as a fact, and it was admitted by the appellants, that on the said 7th Feb. last, when the inspection took place which led to the information being laid, there were ten barrels each containing 100lb. of gunpowder in the said store magazine.

Under these circumstances the respondent's attorney contended that the appellants had kept gunpowder contrary to the provisions of the Act, and had rendered themselves liable to the penalties by the 4th section of the Act, namely, a forfeiture of the whole of the 1000lb. of gunpowder proved to have been in such store magazine at the time of the inspection, as well as a fine of 100*l.*, being at the rate of 2*s.* for every pound of gunpowder so forfeited.

The appellants' attorney, on the other hand, contended that, notwithstanding the appellants were proved to have kept gunpowder in a store magazine, which was not provided with any thunder-rod or lightning-conductor, yet that they did not keep gunpowder contrary to the provisions of the Act in such manner as to bring it within the scope and meaning of the 4th section of the Act, which imposed the penalty for so doing. He contended that the 4th section did not apply at all to such a case, and that, in point of fact, the Act imposed no penalty whatever in respect of not providing lightning-conductors to store magazines; that the 4th section applied only to places used for or in the manufacture of gunpowder, and in which gunpowder is kept in excess of the quantity allowed by the Act, and not to store magazines, in which any quantity of gunpowder may be kept after being manufactured, the Act not fixing any limit in respect of such quantity. He also contended that the words "or other place," occurring in the 4th section, must be construed to mean other place ejusdem generis with mill, press house, corning house, drying house, and dusting house, immediately preceding those words; all such houses or places being used for or in the manufacture of gunpowder only, and not for the purpose of storing gunpowder. He also contended that, inasmuch as the 4th section imposed specific penalties for other offences under the Act, such as not having any store magazine 140yds. distant from any mill or other place used in the manufacture of gunpowder, or not removing with due diligence the finished gunpowder from such mill or other place to such store magazine, but did not impose any specific penalty for not providing lightning-conductors to store magazines, either the Legislature intended that no such penalty should be imposed, or it was a casus omissus; and he therefore claimed the benefit of such omission on behalf of the appellants.

The said justices, however, were of opinion that the 4th section of the Act did apply to the 9th paragraph of sect. 2 of the said Act, and that the appellants were proved to have kept gunpowder contrary to the provisions of the Act, and within the scope and meaning of the 4th section, by reason of their having a store magazine in which gunpowder was kept, and which was not provided with any thunder rod or lightning conductor; and they accordingly convicted the appellants, and declared the whole of the 1000lb. of gunpowder found in such store magazine to be forfeited, and adjudged the appellants to pay the sum of 50*l.*, being at the rate of 1*s.* for every pound of gunpowder so forfeited. Whereupon the appellants' attorney, being dissatisfied with this determination as being erroneous in point of law, applied to the justices to state and sign a case for the opinion of this court, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute (21 & 21 Vict. c. 43), and they stated and signed this case accordingly.

The question of law arising on the above statement is, whether the appellants by having a store magazine for the keeping of gunpowder, and in which gunpowder was kept by them, they not having caused to be erected or provided good and sufficient thunder rods or lightning conductors in connection with such store magazine, for the protection of such store magazine from the effects of lightning, did thereby keep or cause to be kept gunpowder contrary to the provisions of the Gunpowder Act 1860; and thus render themselves liable to the penalties imposed by sect. 4 of the said Act.

If the court should be of opinion that the appellants did render themselves so liable, then the said conviction is to stand good; but if the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the said conviction is to be quashed.

Sect. 4 of the Gunpowder Act 1860, is as follows:

All gunpowder made in any place where, under this Act it is not lawful to make gunpowder, and all gunpowder in any mill, press-house, corning-house, drying-house, dusting-house, or other place, exceeding the quantity which for the time being may lawfully be therein, shall be forfeited; and every person making, or causing to be made, any gunpowder contrary to this Act, or keeping or causing to be kept in any such mill or place, any gunpowder contrary to the provisions hereinbefore contained, shall, for so doing, in addition to such forfeiture as aforesaid, forfeit for every such offence any sum not exceeding 2*s.* for every pound of gunpowder so forfeited.

Every person making gunpowder without having such store magazine, or magazines, 140 yards distant from any mill, and every other place used by him, for or in the manufacture of gunpowder, shall forfeit any sum not exceeding 25*l.* for every month during which such person makes gunpowder without having such magazine or magazines.

And every person making gunpowder, who wilfully neglects or delays removing with due diligence the finished gunpowder made at his mill or mills, and the other places used by him for or in the manufacture of gunpowder, from thence or from the magazines or storehouses used therewith to the store magazine or magazines distant as aforesaid, shall forfeit for every day during which such offence continues, any sum not exceeding 5*l.*

Lopes, Q.C. (with him Bradford), for the appellants.—The 4th section applies only to places used for the manufactory, not for the storage, of gunpowder. A store magazine is not a place of the same kind as a mill, a press-house, a corning-house, a drying-house, or a dusting house, and therefore cannot be included in the words "or other place," as used in that section. No doubt this being a breach of the last clause of sect. 2, may be a misdemeanor punishable by indictment, but it is not one of the offences for which special remedies are provided by the first paragraph of sect. 4. The justices have here confiscated the appellants' powder as well as fining them, which is a penalty provided only for making powder in an improper place, or keeping an excessive quantity of powder, neither of which offences are the appellants charged with. There is no forfeiture imposed for keeping powder in a store magazine, a place intended for an unlimited quantity. This penalty depends upon the amount of powder forfeited; the forfeiture therefore, being illegal, the penalty must be so also.

The respondent did not appear.

BLACKBURN, J.—We have come to the conclusion that the words of the Act of Parliament do not support this conviction. The justices expressly found the offence for which they convicted the appellants to be within the scope and meaning of the first part of the 4th section: now that section deals with gunpowder made contrary to the Act, or kept in any such mill or place "contrary to the provissions hereinbefore contained." The previous provisions are by sect. 1, the repeal of earlier Acts; by sect. 2, certain regulations to be observed with regard to the manufacture and keeping of gunpowder, which are, shortly,—that powder is to be made only in licensed places; that powder is only to be made in certain quantities, and mills are to be provided with a charge house for the store of mill charges at a suitable distance; that certain quantities only are at one time to be subjected to certain pressure, to be corned or granulated, or to be dried; that every person making powder is to have a good and sufficient magazine or magazines, at least 140 yards distant from the mill and other house or place used for making the powder, and substantially built, and licensed as a store magazine or magazines; that every maker of powder shall cause all finished gunpowder to be removed from such mill or place used for the manufacture of powder, to the said store magazine or magazines; and lastly the regulation of which the appellants have committed a breach. Sect. 3 exempts certain buildings then in existence, upon application to the Secretary of State. Mr. Lopes has truly pointed out that there is no restriction as to the quantity of powder to be kept in a store magazine, and it is not suggested that the appellants had stored an excessive quantity. The words of the first paragraph of the 4th section, which alone imposes forfeiture and a fine in proportion to the powder forfeited, does not deal with the neglect of lightning conductors in connection with a store magazine, and it is impossible to justify the order of the justices under that part of the section. Whether the appellants might have been liable to a penalty of 25*l.* a month, under the second paragraph of the section, for making gunpowder without having such a store magazine as the Act provides, or whether they are liable to any other penalty, we need not consider. The only question we are asked is whether they are liable to forfeiture under the first part of the section; and as they are not so liable the conviction must be quashed.

MELLOR, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. We need not now decide whether there might have been a conviction under any other provision of the Act.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think this first part of sect. 4 does not apply to the circumstances of this case.

REG. v. THE VICE-CHANCELLOR AND THE HEBDOMADAL COUNCIL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

Member of congregation—Resident—Nominal occupation of college rooms—17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, ss. 16 and 48.

By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, s. 16, the congregation of the University of Oxford shall be composed of certain persons being members of Convocation; amongst them, all residents. By sect. 48, "residents" are defined to be all members of Convocation who have resided twenty weeks within one mile and a half of Carfax during the year preceding.

A fellow of a college held a living nine miles from Oxford, where he occupied the parsonage house, and where his servants lived. He also rented rooms in his college, which he occupied whenever he passed the night at Oxford; no one else used these rooms, and he repeatedly slept there during the preceding year:

Held, that the Act required an actual residence; and that this was not a sufficient qualification.

ON the 20th Nov. 1871 Adams, Q.C. obtained, on behalf of the Rev. J. H. Eld, a rule nisi calling upon the Vice-Chancellor and the Hebdomadal Council of the University of Oxford, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to place the name of the said J. H. Eld, B.D. on the register of members of the congregation of the said university for the year ending 24th Sept. 1872.

This rule was obtained upon the following affidavit of the said J. H. Eld:

I am a graduate member of the University of Oxford, and a fellow of St. John's College. I took my degree of Bachelor in Divinity in the said university in 1854. My name has been on the register of the congregation of the university since 1857 to the present time, with the exception of the year 1865, when my name was struck off without notice or opportunity of appeal, but it was restored the following year upon my making my claim in the same manner as on the present occasion, although my residence in that case was precisely similar to that in respect of which I have now claimed, as hereafter more particularly mentioned.

That such congregation is composed, under the Act of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, entitled "An Act to make further Provision for the good Government and Extension of the University of Oxford and of the Colleges therein, and of the College of St. Mary, Winchester," of, among other persons, all residents, being members of Convocation.

That in the interpretation clause of the above-mentioned Act, it is enacted that the word "residents" shall mean and include all members of Convocation who shall have resided for twenty weeks within one mile and a half of Carfax, during the year that shall expire on 1st Sept. next preceding the making and promulgation of the register, as directed by the 14th section of this Act.

That section 14 of the said Act provides that the vice-chancellor shall, before the 25th Sept. in each year, make and promulgate a register of persons qualified to be members of the congregation of the University of Oxford according to that Act.

That I have, for twenty weeks and upwards next preceding the making and promulgation of the said register, resided within one mile and a half of Carfax; that is to say, I have during that period occupied, as a resident Fellow of St. John's College aforesaid, a set of rooms, consisting of a bedroom and a sitting room, within that college, and within one mile and a half of Carfax aforesaid. That I am the sole occupier and tenant of such rooms; that I pay rent for the same to the corporation of the President and Scholars of St. John's College; that the rooms aforesaid are occupied and furnished by me, this deponent, and are occupied by no one else; and that whenever I sleep in Oxford, I sleep in the bedroom aforesaid, and that during the year preceding the 1st Sept. last past, I have repeatedly slept, and do from time to time sleep, in the said bedroom.

On or about the 28th Oct. last I was informed, by a letter from the Registrar of the University, that doubts had been raised in the Council of the University, on the revision of the Register of Convocation, as to my qualification by residence, and I was requested to substantiate my claim by filling up a printed form inclosed in such letter.

That on receipt of this communication I forwarded to the registrar my claim to have my name inserted on the Register of the Congregation, in the following words:

"University of Oxford.

"I, James Henry Eld, B.D., of St. John's College, hereby declare that I have resided within one mile and a half of Carfax for twenty weeks during the year which ended on the 1st Sept. last past, and I claim to have my name placed on the list of members of the Congregation of the University of Oxford, for the year ending 24th Sept. 1872. As witness my hand this 27th Oct. 1871."

The aforesaid claim was made by me in the words of the Act of Parliament above stated.

That on or about the 30th Oct. last I was informed, by letter, by the Registrar of the University, that the Hebdomadal Council, in revising the Register of Congregation, had removed my name from the list of persons qualified by residence.

That on the 30th Oct. last the said Vice Chancellor promulgated in the usual manner the list of persons qualified to be members of Congregation at the said University, but that my name does not appear in the said list.

The following affidavit of F. P. Morrell, attorney, was filed on behalf of the defendants:

I am a graduate member of the University of Oxford, and a member of the firm of Morrell and Son, Oxford, solicitors for the University in this matter.

I know and am well acquainted with the Rev. James Henry Eld, B.D., and have read the affidavit sworn by him the 7th Nov. 1871.

Since the year 1863, the said J. H. Eld has been and now is vicar of the parish of Tyfield, in the county of Berks, having been presented to that living by the President and Scholars of St. John's College, Oxford, who are the patrons thereof.

There is a moderate sized and comfortable parsonage house, with stables, garden, and usual offices, and appurtenances, as well as glebe attached to the said living The said living is not of a value which makes it untenable by a fellow of the said College, and it is consequently held by the said J. H. Eld, who is unmarried and a fellow of the said College, together with his fellowship.

I am informed and believe that the said J. H. Eld has permanently inhabited and resided in the said parsonage house since his presentation to the said living as aforesaid; that his servants live there, that all his books and furniture kept in his college rooms are there, that he has daily services in the Parish Church of Tyfield aforesaid, and that he has not and does not keep any curate.

The said J. H. Eld does not hold the office of tutor or dean of the said college, nor is he in any way connected with the teaching thereof.

The said J. H. Eld does, as stated in his said affidavit, occupy a set of rooms in the said college; and I am informed and believe that he does from time to time visit Oxford from Tyfield, which is about nine miles distant from Oxford for college meetings, and other purposes, but that he generally on such occasions returns home to Tyfield in the afternoon or evening of the same day, without sleeping in Oxford; and that he did not for the definite period of twenty weeks during the year which expired on the 1st. Sept. last, actually sleep or reside in the said rooms or elsewhere within one mile and a half of Carfax; and that his only residence during that year was at the parsonage house aforesaid.

Manisty, Q.C. and Kemplay, Q.C., showed cause on behalf of the Vice-Chancellor and University of Oxford.—The affidavits show no ground for the interference of the court. Mr. Eld has not resided, within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, long enough during the year to qualify himself for the register. [Stopped by the Court.]

Adams, Q.C. supported the rule.—This is the first time a judicial interpretation of a qualification by residence under this statute has been asked for, and it is contended that the facts of Mr. Eld's case give him a right to claim to be on the register. The meaning of the word "reside" has been discussed with regard to the Parliamentary franchise in

Whithorn v. Thomas, 7 M. & G. 1;
Taylor v. Kensington, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 309;
Bond v. St. George, Hanover-square, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 312.

According to the last two of these cases, Mr. Eld resided the requisite time in his college-rooms.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It was clearly intended by this Act of Parliament to draw a distinction between residents and non-residents within the university; and the Act requires that there should be an actual and not a merely constructive residence to qualify a member of the convocation to be a member of the congregation. Other qualifications bear no analogy to this matter.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. An absence of a day or two in the course of a residence extending over twenty weeks should not, I think, interfere with a qualification; but there must be a residence for that time in the sense of dwelling solely at that particular place.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. H. HOCKING and R. A. KINGLAKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, April 29, 1872.

STEEL (app.) v. BRANNEN (resp.)

Obscene book—Report of trial—Privilege—Appeal— 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, ss. 1 and 4—20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

M. was indicted for publishing an obscene book. The appellant thereupon published a report of the trial of M., in which the whole of the obscene book was set out. An information against the appellant was then laid before a magistrate under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, s. 1, and the magistrate decided that the appellant's publication was an obscene book of such a character and description that the publication of it would be a misdemeanor and proper to be prosecuted as such; and also that the report of the trial of M. as sold and published was not privileged. He accordingly ordered the copies seized to be destroyed. At the request of the appellant, he stated a case for the opinion of this court, in which he set forth the facts and such his determination, and left to the court the question whether on the facts he was justified in point of law in ordering the copies of the book to be destroyed:

Held, that although sect. 4 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, gives an appeal to the quarter sessions against the determination of a magistrate under sect. 1 of the Act, the appellant was justified in making this appeal under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2:

Held also, as a matter of fact, that the book was an obscene book; and, that being so, that the publication of it was none the less a misdemeanor, and proper to be prosecuted as such, because the appellant had published it without any corrupt motive, and solely for the purpose of carrying on a public controversy on matters of general interest and importance.

Held also, that although the publication in question was a correct report of proceedings in a court of justice, it was not privileged as such.

ON appeal from the determination of a magistrate on an information laid under Lord Campbell's Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 83), sect. 1, the following case was stated (under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2) for the opinion of this court.

1. The appellant is the occupier and manager of a shop being 14, Tavistock-street, Covent-garden, within the metropolitan police district, for a body called or known as "The Protestant Electoral Union," whose objects, as set forth in their prospectus, are, inter alia, "to protest against the teachings of the Romish and Puseyite system which are un-English, immoral, and blasphemous, to maintain the Protestantism of the Bible, and the liberty of England, and to promote the return to Parliament of men who will assist them in these objects, and particularly will expose and defeat the deep-laid machinations of the Jesuits, and resist grants of money for Romish purposes."

2. On the 26th Jan. 1871, the respondent, who was an inspector of the metropolitan police, under authority given to him by special warrant, duly issued under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, seized at the shop 14, Tavistock-street, aforesaid, about 181 copies of "a report of the trial of George Mackey, at the Winchester Quarter Sessions, Oct. 18 and 19, 1870, from shorthand notes of Dr. Soutter, lecturer on shorthand in King's College, London, containing the full text of the Morality of Romish Devotion, or the Confessional Unmasked, showing the Depravity of the Romish Priesthood, and the Iniquity of the Confessional, for the use of heads of families and persons of mature years."

3. Some of these reports were sold in covers, on the outside of which no reference was made to the trial, but contained the following title and description of the book:—"The Morality of Romish Devotion; or the Confessional Unmasked, showing the Depravity of the Romish Priesthood, and the Iniquity of the Confessional.

"The extracts, contained in this pamphlet are simply specimens of the moral theology of Rome, taught in the Royal College of Maynooth, at a cost of 30,000*l.* per annum to this heavily taxed Protestant nation. Through the unfaithfulness of both Christians and politicians, lawlessness has become legalised among us, and the most atrocious and obscene maxims and practices have been imposed upon the people as moral theology and the requirements of religion. On behalf of morality and religion we adjudge the confessional as here 'unmasked' to be a foul blasphemy, and worthy to be execrated of mankind, and we appeal to the word of God and the common sense of the people for a confirmation of our verdict.—ED."

"The time may come when it will become our bounden though painful duty to rouse the indignation of Englishmen at the expense of their modesty by translating and circulating some of the contents of that charnel-house, 'the confessional.' Dr. McNeile. Protestant Evangelical Mission and Electorial Union, 14, Tavistock-street, Covent-garden, London. Price 1*s.* To be had through all booksellers."

4. On the 2nd Feb. last, the appellant duly appeared at the Bow-street Police Court, before Sir Thomas Henry, the chief magistrate of the police courts of the Metropolis, in answer to a summons duly issued under the said statute to show cause why the said books so seized should not be destroyed.

5. The Protestant Electoral Union had been in the habit of selling and distributing copies of the Confessional Unmasked previous to April, 1868, when the decision was given in the case of Reg. v. Hicklin and another (L. Rep. 3, Q. B. 360; see 37 L. J. 89, M. C.)

6. In consequence of that decision the first edition of the work was withdrawn, and a new one published as stated in the following extract from the Introduction, p. iii., to the new edition: "Consequently the society withdraws the condemned edition, and does not intend publishing it. But the publication of a new edition in an altered form, that is, with certain alterations, certain omissions, and certain additions, would not come under the condemnation passed upon the former edition; such an edition, then, is here presented to the public. In this edition are omitted some of the most filthy and abominable passages occurring in the former edition. Also in this edition some passages are added for the sake of illustrating the pernicious influence exercised by the priest in the confessional over the mind and consciences of the laity, even apart from the demoralising and polluting influence exercised by them when employing the obscene language authorised and enforced by the Church. See also page 3 of 'Our Apology.'"

For selling this new edition one George Mackey was tried at the Winchester Quarter Sessions, the 19th Oct. 1870, when the jury, being unable to agree, were discharged without giving any verdict.

8. The appellant kept for sale and distribution and sold and distributed from time to time at the said shop copies of various books and pamphlets, and amongst them the first edition of "The Confessional Unmasked," and after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, the new edition of that book, and after the committal for trial of the said George Mackey, the "Report of the Trial of Mr. George Mackey" was published and sold.

The Confessional Unmasked consists of extracts from Roman Catholic theologians and divines. On one side of the page are printed passages in the original Latin, extracted from the works of authors therein named, and on the other side a free translation of the same, other portions of the pamphlet consist of introductory matter, and of observations by the editor.

9. The report of the trial of Mr. George Mackey, &c., was a substantially correct report of the trial of that person; but The Confessional Unmasked was not read aloud in open court, but was taken as read, as appears from page 105 of the report: and this explains the following paragraph at the bottom of page 2 of the report, "The sale of the Confessional Unmasked having been proved, reads as follows." Then follows the full text of the new edition of the Confessional Unmasked.

10. The retail price of the report of the trial, &c., was 1*s.* It was exposed for sale in the shop window, and was sold to any person who applied for it, sometimes in one of the covers before-mentioned and sometimes in the other.

11. A copy of the report of the trial, &c., which was seized and ordered to be destroyed, and which is annexed hereto, is to form part of the case.

12. It was contended before me on behalf of the appellant, that upon the facts stated, the book seized, viz., the report of the trial, was a fair report of a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction, and as such privileged.

13. I was of opinion that the Report of the Trial of Mr. George Mackey, &c., as sold and published, was not privileged.

14. I was further of opinion that the Report of the Trial, &c., a copy of which is annexed, is an obscene book, and of such a character and description that the publication of it would be a misdemeanor, and proper to be prosecuted as such, and that the copies seized were kept in the said shop for the purpose of sale.

15. I therefore ordered all the copies of such book so seized as aforesaid to be destroyed at the expiration of the time mentioned in the statute.

16. The appellant being dissatisfied with my determination as being erroneous in point of law, duly gave me notice in writing to state and sign a case for the opinion of this honourable court, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

17. The question for the opinion of this court is whether upon the facts above stated, I was wrong in point of law, in ordering the books to be destroyed.

18. If I was wrong in point of law in ordering the books so seized to be destroyed under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, the order made by me is to be quashed, and the books to be restored to the appellant, if otherwise such order is to be confirmed, and the books destroyed in pursuance thereof.

The following were the appellant's points:—First, that the magistrates' decision was wrong in point of law; secondly, that The Report of the Trial of George Mackey was not an obscene book. as shown by its contents, within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83; thirdly, that the said report was not of such a character and description that the publication thereof would be a misdemeanor and proper to be prosecuted as such, and that the copies kept for sale by the appellant were not liable to be seized and ordered to be destroyed under the provisions of the said statute; fourthly, that the report of the trial of George Mackey was a fair report of a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction, and as such report as aforesaid privileged.

The following were the respondent's points:—First, that the magistrate's decision was correct and ought to be confirmed; secondly, that The Report of the Trial of George Mackey was, within the meaning of the 20 & 21 Vict. c 83, an obscene book, and that it was not privileged or protected on any ground from the operation of that Act; thirdly, that it was of such a character and description that the publication of it would be a misdemeanor and proper to be prosecuted as such, and that the copies seized having been kept for sale were liable to be seized and ordered to be destroyed, under the provisions of the said Act; fourthly, that the finding of the magistrate as to the character of the said report is a finding of fact not open to be reviewed; fifthly, that the magistrate having been satisfied as to the character and description of the report, his finding upon that point cannot be questioned.

Kydd for the appellant. [The Attorney-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) for the respondent.—This is not a case for an appeal under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. All the facts are found, and no appeal lies to this court from a finding on a question of fact. The appellant, if dissatisfied with the decision of the magistrate, should have appealed under sect. 4 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, to the Court of Quarter Sessions.] The question whether this book is obscene is a mixed question of law and fact, and the court has jurisdiction to entertain it. Another question arises, whether the appellant, having published this book with innocent motives, the publication can be a misdemeanor; also, whether this book, being a fair report of a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction, is not as such privileged. [BOVILL, C.J.—On the point of obscenity, you must go the whole length of showing that there was no evidence on which the magistrate could have found the book to be obscene. If there was any evidence, we cannot review his decision.] The book which the appellant was prosecuted for publishing, contained a report of a trial, and in the course of the report, the book was set out which the man was tried for publishing. The question arises, whether that book so set out was obscene in point of law. The bonâ fide object of the publisher was not to corrupt, but to carry on a legitimate controversy on a subject of great public importance. He could not carry on this controversy without giving the extracts which the magistrate held to be obscene. The object of the publisher was to expose the revolting practices of Roman Catholic priests in the conduct of the confessional. This could not be done without giving the extracts. Next, in determining whether or not a man has been guilty of a misdemeanor, the question of intention must always be a most material element, and here the intention was innocent. Besides, it is always of importance to notice how matter of an offensive nature is brought forward. "It is not sufficient that mere passages of such an offensive character should exist in a work in order to render the publication of it an act of criminality. It must appear that no condemnation of such passages appears in the context" (per Lord Denman, C.J., in Rex v. Moxon, 2 Mod. State Trials, 356). No one can read this book without seeing that its object is to expose and hold up to reprobation the doctrines contained in the extracts. (He then referred to several standard works, in which numerous passages of an obscene character appeared.) Next, the publication was privileged, as being a fair and correct report of a trial in a court of competent jurisdiction. At the trial, the book was taken as read; that is equivalent to its being actually read. In the report of the trial of Rex v. Eaton (31 State Trials 929), for publishing Paine's Age of Reason, most of the most offensive passages of that book are set out. In Rex v. Carlisle (3 B. & Ald. 167) the real ground of the decision was that the report was a mock report, and, under pretence of being a report of a trial, was, in reality, intended to bring the whole procedure of the court into disrepute and ridicule. In delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Popham v. Pickburn (31 L. J. 133, Ex.), Wilde, B. says, "Undoubtedly, the report of a trial in a court of justice, in which this document had been read would not make the publisher thereof liable to an action for libel." Hoare v. Silverlock (9 C. B. 20) is to the same effect; so is Turner v. Sullivan (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130). [BOVILL, C, J.—Have you any case where the right to publish a report of a trial remains, when it appears that such publication is prejudicial to morality?] No.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) (Archibald and Poland with him) for the respondent.—The appellant has misconceived his remedy, and this court is concluded by the finding of the magistrate. By sects. 1 and 4 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, the appellant ought clearly to have gone to the court of quarter sessions, instead of coming here. Next, the book is almost identical with that dealt with in Reg. v. Hicklin (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 360; 37 L. J. 89, M. C.), which the Court of Queen's Bench unanimously pronounced to be obscene; no one can read this book and say it is not revoltingly obscene. It is not privileged as being a report of a trial. It was not the bonâ fide object to give a report of the trial; but the trial is only made the occasion to reproduce obscenity.

BOVILL, C.J.—This case has been stated under the provisions of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, by which a magistrate had power to state a case for our opinion on questions of law only. The case being before us on that footing, the question for our decision arises under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, which was an Act for preventing the sale of obscene pictures, books, &c. In the present case the magistrate decided that the book which the appellant was convicted of publishing was an obscene book, the publication of which was a misdemeanor; and he further decided that the publication was not privileged as being a fair report of the proceedings in a court of justice. He accordingly ordered all the copies of the book which had been seized to be destroyed, and he now submits to us, as a matter of law, whether, on the facts, he was right in so deciding. On looking over the book in question, I find no inconsiderable portion of it so filthy and disgusting that the book could not be read in public, or in decent society, without shocking the feelings of all who heard it. Passages in the book are so entirely opposed to all delicacy and common decency that counsel could only call attention to the pages where they occurred, and I do not hesitate to express my opinion, that these parts of the book are of such a character as to make the book an obscene book within the meaning of the Act. So far, then, from thinking the magistrate's decision on this point wrong, I think it was perfectly right. If this is a true description of the character of the book, it almost necessarily follows that the publication of it is an offence against morals and a misdemeanor. The book is certainly one which no person of any decency would think of leaving on his table, especially if it was likely to fall into the hands of young people. It has been strongly contended by Mr. Kydd that the whole book has properly been made the subject of controversial discussion, and that the motive of its publication was praiseworthy. No doubt the matters dealt with in the book are matters of interest, and ought to be fully and fairly discussed; but while we preserve the liberty of discussion, we must not allow publishers to run into indecency, so as to corrupt the morals of the public. The tendency of this publication being to corrupt, the appellant must be taken to have had that object in view, even though his object may have been otherwise. This point was fully discussed in Reg. v. Hicklin, where the authorities on the subject were fully considered. There the court of quarter sessions had reversed the decision of the magistrate, on the ground that the immediate intention of the publisher was not to corrupt, but only to expose errors; and it was then assumed by the Court of Queen's Bench that the publisher had a really honest and bonâ fide motive. That court reversed the decision of the recorder on the ground that a man must always be taken to intend the natural consequences of his acts. It is very difficult for Mr. Kydd to contend that the details of this book are not obscene, when the very object of the book is to show that the practices of the Roman Catholic church are of that character. The outer cover of the book refers to the depravity and iniquity of those practices, and professes to unmask them. In the apology, which is a sort of preface to the book, the object of the book is said to be to expose some of the immoral objectionable practices of the clergy, and stigmatises some parts of the book as loathsome. I quote that to show the character of the passages I have referred to. I assume that this edition varies somewhat from that dealt with in Reg. v. Hicklin; but even this book (as stated n the apology) omits only "most of the disgusting offensiveness of Romish morality." I think nevertheless that there is such an abundance of disgusting offensiveness here as to make the book undistinguishable from that dealt with in Reg. v. Hicklin. The test of obscenity is there said by the Lord Chief Justice to be "whether the tendency of the matter charged is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication like this may fall." I think that that is a very good test, and that it is decisive against the appellant in this case. It has been contended for the appellant that the most objectionable passages in this book are only copies and extracts from the works of Roman Catholic divines, used at seminaries for the instruction of Roman Catholic youth. But that does not justify their republication in the present form, nor does it follow that the books themselves are not equally within the purview of the statute. I think that the book is obscene and most disgusting, and that the publication of it is a misdemeanor which might form the subject of an indictment. The appellant must be held responsible for the probable consequences of his unlawful act. He is not protected by the mere fact that the book is controversial, and that its object is to warn the public against the practices of the priests. I fully concur in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Hicklin, and on the facts stated here think that the present case distinctly falls within that decision. A further question that has been raised is, whether the book, containing a fair report of a trial, is thereby privileged. It is found as a fact that the book contains a fair report of the trial of one Mackey, except that The Confessional Unmasked was there taken as read, and was not actually read in court. The magistrates held the publication not privileged, and I entirely concur in that opinion. The publication of fair reports of trials that take place in courts of justice, is, like the fair discussion of all other public matters, considered to be for the benefit of the nation. But it is equally clear that the publication of matter tending to corrupt is not privileged, and may not be lawfully published. It is well put by Mr. Starkey (On Libel, p. 215), "Where the very object of the inquiry is to protect the interests of religion, morality, decency, and good order, by repressing infamous, blasphemous, and obscene or seditious publications, it would not only be impolitic, but weak and absurd to allow the same matters to be afterwards published as a parcel of the judicial proceeding." The same sentiment is uttered by Bailey, J., in his judgment in Reg. v. Carlile: "We are bound," he says, "for the purpose of justice, to hear evidence in the course of judicial proceedings, the publication of which at any distant period of time, or at any time afterwards, may have the effect of an utter subversion of the morals and religion of the people." And again at the end of his judgment, the same judge says of the publisher of a report of such a trial, "It will be no excuse for him, that it was a faithful representation of that which a court of justice, in the discharge of its duty, is bound to hear." There are other passages in the books to the same effect. I entirely concur in the view expressed by Bailey, J. I may here add as a further ground for excluding the privilege in this case, that this book gives in detail parts of the first publication which were not read aloud at the trial. I think that the proper course was pursued at the trial, as reading the book aloud would have been offensive to public decency. The outer cover of the book hardly refers at all to the trial, but almost wholly to the matters which are said to be unmasked in the book, and from that, if there were nothing else, I draw the conclusion that the whole book was not intended as a fair report of the trial, but as a means of reproducing the subject of the first prosecution. I am clearly of opinion that the publication was not privileged and that the decision of the magistrate must be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I will only notice, in passing, the preliminary objection of the Attorney-General, who contends that we have no jurisdiction to deal with the question submitted to us, in other words that 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2 does not apply to 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83. I do not think the Attorney-General much relied on this point, but, as he made it, it is right to notice it. The 2nd section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 provides that after the hearing and determination of any case before justices, any case which they have power to deal with in a summary way, either party being dissatisfied with the decision in point of law, may ask the justices to state a case, and the magistrate may thereupon state a case, for the opinion of the court. In pursuance of that section, the magistrate stated the case now before us. From that case it appears that he decided a book which had been published by the appellant to be an obscene book, within the meaning of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, s. 1, and of such a character that the publication of it was a misdemeanor, and that it was proper to be prosecuted as such. He now refers to us the question, whether he was right in this decision in point of law, by which I understand him to mean to ask us, whether he was right in saying that the book was so obscene, and of such character that the publication of it was a misdemeanor and a fit subject for a prosecution, and further, whether he was right in deciding that the publication was not privileged. I do not think we need have any difficulty in holding that, though it is quite true that the 4th section of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83 gives an appeal, both as to law and fact, to the court of quarter sessions, it is notwithstanding competent to a party convicted under this Act to appeal upon any question of law under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; nor do I think that the provision of the 4th section of Lord Campbell's Act was intended to supersede the provisions of the general Act as to an appeal against a decision in point of law. With reference to this case as stated, I quite agree with my Lord. The Confessional Unmasked purports to be a selection from works of Roman Catholic divines, and contains, amongst other things, directions to the priests with regard to the confessional. Those extracts undoubtedly, if correctly reported, contain obscene matter to an extent at which any proper mind revolts. Mr. Kydd has contended that the appellant has a right to discuss those questions as matters of public interest, and I quite agree that they are of public interest, and that a man has a right to discuss them as such. Mr. Kydd has next contended, that it is impossible to discuss these matters without giving extracts, and setting out those extracts. He therefore contends that, if the object of his client was not to pollute the public mind, but only to conduct a public controversy, the publication could not be a misdemeanor at common law. It may be the fact, and I see no reason to doubt it, that the object of the appellant was, as stated by Mr. Kydd, effectively to assail the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. But I quite agree with my Lord, that to accomplish that end, a controversialist cannot set forth matter that has a direct tendency to corrupt. I quite agree, too, that these filthy extracts have that tendency. To adopt Mr. Kydd's argument would be to allow evil that good may follow, and it would be a strange way of preventing pollution to allow the circulation of that which has a tendency to pollute. Though, therefore, it is a fact, as Mr. Kydd states, that many books are not prosecuted which contain matter equally worthy of reprobation (such as the book which he has especially referred to—The Garden of the Soul, which contains passages of a character cognate to the extracts in the Confessional Unmasked, and open to the same objection), I think it sufficient to say with my Lord, that it does not follow, that because the appellant has been guilty of a misdemeanor, the publisher of The Garden of the Soul is guilty. On that point, however, I express no opinion, as that book is not before us judicially. I think it sufficient to say, that no argument, founded on the impunity hitherto allowed to the publisher of "The Garden of the Soul," can avail to justify the appellant. Upon the second point I would refer to the passage from Starkey, cited by the Lord Chief Justice. It would be a self-contradiction in law to say that a man may be indicted for publishing an indecent work, and at the same time to sanction the re-publication of the same work under colour of being part of a report of the proceedings in a court of justice. The publication of reports of important cases in courts of law is for the protection of the public; but the law would defeat itself if it allowed in the course of such a report the republication of what it had decided to be an indictable offence to publish. Therefore, I agree with the Lord Chief Justice, and I may add that, if I was of a different opinion, I should, with reference to this book—The Confessional Unmasked—defer to a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction which has decided the publication of it to be an indictable offence at common law.

GROVE, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. As to the questions submitted to us, they clearly arise on the facts stated in the case. After stating the facts, the magistrate says, "I was of opinion that the report of the trial of George Mackey, as sold and published, was not privileged." Whether it was so or not, is, I apprehend, a question of law which the magistrate has left to us. The magistrate continues: "I was further of opinion that the report of the trial, &c., is an obscene book, and of such a character and description that the publication of it would be a misdemeanor," &c. As to this latter point, which was dealt with first in the argument, I think Reg. v. Hicklin is a clear authority, and that, unless there is something very different in the present publication to that dealt with in that case, we ought to adopt it. I can see no reason why we should not follow it. I will make only one remark on Reg v. Hicklin, and that has reference to the last part of the marginal note in the Law Reports, that the appellant there "was not justified or excused by his innocent motives or object." That is almost the identical language of the Lord Chief Justice. It is a matter of almost every day occurrence that a man is indicted for doing a particular act with a certain intent, and the jury are in such cases told to infer the intent from the act. They are not, however, conclusively bound to find the intent. When we look at the whole of this question, it comes to this, when an act is done under circumstances which fairly imply a particular intent, the presumption of such an intent is not rebutted by showing that the man who did the act had another paramount intent. A man who is indicted for assaulting with intent to do grievous bodily harm, is not excused by showing that he intended to save the person assaulted from injury to his mind. That is the meaning of the passage I have alluded to, and I do not see that it at all conflicts with the law. In the present case, I see no reason why we should not infer from this publication the intent to do that which the publication has the strongest tendency to do, viz., to promote immorality. The matters contained in the book are so filthy, that they could not possibly be quoted, and no language can be strong enough in which to condemn them. Next it is said that this publication is a report of a trial, and that it is substantially correct. If a person were permitted to publish the report of a trial, in which the question was whether certain matter was obscene or not, and was allowed in such report to republish the whole of the filthy matter, we should have this result, that when any person was brought before a court of justice for publishing obscene matter, any other person might at once publish the whole of the obscenity with impunity. If that were the law, so far from putting a stop to these filthy publications, we should virtually license them by prosecuting the publisher. It seems to me to be a reductio ad absurdum that that is not the law. Reg. v. Carlile is an authority to show that that is not the law, and there is no authority the other way. Next Mr. Kydd asks, what is the remedy? How can you expose these obscene and demoralising practices except by thus giving extracts from the works in which they are set forth? It appears to me that this is not the only course to be pursued, though I am far from saying that if this were the only remedy, the publication of such a book as this would be justified. But if these Roman Catholic books contain matter of such obscenity, why not prosecute the publishers? If such books are, as was obscurely hinted by the Attorney-General, privileged, that would be set up at the trial. On that point I express no opinion. I merely mention it as a course which persons anxious to promote morality are at liberty to take. If such books came fairly within the grasp of the law, the publishers would be punished; if the publication were held privileged, we should understand the reason why.

REG. v. REA.

Bigamy—Marriage before registrar—Misnomer.

In 1866, the prisoner married, and in 1872, whilst his wife was living, he married another woman in the presence of the registrar of marriages, describing himself, not as Edward Rea, his true name, but as Benjamin Rea. It did not appear whether or not the second wife at the time of the marriage knew that prisoner's name was misdescribed:

Held, that the prisoner was guilty of bigamy.

Quære, whether he would have been guilty of bigamy if both parties had known of the misnomer.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Byles, J.

The prisoner was indicted at Shrewsbury Assizes for bigamy.

He was married in 1866 by the name of Edward Rea to his first wife now living, who refused to cohabit with him, and told him he might go and marry any other woman.

In 1872 he accordingly married another woman, in the presence of the registrar, describing himself, not as Edward Rea, his true name, but as Benjamin Rea.

There was no evidence to show whether the second wife, at the time of her marriage, knew, or did not know, that his Christian name was misdescribed.

He was convicted of bigamy, subject to the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal, whether on these facts the felony was proved.

April 27.—No counsel appeared to argue on either side. The court took time to consider its judgment.

May 4.—KELLY, C.B. now delivered the judgment of the court.—This case must be decided upon the same principle as applies to the case of a marriage by banns, because the language of the statute for marriages by a registrar (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, ss. 4 and 42), follows the provisions as to banns and ought to receive the same construction. As to banns it is clear that to render a marriage invalid it must be contracted with a knowledge by both parties that no due publication of banns has taken place: (Rex v. The Inhabitants of Wroxton, 4 B. & Ad. 640; Tongue v. Tongue, 1 Moore P. C, 90.) In this case the man only appears to have known of the misnomer, and the presumption in favour of marriage and against fraud clearly threw the burden of proof of invalidity upon the party alleging it. This was assumed in Tongue v. Tongue, otherwise the statement of Baron Parke's dissent would have been superfluous. Therefore without saying that if both parties knew of the misnomer, there would have been no offence of bigamy against the statute, the conviction ought to be affirmed. Conviction affirmed.

whose affairs were liquidated by arrange- ment, was indicted under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11, for that he knowing that false debts had been proved under the liquidation, failed for the period of a month to inform B., the trustee, thereof.

The evidence was that the debtor, on the 23*rd Sept.* 1870, filed his petition in the County Court, alleging that he was unable to pay his debts, and that he was desirous of instituting proceedings for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition with his creditors; that on the 10*th Oct. the first meeting under the petition was held, and three false debts proved with his connivance. At the first meeting of the creditors, it was resolved that a composition of* 8*s. in the pound, payable by instalments, and to be secured, should be accepted, and B. was appointed trustee in the matter. On the* 12*th Oct. the registrar of the County Court certified that B. was appointed trustee, and was declared to be trustee under the liquidation by arrangement. At the second meeting of creditors on* 19*th Oct., it was resolved that the debtors' affairs should be liquidated by arrangement, and not in bankruptcy; that the remuneration of the trustee* (B.) be left to a subsequent meeting, and that the trustee should pay the moneys received by him into the H. bank:

Held, that upon the evidence, B. was proved to be the trustee under the liquidation by arrangement, notwithstanding that at the first meeting, when he was originally appointed, it was resolved to accept a composition of 8*s., and nothing was then resolved as to a liquidation by arrangement.*

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Mr. Justice Quain.

Samuel Beaumont was convicted of a misdemeanour at the Spring Assizes for the West Riding of the county of York, holden at Leeds on the 21st March 1872.

The prisoner was indicted under the Debtors' Act 1869, sect. 11, sub-sect. 7, for that he, knowing that "certain false debts had been proved by certain persons under his liquidation, failed, for the period of a month, to inform his trustee thereof" contrary to the statute.

On the 23rd Sept. 1870 the prisoner presented a petition to the County Court of Yorkshire holden at Bradford, under sccts. 125 and 126 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, and in the form No. 106 appended to the general rules in bankruptcy stating his desire to institute proceedings for the liquidation of his affairs by "arrangement or composition" with his creditors.

The first meeting under the said petition was held on the 10th Oct. 1870. The petitioner was present at the meeting. At this meeting divers debts were proved in the usual way by affidavit, and amongst other debts three persons formerly workmen in the employment of the prisoner proved debts to the amount of 10*l.*, 9*l.* 12*s.*, and 8*l.* 10*s.* respectively for wages alleged to be due to them from the prisoner. It was proved before me that these proofs had been obtained by the prisoner from the workmen who were induced by the prisoner to make them, the prisoner and the deponents well knowing that the amounts of the debts sworn to in these proofs were considerably beyond what was due to the deponents respectively.

In one case only 5*s.* 8*d.* was due to the deponent instead of 9*l.* 12*s.* the sum sworn to in his affidavit.

It was further proved that the prisoner furnished each of the three workmen with fictitious particulars of the claims and directed them to copy those particulars and send them in to the trustee when demanded, and this direction was obeyed by the three deponents respectively.

The prisoner's attorney was appointed proxy by each of the deponents to vote for each of them at all meetings of creditors.

At the first meeting of creditors the following resolutions were passed by the statutory majority:

1. That a composition of 8s. in the pound shall be accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to the creditors from the said Samuel Beaumont.

2. That such composition be payable as follows, by three equal instalments, at four, eight, and twelve months from this date.

3. That the said composition be secured to the satisfaction of Messrs. Isaac Faulkner Oates and Ephraim Gibson.

4. That Charles Joseph Buckley be appointed trustee in the matter.

5. That the second general meeting of creditors be held at the Royal Hotel, in Cleckheaton.

On the 12th Oct. 1870 the registrar of the said County Court certified that the said Charles Joseph Buckley had been appointed trustee, and he was thereby declared to be trustee "under this liquidation by arrangement." The certificate was in the form number 121, appended to the General Rules in Bankruptcy.

The prisoner's attorney, as proxy for the above three creditors, voted for these resolutions, and these creditors were reckoned in the majority in value.

The second meeting of creditors was held on the 19th Oct. 1870.

The petitioner was present at this meeting, and the following resolutions were passed unanimously:—

1. We, the undersigned, being the statutory majority of creditors assembled at the second meeting in the above matter, duly held at the Royal Hotel, in Cleckheaton aforesaid, this 19th Oct. 1870, in accordance with the provisions of the said Act, do hereby resolve that the affairs of the said Samuel Beaumont be liquidated by arrangement and not in bankruptcy.

2. That Messrs. William Stead, Ephraim Gibson, and John Rhodes Cordingley be appointed a committee of inspection.

3. That the remuneration of the trustee (Mr. Charles Joseph Buckley) be left to a subsequent general meeting.

4. That the trustee (Mr. Charles Joseph Buckley), shall pay all sums of money on account of the estate from time to time received by him into the Huddersfield Banking Company's branch bank at Cleckheaton.

No debts were proved at the second meeting, but the creditors voted at the second meeting in respect of the debts proved at the first meeting, which proofs were on the file of the court.

The prisoner's attorney voted as proxy for the above three creditors at the second meeting in the same way as he did at the first.

There was no fresh express appointment of a trustee at the second meeting beyond what is contained in the above last-mentioned resolution, nor was there any fresh certificate of the registrar given after the second meeting in respect of the appointment of trustee.

The proceedings of a second meeting professed to be regulated by rules 282 and 283 of the General Rules in Bankruptcy.

After the second meeting the trustee, Charles Joseph Buckley, proceeded to act as trustee under the liquidation; he collected the assets, and he had paid at the time of the trial a dividend of 4s. in the pound. He treated the debts alleged to be due to the three above-mentioned creditors for wages as preferential debts, and paid them in full by cheque.

The said creditors immediately handed over the cheques to the prisoner, who got them cashed, and then paid over to the three creditors the sums really due to them, and appropriated the rest of the money to his own use.

On these facts it was contended for the prisoner that he could not be convicted of an offence under the Debtors Act 1869, sect. 11, sub-sect. 7, inasmuch as the liquidation by composition having been changed by the resolutions passed at the second meeting into a liquidation by arrangement, no debts had been legally proved under the liquidation by arrangement, nor had any trustee been legally appointed under that liquidation; that the trustee appointed on the 10th Oct. was appointed the trustee under the liquidation by composition only in pursuance of Rule 279, and that the powers and functions of such a trustee are entirely different from those of a trustee duly appointed under a liquidation by arrangement, according to the provisions of sect. 125, sub-sects. 1, 5, and 7, of the Bankrupt Act 1869.

On the other hand it was contended by the counsel for the prosecution that the liquidation, though changed at the second meeting from a liquidation by composition into a liquidation by arrangement, in pursuance of Rule 283, continued to be in effect the same liquidation, and that the creditors who voted at the second meeting were entitled to vote in respect of their debts proved at the first meeting, and were not under the necessity of proving those debts a second time, and that the trustee appointed at the first meeting became the trustee under the resolutions passed at the second meeting, and was impliedly, if not expressly, recognised as such trustee under those resolutions, and that the petitioner having been present at the said meeting, and having used by his attorney the proofs of debts made at the first meeting could not object that the proceedings at the second meeting were irregular in that respect.

The jury convicted the prisoner of knowing that the above three false debts had been proved under the liquidation, and that he failed for the period of a month to inform the trustee thereof.

I reserved for the opinion of this Court the question whether, on the above facts, the prisoner could be convicted of the offence charged against him.

Copies of the petition of the proceedings at both meetings of creditors, and of the certificate of the registrar of the appointment of the trustee as entered on the file of the court as below, were annexed to the case.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT 1869.—In the County Court of Yorkshire holden at Bradford.—The humble petition of Samuel Beaumont, of Cleckheaton, in the county of York, machine maker.

Showeth,—That your petitioner alleges that he is unable to pay his debts, and is desirous of instituting proceedings for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition with his creditors, and hereby submits to the jurisdiction of this court in the manner of such proceedings, and that your petitioner estimates the amount of the debts owing by him to his creditors at 2500*l.*

That your petitioner does not reside or carry on business within the district of the London Bankruptcy Court.

Your petitioner therefore prays that notice convening such general meeting, or meetings of his creditors, as may be necessary to be given by him during the course of such proceedings, may be sent in the prescribed manner, and that such resolution or resolutions as his creditors may lawfully pass in the course of such proceedings, and as may require registration, may be duly registered by the registrar of the court. And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

Waddy (Wilberforce with him) for the prisoner. —The offence charged was created by the Debtors' Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11): "Any person adjudged bankrupt, and any person whose affairs are liquidated by arrangement in pursuance of the Bankruptcy Act 1869, shall in each of the cases following be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor;" and then sub-sect 7: "If knowing or beliving that a false debt has been proved by any person under the bankruptcy or liquidation, he fail for the period of a month to inform such trustee as aforesaid thereof." Then the mode of appointing the trustee in cases of liquidation by arrangement is regulated by sect. 125 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71 (the Bankruptcy Act). Two points arise, first, no false debts were proved in such a way that it was incumbent on the defendant to give the trustee notice thereof; and secondly, there was no trustee properly appointed that it was his duty to acquaint of such false debts. The Bankruptcy Act contemplates two modes of proceeding for winding-up the estate, first, by composition; secondly, by liquidation by arrangement. Rule 279 is: "where the creditors at the first general meeting duly pass a resolution that a composition shall be accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to them from the debtor, they shall specify in their resolution the amount of the composition and the instalments and dates at which the same shall be payable, and they may name some person as trustee for receipt and distribution of the composition, and any negotiable securities which may be given for the same." That is the only rule in which the trustee is mentioned. Then how stands the matter? On the 10th Oct. the first meeting was held, and debts proved, and a resolution passed to accept a composition of 8*s.* in the pound, and that Buckley be appointed trustee in the matter. On the 12th Buckley was certified by the court as the trustee, and on the 19th, at a meeting of creditors, it was resolved to liquidate the defendant's affairs by arrangement, and not in bankruptcy. The proceedings of the meeting on the 10th were rendered a nullity by those of the meeting on the 19th, the composition being changed into a liquidation by arrangement. The certificate of the registrar of the County Court was obtained on a misrepresentation of the nature of the meeting on the 10th Oct. [CLEASBY, B.—Sect. 125, sub-sect. 6, and sect. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, make the certificate conclusive evidence of the appointment of the trustee.] But in this case there was no resolution then existing to liquidate by arrangement. (WILLES, J.—Buckley was appointed "trustee in the matter," whatever turn it might take—that is, although it might be turned from what it then was, a composition, into a liquidation by arrangement. QUAIN, J.—It was so changed because the creditors were not satisfied with the security for the composition.] The certificate could not be retrospective; and as there was no liquidation by arrangement before the 19th there could be no trustee under it before then. The certificate on the 12th does not therefore avail. The false debts being proved at a meeting which became null, and no trustee being properly appointed for the liquidation by arrangement, the charge in the indictment was not legally established, and the conviction cannot be sustained.

T. Campbell Foster for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

KELLY, C.B.—We are all of opinion that the conviction must be affirmed. I do not say, speaking for myself, that my mind is free from difficulty as to whether some proceeding which ought to have taken place may not have done so, and not been recorded. The charge against the defendant was that he, knowing that false debts had been proved, did not give the trustee notice thereof, and the facts were that certain debts were proved under a proceeding which, if not at the particular time such, became subsequently a liquidation by arrangement, and the defendant knew that such debts were false ones, and failed to inform Buckley, the trustee, thereof, and upon proof of those facts the offence was complete. For the defendant it was argued that, looking at the date of the proof of the debts and appointment of trustee, there was then no resolution by the creditors to liquidate the petitioning debtor's affairs by arrangement, but only to accept a composition, to be paid in a certain time, and that the trustee being appointed before it was resolved to liquidate by arrangement, there was, legally, no trustee at all. We must, however, look at the proceedings in their order; first, the defendant presented a petition to the County Court, wherein he alleged that he was unable to pay his debts, and was desirous of instituting proceedings for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition, and thereby submitted to the jurisdiction of the court in the matter of such proceedings. That was, in substance, a petition for the liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition. Then a meeting of his creditors was held on the 10th Oct., when a resolution was passed "that Charles Joseph Buckley be appointed trustee in the matter," which I read as in the matter of the petition of the defendant for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition. Then again, on the 19th Oct., in the very matter of this petition, a creditors' meeting was held, and by the requisite majority it was resolved that the affairs of the defendant be liquidated by arrangement and not in bankruptcy, and that the remuneration of the trustee (Mr. C. J. Buckley) be left to a subsequent general meeting, and that the trustee (Mr. C. J. Buckley) shall pay all sums of money on account of the estate, from time to time received by him into the Huddersfield Banking Company's Branch Bank at Cleckheaton. That was a clear recognition and treating of Buckley as trustee by the creditors, and a continuation and confirmation of his appointment both prospectively (and retrospectively, as I think), Buckley then being appointed by resolution of the creditors, trustee in the liquidation of the defendants by arrangement. We have next the certificate of the registrar of his appointment in the form provided by the statute, which is clear proof that Buckley was duly appointed trustee in the liquidation founded on the petition before the County Court. It was next said that the date of the certificate was 12th Oct., a week before 19th Oct., when the meeting of creditors was held, at which it was resolved to liquidate by arrangement. If those dates are to be taken as conclusive, there might be a difficulty, but not an insuperable one, because we have only to say in answer that the resolutions at the meeting on the 19th have a retrospective operation. It is, however, unnecessary to consider that question, because the three requisites were proved to complete the case. First, there is the petition praying for a liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition; secondly, there was a meeting of creditors under that petition, at which Buckley was appointed trustee; thirdly, there was another meeting at which it was resolved to liquidate his affairs by arrangement, and finally there was the certificate of the trustees' appointment, and the matter of the special resolution for liquidation by arrangement of the affairs of the defendant of the appointment of Buckley as trustee. Sect. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act makes that certificate conclusive evidence of the appointment of the trustee; and we cannot, therefore, look at the dates. Without referring to the dates the proceedings are such as to establish a liquidation by arrangement, and the appointment of the trustee. The conviction, therefore, must be affirmed.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

Re THE MEYRICKE FUND.

Endowed Schools Commissioners—Endowment—University—Jurisdiction—Discovery—District—Endowed Schools Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56), Charitable Trusts Acts 1853 and 1855 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 124).

The Endowed Schools Commissioners have jurisdiction under the Endowed Schools Act 1869 to compel a college in an university to make discovery of matters relating to an endowment of which the managing body of the college are trustees for exhibitioners to be selected from a particular district, and whose exhibitions are tenable at the university, although they are not connected with any particular school.

Wales is a "district" within the Endowed Schools Act 1869.

THIS was an appeal motion from a decision of Wickens, V.C.

By his will, dated the 25th March 1712, the Rev. Edmund Meyricke, after reciting, amongst other things, that he had always intended to bestow a good part of what God should please to bless him withal for the encouragement of learning in Jesus College, in Oxford, and for the better maintenance of six of the junior scholars who were or should be scholars of the foundation of the said college, out of the six counties of North Wales, gave, devised, and bequeathed all his real and personal estates (except as therein mentioned) unto and for these several uses and purposes; that was to say, unto every one of the said six scholars particularly and severally the annual sum of 10*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain during his residence in the said college; and for the maintenance and settlement of six exhibitioners in the said college, natives of the six counties of North Wales, or of any or either of the said six counties, and of his kindred, if such, of that number of exhibitioners, else such exhibitioners to be others of the said six counties to make up the number of six, he gave to each and every of the said six exhibitioners the annual sum of 8*l.* of lawful money of Great Britain during his residence in the said college; the said 10*l.* per annum to each and every of the said scholars, and the said 8*l.* per annum to each and every of the said exhibitioners as aforesaid, to be paid unto them severally and respectively, yearly, and every year during their respective residence in the said college as aforesaid out of the yearly rents, issues, and profits of his said estate; and the remainder of the yearly rents, issues, and profits of such part of his estate (other than as therein mentioned) he gave, devised, and bequeathed to and for these further uses and purposes, that was to say, for the buying of advowsons of rectories, impropriations, or vicarages, to which the principal for the time being, and the fellows of the said college, should or might, as patrons thereof, present fit persons thereto out of the said number of the said six scholars, or if it happened that there were none of such scholars capable to be presented thereto, then any of the said six exhibitioners that should be capable to be presented thereto should be so presented thereto; such scholars and such exhibitioners to be so presented to such advowsons of such rectories, impropriations, or vicarages, as there should be any vacancy or vacancies of such livings or benefices; or if it happened that there were none of such scholars or of such exhibitioners capable to be so presented thereto, then one of the North Wales Fellows of the said college was to be presented instead of such of the said scholars, or of such of the said exhibitioners as should not be capable to be presented as aforesaid, to such vacancy as might be of such of the said rectories, impropriations, or vicarages. And his will and further meaning and intent was, as to the said exhibitioners, that they and each and every of them, should be well and duly paid yearly the said sum of 8*l.* per annum as aforesaid, until they did or should take their several and respective degrees of Masters of Art, or until they, or any or either of them, should have received and enjoyed a care of souls really worth 40*l.* per annum. And he thereby gave, devised, and bequeathed such part of his said estate so given, devised and bequeathed, for and to the said six scholars and the said six exhibitioners, and for the buying of such advowsons of rectories, impropriations, or vicarages as aforesaid, and for the uses and purposes aforesaid, and the yearly rents, issues, and profits thereof yearly and every year for ever, for and to the same uses and purposes for ever, and to and for no other use intent or purpose whatever. The testator then nominated and appointed four trustees of his will to order and manage his said estate, and provided that from and after the deceases of the said four trustees thereinbefore named, then for the future and for ever the trustees of his said estate so given, devised, and bequeathed as aforesaid, to and for the said six scholars and the said six exhibitioners, and for the buying of such advowsons as aforesaid, for the uses and purposes as aforesaid, and all and every the matters and things relating to the same as aforesaid, should be the principal of the said Jesus College for the time being for ever, and two of the senior fellows of the said college for the time being for ever. And they were by him thereby constituted, authorised, empowered, and appointed to be such trustees for the said uses and purposes relating to the said college as aforesaid; and to act and do in and touching the same, and in and concerning such part of his said estate so given, devised, and bequeathed for and towards the said six scholars and the said six exhibitioners, and the buying of such advowsons as aforesaid, for the uses and purposes aforesaid, and the management of such part of his estate, as appropriated to and for those uses and purposes as aforesaid, from time to time and at all times, as occasion should be, as they should think fit or judge necessary, yearly, and in every year for ever, that the same might be truly and duly done as aforesaid, yearly, and in every year for ever, according to his true intent and well meaning therein expressed, for the said several uses and purposes as aforesaid.

The testator executed a codicil dated the 14th May 1712, whereby he devised a piece of land at Bala, in Merionethshire, for the use and benefit of a school, and made certain provisions out of the rents of his estates in Merionethshire "above the sum of 108*l.* per annum given by his last will to six scholars and six exhibitioners in Jesus College, in Oxford," and otherwise, for the maintenance of a schoolmaster, and thirty scholars at Bala.

The testator died in 1713.

The property devoted to the Meyricke scholarships and exhibitions had very much increased in value since the testator's death, and had been the subject of several decrees and orders of this court. Under or by virtue of these decrees and orders the six scholars now received 40*l.* each annually instead of 8*l.*, and the exhibitions were increased in number to 24, and in value to 35*l.* annually.

On the 3rd April 1857, the Commissioners under the Oxford University Government and Extension Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 81), framed an ordinance with reference (amongst other things) to the exhibitioners on the Meyricke Foundation, by the 36th clause of which ordinance it was provided that "the emoluments of the twenty-four exhibitions of the foundation of Edmund Meyricke, clerk, of the three exhibitions of the foundation of Mr. Bloom, and of the two exhibitions of the foundation of Mr. Rice Powell, should be consolidated as the same respectively became vacant, and applied in maintaining as many exhibitions of the value of 40*l.* per annum respectively, as the amount of the said consolidated emoluments for the time being would allow; that the exhibitions should respectively be filled up by the election of deserving persons, being natives of Wales or Monmouthshire, whom the principal and fellows should have ascertained to be in need of support at the university; provided that no person should be elected whose merit and fitness to be an exhibitioner should not have been previously tested by an examination; that no person should be entitled to preference, or ineligible in elections to any of the said exhibitions by reason of his place of birth, otherwise than by reason of his being a native of Wales or Monmouthshire as aforesaid; that no person should be eligible to any of the said exhibitions who should be a scholar of the college, and every exhibitioner who should be elected to a scholarship within the college, should thereupon vacate his exhibition; and that each of the said exhibitions should be tenable until the holder thereof should have completed his twentieth term inclusive from the date of his matriculation, and no longer." And by the 37th clause of the ordinance it was provided that "notice of every intended election to any of the exhibitions should be given by the principal in such manner as he should deem best adapted to insure publicity, thirty days at least before the day of election."

In 1860 a suit of The Attorney-General v. Jesus College, Oxford, was instituted in which a decree was pronounced in 1861, by which it was declared that the school at Bala was entitled to a proportionate part of the improved surplus rents of the testator's Merionethshire estates.

In 1870 a scheme was approved by the Master of the Rolls, by which the ordinance of the 3rd April 1857, was carried out, and the annual sum of 840*l.* was appropriated to the purposes of the 36th clause of that ordinance.

In 1871 the Endowed Schools Commissioners called upon the principal of Jesus College to answer certain inquiries with respect to the Meyricke Foundation. In the course of a long correspondence which ensued, the commissioners stated that they desired to investigate the matters relating to the Meyricke property, quite irrespective of any connection between it and the school at Bala. Eventually the authorities of the college declined to furnish the information required by the commissioners.

Thereupon the commissioners moved before Wickens, V.C., in the matter of "The Meyricke Fund," and also in the matter of the Endowed Schools Act 1869, the Charitable Trusts Act 1853, and the Charitable Trusts Act Amendment Act 1855, for an order of committal against the bursar of Jesus College, Oxford (who was the actual custodian of the documents relating to the Meyricke Fund), for contempt of court, and for a writ of sequestration against the property of the college for a like contempt in that they had refused to furnish the commissioners with the information required by them.

This was merely a formal motion, the real object of the motion being to determine the jurisdiction of the commissioners over the Meyricke Fund.

The inquiries made by the commissioners (a list of which was appended to the notice of motion) were as follows:

(a) An account of the property belonging to the said endowment; (b), an account of the receipts and expenditure for the four years ending the 31st Dec. 1870; (c), a list of the persons holding exhibitions under the foundation; (d), a list of the trustees in whom any portion of the endowment is legally vested; (e) a list of the managing trustees, if different from those who hold the property; (f), a statement of the schemes, statutes, or ordinances which now govern the endowment.

The motion also asked that the principal, fellows, and scholars might be ordered to pay the costs of the motion, or that such other order might be made as should be proper.

The motion was entitled in the above-mentioned Acts for the following reasons: By the 11th section of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 137), all officers having the custody of documents relating to any charity are bound to furnish copies and extracts, if required by the Board of Commissioners under that statute; and by the 14th section of the Act, if any person from whom the board is authorised to require information refuses to render accounts, statements, or answers to the board when requested so to do, or to attend before them, if desired, he is liable to summary committal for contempt of this court. By the Charitable Trusts Act Amendment Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 124), sects. 6, 7, 8, and 9, the powers of the Board of Commissioners to inquire into charities, and to require persons to attend and be examined before them, and to obtain orders for committal against persons refusing to give information, were considerably enlarged. And by the 49th section of the Endowed Schools Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 56) it is provided that sect. 11 of Charitable Trusts Act 1853, and sects. 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the Charitable Trusts Act 1855, shall extend to the commissioners and assistant commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act.

The motion came before Wickens, V.C., on the 11th Jan. last.

In delivering his judgment, the Vice-Chancellor said.—It has been argued, in this case, on behalf of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, that they have the power of framing a scheme with regard to this fund, and that in that case they are entitled to the discovery which they seek. It was further argued, that even if they have not the power to frame a scheme which shall be operative, without the assent of the college, they are still entitled to the discovery which will enable them to frame a draft scheme for the purpose of seeing whether the college will consent to it or not. In the view which I take of this case, it is not necessary for me to decide the second point. It is also unnecessary for me to decide whether this fund is or is not part of the foundation of Jesus College, a question which seems to me to admit of considerable doubt. I prefer to decide the case on broader grounds. Mr Morgan may or may not be justified in saying that if this fund is within the Endowed Schools Act, it is so by inadvertence, and not intentionally. If the words of the Act clearly bring the fund within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, I must give effect to those words; but I may suggest that nothing could be more conformable to the apparent intention of the Act, than that in a case where, for example's sake, an endowed school exists in a particular parish, and exhibitions are founded for the use of the parishioners not connected with the school, the commissioners should have power to deal with both together. Many more instances might be given; but if Mr Morgan is right in his argument, the commissioners would, in such a case, be excluded. I think, however, that if the words of the 5th and 14th sections receive their natural construction, they bring this endowment within the jurisdiction of the commissioners. It seems to me unfair to restrict the general expressions of the 5th section by the latter part of it; especially considering the words "otherwise howsoever," and that there are no other words in the latter clause which refer to exhibitions tenable at an university. But exhibitions tenable at an university are expressly mentioned both in the 5th section and also in the 14th section which limits in some way the operation of the empowering sections. Then it is said, Wales is not a "district", because it is coextensive with the old principality of Wales, and that to adopt the commissioners' view would be to treat the old principality as a "district of England." But surely Wales is a district in ordinary parlance just as the counties of Durham, or York, or Middlesex, would be districts: though the Act of Parliament probably contemplated in the first instance, much smaller areas, both here and in the 11th section. It was also said, that the commissioners might possibly make a scheme, which would not be a proper scheme, having regard to the nature and origin of this fund. If so, there is a remedy. Therefore I decide that the commissioners have the jurisdiction that they claim, and are entitled to the discovery they seek, and with costs.

From this decision the Principal and Fellows of Jesus College appealed.

Osborne Morgan, Q.C. and Grenside (with them Dickenson, Q.C.) in support of the appeal.—We contend that this Meyricke Fund is not an educational endowment within the Endowed Schools Act at all. The object of that Act was to remedy the abuses which were very prevalent with regard to school endowments. But we contend that the Act is strictly confined to purely scholastic endowments. This is evident from the 9th section of the Act, which empowers the commissioners to frame schemes in such manner as to render any educational endowment most conducive to the advancement of the education of boys and girls or either of them. There being no girls at the universities, it is clear that the Act contemplated endowments in connection with schools only, and not pure University endowments. It is true that the 5th section of the Act defines the term "educational endowment" as meaning, amongst other things, an endowment applicable for the purposes of "exhibitions tenable at a school, or an university, or elsewhere," but the latter part of the section restricts exhibitions tenable at an university, to such as are tenable by scholars belonging to a particular school or persons connected with a particular school. After defining the term "educational endowment" to mean "an endowment or any part of an endowment which, or the income whereof, has been made applicable or is applied for the purposes of education at school of boys and girls or either of them, or of exhibitions tenable at a school, or an university or elsewhere," the section proceeds: "wherever the same has been made so applicable by the original instrument of foundation or by any subsequent Act of Parliament, letters patent, decree, scheme, order, instrument or other authority, and wherever it has been made applicable or is applied in the shape of payment to the governing body of any school or any member thereof, or to any teacher or officer of any school, or to any person bound to teach, or to scholars in any school, or their parents, or of buildings, houses or school apparatus for any school, or otherwise howsoever." We submit that this section clearly restricts the operation of the Act to scholastic endowments. The Meyricke Fund possesses none of the characteristics defined in the latter part of the 5th section, and we submit, therefore, that it is not within the section or the Act at all. The words at the end of the section, "or otherwise howsoever" cannot be held to take in this fund, for those words can only apply to matters ejusdem generis. That is quite settled. In Sandiman v. Breach (7 B & C. 96) which turned upon the construction of the 29 Car. 2, c. 7, by the 1st. section of which it is enacted "that no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person or persons, shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of their ordinary callings upon the Lord's day," in defence to an action to recover the expense of hiring a post-chaise to convey the plaintiff, the defendant, who contracted to take him in his stage-coach, having neglected to do so, it was contended that the contract was illegal, and it was sought to bring a stage-coach driver within the words "or other person whatsoever," Lord Tenterden says: "It was contended, that under the words 'other person or persons' the drivers of stage-coaches are included. But where general words follow particular ones, the rule is to construe them as applicable to persons ejusdem generis". The commissioners may possibly have jurisdiction to require information and make alterations with reference to the school at Bala. But if they are held to have jurisdiction over this fund, where is their jurisdiction to stop? The Act may as well be held to extend to the Eldon, Vinerian, Craven, and such like scholarships. Indeed, the professorships and fellowships, and the universities themselves, will be in danger if the Vice Chancellor's decision be upheld. The Legislature clearly did not intend anything of the kind, and if endowments like the Meyricke Fund are within the Act at all, we submit that it is by mere inadvertence that they have been made subject to its operation, and not intentionally. The recital in the will shows that the testator's object was the "encouragement of learning in Jesus College." He wished to benefit by this endowment, not any school or schools, but Jesus College, which was his own college. To effect this purpose he vested his property in the principal and fellows of the college, so that the property in fact became part of the foundation of the college. If this is so, it is clear that this fund is not within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, from which it is carefully exempted by the provisions of the Act. The 14th sect. of the Act (subsect.4) expressly exempts from the jurisdiction of the commissioners "any exhibition (other than one restricted to any schools, or school or district) forming part of the foundation of any college in Oxford or Cambridge, unless the college assent to the scheme." The manner in which this court has dealt with the fund, and the manner in which the University Commissioners under the Act of 1854 have dealt with it, show that it is part of the foundation of the college. The fund was well and effectually settled by the Master of the Rolls in 1870. No sufficient grounds have been shown why the Endowed Schools Commisioners should seek to disturb the scheme proposed by the University Commissioners and sanctioned by the Master of the Rolls. That scheme works well, and the fund, we submit, should not be given over to the tender mercies of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, who may not be at all qualified to judge the requirements of such a foundation as this. But the Vice Chancellor has held that Wales is a district within the words of the 4th subsection of the 14th section of the Act, and that, therefore, these exhibitions, even if they form part of the foundation of the college, are not exempted from the jurisdiction of the commissioners. That is the only section of the Act where the word "district" is used, the term "area" being employed in other parts as e.g. in sect. 11. The Act does not extend to Scotland or Ireland, so that the Vice Chancellor's decision amounts to calling Wales a district of England. An area co-extensive with the old Principality of Wales cannot reasonably be held to be a "district" within the meaning of the Act. It is quite clear that the word was intended to be applied to a much more limited area; it might perhaps apply to a county of England, but we submit that even that is a too extensive meaning to assign to it; it means rather something in the nature of a school district or a parish.

Without calling upon

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C. and Lindley, Q.C., who appeared in support of the Vice Chancellor's order.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley) said: I believe, Sir Roundell Palmer, we are all agreed in thinking that we ought not to call upon you for any answer to this appeal. The appeal is from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor Wickens, who has held that certain endowments made by Mr. Meyricke for the purpose of founding exhibitions, payable to young men educating at Jesus College, Oxford, which exhibitions are restricted by his will to a particular portion of the Principality of Wales, namely the six northern counties of that principality, are within the operation of the Endowed Schools Act, and the question for us to determine upon this appeal is whether they are or are not within the operation of that Act. The argument has arisen principally upon this, that this Act contemplated merely funds which were devoted to the education of boys and girls, or boys or girls at schools, although the education might have commenced at schools and afterwards terminated as to boys or young men at college, and as a consequence of the education being so terminated at college, exhibitions might be necessary or desirable for the maintenance of these young men whilst they were at college. But in another sense it is contended, and must be contended for the purpose of supporting the argument that has been addressed to us, that the exhibitions which are held at the University are not to be considered as included within the terms of the Act so far as those terms relate to educational endowments, because it is said that it has been found in scanning the Act, that in the 5th section of the Act, and in several other sections which have been pointed out to us in the course of the argument (although the principal reliance is upon the 5th), that it was really applicable to the supervision of schools that were benefited by endowments and only consequentially, as it were, following up the subsequent education of the persons trained at those schools through the medium of exhibitions afforded to them for maintaining their place at the University. I confess that it appears to me that nothing has been pointed out during the course of the argument, which shows that any such restricted sense was contemplated by the legislature in the application of the term "educational endowments." Why, in the first place, one might ask, was so large a term adopted, if it was intended to deal simply with schools, and with persons educated there, and pursuing their course of study in their subsequent education? Why should not a term have been employed to confine and narrow it, as the argument has endeavoured to confine and narrow it upon the present occasion? Why was the Act not called "an Act for the better management of Endowed Schools, and the several endowments connected therewith,"—something that would lead one to look forward simply to the question of schools and nothing else? One does not see any principle or reason in the original printed report of the commissioners, nor is there anything which appears upon the face of the Act, or anything that has been referred to, to show that education was not the main object, or that it it was a limited education confined to a school or schools, and not touching in any way the education which might afterwards have to be provided for. It seems to me that this 5th section, upon the very face of it, plainly and distinctly points to two classes of educational endowments which might be necessary for the completion of a young man's education, while as regards primary education it applies to both boys and girls. As regards that part of the section which applies to or deals with exhibitions, I may say that, in the present state of the University, at all events, it could not be held to have had any application in the mind of the Legislature to the education of girls, because up to the present time there has been no provision for the education of women at the Universities. But that does not in any way prevent the general application of these words, which in themselves ought not to be restricted beyond any restriction imposed upon them by the section itself. The section speaks of "educational endowments" as being a term which is to be applicable to an endowment or any part of an endowment which, or the income of which, has been made applicable in the first place for the purposes of education at school of boys and girls, or either of them. Then it goes on to say, or has been made applicable for the purposes "of exhibitions tenable at a school or an university." Then it goes on further to take the largest view of what the educational purposes may be said to be, by pointing out various purposes which do not seem primâ facie to be for the immediate purposes of education, but which are so connected with it as to be within the purport and meaning of the Act. I said just now "applicable for the purposes of exhibitions at a school or an university," but the section goes further, saying, "at a school or an university, or elsewhere," in the largest imaginable terms. The first object of the Legislature in passing this Act, which is a highly remedial Act—an Act for the purpose of dealing with charitable funds devoted to the purposes of education—the first immediate object was to be sure that the commissioners should have the largest powers conferred upon them, lest by any means something unthought of, which might escape the attention of the legislature, should afterwards be found to be left unprotected by the supervision and care of the commissioners. After having given these very large powers, which are meant and introduced to sweep in every possible denomination of educational endowment, it appears to me that it did then occur to the Legislature that it was proper and desirable to make exceptions from those large powers. The Legislature seem to have contemplated this: they said, "We will not leave any portion of these educational funds, as far as they come within our ken, unprotected, but there are many which are protected already in other and different ways. There are many purposes also as to which the machinery which we intend to employ for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act is not complete, and the machinery provided by the Act is not such as we consider desirable for that purpose. We think, therefore, that there are certain exceptions and restrictions which ought to be imposed upon these large powers which were in the first instance given, and in order that, if possible, nothing may be found to escape attention as to particular things that do not attract our attention, we insert these exceptions in cases where we think endowments ought not to be interfered with by the commissioners, either from their not having special powers appropriated for the purpose of dealing with them, or from any other good reason that may make it improper that the particular fund or particular foundation should be so dealt with. These (they say) we will afterwards except, but we will have the opening powers conferred by the definitions in the earlier parts of the Act large and extensive, so as to embrace everything which we shall not afterwards except." That being so, I think the intention of the Legislature is manifest from the various clauses that have been called to our attention. It is very remarkable how many of the arguments that were used by Mr. Morgan are met by the single observation that they may be cogent as arguments ab inconvenienti. A great part of the arguments adduced before us has been of this nature, that it was not, and could not be intended to give this body such large powers as those to which I have referred. That appears also to have occurred to the framers of the Act, because they seem to have said: "Large as the powers are which we have conferred upon you, we restrict them;" and accordingly they do restrict them in the matters to which attention has been directed in the course of the argument. For instance, Mr. Morgan says that this construction, which has been given to the Act by the Vice-Chancellor, would lead to the conclusion that all university endowments, not only the Craven Scholarship, but the Ireland Scholarship, and several others of later foundation, would be comprised within the power and grasp of the commissioners, or left, as Mr. Morgan says, to the tender mercies of these commissioners. When an Act of Parliament creates commissioners, I think every court is bound to assume that the commissioners, or the persons to whom the duties are entrusted, are persons who are fit and proper to be entrusted with such powers as are committed to them; and that all such powers as we find entrusted to them are not to be dealt with as if they were conferred upon persons who were likely in any way to abuse or misuse them; but, on the contrary, we must assume that they are very fit and proper persons to exercise all the powers that the Legislature has thought fit to commit to them. I do not trouble myself, therefore, to inquire into that or any other of those points by which Mr. Morgan has endeavoured to lead us aside from the scope and purport of the Act. I assume that the commissioners are most fit and proper persons to exercise every power that the Legislature has given to them. That being so, we find that, with respect to university scholarships, there is very great protection afforded by the Act. In the first place, there is the fifty years clause which is applicable to every scholarship except the Craven Scholarship. There are very large and general provisions applying to all the powers exercisable by the commissioners. They have not the power arbitrarily, at their own mere will and pleasure, to direct the changes to be made which they may think it essential to carry into effect. They are obliged first to have a scheme, and then that scheme is to be subjected to certain provisions, and from that, there is an appeal to the Queen in Council, and the Council of Education in certain cases. Further than that, the scheme is to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and either House of Parliament, dissenting from the scheme, may stop at once its adoption, a course to which one branch of the Legislature has already had recourse with regard to one of the schemes so sanctioned by the commissioners. All these guards are imposed upon their powers, and all these guards being imposed tend to show that the construction which gives the widest sense and meaning to the original powers, is the correct construction. Another argument used by Mr. Morgan was this: that if their full force is given to the words "applicable for the purposes of exhibitions tenable at a school, or an university, or elsewhere," in the 5th section of the Act, then the section will apply to scholarships founded by artists, for the purpose of promoting the study of art at Rome, and exhibitions founded for special local purposes as regards certain particular religious bodies and the like—that all these might be swept in by the 5th section. And so they might be swept in by the operation of the 5th section but you find several exceptions—you find that the 6th sub-section of the 8th section says that nothing in the Act shall apply "to any endowment applicable and applied solely for promoting the education of the ministers of any church or religious denomination, or for teaching any particular profession, or to any school (unless it is otherwise subject to this Act) which receives assistance out of such endowments," which would exclude, for instance, such exhibitions as might be founded here under the late arrangement with regard to legal education for legal exhibitions coupled with the study of the law. So with regard to exhibitions for the study of art in painting and the like. Then there is a careful exception of the particular foundations for the purposes of religious instruction or education, whether of the Church of England or other religious bodies. When you look carefully at the whole scope and frame of the Act therefore, these very exceptions all tend to show how large the original powers were meant to be, and how carefully drawn these original clauses were, and how necessary it is, if you want to restrict them, not to put a narrow interpretation upon the clause which defines what educational endowments are, by which means you might exempt a very large amount of educational endowments from the beneficial operation of the Act; but you are to see how far the Legislature has in the subsequent sections of the Act thought that restrictions were necessary to be imposed upon those powers, and you are to limit yourself to those restrictions only, thus giving a wider sense to the original definition of the scope and frame of the Act. When I come to consider the sort of argument that was addressed to us in order to induce us to narrow the effect of the 1st section of the Act, really I must say it would lead one to a very unreasonable conclusion because it is argued: true it is if there be an endowment for the education of boys at a school, and if you afterwards find another endowment giving exhibitions to boys at the university who have been educated at that school, then the intervention of the commissioners is lawful, for they have full power to deal with the subject matter of the exhibitions. But if it should so happen, as was mentioned by way of illustration during the argument with regard to Cowbridge School, that there were two endowments, one of them being for an exhibition at the university for boys educated at Cowbridge School, and the other endowment being by some other citizen or denizen of Cowbridge who was minded to benefit the inhabitants generally, and not the particular school, and who chose to say that every person born in Cowbridge or resident in Cowbridge should have the benefit of an exhibition at the university, you would give the commissioners the power of regulating the exhibitions for boys educated at Cowbridge School, and you would not give them equal control over the boys who happened to have been born or to have lived or resided at Cowbridge. With regard to educational endowments, when once you get to exhibitions, the school is left, the school is passed, it is altogether gone by. When you get to exhibitions you see how you can best employ them for the benefit of education. You may touch them, it is said, if it so happens that the possessor of the exhibition has been educated at a particular school; but you cannot touch them, you cannot improve them, you must leave them with all their defects, whatever they may be, if it happens that the exhibitioner has not been educated at a particular school, but has a right to the exhibition because he has been born or has resided for a certain time in a particular town. Nothing can be more unlikely than that there should be such an exception from the general definition of the words "educational endowment;" and I am happy to say that I agree with the Vice-Chancellor in not finding any such restriction in the 5th section, but am, on the contrary, of opinion that the words must be taken in the larger general sense and that they apply to exhibitions paid to persons who are sent to the university to be educated. Then comes the question about restricting the powers of the commissioners as applied to the particular case which we have before us. It is said that the restrictions in the 5th section are binding upon the commissioners; that is the clause principally relied upon, and any observations I have made upon that will be sufficient for the purpose I have in view as showing that the restrictions in question do not touch the case we have now here before us. Assuming the construction of the 5th section to be as large as I have said, the 14th section of the Act provides for certain specified cases, in which it prohibits the interference of the commissioners. Then, the 4th sub-section of the 14th section says simply that nothing in the Act shall authorise the making of any scheme interfering "with the constitution of the governing body of any school or with any exhibition (other than one restricted to any schools or school, or district) forming part of the foundation of any college in Oxford or Cambridge, unless the college assent to the scheme." Therefore it is said that no exhibition can be dealt with "other than one restricted to any schools or school, or district" forming part of the foundation of any college in Oxford or Cambridge, unless the college assent to the scheme. It is said that this restriction with regard to any school or district does not apply to these particular exhibitions, which exhibitions are confined not to any district, but to the whole principality of Wales. The original founder confined his exhibitions to the six counties of North Wales. I think it has hardly been argued, and that it could hardly be argued that that would not be a restriction in the strictest possible construction of the term. Subsequently, and before the passing of this Act, this restriction was, by the operation of the University Commissioners, enlarged, and all the counties of Wales, and also Monmouthshire, were included as districts from which persons might come and have the benefit of these particular exhibitions. It was said that when this Act was passed the Legislature would find the charity in this position, that the whole of Wales was to have the benefit of the exhibition, and that therefore the exhibitions could not be said to be confined to a district. Really, one has heard no positive definition of a district as applied to this Act which would support such an argument. I apprehend that the rule intended to be introduced by the exception was this, that wherever the restriction exists, the commissioners are let into the enjoyment of all their powers, and as to that restriction it is said that it does not matter whether the exhibition is confined to persons coming from a particular school or to persons coming from a district. A common distinction is north and south of the Trent, and this distinction north and south of the Trent would be a restriction to a district. North of the Trent would be one district, and south of the Trent would be another district. A county like Yorkshire would be in the same way a district; and within the meaning of this Act a district means something different from the whole area with which the Act deals. The whole area with which the Act deals is England and Wales. It does not extend to Scotland or Ireland. A district is a portion of that area, and not the whole of it. That is the plain and simple meaning of the word. An argument might be founded, no doubt, upon the improbability in the first place—the primâ facie improbability—of an Act of this kind dealing with the institutions of an university at all, after an Act had been passed which established the university commissioners, and gave them power—which they have exercised in reference to this particular charity—to deal with and regulate a number of educational endowments which were connected with the university, and which powers, it might be said primâ facie, having been once granted to a body competent to deal with, and having power to deal with the whole university, could not afterwards be delegated to a different body dealing with a different area, and with different jurisdiction, in such a manner that their jurisdiction should appear to overlap the jurisdiction which had been conferred on the previous body. But even that argument fails entirely when you come to consider the very last section I have been considering, namely, the 4th sub-sect. of the 14th section of the Act, because, undoubtedly that very 4th sub-section implies that with the consent of the college it is restricted as to the larger powers given under the definition in the 5th section, and you measure in some degree, no doubt, those powers by the restraint which is imposed upon them. Well, you find therefore, that there are powers extending to the very foundation of the college, if the college chose to assent. That shows that as far as the original powers went, they contemplated going even to the very matter of educational endowment which might form part of the very endowment or foundation of the college or university, provided you obtained the assent of that body. The assent is to be given to the exercise of the power and the power then exists. There is a restriction of that power in certain cases and that very restriction shows how large and wide the power was in order to render it necessary that such a restriction should be imposed. I think the more every section and sub-section of the Act is considered, the more it will be found that the construction I have suggested is the correct one, and the more you consider it the more you will see that the scheme of the Act is one of very large powers in the first instance, which are afterwards fettered by the Act with restrictions and provisions on account of the largeness of those powers, and only fettered to that extent; and that it is one on which this court is not at liberty to impose any additional fetters or restrictions. It appears to me, therefore, that the view of the Vice-Chancellor was perfectly correct, and that this particular endowment is under the jurisdiction of the commissioners appointed.

Lord Justice JAMES.—I am of the same opinion. I desire to be understood as adopting and repeating every word of the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor as reported, and, of course, the conclusion he has arrived at. I only desire to add one thing further, which is that, being myself a Welshman, I do not find anything derogatory in the decision that Wales is a district.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

WHITE (app.) v. FEAST (resp.)

Wilful damage to property—"Fair and reasonable supposition" of right—Jurisdiction of justices— 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52, enacts that "whosoever shall wilfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury or spoil to or upon any real or personal property whatever, either of a public or a private nature," may be convicted before a justice of the peace, and imprisoned or fined, "provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of," &c.

The express proviso in this section excludes the implication of the proviso ordinarily implied in cases of summary jurisdiction, that the jurisdiction of justices is ousted by a bonâ fide claim of right. In order to oust their jurisdiction the justices must be shown that there are fair and reasonable grounds for the supposition that the party complained of was acting in the assertion of a right.

Appellant, with thirteen other men, acting under the orders of one D., dug a ditch from forty to fifty yards long in respondent's garden, without any previous communication being made to respondent. D. in giving these orders acted under what he considered a public right, on the ground that about fifteen years before there had been a ditch over part of this ground, which was inclosed as a garden by respondent's father. Appellant having been convicted under the above section by justices, who found that he did not act under a "fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of:"

Held, that the conviction was right.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

This was an information, dated 3rd Aug., preferred by Joseph Feast against John White, for that the said John White, on the 1st Aug. 1871, at the parish of Walsoken, in the county of Norfolk, did unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously commit damage, injury, and spoil to and upon certain real property of the said Joseph Feast, of a private nature, to wit, the land and soil of a certain garden of the said Joseph Feast there situate, by then and there digging and cutting a certain gripple therein, thereby then and there doing injury to the said Joseph Feast to the amount of 1*l.*, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them, on the 7th Aug. 1871, we, the undersigned, being three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Norfolk, did thereupon convict the said John White of the offence charged against him in the said information, and did adjudge the said John White for his said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of 1*s.*, over and above the amount of the injury so done as aforesaid, and for such injury the sum of 1*l.*, to be paid and applied according to law (and also to pay to the said Joseph Feast the sum of 15*s.* 6*d.* for his costs in that behalf), and in case the said sums should not be paid forthwith, we adjudged that the said John White should be imprisoned in the house of correction at Swaffham, in the said county of Norfolk, and there kept to hard labour for the space of seven days, unless the said several sums should be sooner paid.

And the said John White, alleging that he is dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, &c., we hereby state and sign this case.

The defendant having appeared upon summons before us, the undersigned, to answer to the said information, it was thereupon contended on his behalf by Mr. John Walter Watson, his attorney that we had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the said information, but the said John Walter Watson did not show to us by evidence or otherwise that the said defendant acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of in the said information, nor that such act was a trespass, not being wilful or malicious, committed in hunting, fishing, or in the pursuit of game, nor that the said defendant was acting bonâ fide in the assertion or exercise of any right or supposed right in doing the act complained of in the said information. We thereupon determined to proceed with the hearing of the said information, and it was thereupon proved before us on the part of the said informant, and we find.

1. That the said informant lives at Walsoken, in the county of Norfolk, and is the owner and occupier of a garden there, of which his father, now deceased, was the owner at the time of his decease.

2. That the said defendant lives at Leverington, Parson Drone, about six miles distant from Walsoken aforesaid, and on the 1st Aug. he came with thirteen other men, and without any communication with the said informant, forcibly entered the said garden of the said informant, and dug and cut in the land and soil thereof a gripple (which term we find and adjudge to mean a small ditch), about four feet wide at the top, and about three feet deep, and from forty to fifty yards in length, extending from one end of the said garden to the other.

3. That the father of the said informant, and the said informant (who immediately succeeded his said father) have occupied the said garden in succession uninterruptedly for thirty-six years, and there never was during that period or at any previous time, any gripple or ditch whatever upon the site of at least from fifteen to twenty yards in length of the gripple dug and cut as aforesaid by the said defendant, to wit, at that end of such gripple which lies next the road called the Silt-road.

4. That no gripple has existed for many years, if ever, upon the site of the residue of the said gripple dug and cut as aforesaid by the defendant, until he so dug and cut the same.

5. That the damage and injury done by the said defendant to the land and soil of the said garden, and to the said informant as the owner thereof, by the digging and cutting of the said part of the said gripple of the length of from fifteen to twenty yards, where none formerly existed as aforesaid, amounts to the sum of 1*l.*

And the said John Walker Watson, on behalf of the said defendant, thereupon produced and examined the following witnesses (that is to say):

1. Adam Dawson, who deposed as follows:—

I live at Wisbech, and know Chapel-street, Walsoken. I purchased property there in 1839; at that time there was a gripple from Chapel-street to the Silt-road, about three feet wide and a foot and a half to two feet deep; it took the surface drainage of Chapel-street when it got to the Silt-road; I don't know where it went to; at that place it passed near the property of Mr. Feast, the informant's father; there was a cart road between the gripple and Mr. Feast's property; the gripple continued there the whole way from Chapel-street to the Silt from the time I purchased the property in 1839 for twenty-two years, when Mr. Feast's father inclosed the whole of that portion which was on the south side of the property; I cannot say whether he filled in the dike or not; the dike was there when he inclosed it; I gave directions for the dike to be cut.

On cross-examination:

I was exercising what I considered to be a public right. I never asked Mr. Feast to cut the gripple out; I think it was a proper thing to do; I swear the gripple ran through to the Silt-road; I can't say when I saw it open last; I swear it was open fifteen years ago; I can't say whether water went down it. Mr. Osborn, the chairman of the board of health, said if we would find a drainage the board would take the road; I submitted to the drainage being closed fifteen years ago; I don't remember the gripples being first cut; I cannot remember the common being inclosed.

2. Joseph Larmet, who deposed as follows:

I live in Wisbech, and know Chapel-street, Walsoken, and South-street, and the Silt-road. South-street intervenes between Chapel-street and the Silt-road; I remember a gripple in 1855 extending from Chapel-street to the Silt-road; I should call it a small ditch, 4ft. wide at the top, and two or three feet deep; I've seen water in it the whole way; it passed the property now occupied by Mr. Feast, and there was a road between it and such property for foot passengers with a hand-cart; Mr. Feast the elder inclosed his part in about 1860 or 1861; he inclosed it with boards at both ends; I expect it was used as a drainage, and inconvenience has arisen from the inclosure to the drainage, and the road was afterwards inclosed up to Chapel-street.

On cross-examination:

I have nothing to do with the cutting of the ditch; I speak to the best of my knowledge; the gripple was open in 1855; I cannot say when I saw water; I came to Wisbech in 1850, and since that time I saw water at the Chapel-street end. I cannot speak to the other end.

The said John Walter Watson then again contended that we, the undersigned, had no jurisdiction to entertain this case or to adjudicate thereon, but he adduced no evidence before us in support of such his contention, nor was it made to appear to us in any way that the said defendant had any reason to believe, although set to work by the witness Adam Dawson, that the said Adam Dawson so employed him in order to assert or exercise any right possessed or supposed to be possessed by the said Adam Dawson, but so far as appeared before us, the said defendant was a stranger to the said informant, and did the act complained of in the information under the mere direction of the said Adam Dawson, and without any knowledge that the said Adam Dawson asserted the claim mentioned in his evidence.

We therefore, upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case found and determined that the said defendant did not act under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of in the said information, and that such act was not a trespass, not being wilful and malicious, committed in hunting, fishing, or the pursuit of game, and that the said defendant was not acting bonâ fide in the assertion or exercise of any right or supposed right in doing such act. We also found and determined that the said Adam Dawson and Joseph Larmet were in error in deposing that the gripple or ditch to which they deposed as formerly extending from Chapel-street to the Silt-road, extended throughout the whole of that distance, and that in fact such gripple, if the same ever existed at all in the line deposed to by them, only extended from Chapel-street to a point short of the Silt-road and distant therefrom at least from fifteen to twenty yards, and that throughout such fifteen or twenty yards no gripple ever existed until the gripple complained of was dug and cut by the said defendant as charged in the said information.

Whereupon we the undersigned did adjudge and determine that the said defendant was guilty, and should be convicted of the said offence charged in the said information in manner and form aforesaid, and did adjudge that he should forfeit and pay such penalty, and should pay such compensation for the said injury, and such costs, and in default thereof should be imprisoned and kept to hard labour as respectively hereinbefore mentioned.

If the court shall be of opinion that we the undersigned justices had jurisdiction or power to hear and determine the said information, and that having such jurisdiction or power we had sufficient authority upon the evidence before us to convict the said defendant of the said offence charged against him in the said information, then the conviction shall be confirmed. But if the court shall be of a contrary opinion then the said conviction shall be quashed.

CHARLES CURRIE.
JOHN BRAMHALL.
RICHD. YOUNG.

The enactment (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 52) under which the appellant was charged was as follows:

Whosoever shall wilfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil, to or upon any real or personal property whatsoever, either of a public or private nature, for which no punishment is hereinbefore provided, shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, at the discretion of the justice, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for any term not exceeding two months, or else shall forfeit and pay such sum of money not exceeding £5, as to the justice shall seem meet, and also such further sum of money as shall appear to the justice to be a reasonable compensation for the damage, injury, or spoil so committed, not exceeding the sum of £5; provided that nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of, nor to any trespass, not being wilful and malicious, committed in hunting, fishing, or in the pursuit of game, but that every such trespass shall be punishable in the same manner as if this Act had not passed.

G. Bruce, for the appellant, contended that a bonâ fide claim of right having been set up, the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted. In Reg. v. Stimpson (4 B. & S. 301), a conviction under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 24, for attempting to take, otherwise than by angling, fish in a river in which the prosecutor had a private right of fishing, was quashed on the ground that a bonâ fide claim of title to fish in the river was made by the defendant before the justices, and that there was no reasonable evidence on which they could find that it was not made bonâ fide. "The general rule of law," said Blackburn, J., "applicable to justices exercising summary jurisdiction, is that they are not to convict where a real question as to the right to property is raised between the parties; then their jurisdiction ceases, and the question of right must be settled by a higher tribunal; for the justices, by convicting, would be settling a question of property conclusively and without remedy, if their decision happened to be wrong." So in Reg. v. Pearson (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 237; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 126), it was held, that if on the hearing of a complaint for an assault, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 42, it be shown that a bonâ fide question as to title to land is involved, the jurisdiction of the justices is at once ousted. [BLACKBURN, J.—The real question here is whether the justices, under the proviso at the end of the 52nd section of the Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97), have not got jurisdiction where they are of opinion that the supposition of right was not fair and reasonable; and (2), whether they were not justified in holding that it was not.] It is submitted that whether Mr. Dawson's supposition was or was not fair and reasonable, the appellant at any rate might reasonably believe that Mr. Dawson had a right to give the order which he gave. Quite independently of the statute, whenever a question of title arises, the jurisdiction of the magistrates ceases by a restriction placed on their authority by common law in all cases of summary convictions. Paley on Convictions (edit. 5, p. 137) says, "It has always been held as a maxim that where the title to property is in question, the exercise of a summary jurisdiction by justices of the peace is ousted. This principle is not founded upon any legislative provision, but is a qualification which the law itself raises in the execution of penal statutes, and is always implied in their construction; and so rigid is this rule, that even where a statute allows the accused to go into the question of title, he is not obliged to do so, and may object to the jurisdiction of the justices." In Leath v. Vine (30 L. J. 207, M. C.), a person charged, under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, with trespassing in pursuit of game in the daytime on land in the occupation of a tenant to A., set up a claim of right to shoot over the land, on the ground that he and everyone who chose had always shot there till some recent acts of interruption, and declared his readiness to try the right with A., and it was held that the mere assertion of such a general right in himself and everyone else, though he really believed it, without showing any such claim of right as would be a defence to an action of trespass, did not oust the jurisdiction of the magistrates to convict under the statute in question; but Wightman, J., who delivered the considered judgment of the court, observed, "I am disposed to think that the mere belief that he had a right is not sufficient under the terms of the statute now in question to oust the jurisdiction of the magistrate, as it might under the Malicious Trespass Act." [COCKBURN, C. J.—If the proviso of the statute is more restricted than the general qualification which exists by implication in all other cases, surely we are bound to act according to what the Legislature points out in the statute? BLACKBURN, J.—If the general qualification is to be implied here, the express proviso of the statute would be rendered useless.] Hudson v. MacRae (4 B. & S. 585) was also referred to. Finally, the word "wilfully," in the 52nd section of the Act, taken as it is, in connection with the word "maliciously," must mean something more than intentionally.

Thesiger, for the respondent, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think we need not call on Mr. Thesiger. Our judgment must be for the respondent. Without at all questioning for a moment the truth of the general proposition, that in cases where summary jurisdiction is given to justices for trespasses or similar matters, there must be an implied restriction on their jurisdiction where there is a bonâ fide claim of right, yet it is quite competent to the Legislature to qualify that general proposition, and to cut it down within such limits as they think proper; and I think we must adjudicate on this on the terms of the statutory enactment. When we look at it we find that it comes to this—that a person shall be liable to be summarily convicted where he has committed, wilfully or maliciously, damage or injury to the property of another, and that he is not entitled to call on the magistrates to hold their hands if he has entertained, upon unreasonable grounds, the opinion that he was justified in what he was doing, although he may have honestly believed that he was justified in doing the act; because the Legislature has chosen to put only such a restriction on the jurisdiction of the magistrates. It is expressly enacted that in order to oust their jurisdiction there must have been fair and reasonable grounds for the supposition that the party was acting in the assertion of a right. That being expressly stated by the Legislature as the limit of the magistrate's jurisdiction, it is not for us to extend the limit. The general rule applies here, that that which is expressed gets rid of that which would otherwise be implied. Then comes the other question—whether the magistrates were justified in finding that the appellant had no fair and reasonable ground for supposing that he had a right to dig the ditch. In my opinion there was abundant evidence on which they might come to that conclusion. It is said that, inasmuch as the appellant was employed as a mere labourer by another person to do the act in question, he was justified in supposing that there were fair and reasonable grounds for the order given him by Dawson. But I cannot assent to that proposition. I think it cannot be a just ground for holding a person exempt from the jurisdiction of the justices. The appellant can be in no better position than the person who employed him. We will suppose, in his favour, that he inquiries, before he does what would be an act of trespass, of the person who employed him, on what grounds the act ordered would be justifiable; and let us suppose, further, that his employer states to him the grounds on which he gives the order. If the grounds alleged are not fair and reasonable grounds, then the servant can be in no better position than the master. Now, it appears here that about fifteen or sixteen years ago there was a similar ditch existing—and even as to that there is some evidence to the contrary—a ditch into which the water flowed, either accidentally or of right, which latter there is no evidence to show. About fifteen or sixteen years ago it was stopped up, without any one asserting a right to have it open. After such a lapse of time the appellant comes with twelve or thirteen other men employed by Dawson—without any notice whatever being given to the respondent, or any prior assertion of right—into the private garden of the respondent and cuts open the ditch in derogation of the legal right of the respondent. On such a state of facts I think that the magistrates were fully justified in coming to the conclusion at which they arrived. I quite agree that the magistrates cannot give themselves jurisdiction by finding as a fact that for which there is no evidence. But where there is evidence, and the conclusion is a reasonable one, we cannot interfere. I think their decision on the point was right, and our judgment must therefore be for the respondent.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is an inaccurate phrase to speak of a common law restriction on the summary jurisdiction of magistrates, for the very excellent reason that there is no summary jurisdiction at common law. All summary jurisdiction is the creature of statute. But this principle has existed for several years; that inasmuch as questions of title to lands are questions of much difficulty, it must be considered, unless there is something to show the contrary, that where a statute gives summary jurisdiction, there is an implied restriction on that jurisdiction wherever a question of title to land is bonâ fide raised before the magistrates. They are in such a case to hold their hands, probably because they are not well fitted to decide such questions. Where it appears from an Act of Parliament, as in the case of the Highway Acts, that it was not the intention of the Legislature that such a restriction should exist, this rule does not apply. The justices are not bound in such a case to hold their hands, though that will not prevent the question of title being afterwards raised. There is a series of decisions establishing another rule, that an act cannot be a crime unless there is a mens rea. If, therefore, the person doing it believes that he had a bonâ fide right to do it, there is to be no conviction for a crime, because of the absence of the mens rea. If the intention is to protect property from injuries done even by innocent persons, as in the case of a trespass, as distinguished from a guilty act, this rule applies. In the present case the words of the 51st section of the Act of Parliament are "Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil, to or upon any real or personal property whatsoever, either of a public or private nature, for which no punishment is hereinbefore provided, the damage, injury, or spoil being to an amount exceeding 5*l.* shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour." Then comes the 52nd section providing that "whosoever shall wilfully or maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil to or upon any real or personal property whatsoever, either of a public or private nature, for which no punishment is hereinbefore provided, shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, at the discretion of the justice, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned only, or to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months," &c. To this a proviso is added that "nothing herein contained shall extend to any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of, nor to any trespass not being wilful and malicious, committed in hunting, fishing, or the pursuit of game, but that every such trespass shall be punishable in the same manner as if this Act had not passed." It is noticeable that "wilfully and maliciously," in the 51st section, is changed to "wilfully or maliciously" in the 52nd; and also that, in the case of hunting, fishing, or the pursuit of game, any trespass not malicious is exempted from the operation of the enactment. If the "or" were to be read "and" the first part of the section would be most insensible, but, read as it is, the section has a very sensible meaning. It seems to me that it was purposely provided that a distinction should be made between a trespass wilful or malicious and one which is both wilful and malicious. And we must remember that many of the injuries to property, wilful, but not malicious, are done by very poor persons, against whom it would be absurd to proceed by civil actions in the Superior Courts; the remedy would be worse than the disease. It was desirable, however, to provide remedies for the protection of property in such cases; but, at the same time, it was not desirable that the poor man should not be dealt with in the manner provided by the statute, where he has a bonâ fide claim of right; and the Legislature has not given the magistrates jurisdiction to decide on that claim, whether it be a well-founded claim or not; but the Legislature has trusted them with the power of determining whether the supposition is a "fair and reasonable" one or not; and of convicting where any person does such an injury to property wilfully without any reasonable ground for the supposition that he has a bonâ fide claim of right. The real thing is the power given to the magistrates to grant compensation to a certain amount to the party injured by the wilful act of another, whether the act so done be done under a bonâ fide claim of right or not, if it is not founded on a fair and reasonable ground, the words of the proviso being, that nothing contained in the section shall extend to "any case where the party acted under a fair and reasonable supposition that he had a right to do the act complained of." I can read these words in no other way than as giving the magistrates a right to decide whether the supposition acted on is a fair and reasonable one or not. The decision of that point is to be within their jurisdiction. Taking this to be the proper view of the construction of the statute, the question next arises, were the magistrates right in determining that the appellant in digging this trench was not acting under a fair and reasonable supposition of right? He was hired to dig the trench by Mr. Dawson, and he does not seem to have made any inquiry, but simply to have done what he was ordered to do by Mr. Dawson. I am far from saying that that might not in many cases be a fair and reasonable ground for so acting. I might put the case of a farmer ordering one of his labourers to dig up an adjoining hedge, an act which might, so far as the farmer was concerned, be a wilful injury to the property of another; but the labourer might well say, "I had a fair and reasonable ground for supposing that the farmer for whom I was working had a right to order me to do the act," though, in fact, the farmer had no such right. But where we have to deal with the case of a man who simply says to another, "Go and dig a ditch in my neighbour's garden," we must at once see that that is not a similar case. If Mr. Dawson had shown a fair and reasonable ground for a claim of right, that would, I think, extend to those persons who acted under his directions or orders. But what he says comes simply to this, "I had a right to dig this ditch, and in doing so I was exercising only a public right; and the reason why I think I had a fair and reasonable right to do so is that about fifteen years ago there was a ditch open there. About that time the persons occupying this place stopped up the ditch and enclosed it, and turned the gripple as well as the cart road into a garden for himself; and because, more than fifteen years ago, there was a ditch de facto existing there, I have now a right to make a common sewer of the place." The justices were quite right in holding that this was an unreasonable supposition of right. At the trial of a civil action at Nisi Prius, Mr. Dawson may possibly make out such a case as he has set up; but, so far as the case came within the jurisdiction of the magistrates, we cannot say that they were not at liberty to come to a different conclusion. I fully agree with what my lord has said as to the calling in of twelve other men, and the high-handed manner of the whole procedure.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Wherever a statute creates an offence of this description, and also enacts a proviso as to the restriction which is to be placed on the jurisdiction of the magistrates, we are not at liberty to imply any other restriction on that jurisdiction. There is no doubt that in some cases the reasonableness of the conduct of the person doing the act is involved in the words "bonâ fide claim of right," but there may be a bonâ fide claim of right in some cases where there is no reasonable ground for the claim. The jurisdiction of the magistrates is ousted only where there is reasonable ground for the supposition, and as to the existence of such reasonable ground in the present case I entirely concur in the observations which have fallen from the other members of the court.

QUAIN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think that the appellant must show to the justices that he had a fair and reasonable ground for supposing that he was acting in the assertion of a claim of right. He can here be in no better position than Mr. Dawson himself, and I can find no evidence whatever that Mr. Dawson had a fair and reasonable ground for the supposition that he had a right to cut a ditch through the private property of the respondent. In his direct evidence he says he cannot say whether the respondent's father filled in the dike or not. In cross-examination he says he cannot say whether the water ever went down it; and his only witness says "I expect it was used as a drainage." I think such evidence shows no reasonable grounds, on the face of the case, for Mr. Dawson's supposition that it was used as a common sewer. I think, therefore, that the respondent was right and that this appeal must be dismissed.

REG. v. HARRALD.

Married woman—Right of to vote at municipal election—32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, s. 9; 33 & 34 Vict. c. 93.

Married women who are such at the time the burgess list is made, are, notwithstanding 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, s. 9, disqualified to vote at municipal elections.

Sect. 9 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, which enacts that in the Municipal Corporation Acts, "words importing the masculine gender, shall be held to include females for all purposes connected with and having reference to the right to vote in the election of councillors, auditors and assessors," removes only the disqualification previously existing on the ground of sex, and does not affect the disqualification arising from marriage.

The Married Women's Property Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 93), does not remove the latter disqualification.

Semble, that a woman who is single at the time she is put on the burgess roll, but marries before the election, is disqualified to vote.

IN this case a rule had been obtained by Herschell calling on Charles Harrald to show cause why a quo warranto information should not issue calling on him to show by what right he exercised the office of town councillor of the borough of Sunderland.

It appeared from the affidavits that at an election of town councillors for the borough of Sunderland, held on 1st Nov. 1871, Charles Harrald was elected for the Sunderland ward by a majority of one over the next candidate.

Amongst those who voted for him were two married women. Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Storey.

Mrs. Thompson, at the time she was put upon the burgess roll was a married woman, but lived apart from her husband, and occupied a house and paid rates as a single woman.

Mrs. Storey was a single woman at the time she was put on the burgess roll, but married about ten days before the election.

Crompton showed cause against the rule.—Sect. 9 of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, empowers women to vote at municipal elections. That section enacts that "in this Act and the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and the Acts amending the same, wherever words occur which import the masculine gender, the same shall be held to include females, for all purposes connected with and having reference to the right to vote in the election of councillors, auditors, and assessors." There is nothing whatever in the Act to prevent a married woman from exercising the municipal franchise: the words are quite general, applying to all women, married and unmarried alike. The first of the two women, therefore, was not disqualified to vote. As to the second, she was unmarried at the time she was put on the burgess list, and was then clearly entitled to vote. Can a marriage occurring subsequently, and before the next burgess roll is made out, deprive her of that right? The effect of marriage is simply to transfer her property to her husband; but suppose a male had transferred, after being put on the burgess roll, the property in respect of which he had been put there, would that have disqualified him to vote? It clearly would not, and why then should an act which has merely the same effect, disqualify a woman? The roll is conclusive as to those persons who are entitled to vote, and it has been decided that you cannot question by quo warranto against the person elected, the qualification of a person who has been put there: (Reg. v. Tugwell, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 704)—"I think," said Blackburn, J., in this case, "the Legislature intended that the burgess roll should be conclusive. By sect. 15 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, the overseers are to make out the burgess list which must be duly published. By sect. 17, persons omitted from the lists may claim to have their names inserted, and the names of persons not entitled to be on the list may be objected to, and the town clerk is to make out lists of claimants and lists of persons objected to, which must also be duly published. By sect. 18, the mayor and two assessors are to revise the lists. By sect. 22 the burgess lists revised by the mayor are to be delivered to the town clerk, who is to cause the burgess lists to be copied into one general list in a book, with every name numbered, and 'every such book in which the said burgess lists shall have been copied, shall be the burgess roll of the burgesses of such borough entitled to vote in the choice of councillors . . . . of such borough.' It is clear from these enactments, by which careful provision is made for revising the burgess lists, that the burgess roll ought to contain the names of all persons entitled to vote, and that no person whose name is not in the roll can vote, and the Legislature intended the burgess roll to be conclusive on the point. The only argument that can be suggested against this view is grounded on sect. 9, and it is said that it is only persons duly enrolled according to the provisions of that Act who shall be burgesses of a borough; but I think that there is no weight in the argument, as a careful provision is made for revising the lists." There is, it must be admitted, no instance of a married woman voting before the statute, but this was because before the statute no woman at all could vote. As to the other woman, by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 93, a married woman is now entitled at law to hold property, and, if so, the disqualification formerly arising from coverture is done away. It was a question to be determined before the making of the burgess roll whether her property was or was not of such a character as would entitle her to vote; and as an adverse determination was not come to the burgess roll is decisive. [HANNEN, J.—It has been held that a married woman, though on the list of Parliamentary voters, cannot exercise the franchise. MELLOR, J.—Bright, in the very beginning of his book on the Law of Husband and Wife, lays it down that "By marriage, the husband and wife are as one person in law. Upon this union depend almost all the legal rights, duties, and disabilities, which either of them acquires or incurs by the intermarriage. The very being or legal existence of the woman is by the common law suspended during the marriage, or at least it is incorporated and consolidated into that of her husband, under whose wing, protection, and cover, she performs everything."]

Herschell, in support of the rule.—Both women are disqualified to vote. Neither being sui juris has any legal existence at the time of voting. Their votes were, therefore, when given, absolutely void. Further, neither of them is a "person" in the eye of the law, the legal existence of each being merged in that of her husband. The Legislature never intended to give the municipal franchise to married women. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55 only removed the disqualification of sex, but did not touch in any way the disqualification arising from marriage. In the case of married women a double disqualification previously existed, and only one part of it has been abolished by the statute.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think there is quite enough to entitle Mr. Herschell to have this rule made absolute, because it seems to me that as to the vote of one of these two married women it is impossible to say that it is good, and I am strongly inclined to think that the vote of the other is bad also. The first vote is that of a married woman, originally single, put on the burgess roll. It is quite certain that according to the old common law of the land, a married woman was considered to have all her rights merged in those of her husband—she was disqualified to exercise any rights apart from him. That was thought to be a hardship in the case of her possessing property, and it was often argued and strongly urged that, inasmuch as the qualification for being put on the burgess roll was the possession of property, married women possessed of such property ought to be allowed to exercise the right of voting, for which right the possession of property was the sole required qualification. It was thought that at least unmarried women should be allowed to exercise this right. Accordingly the statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, gave effect to these views by enacting that wherever, under any municipal statute, men were entitled to vote, women who were in the same situation should also be allowed to vote. The women intended by this were women possessed of property. I cannot think that the Legislature intended, by a general enactment that women should be entitled to vote, to alter the status of married women according to the general law of England. That statute has certainly not done so. The only way of bringing married women within that statute is by saying that by a subsequent statute their status has been altered by giving them a property independently of their husbands. It is plain that this subsequent statute was passed altogether with a different object—alio intuitu—from that of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55; and I cannot think that it was intended by a side-wind to give them a different status as to political and municipal rights of voting. I have no doubt, therefore, as to the case of one of these married women. As to the other the case is somewhat different. At the time she was put on the burgess roll, she was not married, and therefore by the Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, she was entitled to vote. Shortly before the election she married, and by the act of marriage her status became altered to that of a married woman, with all the incidents attaching to that condition. But it is said that once a person is put on the list, though the qualification is lost, and she could not then for the first time be put upon it, yet the right conferred by being placed there is not lost; and generally, no doubt, that is so in the case of a man, whose right is not altered by reason of something happening, which, if it happened before he was put on the roll, would have disqualified him. The question is, whether the same thing applies to the case of a married woman, whose legal status is altogether altered by the act of marriage. I am strongly inclined to think it does not, but that the case is the same as if she had originally been a married woman, and as such disqualified to be put on the roll. It is not necessary, however, to decide either of these points; for either is sufficiently doubtful to entitle Mr. Herschell to have his rule made absolute for a quo warranto.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. As to the married woman, there is no doubt that the effect of marriage is to affect all such rights as she could exercise whilst single, and to merge them in those of her husband. After marriage she can only exercise any right under his protection. The passage which I cited from Bright's Law of Husband and Wife is still in its general principles applicable. Mrs. Thompson, therefore, was disqualified at the time she was put on the burgess list; and I agree with my Lord that the subsequent act referred to was not intended to have the effect contended for by Mr. Crompton, and that her disqualification existed during the whole of the time. As to the woman who was single at the time she was put on the burgess roll, I quite agree that were it not for the subsequent marriage, she would be entitled to vote by virtue of the 9th section of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 55, which destroys and abrogates the disqualification arising from sex, but not any other disqualification whatever, as, for instance, that of marriage. I think the fact of her having been married before the election extinguished the right which she had acquired as a single woman. The only effect to be given to the 9th section is to hold that it simply removes the disqualification arising from sex, but leaves all other disqualifications undisturbed.

HANNEN, J.—I am of opinion that the Married Women's Property Act was intended only to protect a married woman in the enjoyment of her property, and was not intended to extend the political rights of women; and that the question of their political rights must be clearly raised before the Legislature and be decided by it and that we must not by a sidewind give an extension to the Act not contemplated by the Legislature. I am not equally clear as to the point concerning the second vote. But there is sufficient doubt existing to make it desirable that the matter should be raised on the record. The rule must therefore be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

SECOND COURT.

REG. v. AYLESFORD UNION.

Rateable value of chalk pit—Neighbourhood of cement works—Profits of actual tenant.

The occupiers of cement works, and also of a chalk pit situated close by, were assessed separately as to their works and their pit. There were other equally good chalk pits in the neighbourhood, the chalk from which was used only for ballast and other purposes not so profitable as that of manufacturing cement, for which the appellants used theirs. They appealed to quarter sessions against the assessment of the chalk pit; and the counsel who supported the rate, proposed to ask the appellants' manager for information as to the profits the appellants obtained from the chalk, but the quarter sessions refused to admit evidence upon that subject.

Held, upon a special case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the quarter sessions were right, and that although the convenience and situation of the chalk pit were to be considered in estimating what rent a tenant would reasonably pay, the actual profits derived by the appellants were not material in forming that estimate.

AT a general quarter sessions of the peace holden by adjournment at Maidstone, in and for the county of Kent, on Thursday 29th June 1871, upon an appeal of John Messer Knight, and Thomas Bevan (hereinafter called the appellants,) against the guardians of the North Aylesford Union, and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Northfleet, in the same county (hereinafter called the respondents), touching a certain rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor of the said parish of Northfleet, on the 28th March 1871; by which said rate the appellants were assessed in the sum of £1156 for the gross estimated rental, and in the sum of £1136 for the net rateable value of certain premises in the said parish, in the occupation of the appellants: The said court of quarter sessions amended the said rate by striking out the said sum of £1156, gross estimated rental, and inserting in the said rate the sum of £1083 in lieu thereof; and by striking out the sum of £1136 net rateable value and inserting in the said rate the sum of £1063 in lieu thereof, subject nevertheless to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon the following case:

The appellants Messrs. Knight and Bevan are large cement makers carrying on their business, and owning and occupying large works in the said parish of Northfleet.

The rate against which the said appeal was brought so far as relates to the premises in the occupation of the appellants is as follows, that is to say:

The tenements mentioned under the No. 216 in the said rate are those whose rateable value was in dispute on the appeal.

This land consists of a chalk pit, lying on both sides of a certain public road, called Bow-street. The tenements, Nos. 217 and 218 in the said rate, lie immediately adjoining to the chalk pit, being separated from it only by the public road running from Bow-street to the river Thames.

The premises, Nos. 217 and 218, contain the cement manufactory properly so called, which consists of wash mills, backs, kilns, and grinding mills; sheds for making cement casks, warehouses for storing the cement, and wharves, extending into the river, for shipping it. The whole of the premises up to the road separating them from those in 216 is the freehold property of the appellants.

The premises, No. 216, were hired by the appellants, and are used by them solely for the purpose of getting chalk for making cement, the same being a necessary ingredient in that substance. There is a tramway by which the chalk, when quarried, is conveyed directly into the works by a tunnel. The chalk, after being brought from the pit, is thrown into the wash mills, where it is mixed with water, and a certain proportion of mud, so as to form a paste of about the consistence of cream. It is then pumped from the mills into large open spaces, called backs, in which the water drains away and evaporates; and the residue, when nearly dry, is broken up and placed in kilns, in which it is burnt. It is then ground to powder, and is packed in casks and bags, and is then ready for sale as cement. The whole of the premises in No. 216 are held by the appellants from a Mr. Poynder, under a lease for twenty-one years, from the 25th March 1864, subject to a rent of 600*l.* per annum, and the payment of an annuity of 200*l.* per annum, to a lady whose age was sixty-four at the date of the lease. The former occupier held the property mentioned in the lease, under a yearly letting, at the annual rental of 300*l.*, but shortly before the 25th March 1864, the rent was raised to 500*l.* a year, and the lessor knew that the appellants wanted it to get chalk for the manufacture of cement.

In the year 1870 the appellants obtained the whole of the chalk used in the manufacture of cement from this pit. The number of cubic yards of chalk actually excavated from the pit in question, and used in the making of cement in the year 1870 was 50,000, which, according to the calculation of the appellants, would represent 65,000 tons, but, according to the calculations of the respondents, would represent 86,250 tons.

The sessions have, as a matter of fact, adopted the calculations of the appellants,

There are several other chalkpits in the neighbourhood, producing chalk of about the same quality as that of the appellants'. These, however, are used only for the purpose of obtaining chalk for ballasting ships, and are held on the terms of paying to the landlord a royalty which varies from 4*d.* to 6*d.* per ton on the chalk got. It was admitted that much greater profit would be made of chalk by making it into cement than by using it for ballast.

Upon the trial of the appeal, Mr. Bevan, who was the partner managing the works, was called, and gave evidence for the appellants; and on his cross-examination by the counsel for the respondents, gave certain answers, from which these facts have been found by the court; and after he had stated the number of cubic yards of chalk got in the year 1870, the counsel for the repondents proposed to ask him how many casks of cement were produced from that quantity of chalk, and what was the price of the cement per cask. This question was objected to by the counsel for the appellants, on the ground that it was evidently intended as a step in an inquiry into the profits of the trade.

The counsel for the respondents thereupon admitted that his object in asking the question was to obtain information as to the profits made from the manufacture of the cement, and contended that although it was necessary that the two sets of premises should appear in the rate under distinct items, by reason of the different ownerships of the two, yet that they were virtually all part of the same factory, and that the rent which could be reasonably expected to be obtained for the chalk pit in the terms of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96, was not to be estimated by such a royalty as another tenant would pay for the purpose of getting ballast, but by such a royalty as a tenant could afford to pay who was enabled to connect the pit with a cement factory, and who used the pit in the way in which the appellants actually use it; and that its connection with the cement works was to be taken into consideration as increasing the value to the present appellants.

The appellants admitted that they made a large profit by the manufacture of the chalk into cement, but they contended that they ought not to be obliged to disclose the amount of profit made by them; they further contended that they ought to be rated upon an estimate of the rent at which the property might reasonably be expected to let from year to year free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes.

The court refused to allow evidence of the amount of the profits made by the appellants in manufacturing chalk into cement to be gone into, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the propriety of such rejection; and they eventually amended the rate by reducing the gross estimated rental from 1156*l.* to 1083*l.*, and net rateable value from 1136*l.* to 1063*l.*

The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is,

Was the court of quarter sessions wrong in refusing to allow these questions to be put, viz.:

How many casks of cement did you make last year?

What was the price of the cement per cask?

These questions being admitted to be put with a view of ascertaining the profits on the cement works, to show that chalk so used is more valuable, and how much more so than chalk used for ballast.

If the Court of Queen's Bench answer this question in the negative, the order of sessions amending the rate is to be confirmed.

If the court answer this question in the affirmative, the order of sessions amending the rate is to be quashed, and the original rate confirmed.

Poland appeared to support the order of sessions; but the court called upon Barrow and Biron for the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Northfleet, the respondents at the quarter sessions. The court of quarter sessions refused to consider the advantage which the appellants derived from the proximity of this chalk pit to their cement works.

They ought to have taken into account the further rent which a tenant would pay for the chalk pit, if he had all the advantages which the appellants enjoy for using it, the value of this chalk pit ought not to be estimated at the amount which a tenant would pay for another pit which produced the same quantity and quality of chalk. The only true mode of estimating the value of the whole of the appellants premises is by obtaining their profits and making the necessary deductions, just in the same way as a railway company is assessed. The principles for rating the occupier of a brickfield, which for this purpose would be premises analogous to the appellants', are laid down in Reg v. Westbrook (10 Q. B. 178); there it was held that the royalty per thousand of bricks made in the year, and the fixed annual charge, both of which the occupier paid to the lessor of the land, were properly considered as the rent. These cement works and all the premises held by the appellants in connection with them ought to be assessed according to the established principles concerning railways and gasworks:

Reg. v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 1 Q. B. 556;

Reg. v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 4 Q. B. 18;

Reg. v. Sheffield Gaslight Company, 23 L. J. 169, M. C.

BLACKBURN, J.—Upon the facts stated in this case, I think there cannot be the smallest doubt that the quarter sessions rightly refused to consider the matters which the respondents proposed to raise. The rateable value of this chalk pit is the amount of rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of the expenses necessary to maintain it in a state to command such rent. There are two elements which should be considered in order to arrive at this rateable value:—what would a tenant pay for it? and what would he give for another equally good ground? The contiguity of the cement works must be considered in this way: Would he pay more rent for the chalk pit on that account? The sessions may have thought that as there were equally good chalk pits in the neighbourhood, the hypothetical tenant would not have preferred one to the others. If that were so, it matters not how much the appellants can manage to make out of this particular pit, and the sessions were quite right in disallowing inquiries into their profits.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The respondents seem to have contended that the proper criterion of the rateable value was the amount of yearly profits. No doubt the convenience and advantages of the situation of the chalk pit ought to be considered, but not the profits actually derived from it by the appellants. All the quarter sessions ask us is were they right in refusing to admit these questions? I think they were.

Order of sessions affirmed.

COLAM v. MANFIELD.

Quarter sessions—Power to quash conviction without hearing evidence—Jurisdiction of Queen's Bench—12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, ss. 2, 23, 26.

An order of quarter sessions quashing on appeal a conviction, stated on the face of the order that it was made "upon the said appeal coming on to be heard, and reading the said recited conviction, and hearing the allegations of counsel on both sides, and upon due proof and consideration of the premises."

Held, that this order was good on the face of it, and that it was not necessary that the quarter sessions should hear evidence before quashing the conviction. It is competent to them to do so where the statement of facts which the prosecuting counsel is prepared to prove does not disclose sufficient to sustain a conviction.

Quære, whether the Court of Queen's Bench can review an order of quarter sessions quashing a conviction solely on a point of form, contrary to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 26.

THIS was a rule nisi to quash an order of quarter sessions made upon an appeal of William Manfield against a conviction under the hands and seals of Richard Oliver and others, justices for the county of Dorset, dated 29th April 1871, whereby the said William Manfield was convicted, for that he on 29th March 1871, at, &c., unlawfully did cause to be cruelly illtreated and tortured, a certain animal, to wit, a horse.

The following was the order of quarter sessions:—

Upon an appeal made unto this court by William Manfield, from and against a certain conviction of him, the said William Manfield, by Richard Oliver Francis Steward, and Edward Leigh Kindersley, Esquires, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the county of Dorset, bearing date the 29th April last past, for that he, the said William Manfield, on the 29th of March last past, at Higher Burton Farm, in the parish of Charminster, in the county aforesaid, did unlawfully cause to be cruelly illtreated and tortured a certain animal, to wit, a horse. And the said justices thereby adjudged the said William Manfield for his said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of 5*l.*, to be paid and applied according to law; and also to pay to John Colam, the complainant, the sum of 5*l.* 13*s.* for his costs in that behalf. Now upon the said appeal coming on to be heard, and reading the said recited conviction, and hearing the allegations of counsel on both sides, and upon due proof and consideration of the premises, this court doth therefore order that the said conviction be quashed, and the same is quashed accordingly; and this court doth also order that the said John Colam, the said respondent, do and shall, upon notice of service of this order, pay or cause to be paid unto the said William Manfield, the appellant, the sum of 34*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, being such costs and charges as appears to this court reasonable and just in his prosecuting the said appeal.

BY THE COURT.

The following affidavit was made by Mr. Colam on the motion for a rule nisi.

That I was the prosecutor in the case of Reg. v. William Manfield, of Dorchester, in the county of Dorset, gentleman, for cruelty to an animal, to wit, a horse, and upon my complaint proceedings were taken under the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed in the 12th and 13th of Vict. c. 92, intituled "An Act for the more effectual Prevention of Cruelty to Animals," which complaint was heard and determined on the 29th April 1871, before two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Dorset, sitting in petty sessions at Dorchester, in and for the county of Dorset, when the said William Manfield was adjudged to be guilty, and was convicted of the said offence and ordered to pay a fine of 5*l.* and 5*l.* 13*s.* costs, or to be imprisoned for the term of two calendar months, and the conviction was returned to the court of quarter sessions held at Dorchester on the 28th June 1871, the said conviction being in the form conformable to the requirements of the said Act.

That the said William Manfield entered an appeal against the said conviction on the grounds, first, that he was not guilty of the offence of which he had been convicted; secondly, that the formal conviction drawn up and returned to the said sessions was not in law sufficient to support the conviction; thirdly, that the said conviction was bad on the face thereof.

That afterwards, that is to say, on the 28th June 1871, being the day appointed for holding the quarter sessions of the peace in and for the said county, at Dorchester aforesaid, before the Right Hon. Lord Portman, chairman, the Rev. Charles William Bingham, and William Charles Lambert, Esq., then and there being justices of the peace for the said county, and then sitting and constituting the said court of quarter sessions, the said appeal of the said William Manfield came on to be heard, and the said conviction was, by order of the said court of quarter sessions, quashed, on the ground that it ought to have been in the words provided by the said Act, and that the form in which the said conviction had been returned was not applicable to the case, and that the said conviction was therefore invalid.

That I, the said deponent, do now apply by my counsel that a writ of certiorari may issue to bring up the said conviction and the proceedings thereon, that the said order of the said court of quarter sessions may be quashed or otherwise dealt with as to this honourable court may seem fit, on the grounds that—first, the form of conviction returned as aforesaid, being in accordance with the provisions of the said Act, is a good conviction under the said Act, which authorises the use of the form provided by the 23rd section of the said Act or any form made according thereto, or to the effect thereof, or as near thereto as the case shall permit; secondly, that the said statute under which the conviction was made enacts in the 26th section thereof that no conviction made under the authority of this Act, nor any order, judgment, or proceeding relative thereto, shall be quashed for want of form.

The affidavit of the attorney for the appellant, against the rule, stated as follows:—

The said William Manfield duly entered an appeal at the then next general quarter sessions of the peace for Dorset, against the said conviction, and that the grounds of the said appeal were -first, that the said William Manfield was not guilty of the said offences or either of them; secondly, that the formal conviction drawn up and returned to the said sessions was not in law sufficient to support the conviction; thirdly, that the said conviction was bad on the face thereof.

That I acted as the attorney of, and was present at the hearing of the said appeal, for the said William Manfield, at the said general quarter sessions of the peace for Dorset, which were held on the 27th June 1871, at Dorchester aforesaid, before the Right Hon. Lord Portman, chairman, Willam Charles Lambert, Esq., and others, justices of the peace for the said county, then sitting and constituting the court of the said quarter sessions; that the said appeal then came on to be heard by and before the said court, when counsel on the part of the respondent, John Colam, opened the case, and stated matters he should prove in evidence; that, thereupon, counsel on behalf of the said appellant submitted to the said court that if all those matters were proved, as stated by the said respondent's counsel, no offence was shown.

And he also submitted that the said conviction was bad; that the said court of quarter sessions quashed the said conviction with costs, and refused the application of the said respondent's counsel to give the reasons of such course for quashing the said conviction, and also refused the application of the said respondent's counsel to grant a case for the opinion of this honourable court.

Maule, Q.C. and A. Collins showed cause against the rule.—This court will not interfere unless there is something in the order showing error on the face of it. This court is not a court of appeal from quarter sessions, and has no jurisdiction to quash orders made on matters within the jurisdiction of the justices, even though those orders may not be such as the court can approve. In Rex v. The Justices of Monmouthshire (8 B. & C. 137), this court refused an application for a certiorari to remove and quash an order of quarter sessions, adjourning the hearing of the appeal, on the ground that even if the order of sessions were erroneous, the Court of Queen's Bench had no jurisdiction to review it. "This," said Lord Tenterden, C.J., "is an application to the court to quash an order of sessions made for adjourning an appeal, on the ground that upon the question whether the order of removal should be confirmed, the justices were equally divided in fact, though it is alleged that, in point of law, two were for quashing the order, and one only for confirming it; because it is contended that the vote given by one of the justices for confirming the order was a nullity, and therefore the sessions ought to have quashed the order of removal, and not to have adjourned it. The late decisions establish, however, that we cannot assume to ourselves the jurisdiction of a court of error and revise the judgments of the court of quarter sessions." In Rex v. Gudridge (5 B. & C. 459), as pointed out by Lord Tenterden in this case, the rule which had been obtained was not to review the order of the court of quarter sessions, but to quash a writ of certiorari quia improvide emanavit. In Reg. v. The Justices of Cheshire (8 A. & E. 398), it was also distinctly held that this court would not notice objections not appearing on the face of the order. There, on appeal against an order of removal, the respondent, at sessions, objected to the statement of grounds, and the court held the statement bad; the respondents demanded to have the order confirmed, but the sessions quashed it for a defect in the order, and this court refused to grant a certiorari to bring up the order of sessions. "Certainly," said Lord Denman, C.J., "the circumstances of this case are very peculiar, and we cannot approve of the conduct of the magistrates. But this court is always extremely scrupulous in interfering with magistrates, where they have jurisdiction. . . . The sole question for us is whether, at the time when the court decided they had power to decide;" and similar views were expressed by the other judges. He also referred to Rex v. The Justices of Cambridgeshire (4 A. & E. 111). In Rex v. James (2 M. & S. 321), it was held that this court will not, upon removal of an order of sessions allowing overseers' accounts, which is good upon the face of it, go into the merits of those accounts upon affidavit. "If there is likely to be a defect of justice," said Lord Ellenborough, "the remedy must be by application to the Legislature, for the court cannot enlarge the limits of its jurisdiction in order to supply a remedy." Archbold's Crown Office Practice, p. 179, and the cases there cited were also referred to.

Harris and Castle, for the appellants, argued that though this court would not receive affidavits to prove facts not appearing on the face of the order made at quarter sessions in cases where the matter had been regularly heard and determined at quarter sessions, yet such affidavits should be received where the quarter sessions does not hear evidence on the matter, but decides merely on a question of form. [COCKBURN, C.J.—It is denied by the other side that the matter was determined on a mere question of form.] There is no statement on the face of the order that they heard any evidence on the subject before them, and as a matter of fact no such evidence was heard. [COCKBURN, C.J.—If a counsel states the facts which he is in a position to prove, and the other side says, "If you prove all you state, it comes to nothing in point of law," what objection is there to determining the matter on such a statement? It is like nonsuiting a counsel on his opening.] This court should look at the affidavits which show that, contrary to the express provisions of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92 s. 26, the conviction was quashed on a mere point of form. [BLACKBURN, J.—The authorities cited by Mr. Maule go to show that we cannot look at affidavits where there is nothing irregular on the face of the order.] Those authorities refer to cases where the quarter sessions have acted within their jurisdiction; it is submitted that they had no jurisdiction to determine the present matter without hearing evidence on the subject. [COCKBURN, C.J.—They clearly had jurisdiction over the subject matter before them.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think we have no jurisdiction to interfere in this matter. Even supposing that the quarter sessions had, in deciding upon that which was clearly within their jurisdiction, gone wrong, and had believed that it was competent to them to dispose of the case on a question of form, I entertain serious doubt whether, the subject matter of the complaint being within their jurisdiction, it is competent to us as a court of error to bring up their order and quash it. But I am very far from resting my decision in the present case upon that ground. If it were necessary to decide that point, it might require more deliberate consideration. What I go upon here is this—that there is nothing at all on the face of the proceedings or in the facts to show that the conviction was quashed by the quarter sessions on a matter of form. All that appears on the face of the case is that the quarter sessions heard the allegations of counsel as to what he could prove, and thereupon quashed the conviction. Now, if there be any state of things which could have happened which would be consistent with that, it cannot be said that the order of the quarter sessions has upon the face of it evidence of error. Is there, then, such a conceivable state of things? Yes. Suppose the person who has to support the order appealed against opens a state of facts which, if admitted by the opposite counsel, would not make out a case for a conviction, and the quarter sessions, or any other court, sees that that is so, it would be the idlest waste of time to go into evidence on a matter of that kind. It is a thing that happens every day at Nisi Prius and at criminal trials. Counsel opens his case, and states the facts which he is prepared to prove, and the judge says to him, "If you succeed in making out these facts you cannot gain your case." The case then is quite a conceivable one, and the affidavits which have been produced by the other side tend to illustrate it. I do not say that we are to take those affidavits as conclusive, but they show a state of facts on which the justices may have proceeded. But if it be said that the true ground of their decision was their thinking that they saw some defect of form on the conviction, and that they proceeded on that, it is sufficient to say here, without expressing any decided opinion about our competency to sit as a court of error upon the matter, that the affidavits are conflicting; and I know of no authority in support of the position that the court should, on conflicting affidavits, proceed at once to quash an order of the justices at quarter sessions. That is a thing which we cannot do. We must confine ourselves to what appears on the face of the order; and, looking at that, I see nothing more than a statement of facts which, if true, would justify the quarter sessions in making the order which they did.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. As far as I can see, from looking at the conviction, it appears that the conviction was perfectly good. It follows the very words of the Act, and, so far as I am aware, is perfectly valid. If the ground of the decision of the quarter sessions was that the conviction was bad in form, then they were wrong in two things—first, in quashing the conviction on a question of form; and, secondly, in thinking that this particular conviction was wrong in form. I do not wish to decide the question whether, if they had decided the matter on a point of form, we should be entitled to quash their decision on that ground, or whether we should not say that though they were wrong in doing so, yet we are not a court of error to reverse their decision. I wish to guard myself against being supposed to decide that question one way or the other at present. The decision of the quarter sessions may have proceeded on either of two grounds—first, that the conviction was bad in form; secondly, that the defendant was not guilty. They say that, upon reading the said recited conviction, and after hearing the allegations of counsel on both sides, and upon due proof and consideration of the premises, they ordered the conviction to be quashed. Now, it is quite plain that they have jurisdiction to quash if it appears to them that the person accused is not guilty. It is also quite clear that there may be cases in which, without going into any evidence in the matter, they can so decide. The objection on this head therefore fails. As to the point whether we can receive affidavits to show that the quarter sessions were wrong in the conclusion they came to on the subject of the guilt of the person accused, or that the reason given for their decision on the face of their order was not the real reason which influenced them, I think the authorities are very strong to show that we cannot do so. If the justices at quarter sessions do anything maliciously and with a high hand, contrary to law, the proper remedy is by criminal information against them; and, further, I have no doubt that if such a case really existed, and it were brought to the notice of the Lord Chancellor, he would advise Her Majesty to remove such justices from their office. I hope no one will for a moment understand me as saying that the present was a case of this description, for I know nothing whatever about the present case. These affidavits cannot, therefore, be admitted, and, even if they were admitted, as they are directly conflicting, the practical result would be the same.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

SECOND COURT.

SIMPKIN (app.) v. THE JUSTICES OF BIRMINGHAM (respts.).

Excise licence—Special sessions—New tenant—9 Geo. 4 c. 61 ss. 4 and 14.

A person occupying a house in the borough of Birmingham was licensed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to sell excisable liquors by retail to be drunk upon the premises, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. His last licence was dated 10th Oct. 1870, for one year; on the 25th Aug. 1871 he applied at the general annual licensing meeting to renew his licence, and at the adjournment on the 15th Sept. 1871 his application was refused on account of convictions for selling liquors on Sundays, which were recorded against him. Three days after his licence expired by effluxion of time, viz., on the 13th Oct. 1871, he left the premises, and the appellant subsequently entered into possession of them. On the 4th Jan. 1872, at a special session holden under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 4, the appellant applied for a licence until the 10th Oct. following; but at the adjourned special sessions on the 15th Feb. 1872, the justices refused the application on the ground that under the circumstances they had no jurisdiction under the 14th section. By that section if any person duly licensed under this Act shall (before the expiration of such licence) die, or shall be by sickness or other infirmity rendered incapable of keeping an inn, or if any person so licensed shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence it shall be lawful for the justices assembled at a special session to grant to any new tenant or occupier of any house so become unoccupied a licence until the 10th Oct. then next ensuing.

Held, upon a case stated, that the justices of the special session were right, and that the appellant came neither within the words nor the spirit of the Act of Parliament.

CASE stated for the opinion of the court under sect. 11 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, intituled, "An Act to amend the proceedings in courts of general and quarter sessions of the peace in England and Wales, and for the better advancement of justice within the jurisdiction of those courts," by consent of the parties, and under an order of John Unthank, Esq., dated the 13th March 1872.

That Chas. Woodin, the tenant and occupier of a certain house and premises situate in Newtown-row, in the borough of Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, victualler, was under and by virtue of an Act of Parliament 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, intituled "An Act to regulate the granting of licences to keepers of inns, alehouses, and victualling houses in England," duly licensed to sell excisable liquors by retail to be drunk and consumed in the said house and premises by virtue of a licence granted to him by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Inland Revenue, dated 10th Oct. 1870, for one year.

That the said license so granted to the said Chas Woodin, expired on the 10th Oct. 1871, by effluxion of time.

That while in the occupation of the same premises under a similar licence, that is to say, on the 23rd Dec. 1868, the said Chas. Woodin was duly convicted at the police court of the said borough for having, on Sunday the 13th of the same month, as a licensed victualler at the borough aforesaid, otherwise than for refreshment of travellers, opened his said house for the sale of wines, spirits, beer, and other fermented and distilled liquors, before half-past twelve in the afternoon, and fined 5*s.*, and 10*s.* costs; and also that on 2nd Dec. 1870, he was convicted for having on Sunday, 23rd Oct. 1870, as a licensed victualler at the borough aforesaid, otherwise than for refreshment of travellers, opened his house for the sale of wines, spirits, beer, and other fermented and distilled liquors before half-past twelve in the afternoon. And that at the hearing of the last-named charge, he, in the opinion of the magistrate suborned a witness on his behalf to commit perjury, and was fined 5*l.* and 12*s.* costs.

That the said Chas. Woodin in due form of law as provided by the 10th section of the said Act of Parliament, 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, applied at the general annual licensing meeting for the said borough of Birmingham, held on the 25th Aug. 1871, for a renewal of his license, which annual licensing meeting and application were adjourned until the 15th Sept. 1871.

That on the said 15th Sept. the said application of the said Chas. Woodin was refused by the magistrates.

That the said Chas. Woodin gave notice of appeal against the said refusal as provided by the 27th section of the said Act of Parliament, but such appeal was not prosecuted, and he continued to occupy the said house and premises until the 13th Oct. 1871, being three days after his licence expired, but he did not continue to sell excisable liquors by retail under his said licence after expiration thereof on the 10th Oct. 1871.

That on the 30th Dec. 1871, William Simpkin, being then the new tenant or occupier, and in possession of the said house and premises, duly gave the notice required by the 14th section of the said Act of Parliament, alleging that the said Charles Woodin, the person in the occupation of the said house and premises, and duly licensed to sell excisable liquors to be drunk or consumed in such house and premises, having removed from and yielded up possession of such house and premises, it was the intention of him, the said William Simpkin, as the new tenant and occupier of the said house and premises, to apply at the next special session to be holden at the public office in Moor-street, in the said borough of Birmingham and county of Warwick, on the 4th Jan. 1872, being a special session duly convened under the 4th section of the said Act, for a licence to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in the said house and premises, which house he intended to keep as an inn, alehouse, or victualling house.

That the said William Simpkin duly made such application in pursuance of the said notice at the said special session holden on the 4th Jan. 1872; and such special session and application were adjourned until the said 18th Jan., when such application was renewed, and such special session and application were again adjourned until the 15th Feb., when such application was refused on the ground that the magistrates at such special sessions were not authorised under the 14th section of the said Act, to entertain such application because the said Charles Woodin, having remained in possession of the said house and premises until after the expiration of the said licence by effluxion of time, he was not a person so licensed at the time of giving up possession, and that the said William Simpkin was not a new tenant or occupier within the meaning of the said section of the said Act made and passed in the ninth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth.

The said Wm. Simpkin has duly given notice of appeal against the said refusal, and entered into recognizances as required by the 11th section of the Act of Parliament (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45).

The question submitted to the court is: If the court shall be of opinion that the respondents were correct, then the appellant agrees that a judgment in conformity with such decision, and for such costs as the court may adjudge, may be entered on motion by the respondents at the sessions next or next but one after such decision has been given.

If the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the respondents agree that a judgment in conformity with the decision of such court, and for such costs as such court may adjudge, may be entered on motion by the appellant at the session next or next but one after such decision has been given.

H. Matthews, Q.C. for the appellant.—This question depends upon sects. 4 and 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. By sect. 4 it is enacted—

That the justices assembled at the general or quarter sessions which shall be holden at Michaelmas next after the passing of this Act, and at the general annual licensing meeting in every subsequent year, shall appoint not less than four nor more than eight special sessions to be holden in the division or place for which each such meeting shall be holden, in the year next ensuing such general annual licensing meeting, at periods as near as may be equally distant; at which special session it shall be lawful for the justices then and there assembled, in the cases and in the manner and for the time hereinafter directed, to license such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns, as they, the said justices, shall, in the execution of the powers herein contained, and in the exercise of their discretion, deem fit and proper persons under the provisions hereinafter enacted, to be licensed to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed on the premises.

By sect. 14 it is enacted—

That if any person duly licensed under this Act shall (before the expiration of such licence) die, or shall be, by sickness or other infirmity, rendered incapable of keeping an inn, or shall become bankrupt, or shall take the benefit of any Act for the relief of insolvent debtors; or if any person so licensed, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of any person so licensed, shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence; or if the occupier of any such house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted, or shall have neglected to apply, at the general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, for a licence to continue to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house; or if any house being kept as an inn by any person duly licensed as aforesaid, shall be or be about to be pulled down or occupied under the provisions of any Act for the improvement of the highways, for any other public purpose; or shall be by fire, tempest, or other unforeseen and unavoidable calamity, rendered unfit for the reception of travellers, and for the other legal purposes of an inn; it shall be lawful for the justices assembled as aforesaid at a special session, holden under the authority of this Act, for the division or place in which the house so kept or having been kept shall be situate, in any one of the above-mentioned cases, and in such cases only, to grant to the heirs, executors, or administrators of the person so dying, or to the assigns of such person becoming incapable of keeping an inn, or to the assignee or assignees of such bankrupt or insolvent; or to any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied, or to any person to whom such heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns shall, by sale or otherwise, have bonâ fide conveyed, or otherwise made over, his or their interest in the occupation and keeping of such house, a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house or the premises thereunto belonging; or to grant to the person whose house shall, as aforesaid, have been, or shall be about to be, pulled down or occupied for the improvement of the highways, or for any other public purpose, or have become unfit for the reception of travellers, or for the other legal purposes of an inn, and who shall open and keep as an inn some other fit and convenient house, a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed therein — provided always that every such licence shall continue in force only from the day on which it shall be granted until the 5th April or to the 10th Oct. then next ensuing, as the case may be, provided also that every person intending to apply in any of the above-mentioned cases at any such special session for a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in a house or premises thereunto belonging, in which exciseable liquors shall not have been sold by retail to be drunk or consumed on the premises by virtue of a licence granted at the general annual licensing meeting next before such special session shall, on some one Sunday within the six weeks next before such special session, at some time between the hours of ten in the forenoon and of four in the afternoon, affix, or cause to be affixed, on the door of such house, and on the door of the church or chapel of the parish or place in which such house shall be situate, and where there shall be no church or chapel, or such other public and conspicuous place within such parish or place, such and the like notice as is hereinbefore directed to be affixed by every person intending to apply at the general annual licensing meeting for a licence to sell exciseable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in a house not heretofore kept as an inn, and shall in like manner serve copies of the said notice on one of the overseers of the poor, and on one of the constables or other peace officers of such parish or place.

It has been held under this section that a new tenant, taking possession during the existence of the licence of his predecessor, and not having time to give the necessary notices under sect. 10 for the annual general licensing meeting, was not prejudiced by the refusal of his predecessor's application for a renewal at the general sessions, but was entitled to apply at a subsequent special sessions: (Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 781; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 43.) The only difference between that and the present case is that here the previous occupant gave up possession of his house three days after the expiration of his licence, instead of during its continuance, as in that case. The refusal of a licence to the former occupant was also held to be no bar to the application of a new tenant in Reg. v. Justices of the West Riding (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 33).

Field, Q. C., for the respondents.—The scheme of the Act is to make a licence a personal matter, and although there are some provisions for the protection of the landlord's interest, they are exceptional, and must be construed strictly. Sect. 14 relates only to the time of the existence of a licence, and the clause governing this matter is "if any person so licensed shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence." Here Woodin had no licence when he gave up the house, and the application by the appellant was in fact an application to obtain a licence for a new house. By the form of licence in sect. 13 and the schedule C., the licence continues until the day named, and "no longer." The landlord must stand or fall by the acts of his licensee, except in those cases specially provided for in sect. 14.

Matthews, in reply.—This was a change in the tenancy which prevented the appellant from obtaining a licence for the house under ordinary circumstances, and is exactly a matter for which the 14th section was intended to provide. The interpretation of this clause suggested by the other side requires the insertion of the words "at the time of removal," for which there is no authority. It is sufficient if the person has been "so licensed" since the last opportunity another occupant would have of applying to the general sessions.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the sessions were right. After trying for some time to construe the Act, I believe the appellant has not come within the words nor within the spirit of its provisions. Probably the Legislature contemplated by sect. 4, that a person, situated like the applicant in the case of Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, should have an opportunity of going to a special sessions under sect. 9; but in sect. 14 the words are not of themselves sufficient to bear out that intention; they merely refer to the death or incapacity of the previous occupant, or his removal, or his omission to apply for a continuance of his licence, or the house being rendered unfit, and to such cases only. There is nothing about a failure of the previous occupant on the ground of convictions, to obtain a renewal, and his then yielding up possession to another person. If he yields before the conclusion of his licence, there is nothing, taking the two sections together, to prevent his successor applying for a renewal after the general meeting, but we are bound, I think, to limit the change of tenancy to that date; and when a licensed person remains in a house after his licence expires, his successor must apply at the next annual general licensing meeting for a licence to keep the house as an inn not previously kept as such, in pursuance of sect. 10. I thought at first that this was a hard case upon the applicant and the landlord, but upon carefully considering the Act, I think it is by a mere accident, and I doubt whether it is in accordance with the spirit of the whole Act that sect. 14 should apply to all cases where the change of possession occurs even before the 10th Oct. At all events, the landlord's privileges go no further.

SECOND COURT.

NORRIS (app.) v. BARNES (resp.)

Nuisance—Smoke from manufactory of minerals—18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 44—29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, ss. 14 and 19.

The appellants, the occupiers of a manufactory of bichrome, which is the produce of ores and minerals, were charged, upon information, with having, as part of their works, a chimney sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance, under the Sanitary Act 1866, s. 19. The justices found that the smoke from the appellants' chimney was a nuisance, and ordered its abatement:

Held, by Blackburn and Mellor, JJ. (Lush, J. dissenting), that the appellants came within the exemption contained in the Nuisances Removal Act 1855, s. 44, of mines, smelting, and the manufacturing of the produce of ores and minerals; that these two Acts, being, by sect. 14 of the later Act, to be construed as one, the exemption in the earlier Act applied to the nuisances created by the later Act; and that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order.

THE following case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, under the provisions of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the West Riding of the county of York:—

By the 14th section of the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, part 2) it is, amongst other things, enacted that:

The expression "Nuisances Removal Acts" shall mean the Acts passed in the years following of the reign of her present Majesty, that is to say, the one in the session of the 18th and 19th years, c. 121; the other in the session of the 23rd and 24th years, s. 77, as amended by this (the second) part of this Act, and this part of this Act shall be construed as one with the said Acts.

By the 19th section of the said At it is enacted that:

The word "nuisances" under the Nuisance Removal Acts, shall include, inter alia, Any fireplace or furnace which does not, as far as practicable, consume smoke arising from the combustible used in such fireplace or furnace, and is used within the district of a nuisance authority for working engines by steam, or in any mill, factory, dyehouse, brewery, bakehouse, or gas work, or in any manufactory or trade process whatsoever: Any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance.

By the second proviso to the said 19th section it is provided:

That where a person is summoned before the justices, in respect of a nuisance arising from a fireplace or furnace which does not consume the smoke, arising from the combustible used in such fireplace or furnace, the justices may hold that no nuisance is created within the meaning of this Act, and dismiss the complaint, if they are satisfied that such fireplace or furnace is constructed in such manner as to consume, as far as practicable, having regard to the nature of the manufacture or trade, all smoke arising therefrom, and that such fireplace or furnace has been carefully attended to by the person having the charge thereof.

By the 44th section of the Act passed in the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121 (being one of the Acts incorporated with the Sanitary Act 1866, part 2) it is enacted, inter alia, that:

The provisions of this Act shall not extend or be construed to extend to mines of different descriptions, so as to interfere with or obstruct the efficient working of the same, or to the smelting of ores and minerals, or to the manufacturing of the produce of such ores and minerals.

On the 13th June the appellants were summoned to answer the complaint of the respondent, an inhabitant of Sowerby Bridge in the parish of Halifax, in the West Riding of the county of York, for that they the appellants on 3rd June inst., at the district of Sowerby Bridge in the riding aforesaid "unlawfully did send forth black smoke from a certain chimney situate on the west side of, and near to the Sowerby Bridge Gasworks, belonging to certain premises called 'Calder Works,' in the occupation of the appellants (not being the chimney of a private dwelling house), in such quantity as to be a nuisance, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided." But no prior order had been made for the removal of or to discontinue using the said chimney.

The summons came on for hearing on the 1st July 1871, when it was proved on behalf of the respondent that he was an inhabitant of Sowerby Bridge in the said parish. That black smoke did issue from the said chimney on the day in question at different intervals, for periods of time amounting altogether to twenty-eight minutes of the one hour during which it was watched, in such a quantity as to be a nuisance. That Calder Works were in the occupation of the appellants, and that the said premises were used as a manufactory, and not as a private dwelling house.

On the part of the appellants it was then proved hat the chimney complained of communicated with four furnaces, which were all used solely for the manufacture of bichrome, and that bichrome was the product of ores and minerals. That in three of the furnaces ironstone and limestone were put in, and in the fourth limestone, small coal and potash were placed to produce a substance necessary for, and used solely in the manufacture of bichrome in the other three furnaces. That, in order to manufacture bichrome, it is necessary to have a flame in the furnaces used for that purpose 17ft. in length, and that the necessary flame could not be produced either from coke or wood, but only from coal; but in cross-examination it was shown that the defendants had formerly carried on the process of bichrome manufacture in their present premises by the use of coke, and there was then no nuisance of black smoke from the chimney: but it was stated that bichrome, manufactured in furnaces in which coke was used as the combustible, was less in quantity by ten per cent. than when coal was so used; and it also appeared that the ore which had been smelted by coke for the production of bichrome was inferior in quality to the ore which had been subsequently used for that purpose with coal as the combustible. It also was stated by the defendants that by the use of coke they could not extract the full quantity of bichrome from the richer material now used by them. That the black smoke which it was proved that the chimney sent forth was smoke produced by the use of coal in the said furnaces for the purpose of manufacturing bichrome. That the appellants had tried experiments to make the chimney consume its own smoke, and that they had fitted up and had a smoke-consuming apparatus in work at the furnaces in question at the time of the nuisance complained of, but from the evidence it did not appear to be efficient for the purpose. Witnesses were also called to prove that the furnaces during the several periods when the said chimney sent out the black smoke had been carefully attended to by the several persons who had the charge thereof, but one of the defendants expressly stated that they could not by any known mode consume the smoke so long as coal was used as the combustible. From the evidence before the justices it was not proved to their satisfaction that by the use of coke as a combustible, bichrome could not be manufactured of equal quality to that produced by the use of coal, but it appeared to them that there would be an increased quantity of bichrome produced by the use of coal over coke, thus leaving a larger profit to the manufacturer.

It was also contended on the part of the appellants that the justices ought not to make any order upon the summons, but ought to dismiss the complaint for the reasons: First, that the manufactory carried on by means of the chimney, which sent out the black smoke, was a manufactory of the produce of ores and minerals, and, therefore, did not come within the Acts in question; secondly, that the furnaces in question were constructed in such a manner as to consume as far as practicable, having regard to the nature of the manufacture of bichrome, all smoke arising therefrom, and that the furnaces had been carefully attended to by the persons having charge thereof.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the information being laid under the latter part of the 3rd sub-section of the 19th section of the Sanitary Act 1866, neither the previous part of the said 19th section, nor the second proviso to the said 19th section, applied to this information.

Being satisfied by the evidence laid before them on the part of the respondent, that black smoke was on the day in question sent forth from the said chimney in such a quantity as to be a nuisance, and that the same might be prevented by the use of coke as a combustible: and being of opinion that notwithstanding the proviso, and the said 44th section of the Act of 1855, the said appellants were not justified in committing so serious a nuisance for the sake of profit, more or less, which might be derived, the justices made an order upon the appellants for the abatement of the nuisance, and for the payment of certain costs; and the appellants, being dissatisfied with this decision, requested the justices to state a case for the opinion of this honourable court.

The question was, whether they ought, upon the evidence laid before them by the appellants, to have dismissed the complaint.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the order was to be quashed; if in the negative, then it was to stand and to be carried into effect.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Beresford) argued for the appellants.—The Legislature has thought fit to exclude manufactories of ores and minerals from the operation of the special remedies for nuisance provided by this series of acts. These remedies are highly penal, and every doubtful expression must be construed in favour of the parties against whom they are to be put in force; an exemption of a particular class of persons from the effect of these remedies cannot be repealed by implication. [The other point raised by the justices was not argued.]

Field, Q.C. (with him R. G. Williams) for the respondent.—This latter part of sect. 44 of the Act of 1855, is impliedly repealed by the very strong words in sect. 19 of the Act of 1866, "in any manufactory or trade process whatsoever:" or if it still stands, its application is limited to the provisions of the Act of which it forms a part. Sect 8 contains the list of what were to be deemed nuisances under that Act of 1855; and until the extension of that list in the Act of 1866, the exemption in sect. 44 could only apply to "Any premises in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health," or to "Any accumulation or deposit which is a nuisance or injurious to health." It cannot be believed that it could have been intended by the Legislature in 1866, to exempt the premises of a mineral manufactory from the provisions of the Sanitary Act concerning an overcrowded house, or a workshop insufficiently ventilated, which are the other things included with smoke-causing furnaces and chimneys in the definition of nuisances in sect. 19 of that Act. That section enacts that "the word 'nuisances,' under the Nuisance Removal Acts, shall include" the further matters there mentioned, but it does not necessarily mean that all the provisions concerning what were nuisances before should apply to these further nuisances. The only words upon which the appellants can base their exemption from being included in any manufactory or trade process whatsoever, are those in section 14, "this part of this Act shall be construed as one with the said Acts."

Manisty in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—This case lies in a small compass, but the point raised is not easy to decide. In my opinion Mr. Manisty is right, and we cannot apply the power given to justices to convict for a smoke nuisance to manufactories of the produce of ores and minerals. 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121 has by sect. 8 included in the definition of nuisances some new matters, none of which by sect. 44 were to extend to mines or the manufactory of ores and minerals. The remedy for a nuisance was given by sect. 12, by which justices might make an order of abatement. The words of the 44th section are, in my opinion, such as to render it impossible to say that, as the legislation concerning nuisances then stood, there could be any order of abatement affecting the manufactory of the produce of ores and minerals. 29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, was intended to meet and prevent many other nuisances besides those previously dealt with, amongst them, unnecessary smoke from any manufactory or trade process whatsoever. That Act by itself would, without doubt, meet the case before us, but unfortunately, by sect. 14, it is enacted that the Act shall be construed as one with two earlier Acts; in one of these, the Nuisances Removal Act 1865, sect. 8, there is a list of matters which "nuisances" are defined to include. Similarly, in sect. 19 of the Act of 1866 "Nuisances" are defined to include other matters. Construing these two Acts together, as required, we must read "Nuisances" to include the whole of the matters in both these sections; and sect. 44, which was passed originally to affect only the first list must, upon construing the acts as one, be read to affect all nuisances. I entirely agree with what has been said on behalf of the respondent's view, that it is obviously absurd to apply this exemption with respect to mines, smelting, and the manufacturing of the produce of ores and minerals, to the nuisances created by the Act of 1866. I cannot think that the Legislature could have meant it, but as they have to my mind clearly said it, we can only leave them to mend it. I think these Acts have failed to give justices jurisdiction over nuisances arising in the cases described in sect. 44 of the Act of 1855.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The effect of the Act of 1866 is, I think, only to extend the application of the earlier Acts to other nuisances than those before provided for, and it in no sense repeals the exemptions which before existed.

LUSH, J.—I am sorry to differ from the judgment of the majority, but it does not appear to me that the Legislature obliges us to put a construction upon these Acts which is different from their obvious intention. The nuisances provided for in the Act of 1855 are few in number, and by sect. 44 mines and manufactories of minerals are exempted from the special remedies enacted for those nuisances. It seems to me, however, that the exemption may well be limited to the nuisances there described, and it need not be read to apply to another class of nuisances which had not then been created.

BLACKBURN, J.—This is far too doubtful a case to carry costs.

GASLIGHT AND COKE COMPANY v. VESTRY OF ST. GEORGE, HANOVER-SQUARE.

Construction of statute—Incorporation of inconsistent provisions—23 & 24 Vict. c. 125—31 & 32 Vict. c. cvi.—31 & 32 Vict. c. cxxv.

The plaintiffs were one of the gas companies included in the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, and under sect. 36 they had elected to adopt its provisions. In 1868 The City of London Gas Act and the Gaslight and Coke Company's Act, two local Acts, received the Royal assent on the same day. By the former of these two Acts certain provisions in the Act of 1860, concerning the purity and illuminating power of gas, were repealed, and others were enacted in their stead. By the latter of these two Acts, which was an Act promoted by the plaintiffs, it was enacted that the plaintiffs' company should be and continue subject to the powers and provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, as if this Act were not passed, so far as the same were not varied by this Act; and that nothing in this Act contained should exempt the plaintiffs' company or their gasworks from the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860. It was also enacted that if the former of these two local Acts should pass into a law in that session, then the plaintiffs' company and their undertaking should be subject to the provisions of the City of London Gas Act.

Held, in an action to recover the price of gas supplied to the defendants, the amount of which depended upon whether the plaintiffs were bound by the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, repealed by the City of London Gas Act 1868, that the plaintiffs were, by the terms of their Act of 1868, subject to all restrictions imposed upon them for the benefit of the public, by both the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, and the City of London Gas Act 1868.

The Gaslight and Coke Company, hereinafter called the company, sued the vestry of the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, hereinafter called the vestry, for gas supplied for lighting the public lamps within the said parish, and for maintaining, cleaning, and keeping in repair the said lamps, and upon accounts stated; and claimed 2160*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.*

The vestry paid into court 1787*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.*, and denied their liability to pay the residue, upon which issue was joined.

The cause came on to be tried before Mellor, J., and a special jury, on the 13th Feb. 1871, and a verdict was recorded for the plaintiffs for 373*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*, being the balance of the claim above the payment into court, subject to the opinion of the said court of Queen's Bench upon a special case, to be stated in the event of any disagreement by the parties or either of them, by Henry Manisty, Esq., Q.C., and subject also to a reduction of the amount of the verdict to be named by the said Henry Manisty, in the event of the court being of opinion that the defendants have a right to any reduction whatever. The company were re-incorporated by the Gaslight and Coke Company's Act 1868, s. 5.

The parish of St. George, Hanover-square (which is without the limits of the City of London and the liberties thereof) has been supplied with gas by the company ever since 1810, when it was first incorporated by Royal Charter; and the vestry which was formerly governed by a private Act of 7 Geo. 4, is now subject to and incorporated by the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855.

The claim by the company in this action against the vestry is in respect of 1162 public or street lamps, and four private lamps or jets used in their office for the six months from the 1st Jan to 30th June 1870. The pleadings were annexed to and formed part of this case. The account delivered before action is as follows:

Total £2160 15*s.* 11*d.*

The particulars in the action stated that the gas supplied to 938 lamps and the 4 jets was of the description called cannel gas, and the gas supplied to 224 lamps was of the description called common gas. That the amount claimed for the cannel gas, including the lighting, cleansing, and repairing of the lamps, is £1763 13*s.* 7*d.*; and the amount claimed in respect of common gas, including the lighting, cleansing, and repairing of the lamps, is £396 12*s.* 4*d.*

Since the particulars were delivered it has been ascertained that the actual number of lamps supplied with cannel gas is 942, and the number supplied with common gas is 220.

Cannel gas of an illuminating power of 23 candles was supplied to 942 lamps consuming 2½ft. per hour, and common gas of an illuminating power of sixteen candles was supplied to 220 lamps consuming 4ft. per hour. The four private lamps or jets in the stoneyard of the Vestry were supplied with cannel gas of the like illuminating power as aforesaid, consuming 3ft. per hour but no question arises in respect of the four lamps or jets.

Upon an estimate of the yearly consumption of cannel gas by each lamp consuming 2½ft. per hour, and of the yearly cost of repairs, &c., the company charged £3 14*s.* 4*d.* per lamp per year. Upon a similar estimate for common gas consumed at 4ft. per hour, and the repairs, the charge would be £3 19*s.* 8*d.* per lamp per year. But as the company could not supply cannel gas to all the lamps, those which consumed common gas were also supplied at £3 14*s.* 4*d.*, including repairs, per lamp per year, being a reduction in favour of the vestry.

The gas mains are the property of, and are laid down by and are under the control of the company, and the company have full power to lay down and carry their cannel gas mains under and along such parts of the parish. But the public have no power to require, nor is the company under any statutory obligation to lay, mains for the supply of a particular kind of gas. The company under the provisions of the Gas-Light and Coke Company's Act 1868, can discontinue the manufacture and supply of cannel gas altogether upon giving three months' notice thereof.

In certain parts of the parish there were and are no cannel gas mains, of which fact the vestry had notice, and knew that cannel gas could not be supplied in those parts of the parish, and it was agreed in the year 1857 between the company and the vestry, that in those parts burners should be used which consumed 5ft. per hour of common gas, which is equal to 2½ft. per hour of cannel gas of the illuminating power of fifteen candles, and that a uniform charge per lamp should be made to the vestry for an uniform illuminating power throughout the parish.

Up to the year 1861, the plaintiffs had supplied the defendants with gas upon the terms of a written contract between them.

By the Metropolis Gas Act 1860 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 125), s. 4:

The words 'common gas' shall mean gas of an illuminating power, hereinafter defined of not less than twelve candles. The words 'cannel gas' shall mean gas of an illuminating power hereinafter defined of not less than twenty candles.

By sect. 25:

The quality of the common gas supplied by any gas company shall be, with respect to its illuminating power, at a distance as near as may be of 1000 yards from the works, such as to produce from an Argand burner, having fifteen holes, and a 7in. chimney, consuming 5 cubic feet of gas an hour, a light equal in intensity to the light produced by not less than twelve sperm candles of six to the pound, each burning 120 grains an hour; and the quality of cannel gas supplied by any gas company shall, with respect to its illuminating power at the distance aforesaid, be such as to produce from a batswing or fishtail burner, consuming 5ft. of gas per hour, a light equal in intensity to twenty such sperm candles; and each such gas shall, with respect to its purity, be so far free from ammonia and sulphuretted hydrogen, that it shall not discolour either turmeric paper, or paper imbued with acetate or carbonate of lead, when those tests are exposed to a current of gas issuing for one minute under a pressure of five-tenths of an inch of water, and shall not contain more than twenty grains of sulphur in any form in 100 cubic feet of gas.

By sect. 26 a penalty of 50*l.* by summary conviction is imposed upon a gas company for supplying gas of less illuminating power or of less purity than according to this Act it ought to be.

By sect. 27:

Every local authority taking any supply of gas according to this Act, shall provide all proper and sufficient apparatus, machinery, and instruments, for testing the illuminating power and purity of the gas, and from time to time shall appoint, and out of any funds applicable by them for their local purposes may pay, a chemical examiner of gas engineer, or other competent person, to be an examiner for the purposes of this Act; and every gas company shall within six months after the passing of this Act, cause to be erected in some convenient place, as near as may be to 1000 yards from their works . . . an experimental meter, furnished with a suitable burner, capable of consuming 5 cubic feet of gas per hour, with other necessary apparatus for testing the illuminating power of the gas.

By sect. 28:

The examiner . . . when and so often as is necessary, or as he is so directed by the local authority appointing him, shall examine the illuminating power and the purity of the gas applied, and shall present to the local authority, so often as they require, a report stating the number of examinations on which the report is founded, and the maximum, minimum, and average illuminating power and purity, or the illuminating power and purity from day to day, or at longer intervals, of the gas supplied during the whole period to which the report relates, with such other information and remarks thereon as may be deemed necessary.

By sect. 36:

All contracts made or existing before the 1st Jan. 1860, between any of the gas companies included in this Act, and any local authority, for or relating to the supply of gas, shall terminate on the 1st Feb. 1862, and thereafter the provisions of this Act in all particulars shall apply to such company; provided that from the time of the passing of this Act until the said 1st Feb. 1862, the provisions of this Act relating to price, purity, and illuminating power of gas shall not apply to any such company, unless such company shall elect to adopt them.

The company did elect to adopt the provisions of the said Act, as to price, purity, and illuminating power, and continued to supply the vestry with gas for the public lamps in the same manner as previously, and upon terms agreed upon by letters between them; the vestry paid to the company the amount due upon these terms without remonstrance until Jan. 1870.

On the 13th July 1868, two Acts of Parliament received the Royal assent, viz., The Gaslight and Coke Company's Act, and the City of London Gas Act.

By the City of London Gas Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cxxv.), s. 2, "this Act shall be read as one with the Act of 1860."

By sect. 3:

Such parts of the Act of 1860 as are described in the first schedule to this Act, and any part of any special Act of any company inconsistent with this Act, as far only as they respectively relate to the companies and the City, are hereby repealed.

Amongst the repealed sections mentioned in the schedule, sects. 25, 26, 27, and 28 are included.

By sect. 29, the Board of Trade shall appoint three competent and impartial persons, who shall be called the gas referees.

By sect. 33:

The gas referees shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, from time to time prescribe and certify the mode to be adopted for testing and recording the illuminating power of gas supplied by the companies, and the number of the times of testing.

By sect. 36:

The gas referees shall from time to time ascertain with what degree of purity each company can reasonably be required to make and supply gas continuously, without occasioning a nuisance to the neighbourhood in which the works are situate, and shall thereupon prescribe and certify the maximum amount of impurity in each form with which gas supplied by the company shall be allowed to be charged, and the time from which the allowance thereof shall be enforced as against each company, regard being had to the necessity for any alteration of works by a company consequent on any such certificate.

By sect. 37:

The gas referees shall from time to time prescribe and certify the mode to be adopted for testing and recording the purity of gas supplied by the companies, and the number of the times of testing.

By sect. 40:

The gas referees shall from time to time prescribe and certify what testing places, and what apparatus therein for testing the illuminating power and purity of gas, shall be provided by each company.

By sect. 44 the Corporation shall appoint a gas examiner for each of these testing places.

By sects. 46 to 52 the gas examiners shall test daily the illuminating power and purity of gas supplied by the company, and report to the Corporation, the chief gas examiner, and the company.

By sects. 53, and 54, the gas (except cannel gas) supplied by each company, shall be of an illuminating power of not less than sixteen candles, and the maximum price chargeable by any company shall be at the rate of 3*s.* 9*d.* per 1000 cubic feet.

By sect. 56 the maximum price chargeable by a company for cannel gas shall be at such rate per 1000 cubic feet as for gas of the illuminating power supplied by that company will be proportional to the price of 3*s.* 9*d.* per 1000 cubic feet, for sixteen candle gas.

By sect. 73:

If on any day the gas supplied by a company from any station is of less illuminating power than it ought to be under this Act, the company shall forfeit a sum equal to the value of the defective power, estimated at the rate of 20*s.* for every half candle of defective power on every 100,000 cubic feet, or any fractional part less than 100,000 cubic feet of gas, whether cannel or common respectively, made at that station on the day of default.

By sect. 74:

If on any day the gas supplied by a company from any station is of less purity than it ought to be under this Act, the company shall forfeit a sum of 50*l.* for each station in respect of which they are so in default.

On the 15th Dec. 1869, the company addressed the following letter, in the form of a printed circular, by their secretary to the vestry:—

Chartered Gas Company, Chief Office, Horseferry-road, Westminster, S.W., 15th Dec. 1869.

Sir,—I am instructed to inform you that, in pursuance of the City of London Gas Act 1868, the illuminating power of the common gas supplied by this company will, on and after the 1st Jan. next, be increased to sixteen candles, and the price will at the same time be reduced to 3*s.* 9*d.* per 1000 cubic feet. The illuminating power of the cannel gas will, on and after the same day, and in pursuance of the same Act, be increased to twenty-three candles, and the price will be reduced to 5*s.* 5*d.* per 1000 cubic feet.—Your obedient servant, JOHN O. PHILLIPS, Secretary.

The cannel gas supplied to the vestry was of the illuminating power of twenty-three candles, and the price named in the said letter was according to the requirements of the said 56th section of the City of London Gas Act 1868.

By the Gaslight and Coke Company's Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cvi.), s. 8:

The company shall be and continue subject to the powers and provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, and of any Act passed, or hereafter to be passed, for amending the same, and entitled to the powers and privileges of those Acts, as if this Act were not passed, so far as the same are not varied by this Act.

By sect. 109:

If the Bill, the short title of which, when passed, is intended to be "The City of London Gas Act" (in this Act referred to as the City Gas Act), now pending, pass into a law in the present session, then the company and their undertaking shall be subject to the provisions of the City Gas Act without, as well as within, the City of London and the liberties thereof, and such Act shall extend to the whole undertaking of the company; and for the purposes of the City Gas Act, in relation to the undertaking of the company beyond the limits of the City of London and the liberties thereof, the Metropolitan Board of Works shall have all the same rights, powers, authorities, and obligations, as are given to or imposed upon the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London in the City Gas Act, as fully as if that board had been named in such Act instead of the said mayor, aldermen, and commons, so far as relates to the part of the undertaking of the company beyond the limits of the city.

By sect. 110:

Nothing in this Act contained shall exempt the company or their gasworks from the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, or the Act for Regulating Measures used in Sales of Gas, as amended by subsequent Acts, or any other general Act already or hereafter passed, in the present or any future session of Parliament, for regulating gas companies in the metropolis, or for regulating the supply or sale of gas in the metropolis, and applicable to the company, or from any future revision and alteration by Parliament of the gas rents and meter rents by this Act authorised.

The company contend that their whole undertaking is now subject to the provisions of the City of London Gas Act 1868 as to illuminating power, price, and purity of the gas, and not to the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860, which, so far as the company are concerned, is repealed in those respects as well as to the mode of testing. The vestry contend that the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860 are, so far as the company are concerned with and as affects the said supply of gas to the said 1162 lamps, unrepealed and in full force.

In pursuance of the provisions of the City of London Gas Act 1868, the Board of Trade has appointed gas referees and fixed testing places where the gas has been daily tested, and the gas examiners have daily furnished the Board of Trade, the chief gas examiner, and the company, with the previous day's testings.

All the gas supplied to the vestry has been duly tested accordingly at 17, Arundel-street, Haymarket, and daily reports of illuminating power and purity have been furnished by the gas examiner.

From these reports it appears that the gas supplied during the said six months by the company to the vestry was above the illuminating power and purity required by the Acts of 1868, except on two occasions—viz., 4th May and 15th June—when the common gas was 15·6 and 15·9 instead of 16 candles; and on the 17th Jan. and 11th June, when the cannel gas was 22·5 and 21·1 instead of 23 candles.

The gas referees have not up to the present time certified the number of grains of sulphur beyond which the gas shall not be allowed to be charged.

In reply to an application by the company for payment by the vestry of the quarter's account for gas to March 1870, the following letter and copy of a resolution were sent to the company on the 5th May 1870:

St. George, Hanover-square Board Room,
Mount-street, London, W., May 5th, 1870.

Dear Sir,—I beg to forward you the copy of resolution agreed to to-day, when your company's account to Lady-day last for lighting street lamps was laid before the vestry of this parish. Will you please lay the same before the directors of your company?—I remain, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

J. H. SMITH, Vestry Clerk.

T. Bunk, Esq., Secretary,
Chartered Gas Company.

[Copy resolution referred to in letter.]

"At a meeting of the vestry duly assembled on Thursday, 5th May 1870, present the Rev. H. Howarth, B.D., rector, in the chair, &c., &c., resolved unanimously That the account of the Chartered Gas Company to Lady-day last be disputed, on the two-fold ground that the common gas is not of the quality specified in the circular of the gas company of Dec. 1869; and that the cannel gas as represented is not such, but gas made from a mixture of inferior coal.'—Extract from the Minutes. J. H. SMITH, Vestry Clerk."

The vestry did not before action brought make any complaint whatever of the purity or quality of the gas being supplied in the said half-year other than by the said letter of the 5th May 1870. They now complain that the company did not during the said six months supply the said lamps with such gas as they were bound to supply, and contend that on the facts stated they are not liable, if at all, beyond the amount paid into court.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the provisions of the Metropolis Gas Act 1860 are in force and binding on the company as respects the supply of gas to the said 1162 lamps.

If the court decide the question in the affirmative, the verdict entered for the plaintiffs is to be vacated, and a verdict entered for the defendants with costs; or to stand for the plaintiffs with costs for such amount as the said Henry Manisty shall find to be due, or as the said Henry Manisty shall direct.

Otherwise the verdict is to stand, with costs subject to such reduction in the amount thereof as the said Henry Manisty shall direct, provided that the court are of opinion the defendants are entitled to any reduction.

Pollock, Q. C. (with him Besley) argued for the plaintiffs.—The effect of the two Acts of 1868 is to make the illuminating power the test of the gas to be supplied; this does away, therefore, with the test of purity imposed by the Act of 1860, except so far as that matter rests in the discretion of the gas examiners and referees appointed by the City of London Gas Act 1868. The defendants contend that the plaintiffs are still subject to the purity test of 1860, as well as to the illuminating test, and the examination of the Board of Trade officers, as instituted by the City of London Gas Act 1868. On that point the two Acts are inconsistent, for the earlier one makes twelve candles the standard of light, and the later makes sixteen candles the standard. [BLACKBURN, J.—The plaintiffs were the promoters of the second Act of 1868; and the meaning of the Legislature, to be derived from sects. 109 and 110, may be this: "We are content to oblige you by putting you under all the restrictions of the City of London Gas Act 1868, but we will not set you free from the other Act of 1860. You must be bound by the earlier Act; but if the referees find that you can procure a greater purity than that Act requires, you shall also be subject to their discretion." MELLOR, J.—The gas consumers would then have the benefit of both Acts.] That would be a very hard construction upon the plaintiffs, for if they had not adopted the provisions of the City Gas Act they would have been bound under the Act of 1860 to provide only three-fourths of the illumination now required. [BLACKBURN, J.—When the plaintiffs were promoting their private Act in 1868, they asked a great many boons from the Legislature. The committees may have said, "We will grant you this Act, but we will attach a condition to it, namely, that all those further restrictions for the benefit of the public which the City of London Gas Act contains shall apply to you, although the clauses in that Act which would relieve you from the restrictions of the earlier Act shall not apply. You shall be subject to both Acts so far as the public can derive any benefit from them." Has not the Legislature expressed this in sections 109 and 110 of the plaintiffs' private Act of 1868?] If the Act of 1860 is to be read with this private Act, other persons besides the plaintiffs would be affected by it. Sect. 27 of the Metropolis Gas Act provides that every local authority taking any supply of gas shall provide all proper and sufficient apparatus for testing the illuminating power and purity of the gas, and may appoint a chemical examiner, and shall also erect an experimental meter. By the City of London Gas Act these matters are all to be cared for by the Board of Trade; and in consequence there would be a double testing process going on unnecessarily at the same time.—[BLACKBURN, J.—The Legislature may possibly have so ntended. I do not find that to be a difficulty.] There is not one word in the findings of fact contained in the case, to support the resolution of the vestry passed on the 5th May 1870, and the gas referees have not yet made any certificate. [BLACKBURN, J.—If we decide that the Gas Act of 1860 still applies, it will be for Mr. Manisty to ascertain whether there is to be any deduction from the plaintiffs' claim; and if the amount of deduction is such that the money paid into court is sufficient to cover the amount due to the company, I apprehend that there will be a verdict for the defendants. We have solely to inquire whether the Act of 1860 is still in force and then leave Mr. Manisty to apply our decision according to the circumstances.] By sect. 26 of the Metropolis Act a most stringent power is created against a gas company, by which it may forfeit 50*l.* upon a summary conviction, if the gas be of less illuminating power or purity than prescribed by that Act; and by the City Gas Act, sects. 73 and 74, this same gas company is subject to further provisions of forfeiture. [BLACKBURN, J.—And why not? The Legislature has furnished an additional protection to the public in return for the advantages which have been granted to the company. There are two conditions imposed: the first is by sect. 109, that the plaintiffs are to be subject to anything provided for the benefit of the public in the Act passed at the same time; the second is by sect. 110, that the plaintiffs are not to be exempted from any provisions for the benefit of the public contained in the Act of 1860. This is confirmed by sect. 8 of the plaintiff's private Act 1868.] The 110th section must refer only to those provisions of the Metropolitan Gas Act 1860 which are not repealed by the City Gas Act 1868. [LUSH, J.—Then that section would be unnecessary.] Sections to this effect are often inserted in Acts of Parliament with no other object than greater caution.

Streeten for the defendants.—If the court decide this question in the affirmative, the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to be vacated, and a verdict is to be entered for the defendants with costs. [BLACKBURN, J.—No, we adopt the other alternative, and the case must go back to Mr. Manisty. If it is proved (which does not seem to have been found as a fact) that the gas was impure, he will say how much deduction shall be made, and if that deduction covers all the amount in dispute, then the verdict will be for the defendants; otherwise it will be for the plaintiffs, for such sum as he thinks fit. It would be a monstrous injustice, and a very hard bargain for the company, that if there were a single gallon of gas deficient in quality, or a grain of ammonia beyond the purity prescribed, they were to forfeit the whole.]

BLACKBURN, J.—We decide that the Act of 1860 does apply to this company, and that this case must go back to the arbitrator, to be dealt with as he thinks right.

MELLOR and LUSH, JJ. concurred.

(Before KELLY, C.B., and MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and CLEASBY, BB.)

WHITECHURCH AND OTHERS v. THE EAST LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Poor rate—Railway company—Rating of lands taken under compulsory powers—Liability of company to make good deficiency in rate—East London Railway Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. 7, s. 128).

The defendants, under the powers given them by their special Act, had taken certain lands for the purpose of constructing various railways, one of which passed through the parish of which the plaintiffs are overseers.

Under sect. 128 of their Act (28 Vict. c. li), corresponding to sect. 133 of the L. C. C. Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), the defendants are liable to make good the deficiency in the rates of any parish in which they shall have taken rateable property for the purposes of their railway, "until the railway or the works thereof are completed and assessed, or liable to be assessed to such rates."

Held (dissentiente Martin, B.), by Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell and Cleasby, BB. (distinguishing Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 608; 40 L. J. 113, M. C.), that such liability ceased as soon as such portion of the railway and works thereof as was situated in the plaintiffs' parish was completed and opened for traffic, and had thereby become rateable property.

Per Martin, B., contra, Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company, in the Q. B. is directly in point and governs the present case.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the court by consent of the parties. The facts, as set forth in the special case, were as follows:—

The plaintiffs are the Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor in the Parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, and the defendants are the East London Railway Company, incorporated by the East London Railway Act, 1865.

The company are possessed of some lands for the purposes of their Act. The lands taken in the parishes of Deptford and Rotherhithe have been appropriated to and form a completed railway, and the land taken by the company in other parishes is being used for the purpose of constructing the incompleted portions of the unfinished railways authorised by the Act. Clause 22 of the East London Railway Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. li.), specifies the railways which the company were authorised to make, and which said railways, when complete, are to be called the East London Railway, referred to in the said Act. They are therein described as Railways No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, No. 4,

No. 5, No. 6, and No. 7, respectively. No. 1 is the principal line, and is to commence in Bethnal-green and to terminate at New Cross, Deptford, passing in its course through the Thames Tunnel, and through, amongst others, the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe. The case proceeds as follows: "6. As much of Railway No. 1 as is within the parishes of Rotherhithe and Deptford is complete, and also the stations thereof. So much of the said Railway No. 1 as is in the parish of Wapping is also nearly finished. The completed part aforesaid is let to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, under an agreement dated the 17th Nov. 1869, confirmed by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 55, s. 16. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company opened the said completed portion of Railway No. 1, for traffic in December, 1869, and have ever since occupied and worked it. 7. The whole of the Railway No 1, is also completed, and is let to and worked by the said Brighton Company under the said agreement; but Railways No. 2, No. 3, No. 5, No. 6, and No. 7, are commenced but not completed. 8. Clause 128 of the said East London Railway Act provides that:

If and while the company are possessed under this Act of any land assessed or liable to be assessed to any sewer rate, consolidated rate, poor rate, police rate, main drainage rate, church rate, or other parochial or ward rate, they shall from time to time, until the railway or the works thereof are completed and assessed or liable to be assessed, be liable to make good the deficiency in the assessment for such rates by reason of those lands being taken or used for the purposes of the railway or works, and the deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which those lands with any building thereon are now rated.

And accordingly, pursuant to such clause, the defendants, whilst they were constructing their railway within the plaintiffs' said parish, paid to the plaintiffs the deficiency of rates in their parish; but after that portion of the railway from New Cross to Wapping station was so completed, the defendants considered it 'liable to be assessed,' within the meaning of the said clause, and refused to pay to the plaintiffs, as by them required, any farther sum for the deficiency of rates within their parish under that section."

9. Concurrently with the defendants so refusing to pay, the said Brighton Company claimed of the plaintiffs to be rated in respect of the said completed portion of railway within their (the plaintiffs') said parish, as the sole occupiers thereof, upon the true gross and rateable value thereof, and they the said Brighton Company were afterwards rated by the plaintiffs in the rate made by them on the 13th April 1870, upon the sum of 1181*l.* 15*s.*, rateable value, which rate was based upon the same rentals as those in respect of which the defendants had paid rates during the construction of the said portion of railway No. 1. The said Brighton Company, however, objected to such rating, alleging that the true rateable value of the portion of railway within the plaintiffs' said parish was 150*l.*, and they accordingly claimed as sole occupiers thereof to be assessed at that sum in lieu of the sum of 1181*l.* 15*s.*, the amount at which the property on the site of which the railway had been constructed was originally assessed.

10. The plaintiffs did not collect the said rate from the said Brighton Company, being advised that they were in error in rating them, and contended that the defendants were and are liable, under the said clause 128 of the said East London Railway Act to make good the deficiency in the assessment for rates, notwithstanding that so much of the said railway No. 1 is, as before stated, completed within the plaintiffs' said parish, and is occupied and used by the Brighton Company under the said agreement for the purposes herein mentioned.

11. The deficiency in the assessment of rates made by the plaintiffs in their said parish on the 13th April and the 5th Oct. 1870 amounts in the whole to 310*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendants are liable to pay the said deficiency.

Prentice, Q.C. (with him Morgan Howard) for the plaintiffs. — The question is, have the company, under the provisions of the Acts, to make up the deficiency until the whole line, or till that part of the line which lies within the parish, is complete. The section says, "the railway or the work thereof;" this clearly means the railway authorised by the company's Act, and not only a part of it. See

Reg. v. Metropolitan District Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 698; 40 L. J. 113, M. C.;
Wheeler and others v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 984; 38 L. J. 165, Ex.; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 303; Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 193; 40 L. J. 30, M. C.

Sect. 128 of the East London Railway Company corresponds with sect. 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and must be construed in the same way. There are two things required to exempt the company from their liability—first, that the railway undertaken by them shall be completed; secondly, that it shall be assessed or liable to be assessed. This is a stronger case than Reg. v. Metropolitan District Railway Company. There the whole system of railways had to be completed. Here we only contend that the liability extends till the completion of railway No. 1.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C. (Poland with him) for the defendant.—Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company is distinguishable, for there the railway was not completed within the parish. It was an assessment of St. James's parish on the railway as far as Westminster-bridge, beyond which spot there was a portion in the same parish unfinished. It is manifest that great injustice would be done if there were such delay as the decision in Wheeler v. Metropolitan Board of Works contemplates in the case of a long railway, say extending for some hundreds of miles. The true principle is, that the deficiency is to be made up, so long as there is not a rateable property in the parish to take the place of the former rateable property which has been compulsorily taken. Where houses have been taken and pulled down, as soon as you have a place to rate instead of those houses, as, for instance, a practical working railway in the parish, the rating should take place; till then the old rating has to be supplied. Parochiality is the basis of these assessments. Further, in this case an assessment of the railway has actually taken place, and the act of the plaintiffs in making an assessment shows that the time for assessment has arrived, and is an act from which they ought not to be permitted to retreat.

Prentice in reply.—All depends on the words of the Act. Read by the light of the interpretation clause, it is difficult to see how "the railway" in sect. 128 can mean the part of the railway in the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe. The very reason why the completion of the railway is the period allotted for beginning to assess, is that then the railway is presumably more valuable. As to the assessment which has taken place, this court has never decided that the parish cannot at once assess if they prefer it. The Mayor of London v. St. Alban's, Holborn (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 665; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 574; 36 L. J., M. C. 95) only shows that you cannot recover the deficiency by rate.

CLEASBY, B.—I am called upon to deliver my opinion first on this case, because, as I understand at present, the court is not unanimous. It appears to me that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court. The question turns entirely upon the construction of the 128th section of the East London Railway Act of 1865. But I think we cannot deal with that well without considering first what general legislation there has been upon the subject, and first we have the 133rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Now by this section it was enacted that if the promoters of the undertaking become possessed by virtue of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land tax, or liable to be assessed to the poor rate, they shall from time to time, until the work shall be completed and assessed to such land tax or poor rate, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land tax or poor's rates by reason of such lands having been taken for the purposes of the works. I cannot help thinking that if land had been taken in several parishes and made use of, and the works had been completed and assessed to the poor rate in one parish, then the liability to make up the deficiency would not have existed. At the same time I do not find that there is any compulsion upon them to assess. Under certain circumstances, if it were made to appear that they had not assessed for some improper reason, the Court of Queen's Bench, in all probability, would have compelled them to assess. But they were not compelled to assess for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was or was not a deficiency. But it was left to them, and as soon as the property in a particular parish, according to their clear judgment, was in such a condition as to make it for their benefit to assess, they would assess; and the Act of Parliament would be applicable, without reference to the completion of the whole of the works of which the company were promoters. This being the result of general legislation upon the subject, the 128th section of the East London Railway Act introduces other rates besides the poor rate, but it makes use of the words "until the railway or the works thereof are completed and assessed," so far following the words of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but adding, "or liable to be assessed." Now, without dealing with the case referred to from the Court of Queen's Bench, I cannot help thinking that, upon the fair construction of this section, as soon as the railway is completed in a particular parish where the poor rate is made, the statute introduces the idea of parochiality. And as soon as the land taken in the parish is used, and therefore liable to be assessed as a railway, this section ceases to operate. I do not think it necessary to deal with the case of a large parish in which part of the railway is complete and part still incomplete. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case to deal with the deficiency in the rates of the parish as a whole, and with the liability to make it up as one undivided liability. With respect to the decision in the Court of Queen's Bench, in the first place taking the decision itself, it is not at all at variance with the conclusion at which I have arrived, because, in that case, the condition was not fulfilled of everything having been done in the parish so as to arrive at the deficiency in the poor rate. And with reference to the rationes decidendi in that case, which I should be sorry to call in question, they will be found on examination to be founded on the particular language of that Act of Parliament which is different from the language of this Act. In that Act the words made use of are, "until the railways are completed." There was an interpretation clause which expressly declared that "the railways" should mean "the railways and works connected therewith, by their Act authorised to be constructed." The decisions of the learned judges in that case are founded upon this—that you cannot give effect to these words, "the railways," and the interpretation clause, without holding them to mean "until the whole of the railways are completed." This being the construction upon which the decision in that case is founded, that decision is not applicable to the present case, because here we have the same interpretation clause; and when we come to the 128th section we find that it contemplates, not the system of railways, but "the railway" contemplated by this Act. I do not think, therefore, that my decision dissents from that of the Court of Queen's Bench, and the reasons for deciding are not the same. For these reasons it seems to me that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court.

BRAMWELL, B.—Independently of authority I am of the same opinion. In order to put a meaning upon these words or to construe them, as it is said they need construction, we must see what the probable object of the Legislature was. To my mind it was not to indemnify the parishes against loss. Certainly that was not the object for all time, because it is quite certain that when the railway is made and completed, although the parish may be losers by its making and completing, yet they are to bear that loss; and they ought to bear that loss, because the object of the Legislature only indemnifies those persons whose properties are taken and injuriously affected, and the Legislature does not indemnify any persons against indirect loss occasioned by the alteration in the occupation of other premises—as, for instance, by the railway being substituted for the former occupiers. No one could complain that his business had diminished, or that he had sustained an injury in any other way in consequence of this substitution. So, too, the inhabitants of a parish, who have the misfortune—if it is a misfortune—to have a railway going through that parish, where valuable property is taken down and less valuable property substituted for it, must bear the loss. They take it for better for worse. If the railway turns out a profitable thing for the parish they gain by its being rated. The railway company are liable to have a larger rate put upon them than the former rate was, or they are liable to a less rate, according as the rateable value of the railway is larger or not. Clearly the Legislature ought not, and they do not, attempt to indemnify the parish in respect of the making of the railway—at all events not for all time. It may be that they intended to indemnify them during the construction of the railway, though I have considerable doubt about that. I incline to believe that what they intended to do for the sake of both parties (it may be principally for the sake of the parish) is, that while the railway is in the course of construction, and it would be difficult to put an assessable value upon the land which is being converted into a railway for the purpose of rating, the Legislature meant that, during that time, the promoters of the company—for it is not limited in this particular case—shall be liable to make good a deficiency; that is to say, the land shall not be rated while it is being converted into a railway, and the promoters shall make good the deficiency arising from its not being rated. Now I think that was the object of the Legislature, to preclude disputes as to the rateable value of the land which was diverted from its original purpose, and was of doubtful assessable value, and possibly to indemnify the parish during the time it could not be assessed as a railway. To my mind, as soon as one is satisfied of that, it follows that, as soon as they can assess the land which has been taken as a railway, the reason of the thing ceases, and the obligation to make up the deficiency no longer arises. There may be no deficiency then, because it may be that as soon as the land is assessable as a railway, it may be assessable at a larger rate than before. If houses are taken it will probably be assessable at a less rate. If agricultural land is taken it will probably be assessable at a greater rate. Now, that being to my mind the presumable intention of the Act of Parliament, let us see what are the actual words that are used. The words that are used say nothing, to my mind, about the parish, or ward, or county, or district, or what not; because the section is applicable to sewer rate, consolidated rate, church rate, or other parochial or ward rate. There are no ward rates in Rotherithe, but still the section is applicable to it. A ward rate is not a parochial rate, and a main drainage rate is not a parochial rate, although it is collected through the medium of parishes. The parish, but for this clause, possibly might have had a difficulty, or rather those who are entitled to make main drainage rates, would have the same difficulty as the parish would, but for some such provision as this. I do not understand that at common law the parish would be bound to make good a certain definite sum to a main drainage rate. It would be rather according to the value of the property in that parish, I imagine. I do not think, therefore, that there is any question of parochiality or district in the matter. But I do think, and with great confidence, that the meaning of the law is, that so soon as any parcel of land which would, before it was taken by the railway company, have been liable to assessment either as house and garden, or other ground, as soon as this is covered by a railway, or converted into a railway, and the railway is in such a state of completion with reference to that piece of land, that it is assessable, or liable to be assessed, then the liability of the company to make good the deficiency of the rate exists no longer Of course, I do not mean to say that if a railway were completed on a piece of land, but not so completed as that it could be worked, in that case the company would not be liable to make up the deficiency. I assume that in all probability they would. I am not quite sure about it, but I should think so, for this reason, that it would not be liable to be assessed as a railway. For instance, if it were completed only half way between two intended stations, I should say it would not be liable to be assessed within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. But there can be no doubt that as soon as the piece of land is converted into a railway, or covered by a railway which forms part of a railway capable of being worked, and consequently capable of assessment, then the obligation of the company to make good the deficiency in respect of that piece of land ceases. In other words, it seems to me that the meaning of the Act is this, the company will take several portions of land (using the term generally, land and houses); in respect of each of which portions they would have been subject, or the occupiers would have been subject, to a separate assessment before the company took them. When the company do take them they shall make good the deficiency in respect of the non-rateability, or rather the non-rating of each of those pieces of land, until such time as they are subject to be assessed in respect of the railway constructed upon it, that railway having become workable. I think this is manifest not only from the reason of the thing, but from a variety of small matters, for the expression used in the Act is "until the railway, or the works thereof, are completed," which I have no doubt, in the mind of the draftsman, meant this, "Until the railway constructed upon it, or if not the railway at all events some of the works of the company, are completed and subject to assessment." But another thing which supports this view of the case is this. The Act of Parliament, as I understand, is a little inaccurately drawn. It is not correct to say that a railway is liable to be assessed. It should be "the occupiers of the railway in respect thereof." Would not the section then come to this, that when a company has become possessed of land subject to assessment to any of these rates, they shall from time to time, until the works of the railway are completed, be liable to be assessed to make good the deficiency in the assessment of such rates by reason of the land being taken? That is to say, that as soon as they are liable to be assessed, their obligation ceases. The reason of the thing seems to me to be that way also. We must consider also what is the presumble object of the Legislature. The reason of the thing would seem to be this: Why should these defendants be liable to make good a deficiency because there remains some small piece of their works uncompleted which has nothing to do with the main work, or with the increase of traffic upon it, but which is a mere convenience, or something they were bound to do with reference to the requisitions of the neighbourhood? Take some small spur or some small piece of work that they have got to do, which may be in another parish, why should that make them in any way continue to be liable to make good the deficiency? Another consideration strikes me very strongly, which is this: that after they have made a portion of the works, and are working them, they surely are assessable in respect of them; for instance, they surely are assessable if they work this piece of line—I cannot see any dispute about that. There is no statement that they shall not be assessed: then what is the consequence? Are they to be assessed in respect of that, and still to make up the deficiency?—that is to say, first to be assessed at a certain amount under the ordinary law, and, secondly, to make up the deficiency? That seems to me a very monstrous thing. Why, when the subject-matter is capable of assessment, should they be liable to make good a deficiency in respect of it? Then, on the other hand, if it should be said they are not liable to assessment at all, see what preposterous consequences would follow. It may be that this piece of railway, although not the whole that they are liable to make, is double the rateable value of the land they have taken: are they to be at liberty to say, "Nevertheless we are not liable to be assessed—we shall only make up such deficiency as would arise from non-payment of the old rates?" I cannot see that there is any reason at all for that; it seems to me that the reason of the thing, and the words of the statute are directed to this: that while they are constructing their railway upon it they shall make good the deficiency in respect of each parcel of land, but that so soon as they have a working railway upon it they are liable to be assessed, and consequently that this clause, about making up the deficiency in the rate, does not apply. That would be my judgment upon this matter if it had come before me independently of all authority; but I confess I am glad to think that my Lord and my brother Cleasby can distinguish this from the case in the Court of Queen's Bench. I should have had very great difficulty, certainly, in distinguishing the rationes decidendi in that case; but as my Lord and my brother Cleasby say it does not govern the case, I am content to abide by their judgment, and consequently I feel myself at liberty to express my own opinion upon this case, and that is in favour of the defendants.

MARTIN, B.—I am sorry to say that I differ from my learned brethren with respect to this case. I do it because I think they add words to the 128th section which are not in it, and that, instead of reading the words of the Act of Parliament, which are, "until the railway or the works thereof are completed and assessed, or liable to be assessed," they read it as if it were, "until the railway or the works thereof in in the parish of Rotherhithe are completed and assessed;" and, in my judgment, it is not competent so to read the Act. If the matter were new, it seems to me, without expressing a very confident opinion upon it, that I could not agree with my brother Bramwell upon this; but I am of opinion that this case in the Court of Queen's Bench is directly in point, and that the whole of the reasons upon it apply here. It seems impossible to read the judgment of my brother Keating and my brother Lush, and my brother Hannen, without seeing that that was their opinion. They state it exceedingly plainly, and I think very clearly. The Act of Parliament at present in question has reference only to a line of railway six or seven miles in length, and I cannot think that we ought to go upon arguments of hundreds of miles in considering the matter The case which came on before the Court of Queen's Bench was in regard to an Act which enacted the making of a number of railways, and that "while the company are possessed under this Act of any lands assessed to any poor rate and certain other rates, they shall, from time to time, until the railways or the works thereof are completed and assessed, or liable to be assessed, be liable to make good the deficiency in the assessments for such rates by reason of these lands being taken or used for the purpose of railways or other works by this Act authorised; and the deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which those lands, with any buildings thereon, were rated at the time of the passing of the Act." And, so far as I see, the only difference between the present enactment and that is, that there the word "railways," is used, and not "railway." So far as I can see, in other respects the wording is identical, and that is the only difference between them. Then, the facts being that the railway was not completed, as I understand (although no great stress seems to be put upon it), entirely within a particular parish, the question was whether the company was bound to make up this deficiency. My brother Keating was in the court, and he gives his judgment, and his judgment is what I pointed out in the course of the argument as operating upon my mind. He says this: "There seems to me to be good reason for making the completion of the works the terminus at which the liability of the railway company shall cease; the reason is this—the rateability of any portion of the railway passing through any particular parish can never be accurately and fairly ascertained until the whole works have been completed; when the works have been completed, then the rates can be apportioned with justice to the parishes and with justice to the company, and they cannot, until the completion of the railway, be fairly apportioned." He then alludes to the argument of Sir John Karslake, which, he says, is defective. Then, Lush, J., delivers judgment, and he says: "The company shall, until the railways and works connected therewith by this Act authorised to be constructed are completed and assessed, or liable to be assessed, be liable to make good the deficiency, and that must mean the whole of the railways authorised by this Act; and this is clear from the very obvious reason mentioned by my learned brother, that until the whole scheme is completed, and its capacities for making profits fully developed, the parishes will not get the benefit which they ultimately will get when the scheme shall be developed, and these railways are liable to connect themselves with other railways, and thereby have a large traffic. I cannot doubt, therefore, that the completion of the railways is the event contemplated. That event has not happened. There is still a deficiency between what the railway, if it were rated now would yield, and the rates in respect of the houses which have been pulled down, and, therefore, there being that deficiency, and the event upon which the company are to be relieved not having happened, the company is still liable to make good the deficiency." Hannen, J., says the same: "The question is, what is that event? It is expressed thus—'Until the railways or the works thereof are completed.' The natural meaning of these words is until the whole of the railways are completed; and I can see no reason in the scheme of legislation for supposing that any other than than that which is the ordinary and proper meaning of these words should be put upon them. On the contrary, for the reasons given by my learned brothers, it seems to me to be highly reasonable that the company should be made liable to make up the deficiency until the whole scheme of the railways shall have been completed, and until the whole line of railway shall have been put to its greatest advantage for all parties concerned." And

I own I concur in what Mr. Prentice stated, that this case is an à fortiori case. In that case they put it that all the railways must be completed, but all that Mr. Prentice contends for here is that the deficiency must be made up till the line of railway No. 1 is completed. Therefore, it seems to me, we are overruling the case in the Queen's Bench, which I do not think we ought to do; and I have already stated I do not concur in the reasoning of my brother Bramwell. But, in my judgment, this case is direct on the point, and, as Mr. Prentice says, an à fortiori case. I think it right to give my opinion with regard to this particular matter, as I presume this case is likely to go up to the court of error.

KELLY, C.B.—It appears to me that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court. The question turns entirely upon the meaning of the words "until the railway or the works thereof are completed and assessed, or liable to be assessed," in the 128th section of the Act of Parliament. Now, in order to put a meaning on these words, and, indeed, upon any other words in the Act of Parliament, we must look to the mischief which was sought or intended to be remedied by the Act of Parliament in question. That mischief appears to me to have been this: Where the company have obtained an Act for the construction of a railway, a portion of which (or perhaps the whole of it) may run through a particular parish, so long as the railway itself is incomplete, and not in such a condition as to be worked, and to earn profits, and to obtain any returns from the working of the railway, the principle upon which the railway is to be assessed to the poor rates, and, indeed, to any other description of parochial rate, is full of difficulty and uncertainty. It has been doubted whether it is assessable at all in particular cases; as, for example, where, perhaps, a house or house property of considerable value may have been taken by the company and removed, in order to construct a railway upon the site, and the railway has been duly commenced and partially proceeded with, it is very difficult to say that the land is actually of any assessable value; and when you remember that the land is to be assessed to the rate at what it would fetch, if let under ordinary circumstances to a tenant from year to year, it is very difficult to say that land taken for the purpose of a railway, whatever may have been its value at the time it was taken, but where the railway itself is incomplete, that is, no portion of it is complete so as to be brought into a condition capable of being worked at a profit—it is very difficult to say that it is of any value at all. And, therefore, it may be and has been found that there was very considerable difficulty in determining the principle upon which land, which would not in its then condition let to a tenant from year to year at any rental at all, is liable under the poor laws to any assessment to the poor rate whatsoever. Under these circumstances the Legislature has sought to apply a remedy by provisions almost in the same words as are found in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and in this particular Act of Parliament, providing a remedy by the enactment that where a railway shall be in such a condition, that is, where the company have taken possession of land which was liable to be assessed, and probably had been assessed before, to the poor rate or any of the parochial or other rates here mentioned, the company should be liable to make good the deficiency in the assessment; that is, to make good to the parish the amount which they would have been enabled to obtain from the land in question in its former or original condition, until the railway shall be complete and assessed to the poor rate or other rates in question, or shall be liable to be so assessed. How is that brought into actual practice—into practical effect so as to be a remedy for the grievance compained of? Why, so long as the railway is unworkable and cannot be applied to any profitable or remunerative purpose, it is really worth nothing; and some such provision as this is necessary in order to do justice to the parish. But as soon as a portion of the railway is complete, that is, from one station or from one terminus to another, and comprising the whole of the land which has been taken in the parish in question, then it has been brought into a condition which enables the parish in question to assess it in the ordinary way in which, by law, land or property is rateable to the poor rate or to the other rates in this or any other such Act mentioned, and consequently the mischief ceases; the necessity for the Act of Parliament is at an end, and the Act of Parliament, under which the company are forced to make up the deficiency, ought to be held inapplicable. There is, then, more than one ground upon which to put a reasonable construction upon this Act of Parliament, and one may consider, if the requisitions here found are complied with, that a railway may be taken to be complete whenever a portion of the railway comprised within the rateable land in the parish is complete, so as to enable the company to use it in order to obtain a remunerative return, and the parish are in a condition to assess it to the poor. That is the case here. Here is a line of railway, one of a great many lines, they are six in number; but without reference to the others let us take No. 1, which is the line of railway now in question, the object of this Act of Parliament, that is the railway from Bethnal-green viâ Wapping to Deptford or New Cross. That line of railway is, undoubtedly, not complete; but it is complete from Wapping, through the whole of this parish of Rotherhithe, to New Cross or Deptford; there is therefore what would satisfy the term "a railway is completed," and consequently it is in a condition to be assessed to the poor rate. But if it is held to be liable to assessment, and the railway is complete within the statute, the provision for making good the deficiency would be at an end, and this would affect the whole of the effect sought to be obtained by the Act of Parliament, that is, to remunerate the parish, to protect the parish against loss; and at the same time it would be a reasonable construction, as enabling the parish to assess the railway at its then true value as a railway; and, on the other hand, make the railway company liable only in respect of that as to which they ought to be rated; viz., that portion of the railway which they are working at a profit. But besides, when we look to the terms of the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and the moment we consider that, to put the extended construction upon this Act of Parliament, or rather upon the expressions to be found in it, "until the railway or the works thereof are completed," would, in the case which has been suggested of a railway of a great many miles in length (a railway such as that, for example, from London to Bristol), render the company liable to make good the assessment at its original rate; and unless there was an option in the parish to assess those portions of the railway which were completed and in operation, in the ordinary way, or claim the deficiency under this provision in the Act of Parliament, would also disentitle the parish to recover the larger amount, whenever it might be a larger amount, which they would in the case of those portions of railway be entitled to. We see that the result of such a construction would be to keep up and continue a state of things which the Legislature cannot have contemplated; a state of things in which neither the railway company are assessed, nor the parish entitled to make an assessment upon the railway, according to the ordinary rules of law, that is upon the rateable value of the railway, and to substitute for those ordinary rules something intended to be only of a temporary character, and that long after the necessity for that mode of rating should have ceased. And again, this consideration occurs: supposing the railway between Wapping and Bethnal Green should never be completed at all, here is a complete railway from Wapping to Deptford, which is worked, and worked possibly at a profit, at all events it is worked with some remuneration to the company. And is the system of rating only at the difference or deficiency which exists between the original value of the land and the no-value of an incomplete railway to continue for ever? I see no end to it if so extended a construction is to be put upon the Act of Parliament. But then we have to consider undoubtedly the case decided in the Court of Queen's Bench. Now, it is impossible to deny that, when we look at some of the rationes decidendi, they apply entirely to this case; and that it is necessary, therefore, in pronouncing the opinion I am now delivering upon this case, that I should differ, as to some of the rationes decidendi, from the learned judges of the Queen's Bench. And I feel myself compelled to do so, first upon the ground that, if this deficiency is recoverable under a provision of this nature in the Act of Parliament, it would apply equally to the case of a railway from London to Carlisle or from London to Bristol, as to a small and short railway extending only from Deptford to Bethnal Green. But when we look at the case, there are two points of distinction between that case and the case now before the court which relieves me from the difficulty I should otherwise feel in differing from those learned judges; one has been pointed out by my Brother Cleasby, that in that case in the Queen's Bench the word "railways" is not in the singular number, but in the plural number. That was an Act of Parliament for five or six different railways in different places, and the condition was, "until the railways should be completed." I do not know whether there was an interpretation clause there or not, but there was certainly no such interpretation clause in that case as we find in this case; and, therefore, it is enough to distinguish the one case from the other, that here the word "railway" is in the singular number, and there it was in the plural number, and it is impossible to put a literal construction upon that Act of Parliament without applying the provision to the whole of the railways conjointly. And so it was held that the deficiency was recoverable in the way pointed out in the section in question, until the whole number of the railways was completed. But there is another distinction between this case and the cases before the Court of Queen's Bench, and that is a material distinction which goes the whole length of the principle involved in both cases, and that is this: That there the whole line of railway to be constructed under the Act from one end to the other of the parish or parishes in question was not complete, it was a portion only of the land to be taken in the parish, and to be occupied by the railway which had been completed. Here the whole line of railway from one boundary to the other of the parish of Rotherhithe is complete. The whole of the land taken in this parish liable to assessment in the parish has been taken, and the railway through the whole of that land is complete, and further, it is complete from Deptford, which, I think, is beyond the parish of Rotherhithe, to the station or terminus at Wapping, which is also beyond the parish of Rotherhithe, and, therefore, we have here one complete line of railway in actual operation, and returning a remuneration to the company, the proprietors of the line of railway, and comprising within it the whole of the land which is rateable within this parish. That is another distinction between the case now before the court and the case in the Queen's Bench. It appears to me, therefore, that the only reasonable construction we can put upon this expression is, that it means this deficiency shall be recoverable by the parish against the railway company, so long as the railway within that parish is in such a condition that it would be difficult to determine any reasonable principle upon which it can be rated at all, in which case the parish would find that they could only recover from the company, if assessed in the ordinary way, a much smaller sum of money than they had previously derived from the property as it formerly existed, or than they were likely afterwards to derive from the line of railway or any specific workable portion of it; but the moment there is a workable portion complete and actually worked, so as to make it the subject of assessment to the poor rate, or any other of these rates, according to the law by which railways are rated to the poor rates, it appears to me that the words of the Act are satisfied. There is then, and then only, a railway said to be complete and liable to be assessed; of course the parish cannot be entitled at once to assess it, and recover a poor rate in that way, and also to recover a deficiency under this section of the Act of Parliament, when a part of the railway is complete. And when that has been assessed there is an end of the application of this section of the statute. If the railway itself be complete and liable to assessment, although not actually assessed, so in like manner it comes within the words of this provision in the Act of Parliament, and the right to recover the deficiency is at an end. Under these circumstances, and regretting that I have to differ, as to the rationes decidendi, from the learned judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, I am bound to pronounce an opinion that in this case the action is not maintainable.

SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT.

(Before MARTIN, BRAMWELL, and PIGOTT, BB.)

ANDREWS v. STYRAP.

The Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), sect. 40—Title of "M.D."—"Wilfully and falsely" taking and using the same—Conviction for by justices under the above section—Evidence of the offence—Diploma of foreign university obtained by purchase only.

A., a druggist, had attended a patient in the capacity of a medical man, and sent in to him a bill for such attendances, headed, "Mr. P. to Thomas Andrews, M.D." setting out a variety of charges for attendance and medicine, &c. He subsequently wrote a letter signed, "Thomas Andrews, M.D." threatening legal proceedings unless the bill were paid, and he gave a receipt for the bill when paid, signing it in the same way. There was a coloured lamp over his shop door, on three sides of which the words and letters "Thomas Andrews, M.D." were painted. It appeared that he had obtained by the payment of a sum of money a diploma of doctor of medicine from the University of Philadelphia in the United States, but that he had never been in America, or studied, or passed any examination, for such degree, and he was not registered under the Medical Act.

On appeal, from a conviction by justices under sect. 40 of the Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), for having unlawfully, wilfully, and falsely taken and used the name, title, description and addition of "M.D.," and "thereby implying that he was then registered under the Medical Act, whereas he was not so registered," &c., it was Held by the Court of Exchequer (Martin, Bramwell, and Pigott, BB.) that the conviction was right, and must be affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of justices, convicting the defendant, upon an information laid before them under sect. 40 of the Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90) for falsely, &c., taking and using the name and title of a physician and doctor of medicine, and it came before the court on a case stated by the justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. It appeared from the case that at a petty sessions in and for the borough of Shrewsbury, on the 21st Dec. 1871, an information was laid by the respondent against the appellant, a druggist in the said borough, charging him with having, on the 25th Sept. 1871, within the said borough, unlawfully, wilfully, and falsely taken and used a name, title, addition, and description—to wit, "M.D.," meaning thereby "doctor of medicine," and thereby implying that he, the said appellant, was then registered under the Medical Act, whereas he was not so registered, he, the said appellant, not being a person who was actually practising in medicine in England before the 1st Aug. 1815, contrary, &c., and upon hearing the said parties, appellant and respondent respectively, by attorney and counsel, the matter was determined by the said justices, and the appellant was duly convicted before them of the said offence, and adjudged to pay the penalty of 20*l.*, including costs, to be levied in default of payment by distress and sale of his goods; and in default of sufficient distress he was to be imprisoned for two calendar months, unless the said penalty and costs were sooner paid.

The appellant being dissatisfied with the determination of the justices as erroneous in point of law, applied to them to state and sign the present case for the opinion of this court, from which it appeared that on the hearing it was proved and found as a fact that the appellant had attended a patient, the sister of one Thomas Parton, in the capacity of a medical man, and had, on the day named in the information, sent in to the said Thomas Parton a bill in the following terms:

Mr. Parton, Shrewsbury, 25th Sept. 1871.
To Thomas Andrews, M.D.
To professional attendance, medicines, &c., late Miss Parton £17 8 6

That on the 7th Nov. following, the appellant received 5*l.* on account of the said bill, and on the same day sent in to the said Thomas Parton another bill, headed in the same way.

Mr. Parton,
To Thomas Andrews, M.D.
To professional attendance, medicines, &c., as per items over £17 8 6

And then followed the several items of charge for medicines, attendance, journeys, &c., on the various days specified, from 26th April to 26th Aug. 1871. This bill was accompanied by the following letter from the appellant to Mr. Parton:

Sir,—Unless you settle balance of this account before Thursday week, I shall place it in the hands of my solicitor, without further notice. Yours, &c., T. ANDREWS, M.D.

The balance of the said account was paid on the following day by the said Thomas Parton, who received the following bill and receipt on the 9th Nov.:

Mr. Parton. Shrewsbury, 9th Nov. 1871.
To Thomas Andrews. M.D.
To professional attendance, medicines, &c., &c., Miss Parton.
Balance of account ... ... £12 8*s.* 6*d.*
9th Nov. 1871.
Settled, EDWYN ANDREWS.

It was further proved that the appellant had a lamp over the door of his shop at Shrewsbury, on three sides of which the words "Thos. Andrews, M.D.," were painted.

A book purporting to be the Medical Register for 1871, marked on the outside "By authority," was produced by the registrar of the County Court, and which he said had been issued to the court by authority for their guidance, and upon searching it the name of the appellant was not found there.

On the part of the appellant the above facts were not denied, except as to the words "unlawfully, wilfully, and falsely," and in support of the contention that the appellant did not "unlawfully, wilfully, and falsely," take and use the title of M.D., &c., (as charged in the information), a diploma of the American University of Philadelphia in the United States, dated 20th Feb. 1871, was put in. It was in Latin, and the following translation was handed in to the justices by the appellant.

To all to whom this present letter may reach.

The President Fellows and Professors of the American University of Philadelphia, founded by the laws of the Republic of Pennsylvania, give salutation. Inasmuch as in all universities, properly and legitimately constructed, either here or elsewhere in the world, it was a praiseworthy and ancient usage that men who have not less diligently than faithfully paid attention to literature, or to ingennous arts, or to any liberal studies whatever, meanwhile conducting themselves uprightly and honourably, should be adorned with some distinguished honour, and raised to merited dignity; and since by the laws of our Republic we possess the fullest power of distinguishing and decorating with academical titles, and of advancing to degrees in sacred theology, in arts, and medicine, gentlemen well deserving of them, we therefore, furnished with this authority, and not unmindful of the ancient usage, have adjudged, and at a meeting of the Council have decreed, the eminent gentleman devoted to the highest pursuits, Thomas Andrews, about whose proficiency in medical science and honorable character we have sufficiently enquired and scrutinised, to be worthy and fitting to be honoured as a learned man in the highest degree of dignity; wherefore, with one accord, we have both elected and made him Doctor of Medicine, and have given and assigned to him all rights and privileges which belong to that degree. Now, all and singular these proceedings we in good faith notify unto you by the present letter fortified with our seal and the signature of the President of the University, this 20th day of the month of February, and in the year of our Lord 1871.

A seal, purporting to be the seal of the said university, was appended to this document, as were also several signatures, purporting to be the signatures of professors or officers thereof. A witness also proved that he held a similar diploma from the said university, and that he had been in America, and he testified to the authenticity and genuineness of the seal and the signatures appended to the appellant's diploma. He also said, on cross-examination, that a diploma could be obtained by an examination before examiners in England commissioned by the University of Philadelphia for that purpose. It was not alleged that the appellant had ever been in America, nor was any proof given that he had undergone any examination in order to obtain the diploma.

Upon these facts the justices came to the conclusion that the appellant had committed the offence charged in the information, and they duly convicted him thereof as aforesaid, and the question for this court is whether, upon the above facts, the justices were justified in coming to that conclusion, and so convicting the said appellant, or whether the fact of the appellant having obtained the above-mentioned diploma exonerated him from the charge made against him?

The following sections of the Medical Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), which provides for the registration of duly qualified practitioners as therein specified, were referred to in the argument, and especially sect. 40, upon which the information is founded.

Sect. 31 empowers every person registered under the Act to practise medicine, or surgery, or medicine and surgery, as the case may be, according to his qualifications, in any part of the Queen's dominions, and to recover his reasonable charges with costs of suit, in any court of law; and by sect. 32, no person, after the 1st. Jan. 1859, shall be entitled to recover any charge in any court of law for medical or surgical advice, &c., or medicine prescribed and supplied, unless upon proof that he is registered under this Act.

Sect. 36 provides that, after 1st Jan. 1857, no person, unless registered under the Act, shall hold any appointment as physician, surgeon, or other medical officer, either in the military or naval service, or in emigrant or other vessels, or in any hospital, &c., not supported wholly by voluntary contributions, or in any lunatic asylum, &c., &c.

Sect. 40 enacts that any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be, or take or use the name or title of, a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner or apothecary, or any name, title, addition, or description, implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician or surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding 20*l.*

Huddleston, Q. C. (with him was Bullen), for the respondent, supported the conviction, and—following the course adopted in Ellis v. Kelly (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 331; 30 L. J. 74, Ex., and 35, M. C.; 6 H. & N. 222) and Jones v. Taylor (28 L. J. 20, M. C.)—was called on by the court to begin.—He contended that the conviction was right, and that the justices, having found all the facts and come to a decision upon them, the court would not interfere with the conclusion at which they had arrived.

Ladd v. Gould, 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 325.

R. Vaughan Williams, for the appellant, contra, urged that the diploma of the University of Philadelphia, which was an institution of high standing, and fully empowered to grant degrees, was a sufficient warrant for the appellant's use of the title of "M.D.," and saved him from coming within the operation of sect. 40 of the Medical Act. [PIGOTT, B.—The American University may be all that you say it is, but unfortunately this student has never been there.] It appears that the University is constantly in the habit of appointing examiners in other countries, and non constat that that was not done here. The fact of the Act of Parliament granting certain privileges to some persons, and imposing certain restrictions on others, by no means makes it unlawful to practise or to assume the title of "M.D." The Act only imposes certain liabilities or restrictions, as, for instance, by sect. 36, no unregistered person can hold certain medical offices there specified. If it be contended that the mere fact of practising as a "Doctor," without being registered, is an offence, the answer is in that section. The offence must be something more; a man must practise as a doctor with the object of obtaining the privilege conferred by the Act on registered individuals, or of avoiding or getting rid of the disabilities imposed upon non-registered persons. The mere fact of using the letters "M.D." after his name is no evidence of the offence, or of doing anything coming within the two last-mentioned heads. The case of Ellis v. Kelly (ubi sup.) is an authority that the merely appending "M.D." to one's name is no offence under the Act. In the present case it was done under a supposed right by virtue of the foreign diploma, and Ellis v. Kelly as well as Pidgrift v. Chevalier (20 L. J. 225, M. C; 8 C. B., N. S. 246), show that that is no offence. The evidence in the present case is very similar to that in Ellis v. Kelly, and the remarks of the court there, and particularly those of Bramwell, B., that it is the doing the thing "wilfully and falsely" that constitutes the offence under the Act, which doing is under a supposed, even if it be a mistaken, right cannot be held to be, are very applicable here. The appellant here had a foreign diploma. [MARTIN, B.—It is no diploma at all; it is a mere pretence. BRAMWELL, B.—The matter does not appear to me now as it appears to have appeared to me then.] It is submitted that there is no evidence here of the appellant having done anything more than incorrectly or mistakenly used the title of "M. D." In this case it is an American degree, in Ellis v. Kelly it was a German one. Pedgriff v. Chevallier (ubi sup.), shows that the mere fact of a man's name not being in the medical register is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, for which purpose there must be evidence of wilful falsity, of which there is here an entire absence. To hold the appellant guilty of the offence would seriously affect hundreds of Scotch practitioners who are not registered under the Act.

Martin, B.—I believe we are all of opinion that the justices were perfectly right and thoroughly well warranted in the conclusion at which they arrived upon the facts before them in this case, and that, therefore, this conviction must be affirmed. It is plain to my mind that this is a question of fact. There was ample evidence that this appellant wilfully (for he did it on purpose) and falsely (because he pretended thereby to be on an equal footing with any regularly bred and registered physician or M.D. in England) took, assumed, and used the title of "M.D." under a diploma obtained by him from an American university, without any course of previous study or any examination, but simply on the payment of a sum of money, and which diploma, therefore, he must have known to be in fact utterly worthless and valueless as an indication of the possessor's merit, learning, and skill as a physician, or as giving him any of the privileges of a registered medical man. I am glad to hear from a learned gentleman now in court that the American Legislature have recently prohibited the granting of these degrees to persons on the payment of a sum of money only, and without a previous course of study and preliminary examination. The conviction must be affirmed.

Bramwell, B.—I entirely agree with all that has been said by my brother Martin.

Pigott, B.—I also concur in thinking that this conviction must be affirmed.

Reg. v. Allen.

Bigamy—Validity of second marriage—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57.

A., while his second wife was alive, married a niece of his former deceased wife—the second marriage being within the prohibited degrees of affinity and void: (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, s. 2.)

Held, that A. was guilty of bigamy.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by Martin, B.

The prisoner was indicted for bigamy.

On the 24th Feb. 1853, he married one Sarah Cunningham.

She died in Aug. 1866, leaving a niece named Harriet Crouch.

On the 30th Nov. 1867 he married one Ann Pearson Gutteridge, and on the 2nd Dec. 1871, and in the lifetime of Ann Pearson Gutteridge, he married the above named Harriet Crouch.

It was objected by the learned counsel for the prisoner that the marriage with Harriet Crouch, his first wife's niece, was void, and that the crime of bigamy was not committed. It was stated that the Court of Criminal Appeal in Ireland had so decided, and in deference to that decision, at the request of the prisoner's counsel, I state this case.

The question is, whether the prisoner was guilty of bigamy. Samuel Martin.

Bullen, for the prisoner.—The offence of bigamy was not committed in this case. The marriage with Harriet Crouch was absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes, being a marriage between persons within the prohibited degrees of affinity: (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, s. 2.) No doubt the case of R. v. Brawn (1 Car. & K. 144) is a decision to the contrary, where Lord Denman said, "The validity or invalidity of the second marriage does not affect the question. It is the appearing to contract a second marriage and the going through the ceremony which constitutes the crime of bigamy, otherwise it could never exist in the ordinary cases, as a previous marriage always renders null and void a marriage that is celebrated afterwards by either of the parties during the lifetime of the other." Since that case, however, a case has occurred in Ireland, where seven to four of the judges held that the crime of bigamy was not committed where the second marriage was a void one: (Reg. v. Fanning, 10 Cox Crim. Cas. 411.) In that case the facts were, that F., a Protestant, was legally married, and while his wife was living he was married by a Roman Catholic clergyman to a Roman Catholic woman, representing himself at the time as a Roman Catholic, but it transpired that he was a professed Protestant within twelve months prior to the time of the second marriage. The second marriage was ipso facto void by the 19 Geo. 2, c. 13, s. 1, which enacts that "every marriage between a Papist and any person who hath been or hath professed himself or herself to be a Protestant at any time within twelve months before such celebrating marriage or between two Protestants, if celebrated by a Popish priest, shall be null and void." It was therefore held by the majority of the judges in Reg. v. Fanning, that the second marriage, not being a marriage in the eye of the law, the offence of bigamy was not committed. So in Burt v. Burt (29 L. J. 133, Prob. & Div.), it is stated in the judgment of the court, which consisted of Cresswell, J. O., Martin, B., and Willes, J., that in order to establish bigamy you must prove such a marriage as but for the former marriage would have been in itself valid. Again, in Reg. v. Millis (10 Cl. & Fin. 689), Tindal, C. J., said, that the second marriage, to constitute bigamy, must mean a marriage of the same kind and obligation as the first.

Warry, for the prosecution.—Upon the true construction of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, "whosoever being married shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife shall be guilty of felony," the offence in this case was committed, though the second marriage was a void one. In Reg. v. Fanning, O'Hagan, J., in his judgment, said, "What meaning are we to ascribe to the words of the stat, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57? Are we at liberty to give to the same words in the two parts of the section different meanings? The first words, 'being married,' must mean a real legal marriage. Must the second words, 'shall marry,' be so likewise, and mean the same thing? It is impossible, for the second marriage was always null and void to all intents. I think the construction derived from the inherent invalidity of the second marriage is right. But I do not see why we should be bound in every case to attach to words the meaning which they first have, with the manifest result of giving impunity to a crime. The word 'marry,' in the second part of the section, must, in ordinary cases, be held to import not a real but a pretended marriage. Why should it not be held also in other cases to apply to a ceremony having all the outward marks of validity, but void from some other reason than the existence of the first marriage?" And Keogh, J., at p. 440, says, "There cannot be clearer or more coercive language than that used by Lord Denman in Brawn's case. That decision was made in 1843, and has never since been questioned. I think it proceeds on a true reading of the whole of those statutes, and I think that the mistake of those whose opinion leans to the other side arises from the idea that the word 'marry,' in relation to the second marriage, used in the statutes against bigamy, involves that the second marriage must be identical with the first, whereas that is an impossibility. The second must always be null if the first is good; and then we must conclude that what was in the mind of the Legislature was that the party should be guilty of felony who went through the form or ceremony, so far as he was concerned, constituting a marriage, but which differed from the first marriage in this—that while it was a real marriage, the second was a sham." [Blackburn, J.—Christian, J., at p. 437, says, "In Brawn's case the ceremony was perfect; in this case there is no ceremony at all; and I can quite understand the distinction taken, though I do not say it is so, that in Brawn's case a complete legal ceremony had been performed; that a state of marrying in that case within the definition of bigamy in the Act of Parliament, had been completed, and the offence so constituted, even although, by reason of some disability personal to the party, a valid marriage did not follow. But whenever any of the legal essentials to the ceremony itself are wanting, then the state of marrying within the meaning of the Act of Parliament has not been perfected. If there be that distinction Brawn's case would be strictly right—and the very language of Lord Denman, who says that it is the ceremony which constitutes the crime of bigamy, would be strictly right, and so also the case put during the argument, by which I confess I was more embarrassed than by any other; the case suggested by Hughes B., of a double bigamy. If it were shown that at the time of the second marriage both parties were already married, could the man defend himself from the prosecution of bigamy on the ground that the second marriage was void, by reason of the previous marriage of his wife? Can he defend himself by pleading that his wife was as guilty as himself, or, in other words, is neither of them to be held guilty because both are guilty? I confess I see no way out of it, unless there is the distinction I have been taking, on an apparent distinction taken by some members of the court, and which might be thought sufficient to sustain the conviction in the present case. I merely say that probably if the ceremony be complete as a ceremony, the act of marrying may be taken as complete, although it fails in its legitimate effect, by reason of some personal disability of the party. Upon that however I express no opinion."] In Reg. v. Brawn (1 Car. & K. 144), where the woman, in the lifetime of her first husband, married a widower who had been her sister's husband, which would have been a void marriage under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54 s. 2, it was held that the validity of the second marriage did not affect the question of bigamy. So it seems that the assumption of a fictitious name upon the second marriage will not prevent the offence from being complete.

Bullen in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23.—Cockburn, C.J., now delivered the judgment of the Court. This case came before us on a point reserved by Martin, B., at the last assizes for the county of Hants. The prisoner was indicted for having married one Harriet Crouch, he having a wife still living. The indictment was framed upon the statute, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, which enacts that whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, shall be guilty of felony. The facts of the case were clear,—the prisoner had first married one Sarah Cunningham; and she having died, he had married his present wife, Ann Parson Gutteridge. The second wife being still living, he, on the 2nd of Dec. 1871, married one Harriet Crouch. So far the case would appear to be clearly one of bigamy within the statute; but it appearing that Harriet Crouch was a niece of the prisoner's first wife, it was objected on his behalf that since the passing of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54, s. 2, such a marriage was in itself void, and that to constitute an offence within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, the second marriage must be one which, independently of its bigamous character, would be valid, and consequently that the indictment could not be sustained. For the proposition that to support an indictment for bigamy, the second marriage must be one which would have been otherwise valid, the case of Reg. v. Fanning (Cox C. C. p. 411) decided in the Court of Criminal Appeal in Ireland, was cited, and in deference to the authority of the majority of the Judges in that court, Baron Martin has stated this case for our decision. It is clear but for the statutory inability of the parties to marry one another if free, the marriage of the prisoner with Harriet Crouch would have been within the 57th section of the Act. The question is whether that circumstance alters the effect of the prisoner's conduct in going through the ceremony of marriage with Harriet Crouch, while his former wife was still living. The same question arose in the case of Reg. v. Brawn (1 C. & K. 144), which was tried before Lord Denman on the earlier statute of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 22, the language of which was precisely the same as that of the present. In that case the prisoner, a married woman, had, during her husband's lifetime, married a man who had been the husband of her deceased sister. The same point as is now raised being taken on behalf of the prisoner, Lord Denman overruled the objection. "I am of opinion," said his Lordship, "that the validity of the second marriage does not affect the question. It is the appearing to contract a second marriage, and the going through the ceremony, which constitutes the crime of bigamy, or otherwise it could never exist in the ordinary cases, as a previous marriage always renders null and void a marriage that is celebrated afterwards by either of the parties during the lifetime of the other. Whether, therefore, the marriage of the two prisoners (the male prisoner had been included in the indictment as an accessory), was or was not in itself prohibited, and therefore null and void, does not signify, for the woman having a husband then alive has committed the crime of bigamy by doing all that in her lay by entering into a marriage with another man." In the earlier and analogous case of Reg. v. Penson (5 Car. & P. 412), a similar objection had been taken on the ground that the second marriage was invalid by reason that the woman whom the prisoner was charged with having married while his first wife was alive, had, for the purpose of concealing her identity, been described as Eliza Thick, her true name being Eliza Brown. But Gurney, B., who tried the case, overruled the objection, being of opinion "that parties could not be allowed to evade the punishment for such an offence by concertedly contracting an invalid marriage." We should have acted without hesitation on these authorities, had it not been for the case already referred to, of Reg v. Fanning, decided in the Court of Criminal Appeal in Ireland, a case which, if not on all fours with the present, is still closely analogous to it, and which, from the high authority of the court by which it was decided, was entitled to our most attentive consideration. We therefore took time to consider our judgment. The facts in Reg v. Fanning were shortly these. The prisoner being a Protestant, and having within twelve months been a professing Protestant, was married, having a wife then living, to another woman who was a Roman Catholic, the marriage being solemnized by a Roman Catholic priest. Independently of the second marriage being bad as bigamous, it would have been void under the unrepealed statute of the 19 Geo. 2, c. 13, which prohibits the solemnization of marriage by a Roman Catholic priest where either of the parties is a Protestant, and declares such a marriage so solemnized null and void to all intents and purposes. On an indictment against the prisoner for bigamy, the invalidity of the second marriage was insisted on as fatal to the prosecution. The point having been reserved, seven Judges against four in the Court of Criminal Appeal held the objection to be fatal, and quashed the conviction. After giving our best consideration to the reasoning of the learned Judges who constituted the majority of that court, we find ourselves unable to concur with them, being unanimously of opinion that the view taken by the four dissentient judges was the right one. The reasoning of the majority of the court in Reg. v. Fanning is founded mainly on the verbal criticism of the language of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57; and the words being that, if any person "being married" shall marry any other person, it was insisted that whatever sense is to be given to the term "being married," in the first part the same must be given to the term "marry" in the subsequent part of the sentence; and that consequently, it being admitted that the term "being married" implies a perfect and binding marriage, the second marriage must also be one which, but for the prohibition of the statute, would be, whether as regards the capacity to contract marriage, or the manner in which the marriage is solemnized, binding on the parties. Two authorities were relied on in support of this reading of the statute: First, the language of Tindal, C.J., in delivering the opinion of the judges in the House of Lords, in the well-known case of Rex v. Millis (10 Cl. & Fin. 669), and the decision of the Judge Ordinary of the Divorce Court in the case of Burt v. Burt (2 Sw. & Tr. 88). In the first of these cases, Tindal, C.J., undoubtedly says that "the words in the first clause, and the words 'marry any other person' in the second, must of necessity point at and denote marriage of the same kind and obligation." But it must be borne in mind that the question before the House of Lords was, whether the first marriage—not the second—was valid. The validity of the second marriage was not in question at all. In order to show that what had passed between the parties on the first marriage had not amounted to a valid marriage, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas urges that a similar proceeding between the parties would have amounted to no more than a contract per verba de præsenti, and would not, therefore, have sufficed to constitute bigamy, had it happened in the second instance instead of in the first. The case put by the Chief Justice was not the point to be decided; it was only used for the purpose of argument and illustration. The question how far the incapacity of the parties to the second marriage to contract a binding marriage, independently of the bigamy, would take the case out of the statute, was not present to his mind, or involved in the decision of the case before the House. And the Chief Justice expressly states that though the conclusion he had arrived at was concurred in by the rest of the judges, the reasoning was entirely his own. The language of the learned Chief Justice must, therefore, be taken as extrajudicial, and cannot bind us in expounding the statute now under consideration. The case of Burt v. Burt in like manner falls altogether short of the question we have now to decide. It was a suit for divorce instituted by a married woman against her husband on the ground of bigamy, adultery, and desertion. To establish the bigamy, evidence was given that the husband had married a woman in Australia according to the form of the Kirk of Scotland, but there was no proof that the form in question was recognised as legal by the local law. Upon this latter ground the Judge Ordinary held that a second marriage was not proved so as to make good the allegation of bigamy. All, therefore, that this case shows is that a second marriage by a form not recognised by law, will not amount to bigamy under the Divorce Act. Admitting, as we are disposed to do, that the construction of the two statutes should be the same, the decision in Burt v. Burt will not, as will presently appear, be found to conflict with our judgment in the present case: the second marriage in the present instance having been celebrated according to a form fully recognised by the law. We may, therefore, proceed to consider what is the proper construction of the statutory enactment in question, unfettered by these authorities. Before doing so, it should, however, be observed that there is this difference between the case of Reg. v. Fanning and the present, that the form of marriage there resorted to was one which, independently of the bigamous character of the marriage, was, by reason of the statutory prohibition, inapplicable to the special circumstances of the parties, and ineffectual to create a valid marriage. Whereas, in the case before us, independently of the incapacity, the form would have been good and binding in law. This distinction is expressly adverted to by Christian, J., in his judgment, as distinguishing the case before the Irish judges from that of Rex v. Brawn, and it may be doubted whether, but for this distinction, that learned judge would not have come to a different conclusion. The other judges constituting the majority do not, however, rest their judgment on this distinction, but plainly go the length of overruling the decision of Lord Denman in Reg v. Brawn. Their judgments proceed on the broad intelligible ground that to come within the statutes against bigamy the second marriage must be such as that but for its bigamous character it would have been in all respects, both as to the capacity of the parties and the ceremonial adopted, as binding as the first. Differing altogether from this view, and being prepared to hold that so long as a form of marriage has been used which the law recognises as binding, whether applicable to the particular parties or not, and further than this it is not necessary to go, the offence of bigamy is committed, we have only adverted to the distinction referred to in order to point out that our decision in no degree turns upon it, but rests on the broader ground taken by the dissentient judges in the Irish court. When it is said, in construing the statute in question, the same effect must be given to the term "marry" in both parts of the sentence, and that, consequently, as the first marriage must necessarily be a perfect and binding one, the second must be of equal efficacy in order to constitute bigamy, it is at once self-evident that the proposition, as there stated, cannot possibly hold good, for if the first marriage be good, the second, entered into while the first is subsisting, must of necessity be bad. It becomes necessary, therefore, to engraft a qualification on the proposition just stated, and to read the words "shall marry," in the latter part of the sentence, as meaning shall marry under such circumstances as that the second marriage would be good but for the existence of the first. But it is plain that those who so read the statute are introducing into it words which are not to be found in it, and are obviously departing from the sense in which the term "being married" must be construed in the earlier part of the sentence. But when once it becomes necessary to seek the meaning of a term occurring in a statute, the true rule of construction appears to us to be not to limit the latitude of departure so as to adhere to the nearest possible approximation to the ordinary meaning of the term, or to the sense in which it may have been used before, but to look to the purpose of the enactment, the mischief to be prevented, and the remedy which the Legislature intended to apply. Now we cannot agree with Fitzgerald, B. in his judgment in Reg. v. Fanning that the purpose of the statutes against bigamy was simply to make polygamous marriages penal, and that consequently it was only intended to constitute the offence of bigamy where the second marriage would, but for the existence of the first, be a valid one. Neither can we agree with those judges who, in Reg. v. Fanning, found their judgments on the assumption that, in applying the statute against bigamy, the second marriage must be one which, but for the first, would be binding. Polygamy, in the sense of having two wives or two husbands at one and the same time for the purpose of cohabitation is a thing altogether foreign to our ideas, and which may be said to be practically unknown, while bigamy in the modern acceptation of the term, namely, that of a second marriage consequent on an abandonment of the first while the latter still subsists, is unfortunately of too frequent occurrence. It takes place, as we all know, more frequently where one of the married parties has deserted the other, sometimes where both have voluntarily separated. It is always resorted to by one of the parties in fraud of the law, sometimes by both, in order to give the colour and pretence of marriage where the reality does not exist. Too often it is resorted to for the purpose of villanous fraud. The ground on which such a marriage is very properly made penal, is that it involves an outrage on public decency and morals, and creates a public scandal by the prostitution of a solemn ceremony which the law allows only to be applied to a legitimate union to a marriage at best but colourable and fictitious, and which may be made, and too often is made, the means of the most cruel and wicked deception. It is obvious that the outrage and the scandal involved in such a proceeding will not be the less, because the parties to the second marriage may be under some special incapacity to contract marriage. The deception will not be the less atrocious, because the one party may have induced the other to go through a form of marriage known to be generally binding, but inapplicable to their particular case. Is the scandal or the villany the less because the man having represented to the woman who is his dupe, and to the priest that he is a Roman Catholic, turns out afterwards to be a Protestant? Such instances as these we have referred to, thus involving public scandal or deception, being plainly within the mischief which we may reasonably assume it must have been the purpose of the Legislature to prevent, we are of opinion that we ought not to frustrate the operation of a very salutary statute by putting so narrow a construction on it as would exclude such a case as the present, if the words are legitimately capable of such a construction as would embrace it. Now, the words "shall marry another person," may well be taken to mean shall "go through the form and ceremony of marriage with another person." The words are fully capable of being so construed without being forced or strained, and as a narrower construction would have the effect of leaving a portion of the mischief untouched, which it must have been the intention of the Legislature to provide against, and thereby, as is fully admitted by those who contend for it, of bringing a grave reproach on the law, we think we are warranted in inferring that the words were used in the sense we have referred to, and that we shall best give effect to the Legislative intention by holding such a case as the present to be within their meaning. To assume that the words must have such a construction as would exclude it because the second marriage must be one which but for the bigamy would have been as binding as the first, appears to us to be begging the entire question, and to be running directly counter to the wholesome canon of construction, which prescribes that, where the language will admit of it, a statutory enactment shall be so construed as to make the remedy coextensive with the mischief it is intended to prevent. In thus holding, it is not at all necessary to say that forms of marriage unknown to the law, as was the case in Burt v. Burt, would suffice to bring a case within the operation of the statute. We must not be understood to mean that every fantastic form of marriage to which parties might think proper to resort, or that a marriage ceremony performed by an unauthorised person, or in an unauthorised place, would be a marrying within sect. 57 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 101. It will be time enough to deal with a case of this description when it arises. It is sufficient for the present purpose to hold, as we do, that where a person already bound by an existing marriage goes through a form of marriage known to and recognized by the law as capable of producing a valid marriage, for the purpose of a pretended and fictitious marriage, the case is not the less within the statute by reason of any special circumstances which, independently of the bigamous character of the marriage, may constitute a legal disability in the particular parties, or make the form of marriage resorted to specially inapplicable to their individual case. After giving the case of Reg. v. Fanning our best consideration, we are unanimous in holding that the conviction in the case before us was right, and that the verdict must stand good.

Saturday, June. 1, 1872.

(Before Bovill, C. J, Bramwell B., Byles Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.)

Reg v. Thompson and others.

Evidence—Husband and wife—Admissibility of wife as witness for a joint prisoner.

The wife of a prisoner jointly indicted and given in charge to the jury with other prisoners, cannot be called as a witness by one of the other prisoners for him whilst the husband is so in charge.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court, at the Easter Quarter Sessions for the county of Essex.

This was a joint indictment against Thompson and Danzey for stealing 56lb. of onions, the property of their master, and against Hide for receiving the same, knowing them to be stolen.

The charge was that the two first, being sent with two carts of vegetables to Covent Garden, stopped on the road at Hide's house, and there disposed to him of this bag of onions stolen by the two conjointly from one of the carts.

The prisoners did not ask to be tried separately but the two first retained one counsel, and Hide retained another.

The case depended mainly on what had been done and said at the door of Hide's house, and in his kitchen, by Thompson, Danzey, Hide, and his wife Elizabeth, and a maid servant Eliza, sister of the prisoner Thompson.

After the speech of the counsel for Thompson and Danzey, he tendered as a witness for his client, Elizabeth, the wife of the prisoner Hide.

This was objected to by the counsel for the prosecution on the ground that her evidence must directly affect the case against her husband, inasmuch as the aquittal of the two would necessarily entail the acquittal of Hide, and moreover that anything tending to strengthen or weaken the evidence against them, must have a similar effect on the evidence as regarded Hide.

The following cases were referred to:

Rex v. Smith, 1 Moo. C. C. 281;
Reg. v. Moore, 1. Cox C. C. 59;
Reg. v. Bartlett, 1 Cox C. C. 105;
Reg. v. Deeley, 11. Cox C. C. 607;
Reg. v. Payne, 41 L. J. 65, M. C; 12. Cox C. C. 118;

Under these circumstances, and considering the general policy of the law, as rejecting the evidence of a wife for or against her husband in criminal cases, we refused to admit the evidence of the wife, subject to a case to be submitted to the Court for Crown Cases Reserved.

Thompson and Danzey were convicted and Hide was acquitted, and we passed on each of the two former a sentence of four months' imprisonment, and (no application being made to admit them to bail) execution was respited and they were committed to prison to await the decision of the court.

(Signed) T. C. Chisenhale Marsh, Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

The Judges retired to consider their decision, and upon their return into court, Bovill, C. J., said: We have considered the point reserved in this case and are all of opinion that the wife of one of the prisoners stands in the same position, as regards the admissibility of her evidence at the trial, as her husband. The three prisoners were jointly charged upon the same indictment at the trial, and were all in the charge of the jury upon it, when the wife was tendered as a witness. The case is therefore not distinguishable in principle from Reg v. Payne, and the conviction will be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

V.C. BACON'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. Robert Butler and T. H. Carson, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

April 19, 20, and 23, 1872.

Temple v. Flower.

Railway company—Public highway—Right to stop up—Special injury—Superfluous lands—Parties.

A railway company were empowered to stop up certain streets and passages, including L. C. Place, and to appropriate and use such streets and passages, or parts thereof, so stopped up, for the purposes of their railways and works. By another Act they were also empowered to stop up and appropriate any passage, place, &c., on any part of their railway and works if and when they should have purchased all the land and houses to which it formed an access, and through which any public right of way to any place beyond the same lands and houses did not exist. They were also empowered to grant building leases of any superfluous lands.

The company took the whole of L. C. Place, and pulled down the houses thereon, and on the northern part thereof built a station, and at the southern side erected a hoarding, and the superfluous land thereby enclosed they leased to F., who commenced to build thereon in such a way as to stop up the southern end of L. C. Place, and deprive T. and the public of all access over the old roadway.

T., whose premises were immediately opposite the southern entrance to L. C. Place, had, since 1850, made use of the facilities thereby afforded to bring in and out of his premises long building materials, and this right he claimed as "a part of and incident to the right which, in common with the rest of the public, he had of using L. C. Place as a public highway."

Upon a motion for an injunction to restrain F. from building so as to stop up that portion of L. C. Place not actually used for the purposes of the railway:

Held, that the whole of L. C. Place had by the exercise of the powers conferred by their Acts become vested in the company, and that L. C. Place ceased to be a highway by the construction of the railway and the erection of the hoarding, and the motion was refused.

Held also that L. C. Place was not an "access" to T.'s premises within the meaning of the Act.

Semble, that the railway company should have been parties to the suit, and that the court would not make a final decree in their absence.

THIS was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who were the lessees of the Metropolitan Railway Company, from building their premises in such a manner as to interfere with plaintiff's access to, and right of user over part of the land.

The plaintiffs were builders, carrying on business in premises situated on the south side of Conduit-place, Paddington, which had been erected in 1850, and which were immediately opposite the southern end of Little Conduit-place. Conduit-place was only 18ft. 7in. wide, and the plaintiffs alleged that they and their predecessors in title had, since 1850, availed themselves of the facility afforded by the opening into Little Conduit-place for the purpose of turning their waggons and bringing in and out of their premises ladders and poles, and other long materials used in their business, and they claimed this right as "a part of and incident to the right, which in common with the rest of the public, the plaintiffs had of using Little Conduit-place as a public way." The bill also charged that if the defendants were allowed to stop up Little Conduit-place as they threatened to do, the plaintiffs would sustain special injury and damage beyond that which would be occasioned to the public at large, as they would thereby be prevented from carrying on the business as theretofore, or would at least be subject to great loss and inconvenience in so doing.

The Metropolitan Railway Company were incorporated in 1854, and, by their Act of 1860, in which was incorporated the Lands and Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts 1845, the company were empowered (sect. 7) to purchase and take for the providing of stations and works certain lands delineated in the deposited plans, and described in the Book of Reference lying on the east and west of Little Conduit-place, but not including any part of Little Conduit-place, which was, however, within the limits of deviation, as shown on the deposited plans.

By a subsequent Act, passed in 1861, the company were empowered (sect. 8) to stop up any of the streets or passages shown within the limits of the deposited plans and named in the Act, including Little Conduit-place, and to appropriate and use such streets and passages, or parts thereof so stopped up for the purposes of their railways and works.

By an Act passed in 1862 (sect. 14), after reciting that the company had, in the construction of their railway, been compelled to purchase and pull down various houses and buildings, and that the sites thereof had not been wholly used or would not be required for the purposes of the railway, and that, inasmuch as the railway was wholly within the metropolis, it was expedient that the company should be at liberty to grant building leases of lands which they had purchased but not used for the purposes of their railway, but without prejudice to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, requiring within the prescribed period the sale of the superfluous lands, it was enacted that the company might grant leases of any superfluous lands for such terms of years, at such rents, and subject to such covenants and conditions, as the company should deem expedient, but every such lease should be granted within the period prescribed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, for the sale of superfluous lands, and any lands comprised in such lease should (subject to such lease) be sold within the period prescribed, and in default of sale should vest as provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act with reference to superfluous lands.

By an Act passed in 1865 (sect. 31), after reciting that the company were the owners of certain lands adjacent to the railway, and houses and buildings erected over the railway, or immediately adjoining thereto, or otherwise connected with the structure of the railway, and that other lands and houses, and buildings similarly placed, might thereafter belong to the company, and that it was expedient to reserve to the company the power and control over such lands, houses, and buildings, it was enacted that any lands on, or immediately adjoining to, or houses, buildings, or tenements then or thereafter acquired, erected, or built over, or immediately adjoining to the railway or works of company, or any part thereof, in any way connected with the structure of the railway or works, and the site thereof, and any yards, gardens, or premises attached thereto, should not be deemed superfluous lands within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and it should be lawful for the company to hold and let any such lands, houses, or buildings, and to grant leases of the same for any term or number of years as they might think proper.

By another Act passed in 1866 (sect. 11), the company were, in addition to the powers conferred on them by any previous Acts, empowered to stop up and appropriate any court, alley, square, way, passage, or place on any part of the railway and works, if, and when they should have purchased all the lands and houses to which it formed an access, and through which any public right of way to any place beyond the same land and houses did not exist.

In 1867 the company used the northern portion of Little Conduit-place for the purposes of their station and works, thereby stopping up that end of the street, and they inclosed the land on the north of Conduit-place, including the site of Little Conduit-place, with a hoarding, in which at the south end of Little Conduit-place they put a gate; but the plaintiffs allege that the company did not thereby attempt to exclude them from using the street as theretofore, as the gate was always left unlocked, and they were in the habit of opening it whenever they required so to do in the exercise of their rights.

The plaintiff further charged that the Southern portion of the street, and the lands adjoining thereto were not, and never had been, required or used for the purposes of the company's works, and therefore that the company never acquired the power to stop up the southern portion of the street, and that the rights of the public over the same as a street, including the aforesaid right of the plaintiffs, remained undisturbed.

By an agreement, dated the 13th Feb. 1872, the company agreed to grant to the defendants, who were brewers at Stratford-on-Avon, a building lease of the land on the north side of Conduit-place, including the site of Little Conduit-place. The agreement contained a proviso that the company should be at liberty at any time to retake the land if it should be required for the purposes of their works. The defendants shortly after commenced erecting warehouses on the said piece of land. The plaintiffs objected to the defendants building in such a way as to interfere with their alleged rights. The defendants, in a correspondence that ensued, offered, upon payment to them by the plaintiffs of a nominal rent, to alter a gateway in their premises so as to allow to the plaintiffs the same access to their premises which they had previously enjoyed.

The plaintiffs, however, refused the offer, and instituted the present suit to restrain the defendants from interfering with their alleged right.

Neither the railway company nor the Attorney-General were made parties to the suit.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Bagshawe, for the plaintiffs.—The railway company have only a right to stop up Little Conduit-place so far as it is required for their works. Compulsory powers enabling them so to do are not to be created or extended by doubtful implication: (Lamb v. The North London Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 522, 526; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 98.) Although by building their station the company stopped up one end of Little Conduit-place, it did not thereby cease to be a highway, although in reality a mere cul-de-sac: (Gwyn v. Hardwicke, 25 L. J. 97, M. C.; 27 L. T. Rep. 72.) The company never purchased or acquired any right in the soil of the street.

Beckett v. The Corporation of Leeds, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 375; 20 W. R. 454.

Kay, Q. C. and Osler, for the defendants.—The soil of the street was acquired by the company when they took the houses on either side of it.

Doe d. Pring v. Pearsey, 7 B. & C. 304;
Holmes v. Bellingham, 7 C. B., N. S., 329;
Marquis of Salisbury v. The Great Northern Railway Company, 5 C. B., N. S., 174; 32 L. T. Rep. 175.

In Beckett v. The Corporation of Leeds (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 375), there was evidence to rebut the presumption of law that the owners of the houses were entitled to the soil of the street, but here there is no such evidence. In the 8th section of the Act of 1861, the word "appropriate" is contrasted with the word "use." The company by taking, appropriates the land, and it is not necessary that they should use it. Whatever lands their engineers may consider necessary, the company may acquire, either to be used for their own purposes, or to be disposed of as superfluous lands:

Stockton and Darlington Railway Company v. Brown, 9 H. L. Cas. 246; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 131;
The City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. The Caledonian Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Sc. App. H. L. 160, 164.

The company have complied with all the requirements of the several Acts, and have acted strictly within the powers thereby conferred on them.

Amphlett, Q. C., in reply, referred to Flower v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, 2 Dr. & Sm. 330, 333; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—This case depends wholly upon the Acts of Parliament. The plaintiff's claim is that he is entitled to use a highway; it is that and nothing else;—that there exists a highway to which, with the rest of the Queen's subjects, he is entitled to have access, to make such use of it as the public can make of a highway; and that the company or the defendants on this record, are seeking to interfere with his right in that respect. That there was a highway once is beyond all question. Whether that has ceased to exist is the question which is raised upon this application. Now I think that the railway company ought to be parties to this suit. I said the other day, when we were considering it, that for the purpose of this injunction I would not raise such an objection. The defendants do not raise any such objection as appears by the correspondence which is set out in the bill, and for the present purpose the case may be disposed of upon the materials as they now exist, but it seems to me to be impossible that a decree can be made in this cause until the railway company are here. That I observe now, not for the purpose of postponing the decision which I have to pronounce, or of putting any impediment in the way of the parties. Now at the time when the first of the Acts of Parliament which have been mentioned was passed, the railway company were contemplating the making of a railway across the lands in question, and the other lands which are described in the Act of Parliament and book of reference, and which consist of a sort of parallelogram closely covered with buildings, bounded on the north by what was then called Conduit-street East, on the west by Spring-street, on the east by London-street, and on the south by Conduit-place, and through that parallelogram there ran what was unquestionably a highway called Little Conduit-place. The plaintiff's house, or the entrance to the house, is directly opposite the mouth of that Little Conduit-place. The Act of Parliament clearly does give, and meant to give, the railway company the power to acquire the whole of the land contained in that parallelogram, including of course Little Conduit-place. That is described in the deposited plan, and the books of reference, and the owners of the soil of Little Conduit-place are therein described as being the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the vestry of Paddington. Houses were built on either side of Little Conduit-place. The company, in the exercise of their powers under the Act of Parliament, have purchased and acquired the whole of the land comprised within the parallelogram. They have, as the Act of Parliament authorised them to do, taken and appropriated it for the purposes of their railway and works. That right is not at all confined by the mere site of the railway that they have constructed. They were empowered, as in all such Acts of Parliament the undertakers are empowered, to take more land than appears to be absolutely necessary for the construction of the railway itself. The railway and works comprehend all that they consider necessary for the execution of the objects of their undertaking, and unless it is disputed by some person who has an interest adverse to them, the taking and using by the railway company, for the purpose of their railway and works, is an act accomplished and done, and the effect of it is to vest in the railway company the whole of the lands so taken. Now I find here, as a fact undisputed, that they did take the whole of the lands, that they did erect a hoarding on the south side of those lands—the only facts necessary for me to consider—they did pull down all the houses on these lands existing before the Act of Parliament was passed, and having erected the hoarding, they inserted into it what is called a gate, which would be more properly called a door, the effect of which was to secure in a sense the possession of that which the railway company had acquired. The evidence is uncontradicted upon the facts which I have mentioned. Whether the gate or the door which they put in was locked or not cannot in the slightest degree signify, if as a fact they did take possession of the land, nor can it, in my opinion, signify at all whether they did purchase, or on what terms they purchased, because the owners of the soil in the highway either could or could not claim a right to it, either could or could not sell it; whether they did or did not is a matter unimportant for the present purpose to consider. No claim appears ever to have been made on the part of those persons who are said to be the owners of the soil, and the highway has been stopped up, and has ceased to be a highway, as well by the construction of the railway over the northern half, as by their having erected that hoarding over the whole extent of the southern boundary of the lands so taken. Then it is said that the railway company have no power to do this, and for this purpose Mr. Amphlett has referred to the Act of Parliament, and I quite agree that all must depend on the terms of the Act, because it is unnecessary, I think, to refer to that which has not been said very strongly by the plaintiff, that he was entitled to an easement, and it could only be said in the sense that he had gained such a right over the highway before it was stopped up. Nor does any question arise in respect of the soil, because, whether the soil belonged to the parish vestry or to the Metropolitan Board of Works, or to the owners of the adjoining land, seems to be quite immaterial for the present purpose. If it belonged to the owners of the adjoining land, it was bought and paid for; if it belonged to the officers of the parish, they are no parties, and any interest of theirs I cannot regard. The question depends only upon the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and the first Act of Parliament referred to is that of 1860, by which, in sect. 5, the company are authorised to enter upon, take, and use such of the lands delineated on the plans, and described in the book of reference, as may be necessary for the construction of the railway, stations, and works. I do not think it necessary to refer more particularly to the question which has been raised, for which the case of The Stockton and Darlington Railway Company v. Brown (9 H. of L. Cas. 246; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 131), has been referred to, because, undoubtedly, it was there decided that the company are to be the judges of what land they want for their railway, stations, and works; and, although it happened in the case of Flower v. The London and Brighton Railway Company (2 Dr. & Sm. 330, 333; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10), the question was raised whether they had fairly and properly exercised the powers given them by the Act of Parliament, in other words, whether they had not, under pretence of the Act of Parliament, sought to possess themselves of lands not required for the purposes of their railway and works, yet in the absence of any such question being raised—and here no such question has been raised—I am not at liberty to hesitate in saying that the company by building that hoarding upon the south side, and by making the railway upon the north side of the parallelogram, did no more than the Act of Parliament perfectly authorised and justified them in doing. The 8th section of the Act of Parliament of 1861 seems to me to be one of the most important features in this case. At this time, the matter having been in contemplation from the year 1854, the Act of Parliament of 1860 having passed, in the Act of 1861 the 8th section provides that the company may stop up any of the streets or passages shown within the limits of the deposited plans of 1861. Then it enumerates them, and among them is a street called Little Conduit-place, and the clause ends with these words, "and may appropriate and use such streets and passages or parts thereof so stopped up for the purposes of their railway and works." Whatever criticism be applied to the last words of that clause, the part so stopped up may, I confess, as a matter of construction, be open to some doubt, not a very serious one, but giving it the construction that has been suggested that the clause only applied in this case to such part of Little Conduit-place as has been actually stopped up. I say, here the facts proved are that the entirety of Little Conduit-place was, in fact, stopped up, and has remained stopped up for years, and that it was so stopped up for the purposes of the railway and works. That, in my opinion, disposes of the question. The company are authorised to take possession of such lands described in the deposited plan as they think necessary. Nobody has ever suggested that it was not necessary for them at the time when they exercised these Acts to take and use and to stop up, as in fact they did stop up, this Little Conduit-place, in the construction of the railway. Of course a much larger area was necessary than was ultimately occupied by the railway itself. The quantity of houses, they are very numerous, that had to be taken down, proves, that in the estimation of the company, they were obliged to incur a very considerable expense, buying the houses and the interests of all persons concerned in them, because they thought it necessary for the purposes of their railway and works; and in the course of so doing Little Conduit Place, in my opinion, ceased to be a highway. It was stopped up by the authority of Parliament, an authority which this court could not question, and neither the owners of the soil nor any other person interested in the land did at any time raise any objection to the stopping up of Little Conduit Place, nor was there any reason in the nature of things, except the plaintiff's interest which I will advert to presently, why Little Conduit Place, the houses of which had been destroyed, should not have ceased to be a highway, because there was no purpose for which the highway could be resorted to or used by any person, excepting only, and I now repeat the exception, what the plaintiff says as to the use made of it by him. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, there is not the least doubt that the powers of the Act of Parliament have been rightly exercised, and the consequence of the exercise of those powers is to vest in the railway company the whole of Little Conduit Place. The other Acts of Parliament do not seem to me to carry the thing further. I do not think that the 11th section of the Act of 1866 applies to the case at all, because, whatever may be the construction of that clause, it is contained in an Act of Parliament later in date to the Act to which I have been referring, and does not repeal the former Act; and when this Act of 1866 was passed the company had the right to acquire the very thing in question. The Act of Parliament was passed in the year 1866, and it is said that these works I am referring to of the company were erected in 1867. Now there may be some difficulty about the construction of that clause if it has, as I think it has not, any application to the case before us, because the company has purchased all the lands and houses to which that passage formed an access, "and through which any public right of way to any place beyond the same lands and houses does not exist." It has no access, excepting only the access which might formerly have been from the north side of the plaintiff's house, which has long since ceased to exist, and I think that clause has no application whatever to the case before us. Then what have the company done? It appears by the evidence that the company stopped up and appropriated Little Conduit Place. A gate was erected at the southern end for the use of the contractors, and a hoarding and gate were erected, and intended to, and did, preclude all ingress to the passage or place by the public, who were thereby in fact excluded therefrom, and no persons have since used, or claimed to use the passage. Then the case of the plaintiff is, that being one of the public, and having a right to use and to resort to this highway, he has done so ever since he became the tenant, and his predecessor, for many years before that, had resorted to the highway for the purposes which he has mentioned. It is quite clear, therefore, that that is purely an accident not at all necessary to the enjoyment of his property. That he has, in fact, turned his waggons, cannot, of course, give him a right against the persons who were the owners of the soil enclosed by the gate, nor that he cannot take in ladders and scaffolding poles as long as he could when there was the opportunity of turning the further ends into this highway. I cannot say I am greatly impressed by that, because I have no doubt that, with very simple contrivances, scaffolding poles of any size might be got into his premises. It would require some alteration, no doubt; they could not be got in vertically or horizontally, but they might, by putting them at a different angle, easily be taken into his premises. The inconvenience which he complains of in that respect, does not seem to me to be very great, but even if it were greater, it would not influence my judgment, and I do not think it ought to be attended to on this occasion, because if the railway company have only done what they had a right to do, though the consequences of it may be inconvenient to the plaintiff, that is no reason why he should assert a right over that which I regard as their property. Then the railway company have done this, resorting to the powers which the Act of Parliament contains, which enable them to lease such part of the land as—when the railway is constructed, and experience has satisfied them what land they presently want for the purposes of their undertaking—they have no present occasion for. Having regard, as the Act of Parliament says, to the populous nature of the neighbourhood, it was obviously convenient that they should have the power to lease and make a profit by that means of the land they had taken, and which they did not presently want. That is what they have done, but, as the evidence shows, they have done that contemplating the possibility that at some future day they may have occasion for purposes of necessity for the land which they now demise on lease. They reserve to themselves the power of revoking those leases, and upon terms which are contemplated in the reservation, getting back again the land, which for the present they lease to the lessee. In my opinion the court has no right in the world to interefere with the use which the railway company have made of this land. To call this a highway, which, since the year 1867 has ceased to be a highway, is to abuse the language which is to be applied to it. To say that it can form an access to the plaintiff's premises is directly at variance with the plain facts of the case, for there can be no access unless you can penetrate through the railway. The northern end has been entirely blocked up and destroyed, and there can be no access to that part which remained, if anything did remain, as a highway. But, as I have said, in my opinion the Act of Parliament authorised the railway company to acquire and take possession of the highway called Little Conduit-place; they did most effectually acquire and take possession of it, and they are the rightful owners of it. It is unnecessary for me to express that which I very sincerely feel, a regret that the parties should be engaged in a litigation of this sort, which, from what I have said, I think is unfounded on the part of the plaintiff, and which is wholly useless, as appears by the correspondence. A certain portion of good sense which does not seem to have have prevailed in this case, would have prevented the raising of this question between neighbours and persons engaged in the same kind of business. I think the offer that was made to arrange the contemplated building so as to give to the plaintiff all the convenience he required, upon his consenting to pay a nominal rent, it is greatly to be regretted was not accepted; but with that I have nothing to do, except that I am bound to express, which I cannot help doing, my regret that there should be such a question; but upon the construction of the Act of Parliament, upon the right of the railway company to acquire, possess, and retain that which was once a highway, and which has by law ceased to be a highway and become the property of the company, I have no doubt. I have no doubt that in the year 1867, when they put up that door or gate, they might, if they had thought fit, have built a solid wall along it, and that they have just the same right to do so now. I think, therefore, that there is no foundation whatever upon which the plaintiff's application for an injunction can be sustained, and I must, therefore, refuse it.

V. C. WICKENS' COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

HARRIS v. DU PASQUIER.

Will—Charitable legacies—Uncertainty—Life estate by implication.

A testator, after making certain dispositions of part of his property, proceeded as follows: "On the death or marriage of my wife, which shall first happen, I direct my trustees to pay the following legacies free of duty: To the Cancer Hospital, 100l.; to the Brompton Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, 100l.; to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of Dublin for the time being, 100l., for such objects as he shall deem most deserving; to the Blind Asylum, New Kent-road, London, 100l.; to Mrs. Gladstone, of No. 11, Carlton House-terrace, to be applied as she thinks proper in charity, 200l., to be considered as coming to her from her correspondent 'Nemo'; and the residue I bequeath to my trustees for such objects as they consider deserving, whether in increase of the before-mentioned ones, or otherwise."

Held, that the gift of residue and the legacy to the Lord Mayor of Dublin failed, the first for uncertainty, the second as not being a good charitable gift; that the other legacies were good charitable gifts, and were to take effect after the death or marriage of the testator's widow, and that she was not entitled to a life estate by implication in them.

THIS suit which was instituted for the administration of the estate of Thomas Hyland, now came on for further consideration upon a question as to the validity of certain charitable legacies.

The will was dated the 18th March, 1868, and by it the testator, after appointing trustees and making provision for his wife, directed his trustees, on the death or marriage of his wife, to pay the following legacies free of duty.

To the Cancer Hospital 100*l.*, to the Brompton Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, 100*l.*; to the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of Dublin for the time being, 100*l.*, for such objects as he shall deem most deserving; to the Blind Asylum, New Kent-road, 100*l.*; to Mrs. Gladstone, of No. 11, Carlton-house-terrace, to be applied as she thinks proper in charity, 200*l.*, to be considered as coming from her correspondent "Nemo," and the residue of my estate I bequeath to my trustees for such objects as they consider deserving, whether in increase of the before-mentioned ones or otherwise, and I empower my trustees to make arrangements with the tenants as to the repair of certain houses.

The testator died possessed of considerable pure and some impure personal estate.

Greene, Q.C. and Graham Hastings, for the plaintiffs, the trustees, submitted the question to the court.

Karslake, Q.C. and Tremlett, for the testator's widow, contended that the gift to the Lord Mayor of Dublin and the residuary gift were void, the first as not being given for charitable objects, and the second for uncertainty. They further contended that the widow was entitled, by implication, to a life estate in all the charitable gifts which were postponed until after her death. They cited—

Hemming, for the Crown, argued upon the provisions in the will against the implied life estate to the widow.

Karslake, Q.C. in reply.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider that the gift to the Lord Mayor of Dublin fails, as it appears to me too strong an implication of intention to say that the legacy is given for charitable objects. The other charitable legacies are good, and must be paid at the time specified, but not before. As to the contention that the testator's widow takes by implication a life estate in the gift to the charities, I do not think it can be sustained. The authorities on the subject are to be found in a case before the late Master of the Rolls for Ireland (James v. Shannon, L. Rep. 2 Ir. Eq. 118), where the question was very fully and carefully discussed, and they all appear to bear me out in the view I have taken. The residuary gift fails altogether, on the ground of uncertainty.

CULLEN (app.) v. TRIMBLE (resp.).

*Summary jurisdiction by implication—Provisions in respect of such jurisdiction—*32 & 33 Vict. c. 70.

The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70) contains no express words giving summary jurisdiction to justices to convict for the offences created thereby; but, by sect. 57, a person doing a certain thing is to be deemed guilty of an offence, "unless he shows, to the satisfaction of the justices before whom he is charged, that he did not know," &c.; and, "in case of a conviction for an offence under this section, no compensation shall be payable," &c.; by sect. 103, "if any person acts in contravention of or is guilty of an offence against this Act . . . he shall for every such offence be liable . . . to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.," by sect.* 107, "in proceedings before justices under this Act, any railway company or other body corporate may appear by any member;" and by sect. 108, an appeal to quarter sessions is given to any party who "feels aggrieved by the dismissal of his complaint by justices, or by any determination or adjudication of justices with respect to any penalty or forfeiture under this Act," upon certain conditions mentioned:

Held, that these provisions impliedly gave to justices summary jurisdiction to convict for offences under the Act.

THIS was a case stated under the 12 and 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, on appeal to the quarter sessions.

An information was laid against the appellant, charging him with having exposed in a certain market, the same being a public place where animals are commonly exposed for sale, four bullocks affected with a certain contagious and infectious disease, to wit, the foot-and-mouth disease, contrary to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), s. 57.

On the hearing at petty sessions, it was objected on behalf of the appellant that the justices had no jurisdiction under the Act to convict in a summary manner for the offence charged.

The justices overruled the objection, and convicted the appellant of the offence, and adjudged him to pay £20 penalty and costs, the conviction being drawn in the form I. given in the schedule to 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. Against this conviction an appeal was lodged at the quarter sessions under sect. 108 of the Act of 1869, but the hearing was respited from time to time until the opinion of this court could be taken upon the case.

The question for the court was whether the justices had jurisdiction within the Act; if the court was of opinion in the affirmative, the appeal was to be remitted to the quarter sessions to be heard on the merits.

By section 57 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. cap. 70).

If any person exposes in a market or fair, or other public place where horses or animals are commonly exposed for sale, or exposes for sale in any sale-yard, whether public or private, or places in a fair or other place adjacent to or connected with a market or fair, or where horses or animals are commonly placed before exposure for sale, or sends or causes to be carried on a railway, or on a canal, river, or other inland navigation, or on a coasting vessel, or carries, leads, or drives, or causes to be carried, led, or driven, on a highway or thoroughfare, any horse or animal affected with a contagious or infectious disease, he shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act, unless he shows to the satisfaction of the justices before whom he is charged that he did not know of the same being so affected, and that he could not with reasonable diligence, have obtained such knowledge. . . . In case of a conviction for an offence under this section, no compensation shall be payable in respect of any animal slaughtered under this section.

By sect. 103:

If any person acts in contravention of, or is guilty of any offence against this Act, or any order or regulation made by the Privy Council, or a local authority in pursuance of this Act, he shall for every such offence (except as otherwise provided in this Act, and except where a less penalty is provided in any such order or regulation) be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

By sect. 107:

In proceedings before justices under this Act, any railway company or other body corporate may appear by any member of their board of directors or council, or by any officer authorised in writing under the hand of any director or member of the council of the company or body.

By sect. 108:

If any party feels aggrieved by the dismissal of his complaint by justices, or by any determination or adjudication of justices with respect to any penalty or forfeiture under this Act, he may appeal therefrom, subject to the conditions and regulations following:

1. The appeal shall be made to some court of general or quarter sessions for the county or place in which the cause of appeal has arisen, holden not less than fifteen days, and not more than four months, after the decision of the justices.

2. The appellant shall, within three days after the cause of appeal has arisen, give notice to the clerk of the petty sessional division for which the justices act, whose decision is appealed from, of his intention to appeal, and of the grounds thereof.

3. The appellant shall, immediately after such notice, enter into a recognisance before a justice of the peace, with two sufficient sureties, conditioned personally to try such appeal, and to abide the judgment of the court thereon, and to pay such costs as may be awarded by the court.

4. The court may adjourn the appeal, and may make such order thereon as they think just.

But nothing in this section respecting appeals shall affect any enactment relative to appeals in cases of summary convictions or adjudications in the city of London, or the metropolitan police district.

By sect. 109:

For the purposes of proceedings under this Act, or any order of the Privy Council or order or regulation of a local authority thereunder, every offence against this Act or any such order or regulation shall be deemed to have been committed, and every cause of complaint under this Act or any such order or regulation, shall be deemed to have arisen, either in the place in which the same actually was committed or arose, or in any place in which the person who charged or complained against happens to be.

Aspinall, Q.C., for the appellant, contended that inasmuch as no summary jurisdiction was expressly given to justices by the Act, it could not be implied from its provisions. The remedy against a breach of the Act was therefore only by indictment or by action for the penalties imposed.

Torr, Q.C., for the respondent, argued that the sections above set out could apply only to a summary jurisdiction; that it was sufficient if by obvious implication the Legislature intended to provide such a mode of procedure; and that it was the conclusion so to grant jurisdiction was irresistible from the whole tenour of the Act.

The COURT (Blackburn, Hannen, and Quain, JJ.), considered that the statute, by its various sections, impliedly gave summary jurisdiction to the justices against offences mentioned therein, although the Act was imperfectly drawn, and its language was obscure.

SECOND COURT.

BARNES (app.) v. ACKROYD (resp.)

Nuisance—Black smoke — Occupiers — Nuisances Removal Acts 1855 and 1860—Sanitary Act 1866.

The respondents, who were occupiers of mills which were used as a manufactory, and not as a private dwelling house, were summoned before justices under the Sanitary Act 1866, and the Nuisances Removal Acts incorporated therewith, for sending forth from one of their chimneys black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance. It was proved that during one hour the smoke from this chimney was a nuisance; but, no evidence being given as to the persons who were in charge of the furnaces which sent the smoke up the chimney, the justices discharged the summons:

Held, that the respondents were the proper persons against whom proceedings should be taken, but that the justices should inquire whether the nuisance was likely to recur, or to be repeated, before they made an order of abatement.

THE following case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench under the provisions of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the West Riding of the county of York.

By the 14th section of the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90, part 2nd), it is amongst other things enacted that the expression "Nuisances Removal Act" shall mean the Acts passed in the reign of Her present Majesty in the years following, that is to say, one in the session of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121; the other in the session of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, as amended by the second part of this Act, and this part shall be considered as one with the said Acts.

By the 19th section of the said Act it is enacted that the word "nuisances," under the "Nuisances Removal Acts," shall include inter alia, "any fireplace or furnace which does not as far as practicable consume the smoke arising from the combustible used in such fireplace or furnace, and is used within the district of a nuisance authority for working engines by steam, or in any mill, factory, dyehouse, brewery, bakehouse, or gasworks, or in any manufactory or trade process whatsoever; any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance."

A summons was issued under the hand and seal of John Waterhouse, Esq., a justice of the peace acting in and for the West Riding of the county of York, by the appellant, who is an inhabitant of Sowerby Bridge, in the parish of Halifax, in the West Riding of the county of York, which was duly served upon the respondents; and which said summons was in the words and figures following —"To Messrs. James Ackroyd and Son, Limited, of Skircoat, in the said riding, manufacturers. Whereas information has this day been made before the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said West Riding of the county of York, by one John Barnes, an inhabitant of the parish of Halifax in the said riding, for that you on the 16th Dec. inst., at the township of Skircoat, in the said parish, in the riding aforesaid, unlawfully did send forth black smoke from a certain chimney belonging to certain premises there, called Copley Mills, belonging to you (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house), in such quantity as to be a nuisance, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided: These are therefore to command you in Her Majesty's name to be and appear on Saturday, the 30th Dec. inst., at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at the West Riding Court House, in Halifax, in the said riding, before such justices of the peace for the said riding as may then be there, to answer to the said information, and to be further dealt with according to law. Given under our hand and seal this 26th Dec. 1871, at Halifax, in the said Riding."

The summons came on for hearing on the 30th Dec. last, when it was proved on the behalf of the appellant that he was an inhabitant of Sowerby Bridge, in the said parish of Halifax, being the parish within which the said mills called Copley Mills are situate; that black smoke did issue from the chimney of the said mills on the day in question, at different intervals, for periods of time amounting together to seventeen minutes of the one hour during which it was watched, in such quantity as to be a nuisance; that Copley Mills were in the occupation of the respondents; and that the said premises were used as a manufactory, and not as a private dwelling-house. No inquiry had been made as to who had charge of the furnaces at the time the smoke was emitted, or as to the description of furnaces in use at the time, nor had any order been theretofore made prohibiting the use of the said chimney.

Upon such hearing of the summons no attempt was made to disprove the quantity of black smoke said to have been issuing from the mill chimney, but on the part of the respondents it was contended that the charge could not be maintained against the respondents upon the evidence, and that it was the justices' duty, under the 12th section of the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, to have issued a summons requiring the person by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance, the nuisance arose or continued, or, if such person could not be found or ascertained, the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arose to appear before them in petty sessions assembled at their usual place of meeting, and that they should then proceed to inquire into the said complaint; and that, as there was no evidence before them to prove who was in charge of the furnaces which sent the black smoke up the chimney, they had summoned the wrong person, and that the occupier could not be charged with the offence of committing such a nuisance, unless it had been first shown that the stoker, engineer, or other person employed at the respondents' fireplaces or furnaces could not be found; and having doubts in their own minds as to the construction of the said sect. 12 of the said Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, the justices determined to discharge the information against the defendants, but decided to grant a case for the opinion of this honourable court.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that if the act or default was not the positive act or default of the respondents, yet it was undoubtedly with their (the respondents') permission or sufferance that the nuisance arose and continued; for, they being the occupiers of the premises, no person, as long as they continued in such occupation, could do such acts without their permission or sufferance. And it was further argued that the respondents were responsible for the acts and defaults of their servants in this respect, and more particularly so as the proceeding was not for the recovery of penalties, but merely a civil proceeding against the respondents for an order for abatement of the nuisance referred to.

The justices, therefore, respectfully asked the opinion of this honourable court whether they ought, upon the evidence laid before them by the respondents, to have made the order for abatement applied for. If the court be of opinion in the affirmative, they would be ready to issue a fresh summons, and hear the complaint de novo.

M'Intyre, Q.C., for appellant.—This was evidence upon which the justices ought to have made the order applied for. By sect. 12 of the Nuisances Removal Act 1855, upon complaint to a justice by a local authority concerning a nuisance, "such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found or ascertained, the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to appear before any two justices in petty sessions assembled at their usual place of meeting, who shall proceed to inquire into the said complaint; and if it be proved to their satisfaction that the nuisance exists, or did exist at the time when the notice was given, or, if removed or discontinued since the notice was given, that it is likely to recur or to be repeated, the justices shall make an order in writing under their hands and seals on such person, owner, or occupier for the abatement or discontinuance and prohibition of the nuisance as hereinafter mentioned, and shall also make an order for the payment of all costs incurred up to the time of hearing or making the order for abatement or discontinuance or prohibition of the nuisance." By sect. 13 of the Nuisances Removal Act 1860, "upon complaint before a justice of the peace by any inhabitant of any parish or place of the existence of any nuisance on any private premises in the same parish or place, such justice shall issue a summons requiring the person by whose act, default, permission or sufferance the nuisance arises, or, if such person cannot be found or ascertained, the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to appear before two justices in petty sessions assembled at their usual place of meeting, who shall proceed to inquire into the said complaint, and act in relation thereto as in cases where complaint is made by a local authority under sect. 12 of the said Nuisances Removal Act, 1855, and as if the person making the complaint were such local authority." [Stopped by the court.]

F. M. White for respondents.—The nuisances enumerated in sect. 19 of the Act of 1866 are merely an extension of those mentioned in sect. 8 of the Act of 1855, and must be subject to the provisions of the earlier Acts. The person by whose act or default this chimney was a nuisance must have been either the builder of the chimney or the person who lighted the fire. They ought both to have been summoned before the justices' jurisdiction to make an order against the respondents' arose.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think there can be no doubt that the magistrates have here made a mistake in the application of the law. The masters who authorised and directed their servants to light the fires which caused the smoke are the persons properly liable to these proceedings; but the justices should have inquired, under sect. 12 of the Act of 1855, whether the nuisance was likely to recur or to be repeated; and if satisfied that it was, they should have made an order for the abatement on the respondents. They had better now hear a fresh complaint.

SECOND COURT.

DANN (app.) v. MANBY (resp.)

Metropolitan police—County justices—District not assigned to police court—21 & 22 Vict. c. 73, s. 6.

The respondent was charged before justices of the county of Kent, sitting at Dartford, out of the metropolitan police district, with committing an offence under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54, at Bexley, which is a place within the metropolitan police district, not assigned to any of the police courts of the metropolis.

Held, affirming the opinion of the justices, that they had no jurisdiction to try the offence.

AT a petty session holden at Dartford, in and for the upper petty sessional division of the Lathe of Sutton-at-Hone, in the county of Kent, on the 4th Nov. 1871, before four of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, the information and complaint hereinafter particularly specified of Thomas Dann, of Bexley, Kent (hereinafter called the appellant), against Robert Manby, then residing at 20, Manor-gardens, Chelsea (hereinafter called the respondent), came on to be heard at such petty session holden at Dartford aforesaid, pursuant to a summons which had been issued upon such information, which charged the respondent with having, on the 25th Oct. then last past, used threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace might be occasioned.

The offence charged is one of many offences created by the 54th section of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, clause 13, and is limited to the commission of such offence in any thoroughfare within the limits of the metropolitan police district; and the evidence of the appellant and his witnesses proved, to the satisfaction of the justices, that the respondent had committed the offence so created and charged against him.

They nevertheless doubted whether they had jurisdiction to convict, and therefore declined to do so, and dismissed the complaint.

The appellant being dissatisfied with such determination, as being erroneous in law, applied to the justices in writing, within three days after such determination, to state and sign a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, and they, being of opinion that such application was reasonable, stated and signed the following case accordingly.

As before stated, they were perfectly satisfied upon the facts that the respondent had committed the offence charged by such information; but they thought they had no jurisdiction to convict, and they came to this conclusion upon the following grounds:

The place where the offence was proved to have been committed was at Bexley; but Bexley, although within the Metropolitan Police District, is not within any division of such district assigned to any of the police-courts of the metropolis.

The county justices for the petty sessional division within which Bexley is situated do not hold any petty session at any place within the Metropolitan Police District, but only at Dartford, which, although an adjoining parish to Bexley, is not within the limits of the Metropolitan Police District; and upon the best consideration the justices could give to the subject, they were of opinion that the county justices had no power, while sitting beyond the limits of the Metropolitan District, to convict for any of the offences which are specially created by the statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, and for that reason they declined to convict.

The 75th section of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47 defined the word "magistrate" to include, not only a police magistrate, but also every justice acting for any part of the Metropolitan District for which no court had been established; and the

on the grounds, amongst others, that it was contrary to law to lay on the same day and time nineteen separate informations, and to issue nineteen separate summonses, and make nineteen separate orders with nineteen separate sets of costs for an accumulated penalty upon the one order.

The magistrates overruled the objections, and a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the question of law was demanded, but refused; and on the magistrates being asked to give their refusal in writing, they declined.

The justices imposed a penalty of 10*s.* and 15*s.* costs upon the first summons, and upon each of the remaining eighteen summonses a penalty of 10*s.* and 16*s.* costs, which have not been paid.

R. G. Williams showed cause, and contended that these were convictions for separate offences, and that the costs were in the discretion of the justices.

Maule, Q.C. (with him F. M. White) supported the rule, and argued that one conviction only could be sustained, that there was one continuous act of disobedience, for which one information only could be laid. Further, that the chimney itself, by the words of the Act, was the nuisance, and that a special provision for abating such a nuisance was given in the Act.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think this rule must be discharged. The Legislature, in passing the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, provided for cases of continuous nuisances, and by sect. 14, "any person not obeying the said order for abatement shall, if he fail to satisfy the justices that he has used all due diligence to carry out such order, be liable for every such offence to a penalty of not more than 10*s.* per day during his default, and any person knowingly and wilfully acting contrary to the said order of prohibition shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty not exceeding 20*s.* per day during such contrary action; and the local authority may, under the powers of entry given by this Act, enter the premises to which this order relates, and remove or abate the nuisance condemned or prohibited, and do whatever may be necessary in execution of such order, and charge the cost to the person on whom the order is made as hereinafter provided." By the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), s. 19, the subject of this complaint is made a nuisance within the application of the previous Act of 1855. The justices here have properly said that the order means to prohibit the sending forth black smoke. Then by the 14th section, above referred to, if a person who has not obeyed such order has failed to show that he has used due diligence to carry out such order, he has disobeyed the order, and so toties quoties. Summonses have been taken out in respect of each of a number of days on which such order was disobeyed, and the justices have convicted and imposed penalties on each summons. This is said to have been offensive, and to have multiplied costs. It appears that in each of the cases the justices had a discretion to allow costs. The defendants seem to have been obstinate, and the justices seem to have thought that it would not be oppressive to give costs in each case. It is said the effect, is to increase the penalty imposed, and that may be so. The justices would, I think, have done better in their discretion if they had left it for the Legislature to increase the penalty.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is a repetition of the offence every time the chimney is allowed to send forth black smoke. The effect is that, on each occasion they let forth black smoke after the order for abating was made, a distinct offence was committed, to which the penalty was attached.

Rule discharged with costs.

REG. v. ROWELL (app.).

*Licence for sale of excisable liquors—Jurisdiction of justices—Discretion of justices to refuse licence—Change of tenant after general sessions—*9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14.

The tenant of a house, who in Sept. 1870 had obtained a licence for the sale of excisable liquors, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, was compelled by the landlord (after due notice given) to quit possession of the house in May 1871, and another tenant was let into possession, to whom the justices in petty sessions refused, on the 5*th June* 1871, to indorse the former tenant's licence, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 5. The new tenant then gave up possession, and no application for a licence was made to the general annual licensing meeting, held on the 4*th Sept.* 1871, the house being at that time unoccupied. Appellant, the next tenant of the house, applied for a licence, under sect. 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, at a special sessions held under that Act, but the application was refused by the justices, whose decision was affirmed on appeal by the quarter sessions, who found, however, that the appellant was a proper person:

Held, that the justices clearly had a discretion to refuse the licence.

Quære, whether the justices had any jurisdiction to deal with the matter at the special sessions?

THIS was an appeal against the refusal of four justices of the peace of the county of Norfolk, acting in and for the hundred of Freebridge Marshland, to grant an alehouse licence to William Rowell, the tenant of a house called the Marshland Inn, situate at Walsoken, in the said hundred, under the 14th sect. of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61.

The appeal came on for hearing at the Epiphany Quarter Sessions for the county of Norfolk, holden at Norwich, when that court dismissed the appeal, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the following case:

1. All formal notices were admitted to have been given.

2. The Marshland Inn is a house let for a term of years to Messrs. Eyre and Co., brewers, of King's Lynn. In Sept. 1870, William Joseph Gregory was tenant of the house under Messrs. Eyre and Co., and at the annual general licencing meeting held in that month, he obtained a magistrate's licence for the sale of exciseable liquors in such house, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61.

3. In April 1871, Gregory was fined by the magistrates for an offence against the tenor of his licence.

4. On the 15th May following, Messrs. Eyre having given Gregory notice to quit the said house, Gregory's interest therein was fully determined thereby; but Gregory, notwithstanding, having refused to deliver up possession thereof the lessors obtained from the magistrates a warrant in ejectment, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74, s. 1, for the redelivery of the house to them.

5. On the 17th May, Gregory went out of the house under threat of eviction, under the above-mentioned warrant, which was not therefore put in force, and Messrs. Eyre thereupon resumed possession of the house.

6. At the beginning of June, 1871, a man named Huckle was let into possession of the house by Messrs. Eyre, as their tenant, and on the 5th of that month he applied to the magistrates in petty sessions, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, to indorse Gregory's licence to him; but the magistrates refused to do so.

7. Huckle soon after this gave up the house to Messrs. Eyre, and at the general annual licensing meeting held on the 4th Sept. 1871, the house was unoccupied, and no application was made for a licence in respect of it.

8. On the 20th Nov. 1871, a special session was held, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 4, and the appellant, who had become tenant of the house to Messrs. Eyre since the said licensing meeting of the 4th Sept., applied to the magistrates at such special sessions for a new licence, under the 14th section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, but the magistrates, after hearing the appellant's counsel, and considering the application on its merits, refused to grant a new licence to the appellant in respect of such house.

9. Against this refusal the present appeal was made to the quarter sessions.

10. It was contended on the part of the appellant, and denied on the part of the respondents, that the magistrates at such special sessions had no discretion, but were bound, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, and 34 & 35 Vict. c. 88, s. 1, to grant the appellant the licence that he asked for.

11. The court of quarter sessions thereupon held that although Gregory was a person duly licensed under the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and removed from or yielded up possession of the house specified in his licence, at a period before the general annual licensing meeting, and though it would have been lawful for the justices at a petty session to grant a licence to a new tenant or occupier of such house, under sect. 14 of that statute, yet that such licence so granted would have been a new licence, and that the granting or refusing of such new licence was within the discretion of the magistrates' special session, and therefore the appeal was dismissed.

If the Court of Queen's Bench should be of opinion that it was discretionary with the magistrates assembled at the special session above-mentioned to grant or refuse the new licence to the appellant (a proper person), under the above circumstances, then the judgment of the said court of quarter sessions should stand confirmed; but if the Court of Queen's Bench should be of a contrary opinion, then it is to give such relief in the premises as may be necessary.

9 Geo. 4, c. 61, enacts:—"That if any person duly licensed under this Act shall (before the expiration of such licence) die, or shall be by sickness or other infirmity rendered incapable of keeping an inn, &c., or if any person so licensed, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of any person so licensed, shall remove from or yield up possession of the house specified in such licence; or if the occupier of any such house, being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted, or shall have neglected to apply, at the general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, for a licence to continue to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house, &c., it shall be lawful for the justices assembled as aforesaid, at a special session holden under the authority of this Act, for the division or place in which the house so kept, or having been kept, shall be situate, in any one of the above-mentioned cases, and in such cases only, to grant to the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of the person so dying, &c., or to any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied, or to any person to whom such heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns shall by sale or otherwise have bonâ fide conveyed or otherwise made over his or their interest in the occupation and keeping of such house, a licence to sell excisable liquors by retail, to be drunk or consumed in such house, or the premises thereunto belonging, &c."

34 & 35 Vict. c. 88, s. 1, provides that:—"The justices, at the general annual licensing meeting, or any special sessions, shall not grant, otherwise than by way of renewal, or in pursuance of the provisions of sect. 14 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Licensing) Act 1828, any new licence under that Act, or any new certificate under the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, and the Acts amending the same respectively, except in accordance with the provisions of this Act. . . . If it appears to the justices that the refusal to grant any such new licence or certificate will cause inconvenience to the locality or to the public, or injury to any person or body corporate, such justices may grant provisionally such licence or certificate, and shall forthwith send to a secretary of state a report in writing of such provisional grant, specifying the circumstances on account of which such grant is made. . . . Where, on an application to a court of quarter sessions, or one of the Superior Courts of law at Westminster, with reference to the refusal of any justices, before the passing of this Act, to grant a licence or certificate, it is decided (either before or after the passing of this Act) that such licence or certificate ought to have been granted, such licence or certificate shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have been granted at the date of such refusal."

Philbrick, for the appellant.

Blofield, for the respondents, referred to the cases of Simpkin v. The Justices of Birmingham (36 Justice of the Peace, 279); and Reg. v. The Justices of Lancashire (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 97; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461), in the latter of which cases, Lush, J., delivering the considered judgment of the court, said:—"The 1st section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, after directing the justices to hold annual general licensing meetings, enacts that 'it shall be lawful for the justices, acting in and for such county or place, assembled at such meeting . . . to grant licences for the purposes aforesaid, to such persons as they the said justices shall, in execution of the powers herein contained, and in the exercise of their discretion, deem fit and proper.' Here the personal fitness of the applicant is put as one of the several elements; the fitness of the house is assumed to be another; and, over and above these, two other considerations, not specified or defined, are supposed to exist and to influence the decision. There is nothing in any part of the Act which suggests what these other considerations may or may not be; nothing which gives the applicant a right to demand a licence, nor any words importing an objection on the part of the justices to grant it under any given state of things. It is therefore obvious that the words relied on by the appellant refer, not to the merits of the applicant, but to the fitness and propriety of the application, as one affecting the interest and well-being of the neighbourhood."

BLACKBURN, J.—I think, as far as we can see, that there is nothing whatever in this Act of Parliament to make it obligatory on the justices to grant a licence in such a case as the present. It is quite enough for us to decide whether they had the power to refuse to grant a licence under the circumstances, without determining whether they were bound to do so or not. I think that they had the power to do so, and that it was not obligatory on them to grant the licence.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LUSH, J.—I am also of the same opinion. I will only add, that I have not the least doubt that the magistrates had a right to refuse the licence, whether they had the power to grant it or not.

MACARTHY v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

Compensation—Injury to land—Thames Embankment Act 1862 — Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

The plaintiff resided close to a draw dock at Whitefriars, in the City of London, which he was constantly making use of in the way of his trade.

Under the authority of the Thames Embankment Act 1862, the Metropolitan Board of Works filled in and permanently stopped up the draw dock.

The premises, which the plaintiff held under a lease for eighty years from Michaelmas 1854, were less valuable either to sell or to occupy in consequence of the removal of the draw dock.

The defendants denied that the plaintiff's interest was injuriously affected within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 so as to entitle him to compensation, on the ground that his interest in the draw dock was no more than that of the general public:

Held, that there was such a permanent injury to the plaintiff's premises as to entitle him to compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

THIS is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover the sum of 1900*l.*, being the amount, less 430*l.*, the claim to which has been given up by the plaintiff, assessed by a jury summoned in accordance with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act 1845, as compensation for the alleged injurious affecting of the plaintiff's estate and interest in a house and premises in manner and under the circumstances hereinafter stated, and by consent of the parties and by order of the Honourable Mr. Justice Grove, the following case has been stated for the opinion of the court without pleadings.

CASE.

1. The plaintiff, at the time of the stopping up of the Whitefriars Dock, hereinafter mentioned, resided in and carried on business as a carman and contractor for supplying builders with lime, bricks, and other materials, and as a large dealer in sand and ballast at the premises in the next paragraph described, which he held under a lease for 80 years from Michaelmas 1854.

2. The said premises consisted of a house with warehouse, stables, and business premises, and are situate in Whitefriars, in the City of London, and a draw dock, known under the name of the Whitefriars Dock, leading into the river Thames, which was very largely used by the plaintiff in the way of his business.

3. The said draw dock was a free and open public dock, but was principally used by the plaintiff, the City Gas Company, the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London, and the other persons whose respective premises were in proximity to it.

4. The plaintiff had no right or easement in or to the said draw dock other than his right as one of the public, nor was there appurtenant or otherwise belonging to the plaintiff's said premises any easement, right, or privilege in or to the said dock.

5. The said dock at the time of its being stopped up as hereinafter mentioned was of the length of 352ft., of the width of 46ft. at the outlet upon the river Thames, and of 30ft. at its head. It originally and before the plaintiff became possessed of the premises, extended to Tudor-street, but about twenty years ago it was shortened to its present length by the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London, who filled in the end, and converted it into a roadway and paved the space so obtained, and have down to the present time kept the said roadway in repair; prior to such filling in, the roadway between the plaintiff's premises and the edge of the dock was about ft. wide.

6. This paragraph referred to a plan annexed to the case for the purpose of more clearly denoting the locus in quo to the court.

7. By reason of the proximity of the dock to the plaintiff's premises, and the access given by the dock to and from the river Thames, the said premises were rendered more valuable, as premises either to sell or to occupy, with reference to the uses to which any owner might put them.

8. In the execution of the works authorised by the Thames Embankment Act 1862, and the Thames Embankment (North and South) Act 1868, in the month of Oct. 1868, a solid embankment was carried along the foreshore of the Thames, and thus permanently stopped up and destroyed the said Whitefriars dock.

9. By reason of the stopping up and destruction of the said dock as aforesaid, and the destruction thereby of the access to and from the river Thames, the plaintiff's premises became and were as premises either to sell or to occupy, in their then state and condition, and with reference to the uses to which any owner or occupier might put them in their then state and condition, permanently damaged and diminished in value, and the plaintiff alleged that consequently he became entitled to compensation.

10. The defendants denied that he was so entitled, and issued their warrant to the sheriffs to summon a jury, without prejudice to their right to dispute the question, and the jury assessed the amount of damage and injury at 1900*l.*

11. The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the circumstances set forth in this case, the plaintiff's interest in his premises was injuriously affected within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, so as to entitle him to compensation.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for 1900*l.*, with costs of suit from the 27th April 1871.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nolle pros. shall be entered for the defendants, with costs of defence from the last mentioned date.

Hon. A. Thesiger (Prentice, Q.C. with him) argued on behalf of the plaintiff.—The Board of Works have diminished a public use, which added to the desirability and market value of the plaintiff's premises. The property, quâ property, is rendered more valuable by the convenience of the dock. The property is injuriously affected under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 68). There is here an injury to the land, and it is so found in the case. He cited:

Chamberlain v. West End of London and Crystal Palace Railway Company, 2 B. & S. 605; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 149;
Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 H. L. Cas. 175; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542;
Beckett v. The Midland Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 82; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499;
Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 358.

Hawkins (with whom was Philbrick) for the defendants. The mere fact that a man's premises are injured by a public work is not enough to give him compensation. All the cases go to show that there must be interference with the property itself, or to a private right connected with the land. Beckett v. The Midland Railway (sup.) is clearly distinguishable, for the road was narrowed by the company, and as it passed by, and was immediately contiguous to the plaintiff's house, he sustained a particular injury to his separate premises, which he and the public did not suffer. But in the present case Macarthy had access to a public street, and to the public draw dock only as all the Queen's subjects have a right to use it, and although he used it oftener than others, from the accident of his situation, the character of his right was the same as that of every one of the public. This is not the subject of a civil action, as it is a public right, and if the board were not acting by virtue of a statute, it would be the subject of indictment. Although I do not deny he was injuriously affected, his injury is not the subject of compensation. The case of Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 358), is in our favour; there the occupier of premises near the Thames had been used to bring barges to a draw dock as a public right, and on the dock being stopped up, it was held that he was not entitled to compensation. [KEATING, J.—There was no statement there that the plaintiff's premises were diminished in value.]

Thesiger in reply.—In Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, the claim was only for compensation and not for injury to the premises as premises.

WILLES, J.—It appears to me that this case can be brought within the principle of the decision in Beckett v. The Midland Railway, and which case distinguished Ricket v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, and that we can arrive at such a decision without being at variance with the other decisions. Although we must be governed by the construction put upon the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 by the House of Lords, and the dicta of the noble lords who decided Ricket v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, yet the cases are distinguishable. The distinction between the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Macq. H. of L. Cas. 229), and Ricket's case, and the case we are now considering, consists in this, that the plaintiff's estate here has sustained damage, and it is stated the property would sell for less in the market, attract fewer tenants, or let for less rent, while in those cases there was no injury done to the land or to any interest in land, so that the property was not diminished in value. In Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 358), the case which has been so pressed upon us, there was no interest in the land which was affected, the plaintiff only suffering from the loss of public rights, and a mere personal injury, for which he could obtain no redress, and though the property might be more valuable to him carrying on a particular trade, yet the value in the market to persons who might have wished to build warehouses was not diminished. When, however, you have the case where land is damaged to the extent of being worth less to anyone, and where it sells for less, and lets for less by reason of a permanent work, you have a case distinguishable from those to which I have referred. It is found in the special case that the premises were, in consequence of the stopping up and destruction of the dock and the destruction of the access to and from the Thames, permanently damaged and diminished in value, either to sell or occupy. The only road by which the plaintiff could reach the Thames was stopped up, and the access given to him to and from the Thames rendered the premises more valuable to sell or occupy. This state of things brings us to consider the facts in Beckett v. Midland Railway Company. There there was a house with a road outside which was narrowed; the market value of the land fell; but it was said it might be turned into a garden. The court laid down that property was to be taken as it stood at the time, and that owners are not supposed to alter their property to make t as profitable in any other way because the enjoyment is injuriously affected. This case is thus brought within the doctrine of the decision in Beckett v. The Midland Railway Company. To constitute a claim for compensation there must be an injury to land or to an interest in land as distinct from personal injury. An injury to trade or to any individual will not be sufficient. What makes the value of land is its desirability to the individual, and we have it here found that the land was injured. If it was, then the premises becoming less accessible, are less desirable, and the decisions shew that damage to land by reason of inaccessibility renders the owner entitled to compensation. There was an actionable wrong here if it had not been for the Act of Parliament, but it is not necessary to refer to a series of authorities to show there would have been a cause of action; for I have no doubt this is such an injurious effect to land for which an action could have been maintained. Looking to the recent decision in the case of the Duke of Buccleugh v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 221; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255), where large compensation was recovered for a loss—which I was almost going to term a speculative loss—looking, I say, to that decision, I am grounded in the opinion that it makes no difference whether you cut off a portion of the land. or whether you take away an immediate lateral advantage which diminishes the market value to the owner.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and think the plaintiff entitled to the judgment of the court. This case is governed by the rule laid down in Beckett v. The Midland Railway Company, and I am not aware of any case that interferes with that decision. Ricket's case is clearly distinguishable; the cause of injury there was a temporary injury caused to the trade of the person who carried on business on the premises. The injury here is a permanent one, not to a personal right, but to the house itself, which is injuriously affected and depreciated in value to the amount of 1900*l*. It is not a fictitious injury, but it is found in the case that into whoever's hand the house may come, it is permanently depreciated.

STARR v. TRINDER.

*Weights and measures—Stamp worn out—Necessity for re-stamping—*5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63, s. 21.

It is not necessary where a weight has been once stamped in accordance with 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63, s. 21, but from use the mark has become erased, that it should be re-stamped.

CASE stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions holden at Tunbridge Wells on the 3rd July 1871, an information preferred by John Tringer (respondent) against Stephen Starr (appellant), under section 21 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63, charging that the appellant on the 22nd June 1871, at the parish of Tunbridge, in the county of Kent, did unlawfully use a certain weight, to wit, 2lb. weight, the same not having been stamped according to the statute on that behalf, was heard and determined by the justices, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before us, and we adjudged him to pay a penalty of 1*s.* and the costs.

Upon the hearing of the said information, the respondent proved that he was the inspector of weights and measures in the district where the appellant carried on his business, and on the 22nd June 1871 he made an examination of the weights, scales, and measures at the shop occupied by the appellant, who is a fruiterer and greengrocer, and found a 2lb. weight which had no visible stamp, but was otherwise correct. It was an iron weight with a copper plug, and appeared as if it had been in use some time. He had examined appellant's weights three times, but could not say he had ever seen this 2lb. weight before, and he told the appellant it had never been before him. The respondent's assistant stated that he could find no mark of a stamp on the weight, but that he had several times seen a 2lb. weight in appellant's shop.

It was contended for the appellant that the only issue was, whether or not the weight had ever been stamped. The appellant's son was called, who stated that in July 1869 he took four iron weights to the respondent, and saw him stamp all four, including the 2lb. weight in question, and that the respondent had several times examined the 2lb. weight, but had never before complained of the want of a stamp, and that the copper plug on which the stamp was impressed, being higher than the surface of the weight itself, had been worn away. It was proved by an assistant that the weight had been in use for the past two years, that there never had ever been any other 2lb. weight in the shop. The witness corroborated plaintiff's son as to the wearing away of plaintiff's plug, and as to the respondent having several times examined the weight without making any complaint.

The justices having heard the evidence and examined the weight, decided that as the weight itself bore no appearance of a stamp, the appellant must be convicted.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, taking into consideration the precise words of the Act of Parliament, the evidence given to prove that the weight had been stamped in 1869, and the fact that the weight itself, on examination by the respondent, bore no trace of a stamp, the appellant was legally convicted?

C. Baldock Stone for the appellant.—The 21st section of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 63 provides that the justices of the peace shall provide for the use of the inspectors good and sufficient stamps for the stamping or sealing of weights and measures to be used in every county, and these stamps are to be taken to be the stamps for such county; and all weights and measures which shall be used for buying and selling shall be examined with a copy of the imperial standard weight, and the inspectors are also to stamp such weights, but the Act does not say that the weights are to be re-stamped if the mark becomes worn out by time.

No counsel appeared on the other side.

WILLES, J.—There is clearly nothing to take the case out of the 21st section. The conviction cannot be supported, for there is strong evidence for the magistrate to come to the conclusion that this is a stamped weight. The information must be quashed, and the magistrates must say whether they believe the evidence.

KEATING, J.—The magistrates probably convicted the appellant on a wrong reading of the statute, the mark not being visible on the weight. The justices must say whether the evidence is true.

Stone having applied for costs against the inspector of weights and measures, WILLES, J.—The weight is a just one; we should therefore dismiss the information if we could decide the question of fact. The appeal must be dismissed with costs against the inspector unless the magistrates still convict.

Judgment for the appellant, subject to the decision of fact by the magistrates.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

CULL v. AUSTIN AND AUSTIN v. CULL.

Parliament—Borough-vote—Payment of all poor-rates payable up to preceding 5th of January—Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict., c. 102) sect. 3, sub.-sect. 4.

The general words in sect. 27 of the Reform Act of 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45), that no occupier shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, unless (among other things) he shall have paid, on or before the 20th July in the year in which he makes his claim, all the poor-rates which shall have become payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises previous to the 6th April then next preceding, have been by sect. 75 of 6 Vict., c. 18, and 11 & 12 Vict., c. 90, restricted to this, that he must have paid on or before the 20th July all the rates made and allowed after the 5th Jan. of the preceding year, and which have become payable up to the 5th Jan. of the qualifying year.

The enactments which thus limited the large words of that section are, by virtue of sect. 56 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, made a context to the latter Act, by which the large words of sect. 3, sub.-sect. 4 of that Act (corresponding to the words above quoted from sect. 27 of 2 Will. 4. c. 45) are also limited.

The words, therefore, of sect. 3, sub.-sect. 4 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, "all poor-rates that have become payable by him in respect of the said premises up to the preceding 5th day of Jan.," must be taken as limited to "all rates made and allowed after the 5th day of Jan. of the year preceding the qualifying year, and payable up to the 5th Jan. of the qualifying year."

No excusal of such rates, whether made before or after the commencement of the qualifying year, can be pleaded in lieu of a disqualification arising from their not having been in fact paid or tendered before the 20th July in the qualifying year.

At the registration in 1871 A. applied to have his name inserted in the register as a voter for the borough. He claimed, as an occupying householder, under sect. 3 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and was in every respect entitled to be registered, unless he was disqualified by reason of his not having paid two rates, which had been made respectively on 30th April and 30th Oct. 1869, and to which he was duly rated in respect of the qualifying premises.

Held, that A. was not thereby disqualified.

THESE were two registration appeals, and, as they both involved the same question, they were taken and argued together.

CULL v. AUSTIN.

At a court held on the 9th Oct. 1871, at Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, for the revision of the list of persons entitled to vote for the Borough of Cheltenham for the ensuing year, Thomas Cull, on the said list, duly objected to the name of Samuel Best being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Cheltenham within the said borough. The name of the said Samuel Best appeared on the said list of persons so as aforesaid entitled to vote for the said borough in respect of property within the parish of Cheltenham as follows:

Name.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street where property is situated.
Best, Samuel	Duke-street	House	12, Duke-street.

1. It was proved before me that the said Samuel Best was duly qualified under the Representation of the People Act 1867 to be retained in the said list unless he failed to be qualified for the following reason.

2. On 2nd Feb. 1867 (before the passing of the Representation of the People Act 1867) a poor rate was duly made and allowed (by the justices) for the parish of Cheltenham within the said borough, to which rate the said Samuel Best was duly rated in respect of the qualifying premises, and the amount of which rate did on the making and allowance thereof become payable from him in respect of the said premises; yet the said Samuel Best had not, either before or since the 20th July last past, paid the amount of the said rate, or any part thereof.

3. It further appeared on inspection of the said rate-book of the said 2nd Feb. 1867 that the said Samuel Best had been excused by order of the justices from the payment of the said rate, but it did not appear that the said Samuel Best had ever made personal or other application to be so excused.

4. And it was proved before me that the custom of the parish was for the assistant overseer, shortly before the close of each rate, to enter into the columns of the rate-book headed "legally excused," the rates of all such persons as, in his opinion, were by reason of their poverty unable to pay the same, and the rate-book was then taken before the justices of the peace at their next petty sessions, held at Cheltenham, and the said justices, on the application of the said assistant overseer, then entered at the end of the rate book the following minute, and duly signed the same: "We, the undersigned, being two of her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the county of Gloucester, do hereby, with the consent of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Cheltenham, order and direct that the persons whose amount of rate appears in column No. 7, shall be excused from the payment of the rate." In this way only was the said Samuel Best excused his said rate of the 2nd Feb. 1867.

5. The next following rate was made on the 25th July 1867, also before the passing of the said Representation of the People Act 1867, and before the commencement of the first qualifying year in the said Act defined, and the said Samuel Best had duly paid that rate, and also all rates subsequently made in respect of the qualifying premises.

6. And it was further proved that the said rate of the 2nd Feb. 1867 was, shortly after it became payable, duly demanded of and from the said Samuel Best, by a demand note duly served upon him.

6a. And it was further proved that the said Samuel Best had continuously occupied the same qualifying premises from before the said 2nd day of Feb. 1867, up to the present time.

7. It was contended before me in support of the said objection that, it having been proved that the said Samuel Best had not, on or before the 20th day of July last, paid the amount rated on him as aforesaid by the said rate of the 2nd day of Feb. 1867, he had not bonâ fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates that had become payable by him up to the 5th day of January last, in respect of the premises which formed his qualification, and that accordingly the said Samuel Best ought not to be retained on the list of occupiers within the parish of Cheltenham, entitled to vote for the said borough. But inasmuch as the said rate was so as aforesaid made and allowed before the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, under the provisions of which Act the said Samuel Best proved his qualification to be registered as a voter, I overruled the objection, and retained the name of the said Samuel Best in the list of such voters so under revision by me as aforesaid, subject to this case for the opinion of the court.

The questions for the opinion of the court are—

1. Whether by such non-payment of the poor rate of the 2nd Feb. 1867 as above stated (a poor rate which had ceased to be in force before the passing of the Representation of the People Act 1867, and before the commencement of the first or qualifying year in the said Act defined), the said Samuel Best (who had proved his qualification under the provisions of the said Act) would be disqualified from being retained on the said list of voters; and if so,

2. Whether such excuse by the justices as hereinbefore described would prevent that non-payment from operating to his disqualification. The same facts, mutatis mutandis, as are hereinfore stated respecting the said Samuel Best, relate also to the persons whose names are set forth in schedules hereunder written; and on the same ground as that relied on as aforesaid, I retained in the same list the names of such persons, and, as the questions for the opinion of the court are the same, I directed the appeals to be consolidated.

AUSTIN v. CULL.

At a court held at Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, on the 9th Oct. 1871, for the revision of the list of persons entitled to vote for the borough of Cheltenham for the ensuing year, such court being held before me, the revising barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the said borough, Thomas Cull, on the said list, duly objected to the name of Henry Compton being retained on the list of voters for the parish of Cheltenham, within the said borough.

1. The name of the said Henry Compton appeared on the said list of persons so as aforesaid entitled to vote for the said borough in respect of property within the said parish of Cheltenham, as follows:

Name.	Place of abode.	Nature of qualification.	Street, &c., where property is situate.
Compton, Henry.	Grosvenor Cottages.	House.	4, Grosvenor Cottages.

and his qualification was duly proved in all other respects, except as hereinafter set forth.

2. But it was proved before me that, although the said Henry Compton had duly paid within the qualifying time all the poor rates that had become payable by him during the qualifying year in respect of the qualifying premises, that is to say, the rate of April 30th, 1870, and the two instalments thereof, yet he had not paid, either before or since the said 20th July last past, the two previous rates of the 30th April 1869 and the 30th Oct. 1869, to each of which rates the said Henry Compton was duly rated in respect of the qualifying premises, and the amount of each of which rates had on the making and allowance thereof respectively become payable from him in respect of the same premises.

3. And it further appeared on inspection of the rate book of April 1869 and Oct. 1869 that the said Henry Compton had been excused by order of the justices from the payment of such last-mentioned rates respectively, but it did not appear that the said Henry Compton had ever in either case made any personal or other application to be so excused.

4. And it was proved before me that the custom of the parish was for the assistant overseer shortly before each rate closed to enter in the column of the rate book headed "legally excused" the rates of all such persons as, in his opinion, were by reason of their poverty unable to pay the same, and the rate book was thereupon taken before the justices of the peace at their next petty sessions held at Cheltenham, and the said justices, on the application of the said assistant overseer, then entered at the end of the rate book the following minute, and duly signed the same:—"We the undersigned being two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the county of Gloucester, do hereby, with the consent of the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Cheltenham, order and direct that the persons whose amount of rates appear in column No. 17 shall be excused from the payment of the rate." In this way only was the said Henry Compton excused his said rate of April 1869 and Oct. 1869.

5. And it was further proved that each of the said two rates of 30th April 1869 and 30th Oct. 1869 was, shortly after the making and allowance thereof respectively, duly demanded by a demand note served upon the said Henry Compton.

6. And it was further proved that the said Henry Compton had continuously occupied the same qualifying premises from before the 30th April 1869 up to the present time, and each of the three above-mentioned poor rates was duly made and allowed by the justices for the parish of Cheltenham within the said borough on the days by which each rate is hereinbefore respectively designated.

7. It was contended on behalf of the objector that, it having been so proved as aforesaid that the said Henry Compton had not, on or before the 20th July last, bonâ fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers, in respect of all poor-rates that had become payable by him up to the 5th Jan. last in respect of the premises which formed his qualification, and that in fact two of such rates as aforesaid had been wholly unpaid, so that the said Henry Compton was not entitled to be retained on the list of occupiers within the parish of Cheltenham entitled to vote for the said borough.

8. I accordingly struck his name out of the list of such voters so under revision by me as aforesaid, subject to this case for the opinion of the court.

The questions for the opinion of the court are—first, whether by such non-payment of poor rates as above stated the said Henry Compton was disqualified from being registered as a voter as aforesaid? and, secondly, if so, whether such excuse by the justices as hereinbefore described would prevent that non-payment from operating to his disqualification?

The same facts, mutatis mutandis, as are hereinbefore stated respecting the said Henry Compton, relate also to the persons whose names are set forth in the schedule hereunder written, and on the same ground as that relied on as aforesaid I struck out from the said list the names of such persons; and, as the questions for the opinion of the court are the same, I directed their appeal to be consolidated.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Cur adv. vult.

June 5, 1872.—BRETT, J., delivered the judgment of the Court (Willes, Keating and Brett, JJ.). In these cases the name of the proposed voter appeared on the list of voters to be revised in Oct. 1871, as being entitled to vote for the borough of Cheltenham, and was duly objected to. The qualification was admitted to be duly proved in all other respects; but it was proved that, although the voter had duly paid all the poor's rates which had become payable by him during the qualifying year in respect of the qualifying premises, he had not paid two previous rates of April and Oct. of the year 1869, to each of which rates he was duly rated in respect of the qualifying premises, and the amount of which rates had become payable by him in respect of such premises. On inspection of the rate books for 1869, it appeared that the voter had been excused by order of justices from payment of the rates for 1869; but it did not appear that he had made personal or other application to be so excused. It was proved that the custom of the parish was for the assistant-overseer to enter into the column of the rate book headed "legally excused" the rates of all such persons as, in his opinion, were by reason of their poverty unable to pay the rates, and the rate books were then taken before the justices in petty sessions, who, on the application of the asssistant-overseer, entered in the rate book a minute purporting to excuse the payment of the rates with the consent of the churchwardens and overseers. In this way the proposed voter was excused the rates of 1869. The revising barrister in the one case retained the name on the list, and in the other struck it out. It was contended on the one side that the vote ought not to be allowed; that upon the facts stated it appeared that there had been no legal excusal of payment of the rates of 1869; and, if there had, yet that the voter had not paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates which had become payable by him in respect of the qualifying premises, and therefore was not entitled to be registered; and that it made no difference that the rates in question were rates imposed and payable before the qualifying year, nor that they were upon the hypothesis legally excused before the qualifying year. It was contended on the other side that, upon the facts stated, the court ought to assume that the excusal by the justices was accompanied by the required formalities and was valid; that, if it was, no part of the rates of 1869 were now payable by the voter; that no part had been payable by him during the qualifying year; that, consequently, this case was to be distinguished from the case of Abell v. Lee (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 844; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 365); and that, inasmuch as the voter had paid all rates payable by him in respect of the qualifying premises during the qualifying year, his name was to be retained on the list. The decision depends upon what is the correct construction of sect. 3 of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. The first question appears to be what is the rule of construction to be applied. The governing rule with regard to the construction of all statutes by a court of law administering the law is, that the court is bound to construe them as nearly as possible according to the ordinary received meaning of the words and ordinary grammatical construction of the phrases and sentences used in them. The court ought not in any case to depart from such ordinary sense and ordinary grammatical construction, unless an interpretation according to both or either appears by the context to be contrary to the manifest intention of the Legislature. It would seem that this rule should, if possible, be more strictly adhered to with regard to the varying clauses of the statute under discussion than with regard to any other; because it must be manifest to any court in this country that a statute dealing with the matter with which this statute deals must have been discussed and settled in almost every clause by persons having different views of the most earnest kind; and that the best way for the court to hold a strictly even balance is to follow as nearly as possible the words used in each clause of every section of the Act. Now, by sect. 3, the first condition to be fulfilled is, occupation as an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house within the borough during the whole of the twelve calendar months preceding the 31st July. The second condition is that the proposed voter has, "during the time of such occupation," been rated in respect of the premises so occupied by him to all rates made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises; that is to say, that he has been rated in respect of the premises so occupied by him to all poor rates made during the twelve months preceding the 31st July. The next condition is, that he has paid, on or before the 20th July, an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of "all poor rates that have become payable by him in respect of the said premises up to the preceding 5th Jan." It cannot fail to be seen that there is a grave difference in the wording of the last condition. The words confining the application of the condition to the twelve preceding months are omitted. According to the ordinary sense and grammatical construction of the phrase which describes the last condition, it is applicable not merely to all rates that have become payable by the proposed voter during or in respect of the twelve calendar months preceding the last 31st July, but to all poor rates that have become payable by him in respect of the qualifying premises at any time preceding the last 5th Jan. The question is, whether there is anything in the context of the 3rd section, or of other parts of the statute, or of the statutes which are to be read as part of this statute, which can authorise the court to depart from the ordinary sense and grammatical construction of the 4th sub-section as thus stated. The other parts of this statute which refer to the point in question are sect. 28, and the form in schedule E, referred to in that section and sect. 29. The form of words used in sect. 28 and in the form in schedule E, so far from being inconsistent with the suggested interpretation of sect. 3, are as large as the form of words used in it. They do not, in terms, describe a poor rate or rates payable within the preceding twelve months, but any, i.e., every poor rate due on the 5th Jan. preceding. The list ordained to be made by sect. 29 is in terms of a still larger description: it is a list containing the name and abode of every person who shall not have paid, not merely the poor rates payable in respect of the preceding year, but all poor rates, and not merely those which shall have become payable from him in respect of the qualifying premises, but of any premises within the parish which he has occupied before the 5th Jan. then last past. There is so far nothing in the context of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102 itself to modify the ordinary construction of the 3rd section of the statute. There are, however, some other provisions of the statute which, with reference to the questions now before the court, are of great importance. By sect. 56, "subject to the provisions of this Act, all laws, customs, and enactments now in force conferring any right to vote, or otherwise relating to the representation," &c., "shall remain in full force, and shall apply as nearly as circumstances admit to any person hereby authorised to vote." And by sect. 59, "This Act, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, shall be construed as one with the enactments for the time being in force relating to the representation of the people, and with the Registration Acts." And there is a provision relating to this statute contained in 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58 which must also be noticed. By sect. 30 it is enacted that "the 30th section of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, and the 75th section of the principal Act, i.e., of 6 Vict. c. 18, shall apply to all occupiers of premises capable of conferring the franchise for a county under the Representation of the People Act, 1867." The importance of these enactments is, that by incorporating the former statutes with the present they make them part of the context of the present, and make it necessary to consider whether the larger ordinary meaning of the latter statute may not after all require some modification by reason of the context thus introduced. This makes it necessary to consider whether there was in the former statutes any limitation of the number of rates which it was necessary that the proposed voter should have paid. Now, by sect. 27 of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, the rates which it was necessary that the proposed voter should have paid were "all the poor rates and assessed taxes which shall have become payable from him in respect of such premises previously to the 6th April then next preceding," i.e., the 6th April in the qualifying year. The wording is practically quite identical with that used in sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1867. If, then, by the context of the former statutes some modification is to be made of the words used in sect. 27, it seems fair and right to say that such context must be used to modify to the same extent the words of sect. 3 of the later Act. There is nothing in the subsequent parts of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, itself to indicate any modification; for in sect. 30 the same language is used as in sect. 27. But by the Registration Act (6 Vict. c. 18, s. 11) "Overseers on or before the 20th June shall publish a notice that no person will be entitled to have his name inserted in any list of voters for," &c., "unless he shall pay on or before the 20th July then next ensuing all the poor rates and assessed taxes which shall then have become payable from him in respect of such premises during the twelve calendar months next before the 6th April then last past," i.e., which shall have become payable from the 6th April of the year preceding the 6th April of the qualifying year. That certainly would mislead, unless it be taken that the poor rates which it is necessary according to such notice to pay are those which have become payable after the 6th April of the year preceding the qualifying year. The inference which anyone would be entitled to draw is, that if he pay those poor rates which become payable on or after the 6th April of the preceding year, and has been rated to the poor rates made after the 31st July, commencing the qualifying year, he will be entitled to be registered. The notice in form E is only slightly different from the section. It differs by using the phrase "which have become due" instead of "which have become payable." By sect. 12, the same limitation in the same terms as to the commencement of the time to be considered is made with regard to the assessed taxes. It is necesary to determine the meaning of those phrases. Do they mean all rates and taxes which are payable or due after the 6th April, though made before it, or do they mean the rates and taxes which are made and have become due or payable after the 6th April? By sect. 35, the overseers attending the revising barrister's court shall produce at the said court all rates made for the relief of the poor of their respective parishes or townships between the 6th April in the year then last past and the last day of July in the then present year. This apparently reduces the rates which are to be brought to the notice of the revising barrister, to those which had been made and allowed after the 6th April of the year preceding the qualifying year. And, as to the question whether the proposed voter had been rated to the proper rates, inasmuch as the revising barrister would require to see only rates made on or after the 31st July commencing the qualifying year, it seems to follow that the rates made after the preceding 6th April, and before the 31st July, are laid before him in order that he may see whether they have been paid. Sect. 75 is not so direct, and yet it contains a strong intimation. It gives a description of those persons who shall not be disqualified by being misdescribed in any rate — in other words, of those persons who, but for the misdescription, would be entitled to vote. Those persons are described to be such as, being liable to be rated, have been bonâ fide called upon to pay all rates made for the relief of the poor in such parish or township, during the time of such his occupation (i.e. for twelve months next previous to the last day of July), and such person shall have bonâ fide paid, on or before the 20th July in such year, all sums of money which he shall have been called upon to pay as rates in respect of such premises for one year previously to the 6th April then next preceding. This again confines the rates which it is necessary that the proposed voter should have paid to those commencing within the 6th April of the year preceding the qualifying year. One of the dates of the 6th April, mentioned in all these sections, viz., the 6th April of the qualifying year, has been clearly altered to the 5th Jan. by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 90, but the other date of the 6th April, viz., that of the year preceding the qualifying year, would at first sight seem not to have been altered. The enactment is that no person shall be required, in order to entitle him to have his name inserted, &c., to have paid any poor rates or assessed taxes except such as shall have become payable from him previously to the 5th Jan. in the same year. That would seem to alter the last-mentioned 6th April, but not the former one. But by sect. 28 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, the overseers of every parish shall produce to the barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters of any county all rates made between the 5th Jan. in the year then last past and the last day of July in the then present year. That seems to imply that both dates of the 6th April are changed to the 5th Jan. The various sections may well be said to indicate that the large words used in sect. 27 as to the payment of bygone rates are to be modified and limited. And, after much consideration and with much hesitation, we have come to the conclusion that they do indicate that the rates which it is necessary that a proposed voter, under sect. 27 of the Reform Act, must have paid, were all those which have been made and allowed after the 6th April of the year preceding the qualifying year, and, since the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 90, after the 5th Jan. of the year preceding the qualifying year. If this be the true construction of sect. 27 of the Reform Act, it is so by reason of the context found in the sections which have been alluded to. By sect. 30 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 58, the 75th section of 6 Vict. c. 18 is expressly made applicable to the 12*l.* qualification in counties given by sect. 8 of the Representation of the People Act 1867. If that section as a context limits the large words used in sect. 27 of the Reform Act, it may well be held to limit the same words used with regard to a similar subject matter in the later Act. If that be so, and if the words in sect. 3 be not limited in the same manner, there will be a difference as to the payment of bygone rates between the new and the old franchises in boroughs, and the new occupation franchises in boroughs and counties. This incongruity can be avoided by holding that, by virtue of sect. 56 of the new Act the sections in the older Acts which limited the large words of sect. 27 of the Reform Act are made a context to the new Act, by which the large words of sect. 3 are limited. We have finally come to the conclusion that these words may not improperly be, and ought to be limited, and that the rates which it is necessary that a proposed voter should have paid before the 20th July of the qualifying year, are all rates made and allowed after the 5th Jan. of the year preceding the qualifying year, and payable up to the 5th. Jan. of the qualifying year. As to all such rates he must have paid them according to the terms of sub-sect. 4, that is to say, he must have paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other occupiers in respect of such rates. And no excusal of such rates, whether made before or after the commencement of the qualifying year, can be pleaded in bar of a disqualification arising from their not having in fact been paid or tendered before the 20th July of the qualifying year. It was argued that such a decision as that to which we have now arrived would be inconsistent with the decision in Abel v. Lee (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 365.) In that case, Abel, the appellant, claimed in 1870 to be placed on the register under sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1867. It was conceded that he was duly qualified in all other respects, but it was objected that he was disqualified by reason of not having paid a rate made in respect of the qualifying premises on the 18th June 1869—made, therefore, before the commencement of the qualifying year. The answer relied on to this objection was, that after Oct. 1869, that is to say, during the qualifying year, the payment of this rate was duly excused. The revising barrister disallowed the vote. It was argued on the appeal that the only rates which it was necessary that the proposed voter should have paid, were those made and allowed within the qualifying year, and that the excusal by magistrates whenever made, from payment of any rate, relieved the proposed voter from the obligation, as matter of qualification, of having paid such rate. Both of these arguments were overruled by the court, on the ground of the difference of the words used in the sub-sections of sect. 3, and on the largeness of the words used in sub-sect. 4. Inasmuch as the rate in question, viz., that of June, 1869, was made after the 6th April of the year preceding the qualifying year, the question under discussion in the present case was not raised in that case. The expressions of the judges were pointed to the argument that payment was only required of the rates made within the qualifying year. In that case it was necessary to point out the largeness of the words used in sect. 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1867. In this case it has been necessary to consider how far that largeness required limitation. Inasmuch as we hold that the only rates which it is necessary that a proposed voter should have paid are those made after the 5th Jan. of the year preceding the qualifying year, it is unnecessary to consider whether there was a valid excusal by justices in this case of the rates made in 1869. We are of opinion that the decisions of the revising barrister must respectively be affirmed and reversed, in accordance with this judgment. Cull v. Austin: decision affirmed. Austin v. Cull: decision reversed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by E. STEWART ROCHE and H. PEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, April 22, 1872.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company—Special Act—Power to stop up streets—Deposited plans and sections—Incorporation with special Act—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, ss. 13 & 14.

By the 8th section of their special Act, with which the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 was incorporated, a railway company were empowered to stop up and cause to be discontinued as public highways all streets and highways within the area thereinbefore described as the site of an intended station, and to appropriate the site of such streets and highways to the purposes of the station. The plans and sections deposited by the company upon the application for their Act showed that S. street (which was within the area described in the Act) was to be crossed by the railway upon an arch sixteen feet high, but did not state that the street was to be stopped up. The 6th section of the Act enacted that the railway should be made in the line or within the limits of deviation, and upon the lands delineated on the deposited plans, and according to the levels defined on the deposited sections:

Held, that the company were not bound by the deposited plans and sections except so far as they were incorporated with the special Act, and that the plans and sections were not incorporated with the special Act so as to prevent the company from stopping up S. street.

Decision of Bacon, V.C. reversed.

THIS was a bill and information at the relation of the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London, who were also plaintiffs in the suit, for the purpose of restraining the Great Eastern Railway Company from stopping up or interfering with the public traffic through Sun-street, which is one of the great thoroughfares from east to west in the City of London.

The case came before Bacon, V.C., in last Hilary Term, on a motion for an interlocutory injunction, and his Honour granted an injunction restraining the company from permanently stopping up Sun-street, or interfering with the public traffic thereof, until the hearing of the cause.

From this order the company appealed, and on the appeal coming on to be heard it was arranged that, as the Vice-Chancellor had based his decision on the merits of the case, the hearing of the cause should take place before the Lords Justices in the first instance, and the injunction was continued till the hearing.

The hearing on the motion for an injunction in the court below is reported in 25 L. T. Rep. N. S., 867, where the facts of the case are stated.

It is only necessary to add that although the plans and sections deposited with the clerk of the peace by the company upon application for their special Act, did not state that Sun-street was to be stopped up, they did state that Half Moon-street, another street within the area described in the Act, was to be stopped up.

The cause now came on for hearing.

The Solicitor-General (Sir G. Jessel, Q.C.), Amphlett, Q.C., and Pontifex for the relators.—We contend that the deposited plans which stated that it was not intended to stop up Sun-street were incorporated with the special Act, so as to preclude the company from stopping up Sun-street. The 6th section of the Act of 1864, after reciting that the plans had been deposited, expressly provides that the railway shall be made in the line or within the limits of deviation, and upon the lands delineated on the plans and according to the levels defined on the sections. Then the 13th and 14th sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which is incorporated with the special Act, preclude the company from deviating from the deposited plans, and we contend that there is nothing in the special Acts to vary the provisions of these sections, or to prevent them from applying to this case. In Parker v. The Great Western Railway Company (7 Scott N. Rep. 870), Tindal, C.J., speaking of Acts obtained by railway companies, says: "It is to be observed that the language of these Acts of Parliament is to be treated as the language of the promoters of them. They ask the Legislature to confer great privileges upon them, and profess to give the public certain advantages in return. Acts passed under such circumstances should be construed strictly against the parties obtaining them, but liberally in favour of the public." They also referred to—

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Kay, Q.C., and Smart for the defendants.—The North British Railway Company v. Tod (12 Cl. & Fin. 722) shows that deposited plans and sections are not binding upon a railway company, unless they are so referred to in the company's Act as to be incorporated therewith. And that case was followed in Beardmer v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (1 Mac. & G. 112). There is nothing in this case to incorporate the deposited plans and sections in the special Act. In Reg. v. The Wycombe Railway Company (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 310) Mellor, J. says: "It seems to me that the memorandum on the deposited plan amounted to nothing more than an indication of what the defendants proposed to obtain power to do. It neither became obligatory on the defendants to follow the plan, nor was it the foundation of any authority conferred upon them." The 8th section of the Act of 1864 gave the company express power to stop up all streets within an area therein described, and Sun-street is within that area. Therefore that section varies and prevails over the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. And the 38th section of the Act of 1870 expressly re-enacts the 8th section of the Act of 1864. Therefore, we submit that it is perfectly clear that the company, not being bound by their deposited plans, have full power to stop up Sun-street. They also referred to Amphlett, Q.C. in reply.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—This is an information brought in the name of the Attorney-General by the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London to restrain the Great Eastern Railway Company from stopping up a street called Sun-street. The sole question to be determined is, whether, according to the true construction of the Acts of Parliament which the Great Eastern Railway Company obtained for the purpose of making their station, they have obtained power to stop up Sun-street. The general Railway Act (the Railways es Consolidation Act) gives no power to stop reets, and therefore they clearly cannot have to stop up Sun-street unless we can find an express power is given by special Acts. ertainly the Act of 1864, if we look at that —which I shall do in the first instance— ut considering the deposited plans and the ays Clauses Consolidation Act, appears to confer upon the company power to stop up treet in the plainest possible terms. In the l it is stated: "Whereas it is expedient that mpany should be authorised to purchase all nds and buildings in the City of London ised within an area"—and then it sets out rea, which, beyond all question, included a portion of Sun-street, and proceeds—"and p up all streets and highways within the rea, and to appropriate the site of such area purposes of a railway station." The Act that it is expedient that the company be authorised to purchase lands including t portion of Sun-street, and to stop up all eets and highways within that area, and to priate the site of the area, which includes a n of Sun-street, for the purpose of a railway n. That being the recital, it is enacted by section that the company may stop up, and to be discontinued as public highways, all and highways within the area hereinbefore ed as the site of the intended station, and ppropriate the site of such streets and high- o the purposes of such station." It is very lt to conceive words which could more say, first, that they may stop up the within the area, and secondly, that nay appropriate the site of the streets for rposes of the station. Then it goes on: the western moiety, or half part of the site er-street, shall, from the time of such stop- p, be vested in, and belong to, the North n Railway Company, and nothing herein ed shall authorise the stopping up of the treet or public place known as Broad-street- gs, and numbered 57, in the parish of St. h, Bishopsgate, on the said deposited plans." ot think it is necessary to consider whether ng turns upon that express exception of street-buildings. Looking at the recitals this 8th section, it is difficult to say how words could have been used for the pur- of showing that the company were to be d to stop up the streets, and were to be d to appropriate the site of the streets for rposes of the station. All you can say is ey did not think it necessary to enumerate e all the streets which are within the area. ars to me that if it were intended that they be allowed to stop up all the streets that ithin the area, it would be wholly useless necessary, and might possibly have led to ty if they had professed to set them all out e, because, if they had happened accidentally e one out the consequence would be that uld not stop up that street. But specifying ct boundaries of the area, it appears to me was quite sufficient to say that they were l to stop up all the streets within that area. simply how the case stands on the Act of Now let us see what there is on the other It appears that in the deposited plans they ecify what streets were intended to be l up, and what streets were not intended to be stopped up. It is said in the deposited plans: "Liverpool-street—level unaltered; Half-moon-street to be stopped; Sun-street—level unaltered." Therefore, no doubt there was a representation made that Half-moon-street was to be stopped, and that Sun-street was not to be stopped. Besides that, it is stated that there was to be an arch over Sun-street of 35 feet span and 16 feet high. That is what was stated upon the deposited plans. Now it is perfectly settled law since the case of Tod v. The North British Railway Company, in the House of Lords (ubi sup.), that the mere fact of a representation having been made in the deposited plans, although, no doubt, the fact of such a representation having been made may have the effect of preventing the persons interested in the matter from opposing the railway company in Parliament—for people may go and look at deposited plans and may say, "Oh! it appears that this street is not to be stopped up," and, therefore, persons interested in the street may not appear in Parliament, and may take no trouble about the matter—nevertheless, it is perfectly settled law that such a representation as that does not in any way bind the company unless the plans are incorporated in the Act. The railway companies are obliged by the standing orders of the Houses of Parliament to deposit plans showing what they propose to do. It does not follow that they make misrepresentations in these plans for the purpose of deceiving the public; but the companies are obliged to deposit plans, and it is settled law, which cannot be altered now, that representations made on such deposited plans do not bind them or give any equity against them, except so far as the plans are incorporated in the Act of Parliament. The question, therefore, is how far the representation that Sun-street would not be stopped, and that it would be crossed by an arch of a certain height, is incorporated in the Act. In the special Act itself the only section which was cited as having reference to the deposited plans and sections was the 6th. That section says, "And whereas plans and sections of the proposed railway showing the lines and levels thereof respectively, and the lands required for the purposes thereof, and of the said intended station in the City of London," that clearly means only plans and sections required for the railway, and for the intended station, "and of the enlargement of Bishopsgate station, and of the other purposes of the undertaking, and also books of reference to such plans, have been deposited with the clerks of the peace of the City of London and the counties of Middlesex and Essex respectively. Therefore, subject to the provisions and powers of deviation in this Act and the Acts incorporated therewith contained, the said railways shall be made in the line or within the limits of deviation, and upon the lands delineated on the said plans, and described in the said books of reference and according to the levels defined on the said sections." That section simply by itself appears to me not to be sufficient to incorporate the statement that Sun-street was not to be stopped, or even that the railway was to pass on an arch. It simply states that the railway is to be made upon the line, and within the limits of deviation, and upon the lands delineated in the plan. Indeed, reliance was not placed to any considerable extent on that section, but reliance was placed, and in fact the whole case against the company depends upon, the 13th and 14th sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. Now the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act is incorporated by the first section of the special Act. First of all it is enacted by the first section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act: "That this Act shall apply to every railway which shall by any Act which shall hereafter be passed, be authorised to be constructed, and this Act shall be incorporated with such Act, and all the clauses and provisions of this Act, save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by any such Act, shall apply to the undertaking authorised thereby so far as the same shall be applicable to such undertaking, and shall as well as the clauses and provisions of every other Act which shall be incorporated with such Act, form part of such Act, and be construed together therewith as forming one Act." It was argued by Mr. Amphlett that because there is a section in the special Act incorporating the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, therefore the limitation in the first section, namely, that the clauses and provisions of the Act shall apply save so far as they shall be expressly varied or excepted by the special Act, ought not to be construed as applying to the present case. But I am not of that opinion. It appears to me very improbable indeed that Parliament should have intended to incorporate the general provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, but not subject to that limitation, and that if you find something expressly different contained in the special Act that should not overrule the general Act. Indeed, in all cases where one Act of Parliament is incorporated with another, it is the general, and, as far as I know, the universal, rule, that if you find a contradiction between the general Act and the special Act the special Act is the Act which is to prevail. What then is the effect of the 13th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act? The 13th section does not come within that class of sections which relate to the crossing of roads by railways, but it is in the class of sections which simply relate to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith. It enacts that "Where in any place it is intended to carry the railway on an arch or arches, or other viaduct, as marked on the said plan or section, the same shall be made accordingly." I agree that that does so far incorporate the plans and sections that it does, unless there is something in the special Act which expressly varies it, enact that the railway (which I think means in this case the line of railway, and does not refer to the station) shall cross Sun-street by an arch. I think the company could not make it cross Sun-street in any other way than by that arch, if there be nothing in the special Act to vary that provision. Then the 14th section says: "It shall not be lawful for the company to deviate from or alter the gradients, curves, tunnels, or other engineering works described in the said plan or section," with certain exceptions which, I think, are not applicable to this case. It may be assumed that this arch would be an engineering work within the meaning of that section. If it would, then it amounts to a repetition. It would not appear to me to carry the matter any further than what is contained in the 13th section. Unless there is something which expressly varies that provision in the special Act, that arch is to be constructed over Sun-street. Now what appears to me to be the real question which has to be decided in this case is this—Do the recital and the 8th section of the special Act amount to an express varying of this 13th clause, which says that the arch is to be constructed as delineated on the sections? I am very clearly of opinion that they do. If Sun-street had been mentioned by name, if in the 8th section of the special Act they had taken the trouble to enumerate all the streets which are within the area, and Sun-street had been one of those enumerated, it could hardly have been contended, and, as I understand the argument, it is not contended, that that would not have overruled the provisions in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act respecting the construction of arches where they are shown on the deposited section. I cannot see that it makes any difference that the special Act does not enumerate all the streets within the area, but says that the company may stop up all the streets within the area and may appropriate the site of the streets (which makes the matter still stronger) for the purposes of the station. It appears to me that that does expressly vary the provisions of the 13th and 14th sections of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act. It does expressly vary them and does enable the company to stop up the street and appropriate the site of the street for a station. Some other sections of the special Act were referred to. The 7th section was referred to, but it really appears to me to have little or no bearing on the question. It simply provides for the benefit of landowners that the company are to construct one portion of the line before the other. I am, therefore, of opinion that upon the proper construction of the first Act, the company have power to stop up Sun-street and to appropriate the site of it for a station. Then it can hardly be contended, and indeed, I do not think it was seriously contended, that, if that is the true construction of the first Act, the right to stop up Sun-street is not continued by the second Act. In fact the 38th section of the second Act does expressly and in terms preserve the 8th section of the first Act. It provides that "Except as by this Act otherwise expressly provided, nothing in this Act contained shall repeal, alter, prejudice, or affect any of the provisions of the Station Act 1864, contained in the 8th and following sections of the said Act to the 73rd section inclusive, so far as such provisions are applicable and capable of being carried into effect consistently with the alterations by this Act authorised to be made in the railway, and authorised by that Act, and where by this Act any such alterations or any new railway or works are authorised to be made, such provisions shall apply to the alteration or to the new railway or works if applicable or capable of being carried into effect with reference thereto in like manner in all respects as the same respectively would have applied to the authorised railway or works, and as if such provisions had been specially re-enacted in this Act with reference to such alterations or new railway or works." Now, this new Act of 1870 entirely did away with the arch over Sun-street; that is not disputed. It altered the level by which the railway was to cross Sun-street, and if Sun-street was not to be blocked up it would make the railway go under Sun-street instead of going over it. That alteration having been made, you are then to read the 8th section of the old Act that they may stop up Sun-street and may appropriate the site of it for their station, as incorporated in the Act of 1870. Therefore it appears to me that the true construction of the first Act being that they may stop it up, so far from that view being altered, it is really strongly confirmed by the second Act. Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the company have power to stop up Sun-street, and to appropriate the site of it, provided, of course, that they make their station there, because they would not have the power if they did not make the station there, but only took their line of railway over it. Provided they include Sun-street in their station, I am of opinion that they have power to block it up and to appropriate that portion of it which is within the area described in the first Act. The consequence is that the information must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice JAMES.—I am of the same opinion. I could have wished that we had power to hold the company to be bound by what they represented on their deposited plans; but it appears to me for the reasons that have been stated by the Lord Justice, that it is impossible to limit the plain words of the Act by that which appears to have been put into the plans solely for the purpose of indicating how, at that particular date, it was intended that the line should be constructed.

Information accordingly dismissed with costs.

Re ALCHIN'S TRUSTS; Ex parte FURLEY; Ex parte THE EARL OF ROMNEY AND OTHERS.

Charitable gift—Insufficient description—Latent ambiguity.

Testator bequeathed 500*l.* to "The Kent County Hospital." There was no institution strictly answering this description, and the legacy was claimed by (1) the Kent and Canterbury Hospital, situate at Canterbury; (2) the West Kent General Hospital situate at Maidstone; (3) The Royal Kent Dispensary, situate at Greenwich; and (4) the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital, situate at Maidstone. It appeared that the testator had some landed property situate at Greenwich, but there was no further evidence connecting him with any of the above institutions:

Held, that the legacy must be divided equally between the Kent and Canterbury Hospital and the West Kent General Hospital.

RICHARD THOMAS ALCHIN, of 10, Grand Parade, Brighton, by his will dated the 25th Oct. 1869, bequeathed (amongst other charitable legacies) a legacy of 500*l.* "to the treasurer for the time being of the Kent County Hospital in aid of that institution," and he directed that the receipts of the treasurer for the time being should be a sufficient discharge for the legacy so bequeathed to him as aforesaid.

The testator died on the 1st June 1871. The executors paid the above legacy into court under the provisions of the Trustee Relief Act, stating in their affidavit that, as far as they were able to ascertain, there was no hospital so designated, and that the only institutions with any similarity of name, were the Kent and Canterbury Hospital, situate at Canterbury; the Royal Kent Dispensary, situate at Greenwich; the West Kent General Hospital, and the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital, both situate at Maidstone; and that to the best of their knowledge and belief, there was no other hospital which could claim to be interested in the said legacy.

Petitions claiming the legacy were presented by George Furley, the treasurer of the Kent and Canterbury Hospital; and by the Earl of Romney and others, the treasurers of the West Kent General Hospital.

It appeared from an affidavit filed on behalf of the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital, that in a former suit before Stuart, V.C., a question was raised as to the meaning of a bequest in another will "to the Kent County Hospital," and his Honour decided that the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital was entitled. In that case, however, the testatrix had suffered from diseased eyes, and had been attended by a surgeon who was one of the honorary surgeons of the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital.

From an affidavit filed on behalf of the Royal Kent Dispensary, it appeared that Richard Thomas Alchin possessed some landed property in the neighbourhood of Greenwich.

Freeman for the Kent and Canterbury Hospital.

Cutler, for the West Kent General Hospital, claimed the legacy on the ground that in cases of misdescription, locality was the important thing (Wilson v. Squire, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 654), and in point of locality, the West Kent General Hospital corresponded more closely to the "Kent County Hospital," than an institution confined to one particular district, such as the Kent and Canterbury Hospital. Further, a hospital which only treated patients suffering from ophthalmia could not take a legacy which was intended for a general hospital (Bradshaw v. Thompson, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 295.)

Waller, for the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital, contended that the case was concluded in his favour by the decision of Stuart. V.C.

Oswald, for the Royal Kent Dispensary, contended that, there being a latent ambiguity, the court would listen to parol evidence to show what the intention of the testator really was: (Re Briscoe's Trusts, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 149.) In the present case there was evidence to show that the testator possessed property at Greenwich, and was interested in that neighbourhood. He was, therefore, probably well acquainted with the Royal Kent Dispensary, which was situate at Greenwich, whereas there was no evidence to show that he was even aware of the existence of the other three claimants. He cited:

Waller v. Childs, Ambler 524.
Simon v. Barber, 5 Russ. 112.
Re Kilvert's Trusts, L. Rep. 7 Ch. 170; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 823; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 221.

Batten for the executors.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that in the present case, a testator had left 500*l.* to the Kent County Hospital. If there had been a hospital of that name, then for the reason stated in Kilvert's Trusts there would have been no further inquiry. But there was no hospital called the Kent County Hospital, and the legacy was claimed by three different hospitals and by one dispensary. Now it was quite clear that the testator intended this money to go to a hospital. In his opinion a hospital was a place were patients were received, while a dispensary was a place where medicines were dispensed. He could not therefore give this money to the dispensary. There remained the claims of the three hospitals. The Kent and Canterbury Hospital was a hospital for the whole county of Kent. The addition of the word Canterbury made the name look better, but did not prevent the hospital from being one for the general benefit of the county. The West Kent General Hospital was also a general hospital for the county of Kent. No doubt the testator did not intend this legacy to be divided. He intended the whole legacy to go to one institution. But, inasmuch as the testator had not accurately described any one hospital, his Honour should follow the principle laid down in Kilvert's Trusts (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 823), and divide the legacy amongst those whom he thought entitled. The Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital was also a Kent County hospital, but it was a hospital which dealt only with patients suffering from eye diseases. He understood by a hospital an institution which was open to diseases of all kinds, not an institution which was open to small pox only, or to ophthalmia only. The case of Bradshaw v. Thompson, which had been cited in the argument, showed that a hospital for particular diseases could not take legacy which was given to a general hospital. In that case a testator had left a legacy to the Westminster Hospital, Charing-cross; and the legacy was claimed by the Charing-cross Hospital, and the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital, which were both situate at Charing-cross. Knight Bruce, V.C., decided that the former was entitled. He said. "There are, in a sense in which the term may in this case be properly understood, two hospitals at Charing-cross—hospitals which may, under this will, be correctly described in their local situation by the term 'Charing-cross.' One of these is a general hospital, the other only intended for the reception of persons labouring under a particular complaint. In every instance, whether from necessity or not, where the testator has meant to describe an institution for complaints of a particular nature, he has so said; where, on the other hand, he has intended to describe a general hospital, he has used the term 'hospital' generally. By the term Westminster Hospital, I think he meant a general hospital at Westminster. There is, it appears, an hospital, which may be described as a Westminster hospital, though not the Westminster Hospital, which is at Charing-cross and in the city of Westminster. But for the claim of the Ophthalmic Hospital I should feel little or no difficulty. When I consider, however, that that hospital is intended for a particular and not a general purpose; when I consider that the word 'ophthalmic' is a most important part of its designation; and when I find that in the testator's will limited are designated as limited institutions, and general only by general words—having to elect which of the two institutions is intended, I think that the testator intended that hospital at or near Charing-cross, which is called 'Charing-cross,' and is in the city of Westminster." He could not, therefore, give the legacy to a hospital instituted for a particular purpose. It was said that Stuart, V.C., had decided the same question when raised in a former suit in favour of the Kent County Ophthalmic hospital. But there was no evidence that Stuart, V.C., had had before him in that case claims by the Kent and Canterbury Hospital, or by the West Kent General Hospital. If all these claims had been before Stuart, V.C., then his decision might have been held binding in the present case. Besides, it was clear that the decision of Stuart, V.C., depended upon the particular circumstances of that case. The testatrix there had suffered from weak eyes, and had been attended by one of the surgeons of the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital. On these grounds he must conclude that the Kent County Ophthalmic Hospital was not entitled to share in the benefit of the legacy, and that the whole fund must be divided between the Kent and Canterbury Hospital and the Kent County General Hospital. The costs of all parties would be paid out of the fund.

PRYOR v. PRYOR.

Dedication of way to the public.

A. and B. being owners of freehold property, by agreement in 1808 undertook, after a certain part thereof should have been let on building leases, to demise the remainder to trustees for C. for sixty-one years, upon trust to lease the same upon the like plan as should have been adopted with respect to the other part, or in such manner as C. should think fit. In pursuance of the agreement, a lease was accordingly granted in 1813 to C.'s trustees, the lease reciting the agreement and showing by a plan the manner in which the other part of the property had been dealt with. Upon this plan there appeared a street, part of the land comprised in the lease adjoining one end of the street. C. and his trustees leased this land for building purposes for the whole term, less ten days, to D., who erected houses in such a manner as to continue the street. The street was used by the public for upwards of twenty years.

Held, that there had been a direction by the freeholders to continue the street, and that it had become a public road.

THIS was a motion that the receiver of the court might be directed to place a bar across a portion of Frances-street, Lambeth, in order to prevent the public from exercising an alleged right of way.

The street in question leads at the south end, into Westminster-road. At the north end it leads up to premises belonging to Messrs. Mandsley and Co., where it forms a cul de sac.

In the year 1808 Ann Peacock and Jane Ann Peacock were the owners of some freehold property adjoining the Westminster-road. By an agreement in July 1808, made between A. Peacock and J. A. Peacock of the one part and Thomas Capreol of the other part, after reciting that Capreol had undertaken the management and letting of the premises and had already let part thereof on building leases, and proposed to let the remainder in a similar manner, it was agreed that, as soon as Capreol should have let so much of the premises on building leases as would produce 400*l.* per annum, then A. and J. A. Peacock would demise the residue of the premises to two trustees from Midsummer then last for sixty-one years, at a nominal rent upon trust for demising such residue together or in parcels upon the same or the like plan as should have been adopted with regard to the land which was to produce 400*l.* per annum, or in such other manner as Capreol, who was to be left at full liberty to direct the letting and managing thereof, should think fit, the beneficial interest in such lease to be in trust for Capreol and his family; and by the same agreement Capreol took upon himself to continue the entire management and letting of the land.

By an indenture dated the 11th May 1813, after reciting the above agreement, and that leases had been granted of parts of the premises at rents amounting in the whole to 404*l.* per annum, a lease was, according to the agreement above stated, granted at the request of Capreol to two trustees of all the said premises, except such parts thereof as had been already leased, for fifty-six and a quarter years from Lady-day 1813, the trusts being declared to be for the purpose of granting and demising the same premises in such manner and for the benefit of such person and persons with respect to the rents to be reserved in such leases as were in and by the said agreement of the 15th July 1806, expressed and declared.

A plan was annexed to this deed showing what portions of the property had been already let to produce the annual rent of 404*l.*, and showing also what buildings were then upon the land. Upon this plan appeared a street called Frances-street, and part of the land which was by this deed granted to Capreol's trustees was garden ground adjoining the north end of Frances-street. By an indenture of lease, dated the 4th June 1813, the trustees, at Capreol's request, granted a building lease to Ford for the whole term, less ten days, of the piece of garden ground above mentioned, which adjoined the north end of Frances-street, as then in existence. A plan showed Frances-street as then existing. Ford thereupon erected houses on each side of the piece of land, thus forming a continuation of Frances-street towards the north end.

It appeared that the street had been paved and lighted by the parish of Lambeth, and used by the public for upwards of twenty years. A partition suit having been instituted with regard to the property, and a receiver having been appointed, the question arose whether on the expiration of the lease in 1869 the public could be prevented from using the additional part of the street as a public way, and accordingly the plaintiff, who was entitled through the reversioners to part of the property, moved that the receiver might be directed to place a bar across that part of the street in order to stop the public from using it. Messrs. Mandalay and Co., who were also owners of a part of the property, opposed the motion.

Little, Q.C. and Macnaghten in support of the motion.—There has been no dedication to the public of this part of the street. If the reversioners are to be bound by Ford's act as lessee, specific authority must be proved, and there is no such authority. If the lessee affects to dedicate his leasehold to the public it is not binding: (Rugby Charity v. Merrywcather, 11 East, 376.) The Vestry of Lambeth claim to be the owners of the street, but there cannot be a dedication to a part of the public as a vestry of a parish. To constitute a dedication to the public there must be an intention to dedicate by the owner and user by the public:

Poole v. Huskisson, 11 M. & W. 827;
Vestry of the Parish of Bermondsey v. Brown, 33 Beav. 226; Law Rep. 1 Eq. 204; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574.

The case of Wood v. Veal (5 B. & A. 454) shows that there cannot be a dedication to the public by the tenant, but only by the owner in fee. Ford or his assigns or underlessees could not between 1813 and 1869 dedicate the street to the public, and since 1869 the property has been in the hands of the receiver, and there was no one to make the dedication. A presumption will arise from the fact of the street being paved and lighted by the parish, but this may be rebutted. The lease to Ford was granted by those to whom the freeholders had leased. It may have been to the interest of Ford to allow the street to be used by the public, but not to the interest of the freeholders. They also cited Reg. v. East Mark Tything (11 Q. B. 877).

Eddis, Q.C. and W. W. Karslake, for persons in the same interest.—There is hardly a single element in this case which was not in Wood v. Veal. If the street was dedicated to the public it must have been during the lease, and there is no evidence of the consent of the reversioners. Our proceedings are taken in time. Baxter v. Taylor (4 B. & A. 72), shows that the reversioners cannot maintain an action on the case for injury to the reversion against a stranger for entry upon the land during the tenancy under an alleged right of way which causes no injury to the reversion.

Kay, Q.C., and Whitehorne for Messrs. Mandalay and Co.—We do not dispute that the lessee cannot dedicate to the public without the consent of the freeholder, but the question is whether the owners in fee simple did not join with the lessee in the dedication. It is said that the lease to Ford was not from the freeholder, but it was made under the provisions of the prior deed. The residue of the property was to be let upon the same plan as that on which the first part had been let, and the largest possible powers were given to Capreol to underlet the land as he liked, and he had power given him by the owners of the fee to let on building leases, upon the plan therein referred to, which plan showed Frances-street. The reversioners having looked on, the public having used the street, can it be said that the reversioners have not acquiesced? The lessors have never attempted to restrict the powers given by the freeholders. Even where a lease is not a building lease, it may be presumed that there is liberty to make public streets. User alone is sufficient to raise a presumption of dedication to the public: (Rex v. Barr, 4 Ld. Camp. N. P. C. 16.) The user of a way does not bind the landlord while the tenant is in occupation, but after a long time acquiescence may be presumed (Davies v. Stephens, 7 Car. & Pay. 570), and a dedication by the landlord may be presumed during a tenancy: (Winterbottom v. Lord Derby, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 316, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 771.) But here the inference is not left to be drawn, for we show power given by the landlord to the lessee to make the dedication. Very little user is sufficient to establish dedication: (Shelf. Real. Prop. 7th edit. p. 65, citing Rugby Charity v. Merrywcather.) The case would have been stronger if Capreol had been bound to carry out the plan and scheme of building as it was at that time, but according to the plan he was bound to complete Frances-street. The cases cited on the other side do not apply to this case. In the case of Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, the lease was not a building lease, and there was no power to lay out streets. In Poole v. Huskisson, it is laid down that in order to constitute a dedication to the public by the owner of the soil, there must be an intention so to dedicate. Here the owners did intend the street to be laid out. It is a question in each case whether the lessor's concurrence is established, and it is established here. In Wood v. Veal there was no building lease at all, nor was there any act, as there is here, of lighting and paving the street by the parish; in that case, also, no street had been laid out with buildings on each side, but it was only proved that the locus in quo had been paved and lighted, and that watchmen had been placed there by the Commissioners under an Act of Parliament; there was also a doubt then among the judges whether a street which was not a thoroughfare could be a highway, but it is now decided that a cul de sac can be a highway. There cannot be more plain and overt acts than there are in this case. The houses are to be restored in good condition to the reversioners at the end of the lease, but the houses would be useless without the street. They were built, not under a power only, but under an obligation, the only way in which the land was to be used was by granting building leases, and the building scheme under which the houses were built included the street to be dedicated. The case of Baxter v. Taylor was quoted to show that the reversioners could not in a case like this raise an objection to the dedication, which was, so to speak, in progress, it not being injurious to the reversion; but that case does not apply here, for there the action was against a stranger, here it is the lessee. There is no evidence to rebut the presumption of dedication arising from the circumstances; the case simply rests upon the presumption that must arise from the long occupation by the public.

Hemming, for the Attorney-General.—It cannot be put so high that nothing done during a lease can be good against the reversioner; the onus is on the reversioners to show that the user is not a dedication to the public. Adverse user during the lease is not an absolute nullity against the lessor.

Little, Q. C., in reply.—The effect of Winterbottom v. Lord Derby, is that if you show occupation for seventy years by the public, the jury may presume the dedication took place before the lease. It applies merely to presumption.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Nothing can be clearer than the right with which Mr. Little opened. Nothing can be more indisputable than the authorities which he relied on for the principle that a reversioner is entitled to have back his land and everything he has demised at the expiration of the term, but unless there has been some authority or assent given by the reversioner, for example to make the road in this case, he is not bound by anything that the tenant did. Of that law there can be no doubt whatever. Now when this is looked into, to take it up at the time of the lease, there is a demise of a piece of ground. The demise is to Ford, the lessee, for the purpose of being built upon by him. He is to make the best he can of the land for the very purpose for which it was demised, to build upon. He is to build upon the ground beyond all question. There is nothing to restrict him from that. If he builds on the garden in the same line as the line of the houses on either side, then of necessity the piece in front is a continuation of Frances-street. It would not answer his purpose to build in any other way, but whether it would or not, it was competent to him so to deal with it. That is apparent upon the lease itself. [The Vice-Chancellor then stated the agreement entered into with Ford, of the 15th July 1808, and the deed of 11th May 1813 which showed the building plan, and continued:] The plan, therefore, is made a part of the instrument. The plan shows plainly that a street called Frances-street had been begun; that the plan which had been entered upon was to be continued, and the lease or leases to be granted to Capreol should be in continuance of the plan which had been so begun. I find that part of the plan had consisted in dedicating a street called Frances-street to the public, and for erecting the buildings on either side, and I find that that plan is according to the intention of the parties, their intention expressed to be continued as to the future buildings and the future leases relating to that property. If that be the true state of things, could any jury hesitate to presume that with the full assent of the owners of the land, whatever else was to be made afterwards in carrying out the plan which had been begun, it would be necessary to leave a public roadway? It is the only advantageous manner in which the property could be dealt with, the only way in which it has been dealt with, and it has been dealt with, as (I conceive, according to the full assent, more than the assent), with the actual direction of the owners of the land. Then the dedication to the public is a fact which is proved very distinctly. The evidence of user—I say nothing about the parish having repaired and lighted it, although that is not unimportant—but that it has been so used from the time the houses have been so built to the present time, is very clear in evidence. Then, am I at liberty to presume anything about that? There is the plain assent, by the owners of the land, to that state of things which I now find to exist. In my opinion I cannot, admitting all the authorities on which Mr. Little relied. Indeed the case is open to that observation which Mr. Kay addressed to it, that in no one of these cases is a building lease mentioned. We all know in the demise of land for building purposes provision must be made, whether it is expressed or not, for road-access to different parts of the property demised. If any case had been found, and I should have been surprised if any could have been found, where the owner of land demising for building purposes at the end of the term had said he had a right to take back his houses and stop up all the access to them, it would have deserved attention, and it would have required consideration. I have said what I have to say about the purposes and intention of the owners who were parties to the agreement of 1808, and carried that intention out by the lease of 1813. I read the instrument as meaning that Frances-street had been begun in the Westminster-road, and was to be carried on if the parties thought fit to the extremity of the owner's land, and as far as the houses were built in Frances-street, it would be Frances-street, and as far as houses were added to it in the same line in continuation of the same plan it would still be Frances-street. The user is clear beyond the possibility of doubt. The right of the public has been acquired to it, and it would be in my opinion a most unreasonable thing if, in this suit, which is for partition, and means of course for the preservation of property, I were now to authorise the receiver to set up a bar to shut up this which has become and is a public street. The presumption which I draw is from the conduct of the parties, from the instruments which they have executed and the evidence in the cause. It would be wrong on my part that I should express the slightest doubt that this is as much a public road as Holborn; although it leads in one sense to no place but Messrs. Maudslay's manufactory, it leads to every house on either side of the street, and if it did not it would be no less a public road. Motion refused with costs.

REG. v. MORGAN.

*Quo warranto—Local board of health—*9 Ann. c. 20 *—*23 & 24 Vict. c. 90.

Upon the trial of an information in the nature of a quo warranto for exercising the office of a member of a local board of health, the defendant did not appear, and a verdict passed for the relator.

9 Ann. c. 20, gives costs upon informations concerning the offices of mayors, bailiffs, portreeves, and other offices within cities, towns corporate, boroughs, and other places.

Held that, notwithstanding the incorporation of local boards by the Sanitary Act 1866, s. 46, the relator was not entitled to costs.

THIS was a quo warranto for which a writ had been granted by this court in order to try the validity of the election of a member of the local board of health of Sheerness. The matter came on for trial at the Maidstone assizes, when the defendant failed to appear. A master had refused to tax the relator's costs on the authority of Reg. v. Backhouse (7 B. & S. 911).

Crump moved for a rule nisi on behalf of the relator calling upon the defendant to show cause why the master should not proceed to tax the costs. Reg. v. Backhouse was an information for exercising an office similar to this, and the court refused the costs of the relator, on the ground that it was not an office of the same kind as those mentioned in 9 Ann. c. 20. That is "An Act for rendering the proceedings upon writs of mandamus, and informations in the nature of a quo warranto more speedy and effectual; and for the more easy trying and determining the rights of offices and franchises in corporations and boroughs." The preamble commences, "Whereas divers persons have of late illegally intruded themselves into and have taken upon themselves to execute the offices of mayors, bailiffs, portreeves, and other offices, within cities, towns corporate, boroughs and places," &c. By sect. 5, "It shall and may be lawful to and for the said courts respectively to give judgment that the relator or relators in such information named shall recover his or their costs of such prosecution." In giving judgment Cockburn, C.J. said, p. 921, "The statute has indeed been extended to offices of a corporate character though not in a municipal corporation, but it does not extend to offices of a quasi corporate character where there is no municipal corporation; at all events, I feel myself bound by the rule which the cases have laid down on the construction of this statute. It seems, however, desirable that the Legislature should interfere and make provision for costs in cases not within it." Since that case was decided it has been enacted by the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), sect. 46, that "The following bodies, that is to say, local boards, sewer authorities, and nuisance authorities, if not already incorporated, shall respectively be bodies corporate designated by such names as they may usually bear or adopt, with power to sue and be sued in such names, and to hold lands for the purposes of the several Acts conferring powers on such bodies respectively, in their several characters of local boards, sewer authorities, or nuisance authorities." This is sufficient to make the office of member of a local board of health an office "of a corporate character, though not in a municipal corporation." [BLACKBURN, J.—This is neither an "office," nor is this a "place" of the kind mentioned in the Act of Anne.] In Lloyd v. The Queen (2 B. & S. 656; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610), Erle, C. J., said (in the Ex. Ch. p. 662), "The statute is certainly much wider than the construction put upon it in Rex v. McKay (5 B. & C. 640), because the court there said that the provisions as to writs of mandamus and quo warranto informations applied to corporate offices and corporate places." Other cases upon the subject are:

Rex v. Francis, 2 T. R. 484;
Rex v. Wallis, 5 T. R. 375;
Rex v. Williams, 1 Burr 402.

Per curiam (COCKBURN, C.J., BLACKBURN, MELLOR and LUSH, JJ.)—There is nothing to take this case out of the rule laid down in Reg. v. Backhouse.

RULE nisi for a quo warranto in order to determine the validity of the election of an alderman for the borough of South Shields at a meeting holden under the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 76; and 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, ss. 13 and 14).(a)

(a) 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 14, enables the electors to vote "by personally delivering at such meeting" voting papers.

16 & 17 Vict. c. 79, s. 13, provides that, "at every election of aldermen, the persons, not exceeding the number of aldermen there to be chosen, who shall have the greatest number of votes according to the voting papers signed by the persons entitled to vote at such election, and delivered to and openly read by the mayor, shall be declared by the mayor to be, and thereupon shall be duly elected aldermen."

The question to be determined was whether voting papers used at such an election required a penny stamp.(a)

C. Russell, Q.C. (with him Hazlefoot) showed cause.—The provisions of the Stamp Act have no application to meetings of a representative municipal body such as a town council. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, prescribes the mode of voting thereat, but contains no enactment respecting voting papers. 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, ss. 13, 14, enables voting papers to be used. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, s. 13, they are to be signed by the persons entitled to vote, and delivered to and openly read by the mayor. But the late Stamp Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 11, s. 1), by the words "any such meeting," refers only to a meeting where there may be voting by proxy. And the schedule to 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, defining "voting paper," in using the words "any meeting," means any such meeting as aforesaid.

The court called on

Holker Q.C. (with him John Edge) to support the rule.—If the Legislature have chosen to impose the duty, it is unnecessary to inquire why they have done so. [LUSH, J.—The improbability of their having done so is however great.] A distinction is drawn in 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 102, between papers given to be used by a proxy, and those used by the voter himself. This election was at a meeting of a "body exercising a public trust" within the terms of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 18, s. 1, and the paper in question is an instrument for the purpose of voting by a person entitled to vote "at any such meeting," coming under the very words used in the schedule. [BLACKBURN, J.—It certainly is rather difficult to say why papers to be used at a "parish meeting of heritors or proprietors of real or heritable propperty in Scotland" should be taxed. LUSH, J.—There, however, property is in trust, here there is no trust in the ordinary sense of the word. To say that a municipal elector exercises a trust in voting is a figurative mode of expression. A trustee is bound to act. An elector is not bound to vote. From the 18 & 19 Vict. to the present day no one has ever heard of stamping voting papers of this kind. Were a stamp necessary for them, every vote given by means of a voting paper at the elections held under the recent Education Act would be void.] 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 78, shows the mode of electing aldermen. The votes are to be given by means of voting papers. Then they come within the meaning of the schedule to 27 & 28 Vict. c. 18. It is remarkable that in 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 3, the word "such" is omitted before "meeting." [LUSH, J.—But can we possibly infer from the mere slipping out of the word that the Legislature meant to make so great a change in the law?] The language used is unambiguous; a stamp is imposed on "any instrument for the purpose of voting by any person entitled to vote at any meeting."

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is quite clear that under the former Stamp Act these papers would not have required to be stamped, because the meeting at which they were presented was not such a meeting as those defined. Then, in the later statute the Legislature have broken up the schedule as it stood in the first Act, and the word "such" has slipped out of place. To suppose that the Legislature meant to provide for the stamping of the papers in question would be a most monstrous proposition, and one which I do not think we should be warranted in adopting.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am also of opinion on the construction of this Act that when it was enacted that there should be a stamp on every "letter or power of attorney," &c., for the sole purpose of appointing, nominating, or authorising any person to vote as a proxy or otherwise at one meeting of the proprietors or shareholders of any joint-stock or other company . . . or at one meeting of any body exercising a public trust," &c.; and then proceeded to impose a stamp duty on a "voting paper—that is to say, any instrument for the purpose of voting by any person entitled to vote at any such meeting as aforesaid," . . that meant where proxies are used. In the new Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 102) the Legislature first deal with letters of attorney appointing a person to vote as a proxy at any one meeting "at which votes may be given by proxy;" and then with respect to a voting paper, define it to be "any instrument for the purpose of voting by any person entitled to vote at any meeting," from which sentence the word "such," that should have preceded "meeting," has accidentally dropped out.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

QUAIN, J.—I do not think this was a meeting within the terms of either of the Acts, or that persons attending a meeting for the election of the town council exercise a public trust within the terms of the schedule to the first Act. Such a meeting has no affinity with a meeting of directors of a company.

Russell, Q.C., asked for costs.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The votes were good, being given by persons entitled to vote, and this was a mere technical objection, and you ought to have costs.

Rule discharged, with costs.

(a) 27 & 28 Vict. c. 18, s. 1, imposes the stamp duties specified in the schedules, inter alia (sched. C.), for and upon any "letter, or power of attorney, commission, factory, mandate, or other instrument in the nature thereof; for the sole purpose of appointing, nominating, or authorising any person to vote as a proxy or otherwise at one meeting of the proprietors or shareholders of any joint-stock or other company, or of the members of any society or institution, or of the contributors to the funds thereof, or at one meeting of any body exercising a public trust, in the United Kingdom, or to vote at one parish meeting of heritors or proprietors of real or heritable property in Scotland, 1*d*."

"Voting paper (that is to say): Any instrument for the purpose of voting by any persons entitled to vote at such meeting as aforesaid in any part of the United Kingdom, 1*d*."

By 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 102, the use of "Every letter or power of attorney for the purpose of appointing a proxy to vote at a meeting, and every voting paper hereby respectively charged with the duty of 1*d*." is restricted to one meeting. Sub-sect. 4: "Every vote given or tendered under the authority or by means of any such letter or power of attorney or voting paper, not being duly stamped, shall be absolutely null and void," and in the schedule is as follows: "Voting paper. Any instrument for the purpose of voting by any person entitled to vote at any meeting, 1*d*. And see sect. 102."

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD (appts.) v. OVERSEERS OF LIVERPOOL (respts.)

Poor rate — Docks — Assessment of — Parochial — Acreage system.

The Mersey Docks comprise a range of docks at Liverpool, and another range at Birkenhead. The two sets of docks are separated by the river Mersey, and are situated in different parishes, but have been amalgamated by Act of Parliament for the purposes of general management, and formed into one estate, which is vested in the appellants. Vessels may enter the docks on both sides of the river on payment of one toll. The parish of Liverpool rated the appellants in respect of the Liverpool docks on a sum ascertained by calculating the gross earnings of the docks in that parish, and deducting the amount of the necessary expenditure within the same. To this mode of rating the appellants objected, insisting that the acreage system of assessment should have been applied to the whole dock estate, as in Reg. v. The Hull Dock Company (18 Q. B. 325):

Held, that there being no insuperable difficulty in finding the amount of the earnings and outgoings from each range of docks within each parish, the acreage system, which must only be resorted to ex necessitate rei, must not be applied, and that the mode of rating adopted was correct.

SPECIAL CASE.

By a rate made on 27th May 1865, the appellants were assessed in a sum of 214,944*l.* in respect of the annual value of dock estates within the parish of Liverpool. The board appealed against the rate to the Liverpool Quarter Sessions. The appellants are a corporation, incorporated and regulated by and under the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, and the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, and under these Acts hold docks and other property used in connection with, and for the purposes of the docks, on both sides of the river Mersey.

2. The docks and other property are situated in several parishes and townships on the Lancashire and Cheshire side of the Mersey. The part on the Lancashire side is situated in the parish of Liverpool, and in the townships of Toxteth-park, Kirdale, and Bootle. Each of the parishes and townships in which the said docks and other property are situated have separate rates for the relief of the poor.

3. The first dock on the Lancashire side of the Mersey was made under the authority of an Act 8 Anne, c. 12, whereby the mayor, aldermen, &c., of Liverpool were empowered to make a dock (since filled up) on the south side of the town of Liverpool, and the duties leviable under that Act were not to be applied to any purposes except the building and repairing of the dock.

4. Other docks were subsequently made on the Lancashire side of the Mersey by the corporation of Liverpool, under the authority of other Acts of Parliament similarly limiting the application of the receipts from the docks as was provided by the Act of 8 Anne, c. 12, until by stat. 51 Geo. 3, c. 143, the mayor, aldermen, &c., were formed into a body corporate, and the docks and works on the Lancashire side of the river were vested in them under the style of "The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks."

5. The trustees so incorporated were empowered by the last mentioned Act, to levy certain rates, and when all charges and mortgages upon such rates should be paid off, they were required to lower and reduce the rates and duties thereby granted, as far as could be done in the state of the docks and works, so as to leave sufficient for all charges of management, and collection of rates, and improving, repairing, and maintaining the docks and works so vested in them.

6. Subsequently other Acts relating to the docks on the Lancashire side of the Mersey were passed, in all twenty-two in number, and forming a series extending from the said Act of 8 Anne to 21 Vict., both inclusive.

7. Other docks were formed on the Cheshire side of the Mersey, at Birkenhead, under the authority of a series of fourteen Acts of Parliament, extending from 7 & 8 Vict. to 18 & 19 Vict., by which last mentioned statute all the Birkenhead docks were vested in the Corporation of Liverpool.

8. By sect. 26 of the Act of 1857 it is provided that all such estate and interest in the docks, buildings, and other property, both real and personal, situate at Birkenhead or elsewhere, as were transferred or intended to be transferred to the Corporation of Liverpool, by the Birkenhead Docks Act 1855, should, upon and after the 1st Jan. 1858, vest in the appellants, but subject to all charges and liabilities affecting the same.

9. By sect. 27 of the same Act of 1857 it is provided that all such docks, lights, buoys, lands, buildings, and other property, both real and personal, situate at Liverpool or elsewhere, as were held by, or in trust for, the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, under or in pursuance or for the purposes of the said Acts mentioned in the first part of the schedule thereto annexed, should, upon and after the 1st Jan. 1858, vest in the appellants, but subject to all charges and liabilities affecting the same.

10. By sect. 49 of the last mentioned Act it is enacted that, subject to the provisions of that Act, the appellants should stand possessed of all the property, powers, rights, and privileges, thereby transferred to them, upon the trusts and for the purposes upon and for which such property, powers, rights and privileges, were holden previously to the commencement of that Act.

11. Sect. 56 of the same Act enacts that:—

The following rules shall be observed by the board with respect to the moneys received by them under this Act, viz.:

(1) The conservancy expenditure shall be defrayed out of the conservancy receipts.

(2) The pilotage expenditure shall be defrayed out of the pilotage receipts.

(3) No portion of the conservancy receipts, or pilotage receipts, shall be applied in aid of the general expenditure.

(4) No sums shall be payable in respect of docks by any vessel that does not use the same.

(5) Save as by this Act is provided, no moneys receivable by the board shall be applied to any purpose, unless the same conduces to the safety or convenience of ships frequenting the port of Liverpool, or facilitates the shipping or unshipping of goods, or is concerned in discharging a debt contracted for the above purposes.

12. The dock estates at present consist of basins, docks, piers, jetties, graving docks, gridirons, wharfs, quays . . . and other works and conveniences affixed or appertaining to such basins and docks as are necessary for the working thereof; and the appellants are authorised to received large sums of money, under the name of dock rates and duties, by virtue of the said Acts of Parliament, from the owners of vessels and goods, for the privilege of using the dock property. The portion of such property within the parish of Liverpool is correctly set out in the assessment.

13. The appellants have, under their Act, the power of charging lower rates in some docks than others, and have exercised such power in one or two instances on the Cheshire side.

14. The appellants are bound to apply their rates and moneys according to the directions of the Acts.

15. All the docks were made under the Acts, and all the moneys are appropriated as the Acts direct.

16. The dock estate is now subject to a large debt, and ordinary repairs are paid out of the income so far as it suffices.

17. 18. 19. 20. A sinking fund was provided by the Acts.

21. If the parochial principle of assessment were adopted in the parishes and townships in which the said property of the appellants is situated on the Cheshire side of the Mersey, the rateable value of the property in those parishes or townships would be very little, as compared with that of the property of the appellants on the Lancashire side of the Mersey, inasmuch as, under such system of calculation, the undertaking on the Cheshire side is carried on at a loss, if a proportional amount of the interest on the debt were charged against the earnings, and at an inconsiderable profit even if such interest were not charged. In fact the rates received from persons who choose to make use of that part of the dock property which is within the parish of Liverpool, make up for and pay the losses sustained by the appellants in the parishes and townships on the Cheshire side of the river.

22. The gross estimated rentals mentioned in the assessments are arrived at by considering the docks and warehouses within the parish of Liverpool as separate property from the other parts of the dock estate, and as producing a certain amount of income without taking into account the nature of the whole undertaking, or the duties and liabilities of the appellants, and without taking into account the fact that parts of the undertaking in other parishes are carried on at a loss, or the facts mentioned in the last preceding paragraph.

23. Accounts have been kept in respect of each particular dock on the following principles: Where the tonnage rate is payable on the inward voyage, the whole of the rate has been credited to that dock in which the principal part of the cargo is discharged, and where the tonnage rate is payable on the outward voyage, the whole sum is credited to that dock in which the principle part of the carge is loaded.

As to the dock dues or goods the same rule prevails. The dues on the whole cargo are credited to that dock in which the principal portion of the cargo is loaded or discharged as the case may be.

This method of keeping the accounts has been adopted because the accurate apportionment of the rates and dues has been hitherto unnecessary, and because of the difficulty of determining the proper principle of such apportionment.

24. There is no difficulty in estimating the necessary amount to be expended for the repairs and renewal of the dock estate, and in apportioning the general expenditure on the whole estate among the different docks, according to the amount of income with which each is credited, and accounts have in fact been prepared on this basis. But considerable expenditure is incurred for the benefit of the whole dock estate, and the same difficulty of apportioning the expenditure exists as that referred to in the last preceding paragraph with reference to the income of the dock estate.

25. Attached to certain of the docks there are warehouses and transit sheds, for the use of which rents are paid separately from the tonnage or other rates, and are payable solely in respect of such goods as are stored or placed in them according to the space occupied, and the duration of the occupation. There are also certain graving docks, stages for landing and shipping goods, cranes, weights, and other appliances, the charges for the use of which are wholly distinct from any other charges, and are payable only by those persons who require the use of them for their ships or goods.

There are also certain offices and other places of considerable value which are used by the dock board solely for purposes in connection with the management of the dock estate. . . . . This property . . . . is situate in different parishes, and the receipts and value of every part of it are capable of being ascertained. The whole of such property in the parish of Liverpool is included in the said assessment, and has been separately rated therein.

26. It is not contended by the appellants that they are not liable to be rated, but they contest the correctness of the principle on which they have been rated by the respondents.

27. The appellants contend—first, that the proper method of assessment is to take the net income derived from the whole of the property, and to divide the same amongst the different parishes or townships in proportion to their acreage, and that the result, after making deductions, is the rateable value; secondly, that they are entitled to deduct interest upon their debt, as they are only allowed to receive the increased rates in order to pay off the interest, and the rates would have immediately to be reduced if there were no interest to pay; thirdly, that they are entitled to deduct tenants' profits as would be done in any case of a trading body; fourthly, that they are entitled not only to a deduction for ordinary repairs, but also a deduction for deterioration of works. They calculate the time when the different works will require renewal, and then claim to deduct every year a sum of money which, put out to interest, would, in the said time, be sufficient to renew such works; fifthly, that these deductions must be calculated on the whole area of the docks, and, with the other expenditure, deducted from the gross income before the net income is arrived at.

28. The respondents dispute the several contentions of the appellants above specified, and they further contend, that in rating the appellants they are entitled to calculate the earnings of the docks within the parish, and after deducting the expenses of working those particular docks apart from the rest of the estate, to calculate the rate on the sum so ascertained. That the income from the town dues, after payment of interest on the sum of 1,500,000*l.* (the purchase money of the dues) ought also to be taken into account in the rate.

29. The court was to draw all inferences which they might draw. The question for the court, therefore, was on what principle the dock property in the parish is to be rated, and what, if any, deductions are to be made from the rateable value as estimated by the parish, and whether the recent Parochial Assessment Act makes any and what difference between rates levied before and after that Act came into operation. The amount of the rateable value was to be ascertained on the principle laid down by the court, and the judgment in conformity therewith to be entered at the quarter sessions next or next but one after the amount had been ascertained as aforesaid with such costs as the court should adjudge.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him C. Crompton).—The effect of this case is to bring about a reconsideration of the principle laid down in Reg. v. The Hull Dock Company (18 Q. B. 325.) The defendants there were proprietors of several docks made at different times and under successive Acts of Parliament. The docks communicated with each other and with the river Humber, and extended into several parishes. Every vessel paid a single toll, which became due on entry into the docks, and was paid then, or on clearance outwards; and she was entitled by such payment to go into any one or more of the docks at the will of her own master, or under the direction of the company's harbour master, who had certain powers for regulating the position of vessels. All the payments at whatever dock received were carried to one general account. Held, that the poor rate upon so much of the docks as lay in any parish must be assessed, not according to the actual receipts in that parish, but to the proportion which the area of docks within that parish bore to the entire area of the docks. For that, in such a case, an assessment on the acreage principle was unavoidable; though an assessment on the basis of earnings within the parish is preferable where the nature of the case permits it. The docks now in question should be rated as one estate, and it is only as one estate that they can be carried on under the present system. Sect. 50 of the Liverpool Docks Act 1857 enacts that all the docks shall be deemed to constitute but one estate. But the docks have been separately rated, which makes a great difference. [BLACKBURN, J.—Only a difference as to the persons who shall receive the rates—the Birkenhead or the Liverpool overseers. The amount will not be altered if the assessment is properly worked out. There would, however, no doubt, be a difference between the sum charged in Birkenhead and in Liverpool.] A vessel may go into a dock which is partly in one parish and partly in another. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Then, the Hull case shows that the parochial system of assessment must be applied as far as practicable; but where ex necessitate rei another mode must be adopted, then that may be used.]

Sir John Karslake, Q.C. (Aspinall, Q.C. and Littler with him) appeared for the respondent,

COCKBURN, C.J.—I do not think we need call upon Sir John Karslake to argue for the respondents, as we are of opinion that our judgment should be in their favour. The Hull Dock Case (18 Q. B. 325), undoubtedly established this, viz., that if docks are all contiguous to each other, forming part of an entire system with a general entrance to them all, and with tolls fixed at the same rate for vessels, and having the benefit of any of the series of docks, the principle of parochial rating cannot be applied, but recourse must be had to the acreage system. Nevertheless, the language of the judges in that case shows that the acreage system must not be resorted to except ex necessitate rei. It would not be right to upset the authority of the Hull case, which has now been law for eighteen years, without further consideration. The present case, however, is plainly distinguishable from it, because, of the docks now in question, some are on one, and the others on the opposite side of the river Mersey, and they do not come within the description of an entire system of docks. True, under the Act of Parliament they are united for the purpose of general management, and pecuniary operations; but this fact is not enough to alter that which is in itself a very essential distinction. They are two distinct estates, only considered as one property for the purposes of general management. The docks on the Birkenhead side of the river can no more be deemed to be one with those on the Liverpool side than two separate private estates would be, although under the same management. The Liverpool people have a right to the contribution towards local burthens of this property according to the value of the docks on the Liverpool side. The docks extending on that side are not all in one parish, and therefore so far as they are concerned, the Hull case would apply, but it seems to me that we are not entitled to adopt the acreage system (which ought not to be resorted to except when necessity requires it) here. There is no insuperable difficulty in ascertaining what proportion of the earnings from each dock is due in respect of the earnings of the docks on one side and the docks on the other side of the water. Certainly in this case it would be manifestly unjust that the people of Liverpool should lose the advantage of the superior value of the Liverpool docks, and that the Birkenhead inhabitants should obtain the benefit of the higher value of them. I think we ought to avoid applying the acreage system, which in the present instance would lead to unjust results. What would be the proper principle to adopt if the docks upon the Cheshire side ultimately prove valueless, and can only be maintained out of the earnings of the docks on the Lancashire side, is a very different question, which we are not now called upon to decide. This property must be rated according to the existing state of things, and our judgment must be for the respondents.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 86) is express and imperative that the several hereditaments are to be rated on an estimation "of annual value, that is to say of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenant's rates, &c., and deducting therefrom the probable average annual costs of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent:" (Sect. 1.) Now, that is the principle which the Parochial Assessment Act lays down, and in an immense majority of cases it is very easily acted upon indeed. But it has been long felt that a difficulty in the application of it comes where property lies in different parishes, and it is hard to say how much is earned in each—a difficulty which has been often met with in assessing the rate payable by gas and water companies—and, therefore, a practical rule of thumb has been established which it is very difficult to say is to be found in the Parochial Assessment Act. In the Hull case, where a system of docks, having one entrance and one sum coming in for the whole, lay in different parishes, and another, the Victoria Dock, had been made new, opening into the river, but forming part of the old docks, the court thought it made part of the whole, and as there was one payment for entering, and one series of docks, there was no way of assessing them except by the acreage system. Here is, no doubt, one entire rent, and in any case where we can do nothing else we must go on that system. It may be that there are docks on the Liverpool side which lie in different townships, but the question before us is this, viz., that when it appears there are docks on the Birkenhead side quite separate and distinct, and more ships enter the docks on the Liverpool than on the other side of the Mersey, are we to say we must put on the Birkenhead docks a much greater value, and reduce the assessment of the Liverpool docks because they are united under one management, and the earnings of the docks on either side are received in one sum? It may be that the Birkenhead docks are worked at a loss and ultimately no profits may be derived from them, and they will then have to be kept up at the expense of the other. When that event happens, some question may arise and will be decided. I think there would be no difficulty in approximately ascertaining the amount for the purpose of "real justice and perfect law," as Lord Campbell, C.J. said, though we cannot get the sum with precise accuracy. It is perfect law and justice if the approximate value can be found. The respondents' principle of rating here seems to be the right one as applied to these docks, and any question as to the manner in which it works out may be raised hereafter.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. To the facts on which the judgment of the court in the Reg v. The Hull Dock Company was given I think the principle of acreage valuation was properly applied, because no other was practicable. But everyone can recollect when the Birkenhead Docks were rivals of the Liverpool Docks, and there has been no physical alteration although by Act of Parliament they are worked under one management. That Act does not, however, affect the parochial assessement system so much as to require these docks to be rated on a separate system. I think also our judgment should be in favour of the espondents.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The acreage system ought only to be applied where the parochial system is inapplicable. That is not so here. I do not think that the rateable value of the Birkenhead Docks at all altered by their union with the Liverpool Docks for purposes of management. With regard to any dock that happens to be in two parishes there may be a difficulty, and when it is impossible to apply the parochial system the other mode of assessment may be adopted.

LONG v. WILLIAMS.

Advowson—Mortgage—Sequestration—Foreclosure—Sale.

J. G. S. mortgaged the advowson of the vicarage of St. Giles's, Camberwell, to the plaintiff, as a security for the repayment of two sums of 7500*l.* and 5000*l., advanced by the plaintiff to him, and afterwards conveyed the said advowson, subject to the payment of the said two several sums to the defendant, who, as a security for the payment of the same, executed a warrant of attorney, whereby he confessed judgment at the suit of the plaintiff for the sum of* 25,000*l.* The said vicarage having become vacant, the defendant was presented thereto, and default having been made in payment of the interest on the said several sums, the plaintiff caused a writ of sequestration to issue against the said vicarage. The plaintiff subsequently died, and his representatives afterwards obtained a decree of foreclosure of the equity of redemption and sold the said advowson for 11,000*l.* On a motion for a rule to set aside the said writ of sequestration, it was Held by the Court of Exchequer, (Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell and Channell, BB.), that the said sale was not a satisfaction of the said judgment, and that the sequestration remained in full force and unaffected.

By an indenture, dated the 29th March 1844, the advowson of the vicarage of St. Giles's, Camberwell, in the county of Surrey, was mortgaged by J. G. Storie to the plaintiff, to secure the payment of 7500*l.* and interest. By another indenture of the same date, the said advowson was further mortgaged by the said J. G. Storie, to the said plaintiff, to secure the repayment of the further sum of 5000*l.* and interest.

By an indenture, dated the 22nd Jan. 1846, the said advowson was conveyed to the said defendant subject to the payment of the said sums of 7500*l.* and 5000*l.* and interest; and on the treaty for the sale of the said advowson to the said defendant it was agreed that the said sums of 7500*l.* and 5000*l.*, and all interest then due and to become due thereon, should be secured to be paid by the said defendant to the said plaintiff by a warrant of attorney.

In pursuance of the said last mentioned agreement, the said defendant duly executed a deed poll or warrant of attorney, bearing date on or about the 16th Feb. 1846, whereby he empowered certain attorneys in the Court of Exchequer to confess judgment against him in an action at the suit of the said plaintiff, for the sum of 25,000*l.* and costs; and by the defeazance endorsed on the said warrant of attorney it was declared that the said warrant was given to secure the payment of the sums of 7500*l.* and 5000*l.* on the 29th Sept. 1850; and it was thereby agreed that no action should be commenced against the defendant until default should be made in the payment of the said sums, or the interest thereon; and judgment was afterwards duly entered up on the said warrant of attorney.

Shortly after the date of the said warrant of attorney, the said vicarage of St. Giles became vacant, and the said defendant, as owner and patron of the said living, presented himself, and was duly instituted the vicar thereof; and has been ever since, and still is, vicar thereof.

Default having been made by the said defendant in payment of the interest due on the said sums of 7500*l.* and 5000*l.*, the said plaintiff issued out a writ fi. fa de bonis ecclesiasticis, directed to the Bishop of Winchester, who thereupon granted a writ of sequestration, which was afterwards duly published, but no proceeds whatever have been realised under the said sequestration, owing to prior sequestrations having been lodged against the said vicarage.

The said plaintiff died in or about the month of April 1849, having by his will given and bequeathed all his real and personal estate and effects unto the Rev. Walter Long, and Richard P. Long, upon certain trusts, and appointed the said W. Long and R. P. Long joint executors thereof, who duly proved the said will. The said W. Long and R. P. Long afterwards exhibited a bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery against the said defendant, and by a decree of the said court made in the said cause in 1852, it was ordered that the said defendant should stand absolutely barred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption of and in the said advowson.

The said Walter Long died soon after the date of the said decree, leaving the said R. P. Long, him surviving; and in or about the year 1859, the said R. P. Long sold the said advowson for the sum of £11,000.

On the 23rd July 1869, John Fry Reeves and Frederick William Reeves obtained judgment against the said defendant in the said Court of Exchequer for the sum of 15,007*l.* 10*s.*, and thereupon the said J. F. Reeves and F. W. Reeves caused a writ of fi. fa. de bonis ecclesiasticis to issue, directed to the said Bishop of Winchester, who thereupon granted a writ of sequestration against the said vicarage. The said J. F. Reeves and F. W. Reeves now sought to set aside the writ of sequestration issued at the suit of the said plaintiff, and accordingly

Poynter now moved for a rule calling upon the representatives of the said plaintiff and the said Bishop of Winchester to show cause why the said writ of fi. fa. de bonis ecclesiasticis, and the sequestration founded thereon, granted to the said plaintiffs by the said bishop should not be set aside, on the ground that the judgment on which it had been founded had been satisfied by the sale of the property comprised in the mortgage, although it did not realise the amount due, and cited KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that no rule should be granted in this case. Though the creditor has availed himself of his other securities, he still possesses this security for the balance, as he has only obtained satisfaction to the extent of a portion of his debt.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. None of the authorities cited go to the extent contended for by Mr. Poynter. It appears to me that this is a question for a court of equity.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be refused. An equitable plea might, perhaps have been framed if all the money due had been paid; but I am clearly of opinion that there has been no payment in equity in this case. A court of equity would probably give relief, but only on terms. It would not, I think, grant a perpetual injunction.

KELLY, C. B.—I ought to add that, if there was no other objection to this rule being granted, it would be a fatal one that the judgment-debtor is not a party to the application.

Rule refused.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

BROWN v. NUGENT.

Licence for public music—Dancing—Penalty—25 Geo. 2, c. 36, ss. 2, 3.

By 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2, quarter sessions in London or Middlesex are authorised and empowered to grant such licences as they in their discretion shall think proper to any house, room, garden, or other place kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of a like kind. Sect. 3 twice refers to a house or other place "kept for any of the said purposes."

Held, by the Exchequer Chamber (affirming the Queen's Bench), that the sessions were justified in granting a licence "for public music;" and that the holder of such a licence was liable to the penalty provided for keeping such house without a licence, if he allowed public dancing in his house.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in making absolute a rule of that court obtained by the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff upou a point reserved at the trial. This decision is reported L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 693.

This was a qui tam action brought by the plaintiff, as a common informer, to recover a penalty of 100*l.* under the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, for keeping a house or room for public dancing, without a licence had for that purpose. The declaration was in the form allowed by sect. 13. The plea was nil debet, by statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 4, s. 3, whereon issue was joined.

This action was tried by Lush, J., at the Middlesex sittings on the 23rd Jan. 1871, when the following facts were proved:

The defendant was proprietor and keeper of the Cambridge Music Hall, Commercial-street, in the said county, and within twenty miles of the city of Westminster. On the 16th Nov. 1870, the defendant permitted dancing in the said hall by the performance on a stage, erected at one end thereof, of a ballet divertissement called "The Revels of the Sylphides." This ballet was performed by two dancers, selected, employed and paid by the defendant in that behalf. The stage was arranged with scenic accompaniments, and a cataract of real water at the back, with a nymph rising from the back.

All persons who paid at the doors were admitted to the said hall to view the said dancing, but with the exception of the said two dancers dancing the said ballet as aforesaid, no person danced in the said hall, and no dancing was permitted.

The defendant held a licence for music in the said hall, duly granted to him by the magistrates of the said county under the provisions of the statute 25 Geo. 2, c. 36; a copy of such licence is hereto annexed. Over the entrance of the hall was duly affixed and kept the inscription "Licensed pursuant to Act of Parliament of 25 Geo. 2," in accordance with sect. 3 of the said statute.

The jury, in reply to the learned judge, found that the dancing was a substantial part of the entertainment, and the music only ancillary thereto, and that the defendant kept the said hall for music and dancing.

The learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant, giving the plaintiff leave to move to enter a verdict instead thereof for him.

Within the time in that behalf allowed by the rules and practice of the said court, viz., on the 26th Jan. 1871, the plaintiff, in pursuance of the said leave so reserved at the said trial as aforesaid, applied for and obtained a rule nisi, calling upon the defendant to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a verdict of 100*l.* be entered for the plaintiff instead thereof upon the ground that on the facts found by the jury, the verdict ought to be so entered; it having been found by them that the defendant kept open his house for dancing, not having a licence for that purpose under 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, s. 2.

Afterwards on the 6th July 1871, the said court made the said rule absolute.

The defendant now appealed from the said last mentioned decision and rule, pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854.

Due notice of such appeal had been given, pursuant to the said Act, and an order of Mr. Justice Hannen made herein, dated 11th Dec. 1871, granting the necessary leave to appeal.

The question for the opinion of the court of appeal was whether the said rule of the 6th July 1871 ought to have been made upon the grounds therein stated, or whether the said previous rule to show cause dated the 26th Jan. 1871 ought to have been discharged.

The court of appeal to make such rule upon this appeal as it should think fit, and to proceed thereon pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854.

The licence above-mentioned was as follows:

We, whose names are hereunto subscribed and set, being four of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, assembled in the Michaelmas quarter sessions of the peace, holden in and for the said county, in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Victoria, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, being the Michaelmas quarter sessions preceding the 1st Dec. 1870, do, in consequence of an order of this present session, and by virtue of the power given us by the Act of Parliament, made in 25 Geo. 2, intituled "An Act for the better preventing thefts and robberies, and for regulating places of publick entertainment, and punishing persons keeping disorderly houses;" hereby license George William Nugent to keep a certain house or place called the Royal Cambridge Music Hall, Commercial-street, with other buildings and appurtenances thereunto belonging, in the parish of Christchurch, in the said county, for public music. And the said George William Nugent is to take care, as far as in him lies, that no disorders be committed within the said house or place, and that nothing contrary to sobriety, decency, and good manners be exhibited, represented, or transacted therein, and that he do not suffer any of the aforesaid entertainments to very late and unreasonable hours of the night, and that he do not presume to open his said house on the Lord's Day (commonly called Sunday), Christmas Day, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, nor on any day of solemn fast and humiliation, which now is or hereafter shall be by lawful authority appointed, and that he do in all things conduct the said house and place decently, soberly, and orderly, according to the true intent and meaning of this licence, and of the said Act of Parliament, provided, nevertheless, that the said George William Nugent, in order to giv, public notice that the said house or place is so licensed as aforesaid, do affix and keep up in some notorious place over the door or entrance thereof, an inscription in large capital letters in the words following: "Licensed pursuant to Act of Parliament of 25 Geo. 2nd." And provided likewise that the said house and place so licensed as aforesaid shall not open for any of the said purposes on any day whatever before the hour of five in the afternoon. Given under our hands and seals at the said sessions, and signed and sealed by us the said justices in open court.

HY. M. KEMSHEAD (L. S.).
THOS. JERVIS (L. S.).
J. J. MEEK (L. S.).
W. H. TWENTYMAN (L. S.).

The court has expressed a strong opinion of the impropriety of keeping open on Sunday the Saloon and other parts of the premises used for public amusements, and that such practice should be discontinued; and that the house should be used on Sundays only as a common tavern, if licensed as such.

This licence was endorsed—

The within licence is granted by authority of the Act of the 25 Geo. 2, c. 36, intituled "An Act for the better preventing thefts and robberies, and for regulating places of public entertainment, and punishing persons keeping disorderly houses;" the second section of which Act directs that no fee or reward shall be taken for this licence.

Sect. 2 of the above mentioned Act is as follows:

And whereas the multitude of places of entertainment for the lower sort of people is another great cause of thefts and roberies, as they are thereby tempted to spend their small substance in riotous pleasures, and in consequence are put on unlawful methods of supplying their wants and renewing their pleasures: In order, therefore, to prevent the said temptation to thefts and robberies, and to correct as far as may be the habit of idleness which is become too general over the whole kingdom, and is productive of much mischief and inconvenience: Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the 1st Dec. 1752, any house, room, garden or other place kept for publick dancing, musick, or other publick entertainment of the like kind, in the cities of London and Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof, without a licence had for that purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas quarter sessions of the peace, to be holden for the county, city, riding, liberty, or division in which such house, room, garden, or other place is situate (who are hereby authorised and empowered to grant such licences as they in their discretion shall think proper) signified under the hands and seals of four or more of the justices there assembled, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place, and every such licence shall be signed and sealed by the said justices in open court, and afterwards be publickly read by the clerk of the peace, together with the names of the justices subscribing the same; and no such licence shall be granted at any adjourned sessions; nor shall any fee or reward be taken for any such licence; and it shall and may be lawful to and for any constable or other person, being thereunto authorised by warrant under the hand and seal of one or more of His Majesty's justices of the peace of the county, city, riding, division, or liberty where such house or place shall be situate, to enter such house or place, and to seize every person who shall be found therein, in order that they may be dealt with according to law; and every person keeping such house, room, garden, or other place without such licence as aforesaid shall forfeit the sum of 100*l.* to such person as will sue for the same; and be otherwise punishable as the law directs in cases of disorderly houses.

By sect. 3—

Provided always, and it is hereby further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that in order to give public notice what places are licensed pursuant to this Act, here shall be affixed and kept up in some notorious place, over the door or entrance of every such house, room, garden, or other place, kept for any of the said purposes, and so licensed as aforesaid, an inscription in large capital letters in the words following, videlicet, "Licensed pursuant to Act of Parliament of 25 Geo. 2;" and that no such house, room, garden, or other place, kept for any of the said purposes, although licensed as aforesaid, shall be open for any of the said purposes before the hour of five in the afternoon; and the affixing and keeping up of such inscription as aforesaid, and the said limitation or restriction in point of time, shall be inserted in, and made conditions of, every such licence; and in case of any breach of either of the said conditions, such licence shall be forfeited, and shall be revoked by the justices of peace in their next general or quarter sessions, and shall not be renewed; nor shall any new licence be granted to the same person or persons, or any other person on his or their or any of their behalf, or for their use or benefit, directly or indirectly, for keeping any such house, room, garden, or other place, for any of the purposes aforesaid.

Day, Q.C. (with him Bennett) argued for defendant, the appellant.

Cole, Q.C. (with him Thomas) supported the judgment of the Queen's Bench.

Kelly, C. B.—In this case I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. The action was brought under an Act of Parliament, about which I feel at liberty to say that the clauses are framed without that care and choice of language which it was the bounden duty of the Legislature to exercise in so important a matter as that of which it treats. When, however, I look at the provisions of the Act, I am unable to see any ground for a reasonable doubt of the propriety of the decision of the Queen's Bench. What are the words of the second section? "Any house, room, garden, or other place, kept for public dancing, music, or other public entertainment of the like kind," "without a licence had for that purpose from the last preceding Michaelmas quarter sessions of the peace," . . . "(who are hereby authorised and empowered to grant such licences as they in their discretion shall think proper)" . . . "shall be deemed a disorderly house or place." The question for us is whether, as the licence which was granted in this case only authorises the defendant to keep his house for public music, without the introduction of words which would authorise dancing, the Act is violated by the defendant's allowing public dancing in his house. It has been argued that this limitation of the licence is void, because the justices have no power to grant anything but a general licence for all the purposes mentioned in the section; that they have, in fact, granted a licence under this Act, and that the effect of such a licence cannot be restricted by unauthorised words inserted therein by the justices. It may be, however, that either this licence is void, or that the limitation to music is valid. I think, looking to the public interests, that our duty is to put such a construction upon the words of this section as to justify the granting of such licences, and for such purposes as the justices in their discretion shall think proper. I am of opinion that it is competent to the magistrates, under this Act, to grant a licence either for music or for dancing only. Looking at the general purview of the statute, and admitting that we must interpret its provisions strictly, being those of a penal statute, there can be no reasonable doubt that the Legislature intended the justices to have this power. Passing from the actual intention of the Legislature, let us consider the words of the Act. The purposes for which a house must be kept so as to make it a disorderly house are stated in the alternative in sect. 2; that, however, might perhaps leave it doubtful whether the justices might licence for either of those purposes without the others. But in the next section an inscription is directed to be affixed over the door or entrance of a house "kept for any of the said purposes;" and further on it is provided that no such house "kept for any of the said purposes" shall be open before five in the afternoon. These two expressions clearly contemplate a licence for part only of the purposes mentioned, and this seems to me to be the only reasonable construction of the Act. Moreover, the justices are expressly authorised and empowered to grant such licence as they in their discretion shall think proper. Taking with this the alternative expressions in the second and third sections, and applying the severest principles of criticism to the interpretation of the whole statute, it is impossible to conclude but that such a licence as this is within its provisions. It has been observed by counsel for defendant that the house was licensed, and that was all that people outside could know from the inscription; they would, therefore, be liable to seizure by the police if they entered the house whilst dancing was going on, although they reasonably believed that the law was duly observed. But no police could seize without a warrant, and that is a sufficient protection for innocent persons. I am of opinion that there can be no reasonable doubt that the defendant has committed an offence against this Act.

Martin, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I should think that if a licence for music only could not be granted, then this whole licence would be void. But in my judgment the Act says in sect. 2 that magistrates may grant a licence for either of these purposes only. Sect. 3 tends to the same conclusion, containing twice the expression "kept for any of the said purposes." The defendant kept this dancing room without a licence for that purpose.

CROWN CASES RESERVED

Pleading — Indictment — Debtors' Act — Arrest of Judgment—32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 19.

Quære—Whether the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved can entertain a question as to quashing an indictment, reserved at the trial.

The Debtors' Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 19, enacts: That in indictments for offences under that Act it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged in the words of the Act, specifying the offence, "without setting out any debt, act of bankruptcy, trading, adjudication, or any proceedings in, or order, warrant, or document of any court acting under the Bankruptcy Act, 1860."

Held, that an indictment for misdemeanour framed upon sect. 11, sub-sect. 13 of the Act, which enacts, "that if within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition, the trader by any false representation, or other fraud, has obtained any property on credit and has not paid for the same," which merely charged "that a bankruptcy petition was presented against the defendant to the County Court, &c., upon which the defendant was adjudged bankrupt, and that the defendant within four months before the presentation of the said petition did by certain false representations obtain from B. on credit, certain property, and has not paid for the same," was sufficient in arrest of judgment under the above Statute, and also under Peel's Act (7 Geo. 4, c. 64), s. 20.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Quain, J.:—

Thomas Watkinson was convicted of a misdemeanor at the Spring Assizes for the West Riding of the county of York, holden at Leeds on the 21st March 1872. Sentence was postponed and the defendant was admitted to bail, in order that the opinion of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved should be taken on the following case:—

The prisoner was indicted under the Debtors' Act 1869, sect. 11, sub-sect. 13, for that he within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him by certain false representations did obtain property on credit and did not pay for the same.

He was also indicted in other counts of the same indictment, under the same Act, sect. 13, subsect 1, for that he did in incurring certain debts and liabilities obtain credit by false pretences.

The following is a copy of two of the counts of the indictment:

The other counts are similar, differing only in the names of the persons from whom the credit or property was obtained.

West Riding of Yorkshire, to wit,—The jurors for our lady the Queen, upon their oath present that on the 14th April 1871, a bankruptcy petition was presented against Thomas Watkinson, to the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Bradford, and that upon such petition the said Thomas Watkinson was duly adjudged bankrupt by the court aforesaid, upon the 15th April in the year aforesaid, and that the said Thomas Watkinson within four months next before the presentation of the said bankruptcy petition against him, to wit, on the 20th Feb. 1871, did by certain false representations, obtain from one John Bryant on credit certain property, to wit, certain goods to the amount of 70*l.*, and that the said Thomas Watkinson has not paid for the same property, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace, &c.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present that the said Thomas Watkinson, on the 20th Feb. 1871, did in incurring certain debts and liabilities to the said John Bryant obtain credit from the said John Bryant under false pretences, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace, &c.

The counsel for the prisoner moved to quash the indictment on the ground that it was too vague and general. That it would enable the prosecution to prove under it any number of false representations and false pretences. That the counts should have been confined to one false representation or one false pretence. And that the false representations and false pretences, or some of them, ought to have been set out in the indictment, otherwise there would be a difficulty of pleading autrefois convict or acquit to such an indictment.

The counsel for the prosecution relied on the Debtors' Act 1869, s. 19, as justifying the form of the indictment. The learned judge reserved for the opinion of this court the question whether the above indictment ought to have been quashed.

Some discussion took place during the argument as to whether this court could entertain the question as left to them, but as Mr. Justice Quain reported that the real point raised was as to whether the indictment was good, the Court said the objection would be considered as taken in arrest of judgment.

T. Campbell Foster, for the prisoner.—The Debtors' Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, sub-sect. 13, enacts "that if within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against any person, or the commencement of the liquidation, he by any false representation or other fraud has obtained any property on credit, and has not paid for the same, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." Sect. 19 provides that in an indictment for an offence under that Act it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged in the words of the Act specifying the offence, or as near thereto as circumstances admit, without alleging or setting forth any debt, act of bankruptcy, trading, adjudication, or any proceedings in, or order, warrant, or document of any court acting under the Bankruptcy Act 1869." Under this section it is not sufficient to allege in such a general way as is done in this indictment, that the prisoner did "by certain false representations obtain property on credit and has not paid for the same." That is stating the character but not the substance of the offence. The case is similar to that of an indictment for perjury, in which by the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100 s. 20, it is enacted that it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged. In that case it would be insufficient to allege merely "that the defendant committed perjury." In Rex v. Perrott (2 M. & S. 385) Lord Ellenborough said, "every indictment ought to be so framed as to convey to the party charged a certain knowledge of the crime imputed to him." The Legislature have so held, and have recorded their opinion to that effect in the case of perjury in stat. 23 Geo. 2, c. 11 (by which they relieved the party prosecuting from many of the forms theretofore incumbering the prosecution of that charge), when they enacted that it should be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged together with the proper averments to falsify the matter wherein the perjury is assigned. The Legislature, when they so enacted, must have contemplated a form of prosecution in which the lsely as a prefatory allegation was gene- not always used; and we must consider thinking that not a sufficient allegation to he matter without the proper averments." re merely that the defendant did by cer- se representations, obtain credit is simply the offence by its name. In Davy v. 4 Burr. 2471) a declaration for a bribery was held bad in arrest of judgment, which alleged that the defendant "did receive a eward" in the words of the Act 2 Geo. 2, In Reg. v. Bell (12 Cox C. C. 37) a count he Debtors' Act 1869, s. 13, sub-sect. 1, simply that the defendant did obtain rom the prosecutor "by means of fraud an by false pretences," without setting out ns, was quashed, as being too general. The Reg. v. Martin (8 A. & E. 481); Rex v. (4 Camp. 494), were then cited.

r, C.B.—It might be doubtful whether this as power to quash an indictment, and I opinion on that point, but upon the report learned judge we may treat the point as upon a motion in arrest of judgment. If necessary to rely upon authority we have look to the cases of Reg. v. Blake (6 Q. B. d Reg. v. Mulready, which are fatal to the n taken upon this indictment in arrest of it. hether, if the facts have been examined into court, and are properly stated on record, the an order a venire de novo where the wit- nesses accompany the jury and are asked by them to point out the precise spot where they stood and saw what they had stated they saw.

But if the case sent up to the court merely states that the court below "has been informed" that the circumstances specially set forth took place, this court will not act upon such statement.

CASE reserved for the determination of the Court for Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, by Mr. Serjt. Cox, the Deputy-Assistant Judge, at the Middlesex sessions.

The prisoners were indicted at the quarter sessions of the county of Middlesex, held on the 6th May 1872, first, for indecent exposure in a public place, and, secondly, for inciting each other to sodomy.

The case for the prosecution was proved by two policemen, John Tunbridge and Thomas Hunt.

At six o'clock in the evening of the 23rd April, Tunbridge was on duty in St. James's-park. He saw the prisoner Webb (who was well known to him as a frequenter of urinals) lurking about one of the urinals in the park, and going in and out of it repeatedly. His suspicions being roused, he hid himself and watched. Soon afterwards he saw the prisoner Martin go in, upon which he crept up behind the urinal, and, looking through the bars in the back wall, he saw the prisoners in the act of exposing and handling the private parts of each other. He beckoned to Hunt, who came to the same spot, and witnessed the same proceeding on the part of the prisoners.

The defence was that from the position in which the witnesses stood and that in which the prisoners were described as standing, it was impossible for the witnesses, looking through the bars of the urinal, to have seen so far down the persons of the prisoners as to have beheld the filthy act and exposure which they had described.

The prisoner Martin was defended by counsel.

The prisoner Webb was undefended.

After I had summed up the case, and while the jury were deliberating, they put some further questions to the witnesses as to their respective positions, and then the jury stated that it was very difficult to come to a decision without viewing the urinal, and ascertaining by personal inspection if the witnesses could have seen what they had asserted, and they asked permission to view the locus in quo. Martin's counsel had then left the court. No objection to compliance with this request of the jury was made by either of the prisoners or on their behalf.

In the absence of Martin's counsel I requested that his solicitor would accompany the jury on the view, and he also being absent, the view was attended by the solicitor's clerk. The jury inspected the urinal, and there, as I am informed, asked the witnesses to point out the precise spot on which they had stood and the place and the position in which the prisoners were standing, and then the jury placed themselves in the same position, and looked through the bars.

On the return of the jury to the court the counsel for the prisoner Martin had left the court, but his solicitor, or the clerk who had attended the view, or both, were present. No application was made by either of the prisoners, or on behalf of either of them, to be allowed to make any further comments to the jury on the proceedings at the view. I asked the jury if they required any further observations or information from me.

On their answering in the negative I directed them to retire and consider their verdict. After a short consultation they found both the prisoners guilty, and they were sentenced severally to nine months' imprisonment with hard labour.

The counsel for the prisoner Martin has applied for a case for the opinion of this Honourable Court, on the ground that there had been a mistrial, first by reason of a view having been permitted to the jury after the summing up by the judge; and secondly, by reason of the jury having at such view put some questions to the witnesses which were not heard by the judge or by the prisoners, and upon which the undefended prisoner and the counsel for the defended prisoner had not been expressly called upon to comment to the jury.

The question for the opinion of this Honourable Court is, whether, under the circumstances above stated, there has been a mistrial. If it be the opinion of the Court that there has been a mistrial, then that a venire de novo should issue, or such other judgment be given as the court may determine. (Signed)

EDW. WM. COX,
Deputy-Assistant Judge of Middlesex.

No counsel appeared for the prisoners.

Harris for the prosecution.—First, as to the power of the court to authorise the jury to view in a case of misdemeanor. There is no express authority against it, and it has often been done. [BLACKBURN, J.—On the trial of the Fenians at Manchester for shooting the policeman, I sent the jury out to view the police van in order that they might the better estimate the evidence that bore on it. The men were convicted and hanged. No one made any objection. We had no more power, though sitting under a special commission than any other judge presiding at a criminal trial. MELLOR, J.—In that case no witness was allowed to accompany them. Here the policemen who were witnesses accompanied the jury, and pointed out the place.] In Reg. v. Hatchley (1 Sess. Cases, 180), a certiorari to remove an indictment for stopping a watercourse into the Court of Queen's Bench was obtained in order that a view might be had, and the reason assigned was that without the consent of the prosecutors, a view could not be had on any indictment found at the assizes. [BOVILL, C.J.—At the last Surrey Spring Assizes at the trial of an indictment for a nuisance, the judge and jury went from Kingston to Bermondsey to have a view of the premises after the trial had been on for three days. That, no doubt, was a case where the indictment was removed from sessions to the Queen's Bench by certiorari.] There is no statute which deprives the court of any power it may have to direct a view. Secondly, as to the jury receiving evidence during the view, all that was done was that the jury asked the constables to point out the precise spot where they stood. That is not equivalent to putting questions on a trial. [MELLOR, J.—The two constables were the witnesses. The whole value of their testimony may have depended on their giving correct answers as to the place where they stood. BLACKBURN, J.—It was indiscreet to allow the witnesses to accompany the jury, but I am not aware that what was done renders the verdict void in law. BRAMWELL, B.—If the jury by themselves had gone to view the place during luncheon time, there would have been no harm in it, but the difficulty arises from the witnesses going with them, and pointing out the spot. What authority is there for our ordering a venire de novo?] In Reg. v. Yeadon (Leigh and Cave, 81; 9 Cox, C. C. 91), this court held that there had been a mistrial, and awarded a venire de novo. The following authorities were also cited:

2 Tidd's Pract. 922;
Witham v. Lewis, 1 Wils. 48;
Rex v. Fowler, 4 B. & Ald. 273.

The Judges retired to consider the case, and on returning into court,

BOVILL, C. J. said:—The first objection to the conviction was, that the jury were permitted to view the urinal after the summing-up of the learned judge. We are unanimously of opinion that there was no irregularity, and no impropriety in the learned judge allowing the jury to have that view. It must always be discretionary on the part of the juudge to allow a view, and he should grant it with proper caution to the jury not to receive any communications from the witnesses or otherwise whilst having the view. As to the jury, while they were having the view, asking the witnesses to point out the precise spot on which they had stood, and the place and the position in which the prisoners were standing, there appears to have been no examination by the court below into these facts. It is, therefore, impossible to reverse the conviction on the statement in the case which may be mere hearsay information or mere report. If this had been examined into by the court and stated as fact on the case, a very serious question would have arisen as to whether a venire de novo could have been granted, or whether it would have been ground only for an application to the Home Secretary: (Reg. v. Murphy, 6 Moo. P. C. C., N. S., 177.) (a) The case of Graves v. Short (Cro. Eliz. 616) does not appear to have been cited in Reg. v. Murphy. Another serious question would arise as to whether this was a matter open on the record, or within the jurisdiction of this court. On this point Reg. v. Mellor (27 L. J. 121, M. C.; 7 Cox. C. C. 454), has some bearing. As the case now stands we have no alternative but to confirm the conviction, but this will not prevent the prisoner from suing out a writ of error. If the case had come before the court on a writ of error in its present state, the court must have acted as we have done. We cannot send the case down to be restated, as appears from the observations of Popham, C.J. in Groves v. Short. (a)

(a) Reg. v. Murphy. The marginal note is this:—A prisoner having been tried and convicted of a capital felony by a Court of Oyer and Terminer in New South Wales, and sentence of death passed, and the judgment entered upon the record, an application was made to the Supreme Court sitting in banco for a venire de novo, on an affidavit which stated that one of the jury had informed the deponent that, pending the trial, and before the verdict, the jury, having adjourned to an hotel, had access to newspapers which contained reports of the trial as it proceeded with comments thereon. The Supreme Court made the rule absolute, considering that there had been a mistrial, and ordered an entry to be made on the record of the circumstances deposed to; that the judgment on the verdict should be vacated, and a fresh trial had: Held (on appeal to the Privy Council), acting on Reg. v. Bertrand (4 Moo. P. C. C., N. S., 460): First, that the discretionary power of the Supreme Court to grant new trials does not extend to cases of felony, and that a venire de novo cannot be awarded after verdict upon a charge of felony tried upon a good indictment by a competent tribunal; secondly, that if a venire de novo could be awarded upon an application by way of error on appeal, the proceeding in the Supreme Court was defective in form, and not warranted by the suggestion on the record; thirdly, that the order for vacating the judgment, and for a venire de novo must be reversed.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 21 and Dec. 2, 1871; June 8, 1872.

SHEPPARD v. BENNETT.

Heresy—Communion—Real presence — Sacrifice—Adoration of Christ present in the elements—Retractation before suit—Practice—Appeal to the Privy Council on orders to reform pleadings.

In proceedings against the respondent, a clergyman, for heresy in having published certain doctrines with respect to the Holy Communion:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Arches):

(1.) That to maintain a "real, actual, and objective" presence in the Sacrament under the form of bread and wine is a position not contradictory or repugnant to anything in the articles or formularies of the Church.

(2.) That to maintain that the Communion table is an altar of sacrifice, at which the priest appears in a sacerdotal position at the celebration of the Communion, and that at such celebration there is a great sacrifice or offering of Christ by the ministering priest, in which the mediation of Christ ascends from the altar to plead for the sins of men, is not necessarily such a use of the word "sacrifice" as to contravene the 31*st Article of Religion.*

(3.) That to teach "adoration of Christ present in the Sacrament, under the form of bread and wine," is not so clearly heresy as to make a clerk liable to penal proceedings; since the words do not necessarily imply any adoration of the consecrated elements, or of any corporal or natural presence therein.

The respondent, in the second edition of a book, used expressions in contravention of the formularies of the Church. In a third edition, published before suit, the respondent so altered the statements made in the second edition as to free them from heresy. The second and third editions of the book were the subject of the charges against the respondent.

Held, that, without regarding the alterations made as a retractation, it was competent for the court to take the altered language into consideration as an explanation by the accused of the language before used by him, and to accept the later words as a correct expression of the accused's meaning, if such explanation appeared to be made bonâ fide and to be entitled to credit.

Where an appeal is presented to the Privy Council from an order of the court below, directing a reformation of articles of charge or other pleadings, the actual reformation which appears to the judge to be required, should, in future, for convenience sake, be made by him on the face of the order, so that on appeal the very passages omitted may be clearly brought under the notice of the Judicial Committee instead of an order directing, by general reference only, the nature of the alteration required.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Arches in favour of the respondent: (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Eccl. 167.)

The nature of the charges against the respondent are stated in the judgment (post), and appear further in the reports of the suit at earlier stages: (see 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 623, 762; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 145.)

A. J. Stephens, Q.C., Tristram, Archibald, and Shaw for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

Judgment was delivered by the LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal from the final sentence or decree pronounced by the dean of the Arches Court of Canterbury on the 23rd July 1870, and also from two interlocutory orders made by the same judge, in a cause of the office of the judge promoted by Thomas Byard Sheppard, the appellant, against the Rev. William James Early Bennett, vicar of the parish of Frome Selwood, in the diocese of Bath and Wells, the respondent, for having offended against the laws ecclesiastical by having within two years from the date of the institution of the cause, caused to be printed and published certain works in which he is alleged to have advisedly maintained or affirmed doctrines directly contrary or repugnant to the articles and formularies of the united Church of England and Ireland in relation to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, such works being entitled respectively, "Some Results of the Tractarian Movement of 1833," forming one of the essays contained in a volume entitled "The Church and the World," edited by the Rev. Orby Shipley, clerk, printed and published in London in the year 1867: "A Plea for Toleration in the Church of England, in a Letter addressed to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, 2nd edition," printed and published in London in the year 1867; and "A Plea for Toleration in the Church of England, in a Letter to the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., Regius

(a) Groves v. Short was an issue on a writ of formedon, and the jury retired to consider their verdict. One of the jurors, while they were in their room, showed to his fellow jurymen an escrow and writing, pro petentibus quod non fuit dat in evidence, per quod they found for the defendant. Upon this error assigned it was demurred in law. The court resolved that it could not be any error. They also held that if this was cause to avoid a verdict, if it had been so found by examination as they conceive it was not, yet in regard it was not examined nor made parcel of the record it cannot be assigned for error. For Popham said the trial hereof rests only on the examination and it shall not be per pais, as nonage shall only be by inspection to avoid a fine, so this matter should to avoid the verdict. For if so, then every verdict upon such a surmise might be drawn in question and peradventure after the parties be dead, and all the jurors be dead, so as they cannot be examined, which would be a great inconvenience. And therefore they held that such a cause of staying the judgment ought to be always, if it be upon verdict at the Nisi Prius, upon the postea returned; and if it be upon verdict in banco, it ought to be made parcel of the record, otherwise the party shall not take advantage of staying the judgment or of assigning for error.

Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, 3rd edition," printed and published in London in the year 1868. The cause was instituted in the Arches Court of Canterbury by virtue of letters of request of the late Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, in accordance with the provisions of the Act 3rd and 4th of the Queen, c. 86: (see 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 623, where the letters of request are set out.) The respondent was duly cited on the 26th of July 1869. No appearance was given to the citation, and in default of appearance articles were filed in accordance with the practice of the court. On the 30th Oct. 1869 the judge, having previously heard counsel on behalf of the appellant, directed the articles to be reformed by omitting such parts thereof as charge the respondent with contravening the 29th Article of Religion, entitled "Of the wicked which eat not the body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper." From such decree or order, a petition of appeal was presented, with the permission of the judge, and the appeal came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the 26th March 1870, when the Lords of the Committee, having heard counsel on behalf of the appellant, agreed to report to her Majesty their opinion against the appeal, and that the decree or order appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the cause remitted, with all its incidents, to the judge of the court from which the same was appealed: (see 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 145.) An Order in Council, confirming the report of the Judicial Committee, was afterwards made. The cause was accordingly remitted to the Arches Court of Canterbury, and on the 3rd June 1870, in default of appearance on the part of the respondent, the judge of the court, having heard counsel on behalf of the appellant, himself reformed the articles, and admitted the same as so reformed, notwithstanding that the counsel for the promoter objected to the reformation of the articles so made by the judge as being at variance with and exceeding the reformation directed by the order of the 30th Oct. 1869. On the 16th June 1870 the cause came on for hearing, and an application was then made by counsel that the passages in the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 32nd articles, which had been struck out by the judge in his reformation of the articles, on the 3rd June, might be reinstated. The judge, however, made no further order thereon, and the hearing of the cause was continued. On the 23rd July 1870 the judge, by his interlocutory decree, having the force and effect of a definitive sentence in writing, pronounced that the proctor for the appellant had failed in sufficiently proving the articles, and dismissed the respondent from the suit: (see 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 399.) The present appeal is from so much of the interlocutory decree or order of the 3rd June 1870 as in effect directs the passages in the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 32nd articles to be struck out; also from the interlocutory decree or order of the 16th June 1870, whereby, in effect, the judge declined to allow such passages to be reinstated, and from the final sentence or decree of the 23rd July 1870. The respondent has not appeared upon the hearing of the appeal, and the court has not had that assistance from the argument of counsel in his behalf which is specially desirable in cases like the present, where the Committee are called upon to advise her Majesty on matters of grave importance as a tribunal of ultimate appeal. The counsel for the appellant first opened the appeal from the interlocutory order of the judge of the 3rd June, 1870, whereby he adhered to the reformation that he had made in the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 32nd articles of charge. With regard to the reformation of the articles, the course originally taken seems to be sanctioned by usage; but it appears to their Lordships to be a course attended with considerable inconvenience, and one which might lead to great delay, if not to a miscarriage. The original order of the Arches Court directed the articles of charge to be reformed, by omitting all such parts thereof as charged the respondent with contravening the 29th Article of Religion, ad this order was affirmed on appeal, on the recommendation of this Committee. The form of the order leaves open to further determination by the court what parts of the articles of charge do, in effect, charge the respondent with contravening the 29th Article of Religion, and thus opens the door to further discussion and (as in this case) to a further appeal. In the meantime the judge himself strikes out such parts of the articles of charge as he conceives to be within the previous order of the court, and then proceeds to hear the cause with the record so altered. If he should have erroneously struck out parts not affected by the order, the attention of the accused, in his answer or evidence, will not have been called to the parts struck out, for he would be entitled to consider them as no longer forming part of the charge; but if the promoter, on appeal, should succeed in restoring the passages in question, it would obviously become necesary to allow the respondent an opportunity of meeting the restored charges. In the present case their Lordships have thought it best to allow the appellant to conduct his argument as, if the passages which he avers should not have been struck out still remained part of the record, and to found any argument upon such passages as he might be advised, provided the argument did not seek to establish a contravention by the respondent of the 29th Article of Religion. But their Lordships think it right to observe that it would be proper, in future, that before any appeal be presented to Her Majesty in Council, in respect of an order directing the reformation of articles of charge or other pleadings, the actual reformation which appears to the judge to be required, should be made by him on the face of the order, so that on appeal the very passages omitted should be clearly brought under the judgment of this committee, instead of an order directing, by general reference, the nature of the alteration required. On proceeding to the consideration of the appeal from the final decree of the Court of Arches, there is one point which was prominently brought forward in the opening of the case by the counsel for the appellant, which it appears to their Lordships may be separately disposed of. The articles of charge set forth several passages from the second and third editions of a work published by the respondent, called "A Plea for Toleration in the Church of England, in a letter to the Rev. E. B. Pusey." Now, the second edition of this work was published in 1867, and the third edition in 1868. The third edition contains important corrections of expressions in the second edition, which expressions form part of the charge against the respondent. The original expressions and their correction are fairly stated and set forth by the appellant in the seventh article of charge. The learned judge, in the court below (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408), has stated that he has no doubt that the expressions originally used by the respondent, viz., "the real actual and visible presence of the Lord upon the altars of our churches," and again, "Who myself adore and teach the people to adore the consecrated elements, believing Christ to be in them—believing that under their veil is the sacred body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ,"—"contravened the plain and clear intent of the formularies of the church." And the learned judge has also set forth the alteration of these statements made in the third edition of the respondent's work, and on the passages so altered has found that the respondent has not been guilty of a contravention of the Articles as alleged by the promoter. Mr. Bennett's own words, in adopting the altered words, are as follows:—"My meaning and that which passed through my mind in writing the original passages was precisely the same as that which is now conveyed in the words substituted, but as the original words were liable to a different construction from that in which I used them, I therefore most willingly in this edition adopt another formula to express my meaning." The learned judge has (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408) regretted that these alterations made by Mr. Bennett in his third edition are unaccompanied by any expression of regret or self-reproach on the respondent's part for the mischief which his crude and rash expressions have caused. Their Lordships feel obliged to adopt the censure of the learned judge on this point. Upon this state of facts the learned counsel urged that there had been no retractation of the original user, and that, in default of actual retractation, the learned judge should have condemned the respondent in respect of the words used by him in the second edition of his work, though varied by the substituted words in the third edition, and he cited several authorities for the purpose of supporting this argument. But, without regarding the respondent's language as a retractation, their lordships think that it is competent for them to take into consideration any explanation that an accused person may give of the language used by him, and to determine whether such explanation is made bonâ fide and is entitled to credit. They attach great importance to the fact that the third edition was published before suit, and they think that they may accept his latter words as the more correct expression of the respondent's meaning. In proceeding to consider the substance of the charges against the respondent, their Lordships think it desirable to recall to mind the principles on which former decisions in similar cases have proceeded. In the cases of Williams and Wilson (2 Moo. P. C. N.S. 423; 9 L. T. Rep. N.S. 787), their Lordships laid down as follows: "These prosecutions are in the nature of criminal proceedings, and it is necessary that there should be precision and distinctness in the accusation. The articles of charge must distinctly state the opinions which the clerk has advisedly maintained, and set forth the passages in which those opinions are stated; and further, the articles must specify the doctrines of the Church which such opinions or teaching of the clerk are alleged to contravene, and the particular Articles of Religion or portions of the formularies which contained such doctrines. The accuser is, for the purpose of the charge, confined to the passages which are included and set out in the articles as the matter of the accusation; but it is competent to the accused party to explain from the rest of his work the sense or meaning of any passage or word that is challenged by the accuser." So in the judgment in the Gorham case (Moo. Spec. Rep. 470). "The question which we have to decide is not whether the opinions are theologically sound or unsound, not whether upon some of the doctrines comprised in these opinions, other opinions opposite to them may or may not be held with equal or even greater reason by other learned and pious ministers of the Church; but whether these opinions now under our consideration are contrary or repugnant to the doctrines which the Church of England, by its Articles, formularies, and rubrics, requires to be held by its ministers, so that upon the ground of those opinions the appellant can lawfully be excluded from his benefice." . . . . "This question must be decided by the Articles and the Liturgy; and we must apply to the construction of those books the same rules which have been long established, and are by law applicable to the construction of all written instruments. We must endeavour to attain for ourselves the true meaning of the language employed, assisted only by the consideration of such external or historical facts as we may find necessary to enable us to understand the subject-matter to which the instruments relate, and the meaning of the words employed." . . . . "There were different doctrines or opinions prevailing or under discussion at the times when the Articles and Liturgy were framed, and ultimately made part of the law; but we are not to be in any way influenced by the particular opinions of the eminent men who propounded or discussed them, or by the authorities by which ther may be supposed to have been influenced, or by any supposed tendency to give preponderance to Calvinistic or Arminian doctrines. The Articles and Liturgy, as we now have them, must be considered as the final result of the discussion which took place; not the representation of the opinions of any particular men, Calvinistic, Arminian, or any other; but the conclusion which we must presume to have been deduced from a due consideration of all the circumstances of the case, including both the sources from which the declared doctrine was derived, and the erroneous opinions which were to be corrected." . . . . "This court has no jurisdiction or authority to settle matters of faith, or to determine what ought in any case to be the doctrine of the Church of England. Its duty extends only to the consideration of that which is by law established to be the doctrine of the Church of England upon the true and legal construction of the Articles and formularies." Lord Stowell had long before said, in the case of King's Proctor v. Stone (1 Consist. 428), "If any Article is really a subject of dubious interpretation, it would be highly improper for the court to fix on one meaning and prosecute all those who hold a contrary opinion regarding its interpretation. It is a very different thing where the authority of the Articles is totally eluded, and the party deliberately declares the intention of teaching doctrines contrary to them." To the principles thus laid down their Lordships will adhere in the present case. The attention of the court has been directed to the successive revisions of the Book of Common Prayer, and to alterations or omissions which have been made in it at different times. Changes by which words or passages inculcating particular doctrines, or assuming a belief in them, have been struck out, are most material as evidence that the Church has deliberately ceased to affirm those doctrines in her public services. At the same time it is material to observe that the necessary effect of such changes, when they stand alone, is that it ceases to be unlawful to contradict such doctrines, and not that it becomes unlawful to maintain them. In the public or common prayers and devotional offices of the Church all her members are expected and entitled to join; it is necessary, therefore, that such forms of worship as are prescribed by authority for general use should embody those beliefs only which are assumed to be generally held by members of the Church. In the case of Westerton v. Liddell (and again in Martin v. Mackonochie) their Lordships say, "In the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be allowed:" (19 L.T. Rep. N. S. 505.) If the minister be allowed to introduce at his own will variations in the rites and ceremonies that seem to him to interpret the doctrine of the service in a particular direction, the service ceases to be what it was meant to be, common ground on which all Church people may meet, though they differ about some doctrines. But the Church of England has wisely left a certain latitude of opinion in matters of belief, and has not insisted on a rigorous uniformity of thought which might reduce her communion to a narrow compass. Dealing only with the third edition of the respondent's work, and having regard to their former decision, that the charge of contradicting the 29th Article of Religion as to reception by the wicked should be struck out, their Lordships may consider the remaining charges against the respondent under three heads—first, as to the presence of Christ in the Holy Communion; secondly, as to sacrifice in the Holy Communion; thirdly, as to adoration of Christ present in the Holy Communion. The respondent is charged with maintaining under these three heads the following propositions: First, that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is an actual presence of the true body and blood of our Lord in the consecrated bread and wine, by virtue of and upon the consecration, without or external to the communicant, and irrespective of the faith and worthiness of the communicant, and separately from the act of reception by the communicant; and it was contended by counsel under this head that the true body of Christ meant the natural body; secondly, that the Communion Table is an altar of sacrifice, at which the priest appears in a sacerdotal position at the celebration of the Holy Communion, and that at such celebration there is a great sacrifice or offering of our Lord by the ministering priest, in which the mediation of our Lord ascends from the altar to plead for the sins of men; thirdly, that adoration is due to Christ present upon the altars or communion tables of the churches, in the Sacrament, under the form of bread and wine, on the ground that under their veil is the body and blood of our Lord. The several positions so maintained are averred, each and all, to be repugnant to the doctrines of our Church, as set forth in the Articles and formularies in that behalf specially alleged. Their Lordships are bound to consider, in the first place, what has been affirmed and what has been denied, in reference to the doctrine to which these three statements relate. The 4th Article of Religion affirms, first, that Christ did truly rise from death and took again His body, with flesh and bones and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith He ascended into Heaven; and there sitteth until He return to judge all men at the Last Day. In the 28th Article of Religion it is affirmed, first, "The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves, one to another, but rather is a Sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death: insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ;" secondly, "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of bread and wine) in the Supper of the Lord cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions;" thirdly, "The Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after an heavenly and spiritual manner;" fourthly, "The mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper, is faith;" fifthly, "The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." By the 29th Article of Religion it is affirmed, sixthly, "The wicked and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Augustine saith) the Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ; but rather to their condemnation do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing." By the 31st, it is affirmed, seventhly, "The offering of Christ once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone;" and eighthly, "The sacrifices of masses, in the which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead to have remission of pain or guilt were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits." 9. In the Catechism it is stated that the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper." Their Lordships proceed, with these passages before them, to examine the charges made against the respondent.

I. The first relates to the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Holy Communion. The Church of England, in the passages just cited, holds and teaches affirmatively that in the Lord's Supper the body and blood of Christ are given to, taken, and received by the faithful communicant. She implies, therefore, to that extent, a presence of Christ in the ordinance to the soul of the worthy recipient. As to the mode of the presence, she affirms nothing, except that the body of Christ is "given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after an heavenly and spiritual manner," and that "the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten is faith." Any other presence than this—any presence which is not a presence to the soul of the faithful receiver—the Church does not by her Articles and formularies affirm or require her ministers to accept. This cannot be stated too plainly. The question is, however, not what the Articles and formularies affirm, but what they exclude. The respondent maintains a presence which is (to use his own expression) "real, actual, objective," a presence in the sacrament, a presence upon the altar, under the form of bread and wine. He does not appear to have used the expression "in the consecrated elements" in his third edition; this is one of the points on which the language of the second edition was altered. And the question raised by the appeal is, whether his position is contradictory or repugnant to anything in the Articles or formularies, so as to be properly made the ground of a criminal charge. Setting aside the declaration at the end of the Communion office, which will be presently considered, we find nothing in the Articles and formularies to which the respondent's position is contradictory or repugnant. The statement in the 28th Article of Religion that the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Lord's Supper, only after a heavenly and spiritual manner, excludes undoubtedly any manner of giving, taking, or receiving which is not heavenly or spiritual. The assertion of a "real, actual, objective" presence, introduces, indeed, terms not found in the Articles or formularies; but it does not appear to affirm, expressly or by necessary implication, a presence other than spiritual, nor to be necessarily contradictory to the 28th Article of Religion. The 29th Article of Religion, which is entitled "of the wicked which eat not the body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper," and which affirms that the wicked and such as be void of a lively faith "are in no wise partakers of Christ," may suggest, indeed, an inference unfavourable to the respondent's statements, but cannot be said to be plainly contradictory of them or necessarily to exclude them. The two propositions, that the faithful receive Christ in the Lord's Supper, and that the wicked are in no wise partakers of Christ, when taken together, do not appear to be contradicted by the statement that there is a real, actual, objective presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament after a heavenly and spiritual manner. The "Declaration of Kneeling" should now be considered. It is as follows: Whereas, it is ordained in this office for the administration of the Lord's Supper, that the communicants should receive the same kneeling (which order is well meant for the signification of our humble and grateful acknowledgment of the benefits of Christ therein given to all worthy receivers, and for the avoiding of such profanation and disorder in the Holy Communion as might otherwise ensue), yet, lest the same kneeling should by any persons, either out of ignorance or infirmity, or out of malice and obstinacy, be misconstrued and depraved, it is hereby declared, that thereby no adoration is intended, or ought to be done either unto the sacramental bread or wine there bodily received, or unto any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood, for the sacramental bread and wine remain still in their very natural substances, and therefore, may not be adored (for that were idolatry, to be abhorred of all faithful Christians), and the natural body and blood of our Saviour Christ are in heaven, and not here; it being against the truth of Christ's natural body to be at one time in more places than one." This declaration originally appeared in the second Prayer Book of Edward VI., A.D. 1552, in which book the position of kneeling was positively enjoined upon those who received the Sacrament. It was issued by the king, and was ordered by the council to be appended to the Prayer Book, but after the book had received the sanction of Parliament, so that it was not of statutory authority. From the Prayer Book of Elizabeth (1559) the declaration was omitted. In 1662 it was inserted in the present Prayer Book, and became of equal authority with the rest of the Prayer Book. The form of the declaration was somewhat altered; the words "Unto any real and essential presence there being of Christ's natural flesh and blood" were altered to "unto any corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood," and the words "true natural body" became "natural body." It was urged for the appellant that, since the Church recognises only one body of Christ, the natural and now glorified body which is spoken of in the 4th Article of Religion, and since the declaration asserts that this body is "in heaven and not here," the only presence in the Sacrament which can be held consistently with the declaration is a presence to the soul of the communicant. It was insisted that the word "natural" applied to the body of Christ can convey no additional meaning, unless it be used to distinguish the true body of Christ, which is His natural body, from the Church, which is His body in a mystical or figurative sense; and that the expression "corporal presence" cannot mean a presence in the manner or under the conditions in and under which material bodies are present or exist in space; that it must mean or include any presence whatever in the elements, as contra-distinguished from a presence to the spiritual apprehension of the receiver. There can be no question, it was argued, as to the mode or manner of the presence; for no mode or manner of presence is conceivable which would reconcile the proposition that the true body of Christ is in the elements, with the proposition that the natural body is in heaven and not here. Their Lordships are of opinion that these inferences, whether probable or not, are by no means of that plain and certain character which the conclusion they are asked to draw from them requires. The matters to which they relate are confessedly not comprehensible, or very imperfectly comprehensible, by the human understanding; the province of reasoning as applied to them is therefore very limited; and the terms employed have not, and cannot have, that precision of meaning which the character of the argument demands. Concerning the mode of reception of the body and blood of Christ by the faithful communicant, the Church affirms nothing more than that it is heavenly and spiritual, and that the mean whereby we receive is faith. Nor can their Lordships accede to the argument that the words "corporal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood" must be understood as the appellant understands them, and the phrase "corporal presence" regarded merely as an equivalent for the different expression in lieu of which it was substituted. On the contrary, it is at the least probable that, as the declaration itself was introduced in order to facilitate scruples in one quarter, the alteration made in it was designed to remove objections entertained against it in another. Their Lordships could not advise the condemnation of a clergyman for maintaining that the use in 1662 of the word "corporal" instead of the words "real and essential" in the declaration of kneeling was an intentional substitution, implying that there may be a real or essential presence as distinguished from a corporal presence. The respondent has nowhere alleged in terms a corporal presence of the natural body of Christ in the elements; he has never affirmed that the body of Christ is present in a "corporal" or "natural" manner. On the contrary, he has denied this, and he speaks of the presence in which he believes as "spiritual," "supernatural," "sacramental," "mystical," "ineffable."

II. The next charge against the respondent is, that he has maintained that the Communion Table is an altar of sacrifice, at which the priest appears in a sacerdotal position at the celebration of the Holy Communion, and that at such celebration there is a great sacrifice or offering of our Lord by the ministering priest, in which the mediation of our Lord ascends from the altar to plead for the sins of men. The Church of England does not by her Articles or formularies teach or affirm the doctrine maintained by the respondent. That she has deliberately ceased to do so would clearly appear from a comparison of the present Communion Office with that in King Edward's First Book, and of this again with the canon of the mass in the Sarum missal. This subject was fully discussed before their Lordships in Westerton v. Liddell, when it was decided that the "change in the view taken of the sacrament naturally called for a corresponding change in the altar. It was no longer to be an altar of sacrifice, but merely a table at which the communicants were to partake of the Lord's Supper." The 31st Article of Religion, after laying down the proposition (which is adopted also, in words nearly the same, in the Prayer of Consecration), that "the offering of Christ once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual," and that "there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone," proceeds, on the strength of these propositions, to say that "the sacrifices of masses, in the which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits." It is not lawful for a clergyman to contradict expressly or by inference, either the proposition which forms the first part of this Article, or any proposition plainly deducible from the condemnation of propitiatory masses which forms the second part of it, and is stated as a corollary to the first. It is not lawful for a clergyman to teach that the sacrifice or offering of Christ upon the cross, or the redemption, propitiation, or satisfaction wrought by it, is or can be repeated in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper; nor that in that ordinance there is or can be any sacrifice or offering of Christ which is efficacious in the sense in which Christ's death is efficacious, to procure the remission of the guilt or punishment of sins. It is well known, however, that by many divines of eminence, the word sacrifice has been applied to the Lord's Supper in the sense not of a true propitiatory or atoning sacrifice, effectual as a satisfaction for sin, but of a rite which calls to remembrarce and represents before God that one true sacrifice. To take one example, Bishop Bull says:—"In the Eucharist then Christ is offered, not hypostatically, as the Trent Fathers have determined, for so he was but once offered, but commemoratively only; and this commemoration is made to God the Father, and is not a bare remembering or putting ourselves in mind of Him. For every Sacrifice is directed to God, and the oblation therein made, whatsoever it be, hath Him for its object, and not man. In the Holy Eucharist, therefore, we set before God the bread and wine, 'as figures or images of the precious blood of Christ shed for us, and of his precious body' (they are the very words of the Clementine Liturgy), and plead to God the merit of his Son's sacrifice once offered on the Cross for us sinners, and in this sacrament represented, beseeching Him for the sake thereof to bestow His heavenly blessings on us:" (Bull's Works, vol. ii., p. 22.) The distinction between an act by which a satisfaction for sin is made, and a devotional rite by which the satisfaction so made is represented and pleaded before God, is clear, though it is liable to be obscured, not only in the apprehension of the ignorant, but by the tendency of theologians to exalt the importance of the rite till the distinction itself well nigh disappears. To apply the word sacrifice in the sense in which Bishop Bull has used it to the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, though it may be liable to abuse and misapprehension, does not appear to be a contravention of any proposition legitimately deducible from the 31st Article. It is not clear to their Lordships that the respondent has so used the word "sacrifice" as to contradict the language of the Articles.

III. Their Lordships now proceed to the 3rd charge, which relates to the adoration of Christ present in the sacrament. The 20th and 27th articles of charge contain the false doctrines alleged to be held by Mr. Bennett. The 20th charges that he affirms the doctrine that adoration or worship is due to the consecrated bread and wine. The 27th, that he affirms that adoration is due to Christ present upon the altars of our churches in the Sacrament of the Holy Communion, under the form of bread and wine, on the ground that under their veil is the sacred body and blood of our Lord (the passages referred to for proof are set out in the 7th article.) The 31st article charges that these doctrines are contrary to the 28th Article of Religion, and the declaration on kneeling.

The passages relied on as the ground of these charges are the following: "The reader will observe that in the two first editions, at page 3, the words were: 'The real, actual, and visible presence of our Lord upon the altars of our churches.' In the present edition he will find at page 2 the following words substituted: 'The real and actual presence of our Lord under the form of bread and wine upon the altars of our churches.' He will also observe that, at page 14 in the former editions, that the words were, 'Who myself adore and teach the people to adore the consecrated elements, believing Christ to be in them—believing that under their veil is the sacred body and blood of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' He will now find the following words substituted: 'Who myself adore and teach the people to adore Christ present in the sacrament, under the form of bread and wine, believing that under their veil is the sacred body and blood of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' The three great doctrines on which the Catholic Church has to take her stand are these:—I. The real objective presence of our blessed Lord in the Eucharist; II. 'The sacrifice offered by the priest;' and III. 'The adoration due to the presence of our blessed Lord therein. Well, I do not know what others of my brethren in the priesthood may think—I do not wish to compromise them by anything I say or do—but seeing that I am one of those who burn lighted candles at the altar in the daytime; who use incense at the holy sacrifice; who use the Eucharistic vestments; who elevate the blessed sacrament; who myself adore, and teach the people to adore, Christ present in the sacrament, under the form of bread and wine; believing that under their veil is the sacred body and blood of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—seeing all this, it may be conceived that I cannot rest very much at ease under the imputations above recited." Their Lordships agree with the learned judge of the court below, that the doctrine charged in the 20th article, namely, that adoration is due to the consecrated elements, is contrary to law, and must be condemned. But they have admitted, as the learned judge has done, Mr. Bennett's explanation of that language, and therefore they are not called upon to condemn Mr. Bennett under the 20th article. The 27th article of charge, therefore, alone remains for decision; it is as follows: That in or by the passages lettered N, O, and S, hereinbefore set forth in the 7th preceding article, you have maintained or affirmed and promulgated the doctrine that adoration is due to Christ, present upon the altars (thereby referring to the Communion Tables) of the churches of the said united Church of England and Ireland in the Sacrament of the Holy Communion under the form of bread and wine, on the ground that under their veil is the sacred body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." Their Lordships have now to consider whether or not the passages from the respondent's writings above set forth are necessarily repugnant to or contradictory of the 28th Article of Religion, or of the declaration of kneeling, as alleged in the 31st article of charge. The declaration of kneeling states that, by the direction that the communicants shall receive the consecrated elements kneeling, "no adoration is intended or ought to be done either to the sacramental bread and wine there bodily received, or to any corporeal presence of Christ's natural flesh and blood." According to this declaration, neither the elements nor any corporal presence of Christ therein ought to be adored. The 28th article lays down that "the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." In the 25th article it had been affirmed that "the sacraments were not ordained by Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about, but that we should duly use them." It was laid down in Martin v. Mackonochie that such acts as the elevation of the cup and paten, and kneeling and prostration of the minister before them, were unlawful, because they were not prescribed in the Rubric of the Communion Office, and because acts not prescribed were to be taken as forbidden. Their Lordships in that judgment adopted the words of the committee in Westerton v. Liddell; "for the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be permitted." It follows, then, that the Church of England has forbidden all acts of adoration to the sacrament, understanding by that the consecrated elements. She has been careful to exclude any act of adoration on the part of the minister at or after the consecration of the elements and to explain the posture of kneeling prescribed by the Rubric. If the charge against Mr. Bennett were that he had performed an outward act of adoration on any occasion in the service, the principles laid down in Martin v. Mackonochie would apply to this case. Such an act could not be done except in the service, because the sacrament may not be "reserved." But even if the respondent's words are a confession of an unlawful act, it is questionable whether such a confession would amount to false doctrine. And it is also fair to remember, in the respondent's favour, that the judgment in the case of Martin v. Mackonochie, which established the unlawfulness of introducing acts of adoration, was not delivered until 23rd Dec. 1868, after the publication of the words that are now impugned. Some of their Lordships have doubted whether the word "adore," though it seems to point rather to acts of worship, such as are forbidden by the 28th Article, may not be construed to refer to mental adoration, or prayers addressed to Christ present spiritually in the sacrament, which does not necessarily imply any adoration of the consecrated elements or of any corporal or natural presence therein. Upon the whole, their Lordships, not without doubts and divisions of opinions, have come to the conclusion that this charge is not so clearly made out as the rules which govern penal proceedings require. Mr. Bennett is entitled to the benefit of any doubt that may exist. His language has been rash, but as it appears to the majority of their Lordships that his words can be construed so as not to be plainly repugnant to the two passages articled against them, their Lordships will give him the benefit of the doubt that has been raised. Their Lordships having arrived at the conclusion that they must advise Her Majesty that the appeal must be dismissed, feel bound to add that there is much in the judgment of the learned judge in the court below with which they are unable to concur. The learned judge has endeavoured to settle by a mass of authorities what is the doctrine of the Church of England on the subject of the Holy Communion. It is not the part of the Court of Arches nor of this committee to usurp the functions of a synod or council. Happily their duties are much more circumscribed, namely, to ascertain whether certain statements are so far repugnant to, or contradictory of, the language of the Articles and formularies, construed in their plain meaning, that they should receive judicial condemnation. Their Lordships will not attempt to examine in detail the catena of authorities which the judge of the Arches has brought together, nor that of the learned counsel who appeared for the appellant. No mode of argument is more fallacious on a subject so abstruse and of so many aspects; short extracts, even where candidly made, as in this case, give no fair impression of an author's mind. Thus Dean Jackson is quoted in the judgment; but the quotation omits the preceding sentence (Works, vol. 10, p. 41), which gives to the whole passage a meaning difficult to reconcile with the purpose for which it is used; while the opinion of this eminent divine would have been more correctly represented by referring also to the following remarkable passage in a previous chapter of his work: "What need then is there of His bodily presence in the sacrament, or of any other presence than the influence or emission of virtue from His heavenly sanctuary into our souls? He has left us the consecrated elements of bread and wine, to be unto us more that the hem of his garment. If we do but touch and taste them with the same faith by which this woman touched the hem of His garment, our same faith shall make us whole" (Works, vol. 9, p. 611). Several of those who are cited by the learned judge are living persons of greater or less note, who cannot rank as authorities for the history of the great controversy. One of the authorities is so questionable, that it requires a passing examination. The learned judge, after quoting the 28th Article of Religion, introduces as "a contemporanea expositio, from the compiler of this article, which cannot, I think, be gainsaid," a letter from Bishop Gheast to Cecil, under the date 1556 (probably a mistake for 1566) explaining the sense which he put upon the word "only" in the 28th Article. Gheast does not say that he was the "compiler" of the 28th Article, all but one sentence of which had been in substance in the Articles of 1552; and the context shows that he used the word "Article" only of this sentence. which he says, was ('of mine own penning." Upon the faith of this letter, genuine or not, avowedly written for a personal purpose ("for mine own purgation") is founded an exposition of the words "only after a heavenly and spiritual manner," as meaning that though a man "took Christ's body in his hand, received it with his mouth, and that corporally, naturally, really, substantially, and carnally . . . . yet did he not for all that see it, feel it, smell it, nor taste it." Upon this alleged exposition their Lordships feel themselves free to observe that the words "only after a heavenly and spiritual manner," do not appear to contain or involve the words "corporally, naturally, and carnally," but to exclude them; and that it is the Article, and not the questionable comments of a doubtful letter written for personal motives, which is binding on the clergy and on this court. Their Lordships recall once more, in acknowledging the learning that has been brought to bear upon this case, the principle which this Committee has long since laid down. "There were different doctrines or opinions prevailing or under discussion at the times when the Articles and Liturgy were framed, and ultimately made part of the law; but we are not to be in any way influenced by the particular opinions of the eminent men who propounded or discussed them, or by the authorities by which they may be supposed to have been influenced, or by any supposed tendency to give preponderance to Calvinistic or Arminian doctrines. The Articles and Liturgy, as we now have them, must be considered as the final result of the discussion which took place; not the representation of the opinions of any particular men, Calvinistic, Arminian, or any other; but the conclusion which we must presume to have been deduced from a due consideration of all the circumstances of the case, including both the sources from which the declared doctrine was derived, and the erroneous opinions which were to be corrected." Citations from established authors may be of use to show that "the liberty which was left by the Articles and formularies has been actually enjoyed and exercised by the members and ministers of the Church of England": (See the judgment of the Privy Council in the Gorham case). But, to say the least, very few of the quotations in the judgment exhibit the same freedom of language as do the extracts from Mr. Bennett. And after every authority had been examined, there would still remain the question that is before this Committee, whether the license or liberty is really allowed by the Articles and formularies—whether anything has been said by the respondent which plainly contradicts them. If the respondent had made statements contradicting the Articles or formularies, the citation of great names would not have protected him; if he has not done so, he is safe without their protection. There is one passage in the judgment which seems especially to call for comment:—"With respect to the second and corrected edition of his pamphlet, and the other work for which he is articled, I say that the objective, actual, and real presence, or the spiritual, real presence, a presence external to the act of the communicant, appears to me to be the doctrine which the formularies of our Church, duly considered and construed so as to be harmonious, intended to maintain. But I do not lay down this as a position of law, nor do I say that what is called the Receptionist Doctrine is inadmissible; nor do I pronounce on any other teaching with respect to the mode of presence. I mean to do no such thing by this judgment. I mean by it to pronounce only that to describe the mode of presence as objective, real, actual, and spiritual, is certainly not contrary to the law." Their Lordships regret that the learned judge should have put forth this extra-judicial statement, in which he adopts words that are not used in the Articles or formularies as expressing their doctrine. The word "receptionist" is as foreign to the Articles as the word "objective." Their Lordships have already said that any presence which is not a presence to the soul of the faithful receiver, the Church does not by her Articles and formularies affirm. They need not ask whether there is really any doubt as to the admissibility of the doctrine of Hooker and Waterland, who appear to be described as "Receptionists," in the Church of which they have been two of the greatest ornaments. Their Lordships have not arrived at their decision without great anxiety and occasional doubt. The subject is one which has always moved the deepest feelings of religious men, and will continue to do so. There might have been expected from a theologian dealing with this subject, if not a charitable regard for the feelings of others, at least a careful preparation and an exactness in the use of terms. The very divine whose opinions Mr. Bennett seems to have sought to represent, was obliged himself to point out how erroneous was his statement of those opinions. The respondent corrected the manifest error without an expression of regret at the pain he may have caused to many by his careless language. Even in the maturer form, his words are rash and ill-judged, and are perilously near a violation of the law. But the Committee have not allowed any feeling of disapproval to interfere with the real duty before them, to decide whether the language of the respondent was so plainly repugnant to the Articles and formularies as to call for judicial condemnation; and as these proceedings are highly penal, to construe in his favour every reasonable doubt. There will be no order as to costs, as the respondent has not appeared.

Judgment affirmed

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by J. SHORT and M. W. MCKELLAR, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

SECOND COURT.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF MIDDLESEX.

THE HOUSELESS POOR SOCIETY (appts.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS, &c., OF THE PARISH OF ST. LUKE, MIDDLESEX (resps.).

Valuation list — Omission of notice—Appeal to quarter sessions—Application to guardians — 48 Geo. 3, c. xcvii—Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67).

The appellants were assessed in the valuation list of the respondents' parish in pursuance of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, but received no notice from the overseers, as required by sect. 9. They appealed, directly to quarter sessions, against a poor rate upon the amount of this assessment, expressly made under a local Act of 1808, governing the respondents' parish, in which they were situated, but declared by the overseers in pursuance of sect. 73 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869; and the quarter sessions quashed the rate.

By the said local Act persons aggrieved by any rate or other matter done in pursuance of that Act must apply to the guardians of the parish before appealing to quarter sessions.

By the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, sect. 77, so much of any Acts, whether public or local and personal, as authorises any valuation of hereditaments to be made for the purposes of any rate or tax in respect of which the valuation list is by this Act made conclusive, are thereby repealed.

Held, upon a rule for certiorari, that the quarter sessions had no jurisdiction under the circumstances.

Poland had, on the 25th April, at the instance of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Luke, Middlesex, obtained a rule nisi calling upon the keepers of the peace and justices in and for the county of Middlesex to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue, directed to them, to remove into this court all and singular orders made by them or some of them upon a certain appeal wherein the Houseless Poor Society were appellants, and the Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor, and the Vestrymen of the parish of St. Luke, in the said county, were respondents, touching a certain rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor of the said parish on the 25th April 1871.

It appeared from the affidavit of the respondents' attorney, upon which the rule was moved, that since the 24th June 1869 the respondents' parish has formed part of the Metropolitan Union of Holborn. The valuation list for the said parish was made by the overseers of the poor on the 31st May 1870, under and in pursuance of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), and the said list was finally approved of by the assessment committee of the said union on the 7th Jan. 1871. In the list so finally approved the property of the appellants is charged, assessed, and valued as follows:

Signed this 31st May, 1870. JAMES CLITHEROW, HENRY HARRIS, } Overseers of the Poor of the Parish aforesaid.

This list came into force in the said parish on the 6th April 1871.

On the 25th April 1871 the vestrymen of the said parish duly made a rate for the relief, maintenance, lodging, and employment of the poor of the said parish, and for other purposes chargeable thereon, as appears at the commencement of the said rate, which is as follows:

St. Luke, Middlesex.

A rate or assessment of 13d. in the pound made by the vestrymen, under the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, pursuant to the provisions of the before-recited Act, and of an Act of Parliament passed in 48 Geo. 3, intituled "An Act for making more effectual provision for maintaining, regulating, and employing the poor of the parish of St. Luke in the county of Middlesex, for the relief, maintenance, lodging, and employment of the poor of this parish, and for the payment of any interest or annuities chargeable on the rates of this parish, and for the discharge of all other expenses under the said Act (including the expense of the police during the quarter of a year from the 25th March 1871 to the 24th June 1871) upon all and every person or persons who do or shall inhabit, hold, or occupy any land, house, shop, warehouse, or other building, tenement, or hereditament within the said parish, and which said rate or assessment in this book includes that part of the said parish called No. 4 district.

The amount of this rate assessed upon the appellants in accordance wich the above valuation list was 22*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* This rate was duly signed by sixteen of the vestrymen, was duly declared to be according to the valuation list in force for the said parish by the churchwardens and overseers, and was duly allowed by justices.

The said parish of St. Luke is governed by a local Act (48 Geo. 3, c. xcvii.), cited in the above rate, and deemed to be a public Act, and to be judicially taked notice of as such.

By sect. 27, the vestrymen, whose qualifications are given in sect. 2, and of whom, by sect. 15, the guardians are to be composed, are to make and sign rates or assessments upon all persons inhabiting or occupying any land, house, or other building in the parish for the relief of the poor of the said parish.

By sect. 29, rates are to be allowed by justices and then, by sect. 30, they are to be deemed and taken to be good, valid, and effectual.

By sect. 96:

Provided always, and be it further enacted, that if any person or persons shall think himself, herself, or themselves aggrieved by any rate, or rates, assessment, or assessments, or by any bye-law, rule, or order made in pursuance of this Act, or any other matter or thing done or directed to be done in pursuance of this Act, such person or persons shall apply for relief to the guardians of the poor of the said parish at any meeting to be held within fourteen days next after demand made of such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, or next after any such matter or thing done and committed by, or by an order of, the said guardians, by which such person or persons shall think himself, herself, or themselves aggrieved; and the said guardians are hereby authorised and empowered to give such relief in the premises as to them shall seem necessary; and if such person or persons shall not be satisfied with the determination of such guardians, he, she, or they may appeal to the quarter or general sessions of the peace to be holden for the county of Middlesex, as the case shall be, within seven weeks next after such determination of the said guardians shall be made: such appellant first giving, or causing to be given, seven days' notice at the least in writing, of his, her, or their intention to bring such appeal, and of the matter thereof, to the clerk or clerks of the said guardians, or leaving such notice for him or them, at his or their last or usual place or places of abode, and within two days next after such notice, entering into a recognizance before one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said county, with two sufficient sureties, in the sum of 40*l.*, conditioned to try such appeal, and to abide the order of, and to pay such costs as shall be awarded by the justices at such quarter or general sessions, and the said justices at such quarter or general sessions of the peace for the said county, upon due proof of such notice being given as aforesaid, and of the entering into such recognizance, shall hear and determine the causes and matters of such appeal in a summary way, and award such costs to the parties appealing, or appealed against, as they the said justices shall think proper; and the said justices may then and there, if they see cause, mitigate any forfeiture or fine, and may order any money to be returned which shall have been levied in pursuance of any such bye-law, rule, or order, and award such further satisfaction to be made to the party injured as they shall judge proper; and the determination of such justices, at their quarter or general sessions, shall be final, binding, and conclusive.

On the 19th Sept. 1871, the attorney for the Houseless Poor Society attended before justices in petty sessions, in answer to a summons previously served, to show cause why the said society had not paid the rate, and why a distress warrant should not be issued to levy the amount due, viz., 22*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* The respondents' attorney stated that he had previously informed the appellants' attorney that the Houseless Poor Society could not legally appeal to the general quarter sessions against this rate, as they had not applied to the guardians of the parish of St. Luke for relief, as required by the said local Act. The same objection was taken by the respondents' attorney before the justices at petty sessions, who, however, issued no warrant, the attorney for the society having stated their intention to appeal to quarter sessions. The appellants gave notice, and the appeal came on for hearing on the 28th Oct. last, when the counsel for the respondents objected to the hearing of the appeal, on the grounds that the appellants had not applied for relief to the guardians of the poor of the said parish, as required by sect. 96 of the local Act before referred to, and that no notice of appeal had been given to the clerk to the guardians, and no recognizances had been entered into by the appellants conditioned to try the appeal, and to abide the order of and to pay such costs as should be awarded by the justices. The counsel for the respondents read to the court sect 96 of the said Act, and referred to the various provisions of the Act relating to the making of the rates. The counsel for the appellants admitted as a fact that no application had been made to the guardians for relief, that no recognisances had been entered into, and that they had only served the notice of appeal before referred to. He further stated that the provisions of the local Act referred to by the counsel for the respondents had taken him by surprise. The Assistant Judge, Sir W. H. Bodkin, who was presiding in court at the hearing of the appeal, said that he should under such circumstances adjourn the appeal until the next general quarter sessions of the peace, upon which the counsel for the respondents protested against such adjournment, as the court had no jurisdiction either to hear the appeal or to adjourn it. The Assistant-Judge, notwithstanding, adjourned the hearing of the appeal to the next sessions.

On the 27th Jan. 1872, the appeal day for the January quarter sessions, the appeal was again called on for hearing, and the counsel for the respondent again objected to the jurisdiction of the court on the same ground as before, and again referred to the various clauses of the Act relating to the matter. The counsel for the appellants interposed, and stated that it was conceded on the part of the appellants, that they had not appealed under the local Act at all; but he contended that as the declaration at the end of the rate was signed by the overseers, the court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal under sect. 4 of 27 Geo. 2, c. 38. In answer to which the counsel for the respondents contended that that clause referred to rates made under the statute of Elizabeth, by overseers of the poor, and that as the rate was made under a local act specially applying to the parish of St Luke, it must be appealed against in conformity with the provisions of such Act; and that although the declaration was the act of the overseers, the appellants on a notice given under that section to the overseers, could not upset a rate made by vestrymen under a local Act; and the counsel for the appellants objected that the valuation list upon which the rate was made was not binding upon the appellants, because they had not received the notices required to be given by the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869. The counsel for the respondents said that he declined to discuss that matter until the court had determined whether they would hear the appeal or not. The Assistant Judge stated that he should decline then to give any opinion upon the point raised as to the jurisdiction, but that he would hear the evidence as to value. The counsel for the appellants, notwithstanding the protest from the counsel for the respondents, called a witness, who stated that when the valuation list was signed by the parish officers in May 1870, the two houses, numbers 2 and 3 Banner-street were being altered and converted into one house; and that the appellants did not open them as a refuge until December 1870; and he stated that the full yearly value of the house as altered was, in his opinion, 250*l.* It was also stated by the witness that the appellants had received no notice as required by sect. 9 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869. The counsel for the respondents declined to discuss the questions either of value or as to whether notice had been properly served relying upon the point that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. The justices present retired to consider their judgment, and on their return into court the Assistant Judge stated that the rate so far as it affected the appellants would be quashed; but he gave no reasons for that judgment, and did not refer in any way to the preliminary point as to the jurisdiction. The counsel for the respondents upon the decision being announced stated that an application would be made to the court of Queen's Bench to remove the order by certiorari on the ground of want of jurisdiction; the respondents' attorney afterwards refused to attend the taxation of the costs of the appeal on the ground that the order was invalid.

The churchwardens and overseers of St. Luke's parish are appointed under the local Act before referred to. The guardians of the poor of St. Luke's parish appointed under the local Act duly held meetings for the purpose of giving relief to the persons who felt aggrieved by the rate, and the only appeal against such rate by the appellants was that hereinbefore referred to. If persons were to appeal directly to the sessions, without first applying to the guardians, it would cause great inconvenience and lead to unnecessary expense.

Affidavits, in answer to that upon which the rule was moved, were filed on behalf of the appellants and the justices. The appellants disputed the assertion of the respondents' attorney that he had given them information concerning the local Act, and stated that they never heard of it until they came to the quarter sessions. They also asserted that no notice of a new or altered assessment, as required by sect. 9 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, was served upon them by the overseers.

Metcalfe showed cause, on behalf of the Houseless Poor Society, against the rule.—This local Act is not expressly mentioned amongst those which are repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, s. 77; but by implication the appeal clauses of that Act repeal all previous special systems of appeal. The words are: "The enactments specified in the fifth schedule to this Act, and so much of any other Acts, whether public or local and personal, as authorises any valuation of hereditaments to be made for the purposes of any rate or tax in respect of which the valuation list is by this Act made conclusive, are hereby repealed, where they relate only to the metropolis absolutely, and in other cases so far as they relate to the metropolis." Further, the appeal clause, sect. 96, of the local Act relates only to matters done in pursuance of that Act; here the ground of appeal was the improper assessment in a valuation list, which was made in pursuance of an Act passed in 1869; and it was impossible, in consequence of the omission of the overseers to give notice to the appellants under sect. 9 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, that the appellants should adopt the proceedings upon appeal provided by ss. 18 to 41 of that Act. [BLACKBURN, J.—The rate was a matter in pursuance of the local Act, and the appeal upon such a matter is not affected by the Act of 1869.] There was an important difference between the rate as it was made and as provided by the local Act; the declaration of the rate by the overseers is required by sect. 73 of the Act of 1869, and is not provided for by the local Act; the churchwardens and overseers have, therefore, by declaring this rate, travelled out of the local Act, and subjected themselves to the general law of appeal, which is provided by 17 Geo. 2, c. 38 s. 4. There is no provision in the Act of 1869 for an appeal on the ground of omission by the overseers to give notice of an alteration in the valuation list; and there is no provision in the local Act upon any matter other than those done in pursuance of that Act.

Huddleston Q. C. and Mackey showed cause on behalf of the justices.

Poland, who appeared to support the rule on behalf of the respondents, the churchwardens, overseers, and vestrymen of the parish of St. Luke, was not heard.

BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think that we need trouble Mr. Poland. The real grievance of which the appellants had to complain was that, although duly inserted in the valuation list, they were assessed at an excessive value, and no notice of their having been assessed was given them. Neglect of the notice by the overseers prevented their going to the assessment committee in time, as provided by the Act of 1869. As to whether the valuation list was binding at all upon those persons whose names were inserted without notice to them, we express no opinion. Certainly it would be just and proper if it had no effect. The only question for us is whether the quarter sessions had power to give the appellants relief under the circumstances of this case. It appears upon the face of the rate, against which this appeal was brought, that it was made under the local Act concerning the parish of St. Luke (48 Geo. 3, c. xcvii. Sect. 25 enables the vestrymen of the parish to settle and ascertain the respective sums of money necessary to be raised by a just and equal pound rate for the relief, maintenance, lodging, and employment of the poor of the said parish and for the discharge of other expenses of the said parish. Now, since the valuation list is provided for by the Act of 1869, all rates made by these vestrymen must be in accordance with that list. The present rate, of which the appellants complained, was duly made upon the assessment in the valuation list, but the assessment was excessive, and the appellants had received no notice of it. The appellants contended that the general law of appeal contained in 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4, afforded a remedy for their cause of complaint, but I do not think that is so. That Act gives an appeal only in the cases mentioned, and it requires the persons aggrieved to give reasonable notice to the churchwardens or overseers of the poor of the parish before appealing to the sessions. Now to make notice to churchwardens and overseers necessary for an appeal against a grievance caused by an assessment committee seems to be absurd; and further than that, all rates in this parish are governed by the Local Act 48 Geo. 3, c. xcvii.; and by the 96th section, all persons aggrieved by any rates, assessments, or orders, or any matter or thing, done or directed to be done in pursuance of that Act, must first apply to the guardians before appealing to the quarter sessions. The appellants went to the quarter sessions without making any application to the guardians, and I think the quarter sessions had under the circumstances no jurisdiction to make any order in this matter. The rule, therefore, must be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is whether the quarter sessions had jurisdiction to act as they did, and to my mind clearly they had not.

Rule absolute without costs.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY (apps.) v. BISHOP (resp.).

*Nuisance—Water dripping from a railway bridge—Order to abate—*18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, ss. 8, 12.

The appellants were ordered by justices at petty sessions under the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121) sect. 12, to abate a nuisance, consisting of a want of proper and sufficient means to prevent the percolation and overflow of water upon persons passing under or near a railway bridge, the premises of the appellants:

Held, upon a case stated, that this Act applied only to nuisances, and matters in the nature of a nuisance, which were injurious to health, and that the justices had no power to make this order.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the borough of Aberavon, in the county of Glamorgan, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the Police Station, Aberavon, in and for the borough of Aberavon, in the county of Glamorgan, on the 20th July 1871, a complaint preferred by John Bishop as such inspector of nuisances as aforesaid, hereinafter called the respondent, against the Great Western Railway Company, hereinafter called the appellants, under sect. 12 of "The Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855" (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), charging that in and upon the premises of the appellants, being a railway bridge, situate in Church-street, within the district of the Aberavon Local Board, the following nuisance existed, that was to say, a want of proper and sufficient means to prevent the percolation and overflow of water upon persons passing under or near to the said premises, and that the said nuisance was caused by the act or default of the said appellants being the owners of the said premises, was heard and determined by them, the said parties respectively being then present or represented by their attorneys, and upon such hearing, the appellants were by them ordered to abate the said nuisance, and to pay to the respondent the sum of 1*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* for his costs.

And whereas the appellants being dissatisfied with the determination of the justices upon the hearing of the said complaint as being erroneous in point of law, have in pursuance of sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to them in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such their determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and have duly entered into a recognizance as required by the said statute in that behalf. Now, therefore, they, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, did hereby state and sign the following case.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact, that the bridge in question, being the property of the appellants, was situate near Church-street, in the borough of Aberavon, being the principal street leading to the parish church.

That the bottom of the said bridge was formed of wooden planks, and that both during rainy weather, and for some time afterwards, the water percolated through the said bridge on to the street below, inasmuch that foot passengers were even after the rain had ceased obliged to make use of their umbrellas when passing under the said bridge, and that the water having passed through the bridge was dirty.

That there was nothing under the said bridge to prevent the water falling upon the passengers passing along the said street, and it was admitted by the respondant that no water from either side of the said bridge flowed on to it; the bridge itself being as a fact somewhat higher than either side of the railway, and the water so running from the bridge no rain or other water did or could percolate through the bridge except such as came down from the clouds on to the bridge itself.

It was contended on the part of the appellants, first, that the percolation of the water through the said bridge upon the passengers in the said street was not a nuisance within the meaning of the Nuisances Removal Act for England, 1855, inasmuch as it was not injurious to health; secondly, that the bridge in question did not come within the meaning of the word "premises" as interpreted by the said Act; and, thirdly, that the offence was not sufficiently set forth in the summons served upon the appellants, and of which the following is a copy, but this objection was not taken until the case for the respondent had been closed.

(Copy Summons.)

To the Great Western Railway Company, the owners of the premises situate and being a Railway Bridge in Church-street, within the district of the Aberavon Local Board.

Borough of Aberavon to wit. You are required to appear before two justices of the peace of the borough of Aberavon, at the petty sessions to be holden at the police court in the town of Aberavon, on Thursday, the 20th July, inst., at the hour of eleven in the forenoon, to answer the complaint this day made to me by John Bishop, inspector of nuisances on behalf of the Aberavon Local Board, that in or upon the premises above mentioned, situate at Church Street within the district of the Aberavon Local Board, under the Nuisances Removal Acts for England, the following nuisance exists, that is to say, a want of proper and sufficient means to prevent the percolation and overflow of water upon persons passing under or near to the said premises, and that the said nuisance is caused by the act or default of you the owners of the said premises.

Given under the hand of me, a justice of the peace acting in and for the borough of Aberavon, this 14th July, 1871. (Signed) DANIEL SMITH.

They, however, being of opinion that the percolation of water through the said bridge upon passengers passing under the said bridge was a nuisance within the meaning of the 8th section of the said Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, and that it was not necessary for the respondent to prove that the same was also injurious to health, the words of the Act "being a nuisance or injurious to health;" and they being also of opinion that the bridge in question came within the meaning of the word "premises," as interpreted by the second section of the said Act; and they being also of opinion that the offence as set forth in the information and summons was sufficient, and not calculated to mislead the appellants, gave their determination against the appellants, and made an order for the abatement of the said nuisance.

The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore, are: First, whether it was necessary on the part of the respondent to prove that the nuisance complained of was injurious to public health; secondly, whether the bridge in question came within the meaning of the word "premises" as interpreted by the Nuisances Removal Act for England, 1855; thirdly, whether the offence as described in the summons to the appellants was sufficient, and if not, whether the appellants could object to the form of such summons after the case for the respondent had been closed.

If the court should be of opinion that the said order was legally and properly made, and the appellants are liable, as aforesaid, then the said order is to stand, but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the complaint is to be dismissed.

Lopes, Q.C. (with him Raymond), argued for the appellants.—This is not a nuisance which is injurious to health, and therefore is not subject to the remedies provided by this Act. Throughout the Act the intention of the Legislature appears to limit its enactments to nuisances, or other matters in the nature of a nuisance, which are injurious to the health of the public, or of some individuals. Many things may be nuisances for which this Act cannot provide a remedy, and the limit to be drawn is that which may be gathered from the object of the Act. [Stopped by the court.]

Herschell, Q.C. (with him Hughes), for respondent.—The Act consolidates and amends two separate kinds of legislation, the Nuisances Removal Acts, and the Diseases Prevention Acts; and its application need not be limited to a matter relating to both kinds. I should say any nuisance which could inconvenience the public at large is within the scope of the Act if it can possibly be remedied by an individual. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Could the Act apply to an obstruction, or the keeping a dangerous animal, or too low an awning over a shop window, or a hoarding kept an unreasonable time in front of a house?] It is intended to remedy any nuisance within the four categories mentioned in section 8, some of which might not in any way affect health. [COCKBURN, C.J.—If any restriction be put upon the word "nuisances"—and it would be monstrous to apply a Sanitary Act to every common law nuisance—health must be the criterion. Must not the Act be limited to matters injurious to health?] The Act contemplates only premises having an owner or occupier, therefore private premises; and there can be no reason why it should not give this remedy against all private premises which are kept so as to be a nuisance, without their being necessarily injurious to health. It would be beneficial to the public so to extend its application, and there is no sufficient reason to limit it.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think this conviction cannot be upheld. I agree that it would be convenient and useful there should be a summary jurisdiction in such a case as this, but we cannot act upon any such view unless we can properly put a construction consistent with it upon the language of the Act. Now the Act speaks of nuisances in sect. 8 as certain things in such a state or so kept as to be a nuisance or injurious to health; and, as Mr. Lopes says, it secures the means to abate certain public as well as private nuisances; but still it was intended to apply only when the thing complained of was injurious to health. It is impossible to maintain that a remedy is provided by this Act against all nuisances whatever; for instance, obstructions and the like are not within the scope of the Act, and it becomes necessary therefore to draw the line somewhere. The Act certainly has not made any distinction in express terms between the nuisances to which it applies and those to which it does not apply, and we can only discover a limit by reference to the general object of the legislature. It is a sanitary enactment, and it was clearly intended to protect the health of individuals That gives us a guiding principle whereby to construe the statute; and from it the subject appears to be nuisances, and other matters not amounting to nuisances, but limited to such as affect the public health. This matter complained of may be a serious annoyance, and one to which the public ought not to be subjected; I pronounce no opinion as to whether it amounts to a nuisance indictable at common law, but I hope that there will be no necessity for such a remedy, and that steps will be taken by the company to put a stop to all the inconvenience the matter occasions. It is not a nuisance which is injurious to health within the application of this Act. The possible injury to health by the dripping of this water is too indirect to bring this case within the powers granted to the justices by this Act to enforce a remedy for a nuisance.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the word "nuisances" in sect. 8 cannot include all nuisances at common law. There must be some limit to its application; and if so, I see no other guide except by reference to the scope and object of the Act, which seem to be for the remedy of matters injurious to health only.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only desire to add to what has been said that I think the clue to the interpretation of the expression in the 8th section, "a nuisance or injurious to health," is an injury to the health of some person. I think the intention of the Legislature was to extend the remedies provided by that Act not only to cases in which a public nuisance exists, but also to cases of the nature of a nuisance where there is no injury to the public; provided always that there is an injury to the health of some individual.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. H. HOCKINS, H. F. POOLEY, and R. A. KINGLAKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, June 7, 1872.

COPE v. BARBER.

Celebrating Divine Service—Collection of alms—Interference by churchwardens—Rubric—23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2.

The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2 enacts that any person who shall molest, let, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other lawful means disquiet or misuse any preacher duly authorised to preach therein, or any clergyman in holy orders ministering or celebrating any sacrament or any Divine Service, rite, or office in any cathedral, church, or chapel, or in any churchyard or burial ground, shall on conviction be liable to a penalty of not more than five pounds for every such offence.

The Rubric to the Communion Service of the Church of England orders that "Whilst the sentences are in reading, the deacons, churchwardens, or other fit person appointed for that purpose shall receive the alms for the poor and other devotions of the people in a decent basin to be provided by the parish for that purpose, and reverently bring it to the priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the holy table.

During the reading of the sentences in the offertory, the rector and his curate collected the alms of the people at one end of the church, whilst the churchwardens were at the other.

The churchwardens who objected to the rector collecting alms placed themselves in a menacing position across the centre aisle so as to prevent the rector passing down the aisle, but they did not push or touch him, neither did he attempt to pass.

Upon an information against the defendants the churchwardens under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, the magistrates dismissed the summons, but stated a case for the opinion of the court.

Held: That the magistrates were right in dismissing the case, for the appellant was not at the time of the disturbance ministering or celebrating any Divine service rite or office, the collection of alms not being a part of the service which the rubric enjoins the priest to celebrate.

CASE stated for the opinion of the court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions holden at Macclesfield, in and for the division of Prestbury, in the county of Chester, on the 24th Oct. 1871, an information came on to be heard before us, the undersigned justices, which was preferred by the above-named appellant against the above-named respondents, under the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2, charging that Charles Barber the younger, of the parish of Wilmslow, in the said county, silk manufacturer; Thomas Clark, of the said parish, physician; and Thomas Hobson, of the said parish, merchant, on the 24th Sept. last, at the said parish, in the said county, unlawfully did molest, let, disturb, vex, and trouble him, the said Francis Horden Cope, then being a clergyman in holy orders, celebrating divine service in a certain parish church of the Church of England, to wit, the parish church of the said parish of Wilmslow, there situate, and called the Church of St. Bartholomew, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided; and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information in the manner and upon the grounds hereinafter stated.

Upon the hearing of the information aforesaid, George Fox deposed before us as follows, that is to say:

I live at Haresfield Wilmslow, and am a merchant and a magistrate. I attended at Wilmslow parish church on Sunday morning the 24th Sept., and the seat I occupy is No. 30 on the south side of the middle aisle. I was sitting at the entrance of my seat nearest the aisle. The service was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Cope, Rev. Mr. Hinder, and Rev. Mr. Cocks, and at the appointed time in the Communion Service Mr. Cope preached. At that time Mr. Cocks and Mr. Hinder sat within the communion rails. Immediately after the sermon Mr. Cocks went up to the altar and proceeded to say the offertory sentences, and Mr. Cope and Mr Hinder then began the collection of the people's offerings. Mr Hinder went into the Prescott Chapel and commenced his collections there, and Mr. Cope descending from the pulpit at the same time, they both came down the chancel steps together, Mr. Hinder turning to his left hand and Mr. Cope, with a bag in either hand, commenced to take the offertory down the middle aisle. Mr. Cocks, during this time, was reading the offertory sentences. Mr. Cope had proceeded to within two pews of where I was sitting before I noticed anything; but simultaneously with Mr. Cope's descending from the pulpit I heard, but did not see at the time, the defendants coming from their pew at the extreme west-end of the church. I then looked round and saw Dr. Clark collecting from the south side of the middle aisle, and Mr. Barber from the north side, and at the same moment Mr. Thomas Hobson came towards them; these three gentlemen were all in the same aisle, Dr. Clark occupied the south side, Mr. Barber the north side, Mr. Hobson filled up between the two with his hands behind his back. This was the position when they were abreast of the pew I was occupying. They proceeded until they met Mr. Cope. Mr. Cope then essayed to pass by Dr. Clark, when Dr. Clark put his hands on the side of the pew so as to form a barrier with his arms, and swaying his body at the same moment in the same direction, so as the more perfectly to impede Mr. Cope's progress. Mr. Hobson, who, up to this moment was about 18in. behind the other two gentlemen, immediately stepped forward, took his hands from behind his his back and put one so as to form a support to Dr. Clark. Mr. Cope then turned to the other or north side, and immediately thereupon Mr. Barber laid hold of the pew with his left hand in the same way precisely, and Mr. Hobson at the same moment threw himself to the other side of the aisle so as to support Mr. Barber. Seeing this, Mr. Cope seemed a good deal embarrassed. He seemed as if he did not exactly know what to do, but at last he endeavoured to pass between the two defendants, Clark and Barber, when Mr. Hobson immediately put himself in the centre so as effectually to obstruct Mr. Cope passing between. The position of the three defendants on this occasion was such as to prevent Mr. Cope passing without his having resort to violence. And there was no doubt their position was one of menace, as they assumed a defiant menacing position, and the result was that Mr. Cope was obliged to return back again to the eastern part or head of the aisle when he saw it was impossible to pass without using physical force. Instead, however, of ascending the altar steps the complainant walked to the north aisle of the church, and proceeded collecting the offertory down it and along a portion of the west, and then turned up the middle aisle, collecting on the north side of it, where he had been unable to collect before by reason of the defendants' obstruction. The three defendants then came up to the top of the centre aisle, and there they remained in the same attitude as when Mr. Cope had been originally stopped by them, so that it was impossible for him to pass. They did not physically impede him there, because he did not proceed up the middle aisle from the west, but went along the west aisle and up the south aisle, collecting the offerings of the people as he went, till he joined the Rev. Mr. Hinder. Then Mr. Cope and Mr. Hinder together went up to the Communion Table with the offertory they had collected. Mr. Barber and Dr. Clark then followed them up the church, and Mr. Hobson turned down the centre aisle again to his pew; he had not a collecting box or anything in his hand at any particular time. Upon cross-examination by the defendants, the witness said, "You" (the defendants) "have collected occasionally; you did not strike Mr. Cope. You did not speak to him; your attitude was defiant and menacing." I believe the boxes which were in the hands of Dr. Clark and Mr. Barber were given up to the Rev. Mr. Cocks. I know nothing of my own knowledge about the swearing in or the admission of the rival churchwardens, not having been present at the visitation. No churchwarden other than you and Mr. Wallworth have acted for the church for the last eighteen months.

Upon the same hearing John Vincent, Claude Rivaz, and other witnesses, deposed to the same facts.

Counsel for the complainant stated he had other witnesses, but the defendants said they did not dispute the facts, but wished the complainant to be put in the witness box. He was accordingly sworn, but asked no questions in chief. Upon cross-examination by the defendants, the complainant said that there were unfortunately two sets of persons claiming to be churchwardens of Wilmslow, but that he had never recognised the defendants as such; that they had on several occasions collected the alms, but that he had prevented them doing so on more than one occasion, for sometimes an empty box would be brought. He stated that he was a priest and a deacon. On re-examination he stated that formal notice had been given in the church that the clergy would collect the offertory for church expenses. The defendants had written a letter suggesting a brawl in the church. The complainant admitted that a protest had been made against the validity of the defendants' appointment as churchwardens, but that the chancellor had, notwithstanding, administered the declaration to them, and that they had continuously claimed to be the legal churchwardens of Wilmslow.

When called upon for their defence, the defendant, Dr. Clarke, on behalf of all the defendants, read a paper, which was in these words—

This summons charges us with behaving unlawfully to the Rev. Mr. Cope and the Rev. Mr. Hinder, when administering Divine Service on the 24th Sept. last, in the parish church of Wilmslow. To this we reply first, that we did nothing unlawfully on that day. We say and maintain that we are churchwardens duly and legally sworn in on two occasions before the archdeacon, that we alone almost have acted as wardens for more than eighteen months, and that the clergy have allowed us, even during this dispute, to collect the alms for the sick and poor unmolested. That on this particular Sunday the offertory was for the expenses of the church, which we had not refused to collect, and we do allow that acting as wardens, and having collected our parts of the church we did stop the clergy from collecting it over again because it had been complained of, but we emphatically deny that we either spoke a word, lifted a hand, or touched them, even so much as with a finger. The money we had collected we handed over to them at the Communion Table in the usual way. Secondly, we say and maintain that the clergy were not performing Divine Service, but that they were wandering up and down the church collecting money for a secular purpose. We affirm that they had no business to collect at all. That it is a lay function and the special and ablsolute duty of the wardens alone and we hold that it would be just as scandalous for us to assume their duties as for them to assume ours. Moreover, the rubric distinctly commands them as priests to remain at the Communion Table to read the offertory sentences and receive alms from them who collect. They were in a part of the church, therefore, where they had no business to be, and doing something they had no business to do—something, indeed, opposed to all law, to all customs, and even to all decency. We contend, therefore, that on both these pleas we acted lawfully in virtue and right of our office as churchwardens, and that they were wrong, and we therefore pray the court to dismiss the charge which has been brought against us.

The Justices upon this evidence and this defence were of opinion and adjudged that it was the duty of the churchwardens to collect the offertory, and not that of the complainant, and consequently dismissed the summons, but stated their willingness to grant a case for the opinion of a Superior Court, and if such court should be of opinion that upon the evidence and having regard to the true intent and meaning of the statute, they ought to have convicted the defendants, or any one or more of them, they were of opinion that in such case each defendant, or such one or more should be fined 20s. and costs. The question, therefore, for the opinion of the court is whether upon the undisputed evidence above set forth, and which we find to be true in fact, and having regard to the position and claims of the defendants disclosed on the evidence, an offence against the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, s. 2 was committed by them in the premises. If the court shall be of opinion that the circumstances stated do not amount to an offence against that statute, the dismissal of the said summons is to stand. If otherwise the defendants, or such of them as aforesaid are to stand convicted accordingly, and to pay the said fine of 20s each and costs.

Manisty (Edwards with him) for the appellant.—The clergyman was collecting the alms when the churchwardens interfered with him. He was doing a perfectly legal act in collecting the alms. The rubric says that while the sentences are being read the deacons, churchwardens, or other fit persons appointed for that purpose, shall collect the alms, and reverently bring them to the priest. [WILLES, J.—What is the meaning of the deacons collecting the alms; does it mean that it is beneath the dignity of a priest to collect the alms?] No, for a person of higher degree is never excluded, and he may collect himself, and if he may collect himself he may appoint others to collect for him. [KEATING, J.—If you assume the rector is a proper person to collect you are assuming the whole question.] Even if the rector had not a strict legal right to collect, I say that the conduct of the churchwarden was indecent. The duties of the churchwardens are well laid down in Hutchins v. Denziloe and Loveland (1 Hag. Consist. Cas. 170). The churchwardens had forbade the organ to play, and the children to sing at certain parts of the service when the clergyman had ordered them to do so. Lord Stowell said, the first point is whether the churchwardens have a right to interfere in the service of the church? as if that interference is legal in any case it is so in the present. To ascertain this it is proper to consider what are their duties, and I conceive that originally they were confined to the care of the ecclesiastical property of the parish over which they exercise a discretionary power for specific purposes. In all other respects it is an office of observation and complaint but not of control with respect to divine worship. So it is laid down in Ayliffe (Parergon, p. 170) and in the canons of 1571. In these it is observed that the churchwardens are appointed to provide the furniture of the church, the bread and wine for the Holy Sacrament, the surplice, and the holy books, but it is the minister who has the use. In the service the churchwardens are to do nothing but collect the alms at the offertory, and they may refuse the admission of strange preachers into the pulpit. Again, if the minister introduces any irregularity into the service, they have no authority to interfere, but they may complain to the ordinary of his conduct. I do not say there may not be cases where they may be bound to interpose; in such cases they may repress, and ought to repress, all indecent interruptions of the service by others, and are the most proper persons to repress them, and they desert their duty if they do not. If a case could be imagined in which a preacher himself was guilty of any act grossly offensive, I will not say that the churchwardens, and even private persons, might not interpose to preserve the decorum of public worship. But that is a case of instant and overbearing necessity that supersedes all ordinary rules. In cases which fall short of such singular pressure, and can await the remedy of a proper legal complaint, that is the only mode to be pursued by a churchwarden, if private and decent application to the minister himself shall have failed in preventing what he deems to be the repetition of an irregularity. [WILLES, J. —If the clergyman introduced howling into the church, or any such indecent noise, I think the churchwardens might turn him out.] He referred to Worth v. Terrington (8 M. & W. 781). [WILLES, J.—I am glad that case is referred to, because it gives me an opportunity of publicly stating that the reporter misunderstood Lord Wensleydale in that case, and I possess a letter of his in which he says that he never said what is imputed to him, and in his own copy of Meeson and Welsby there is a note in the margin of that page in his own hand, "I never said so."] There is no objection to the clergyman collecting alms, and there is no authority that he may not. [WILLES, J.—If the churchwarden was a notorious evil liver and non-communicant, could the clergyman appoint some one else to collect?] I should say so. The priest collected by the desire of the congregation. [KEATING, J.—There is a case in Howitt's State Trials, vol. 10, p. 88, fol. edit., where, on a collection for charity, the clergyman collected the money, and he was indicted at the Rochester Assizes for collecting money without authority; but Lord Stowell mentions it as of little authority.] If the priest was not performing the service, but left it to his curates, would he be the more open to molestation? He referred to Office of Judge promoted by Ritchings v. Cordingley (L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Eccl. 113).

McIntyre, Q.C. (with whom was Coxon).—The question is, What is the real duty of the churchwarden? He is the person who has the care of the furniture of the church, and he is to collect the alms. The churchwardens were, therefore, doing no more than their duty, and if there was an interference it was by Mr. Cope. The proper vessel in which to collect the alms was a basin, and not a bag, and it is admitted that Cope considered the churchwardens the proper persons to collect. Mr. Cope was not then celebrating Divine Service or any rite or office; but the summons describes him as doing so, and by the Act of Parliament under which the summons was taken out he must be at the time celebrating Divine Service quâ clergyman, and celebrating a part of it which no one except a clergyman can take a part in. If a clergyman as an ordinary person was at church, could a person who molested him be said to have molested a clergyman celebrating Divine Service? I say certainly not, he must be absolutely at the time engaged in the service.

WILLES, J.—The question is whether the magistrates rightly dismissed the respondents on an information by the appellants, charging that they unlawfully did molest, let, disturb, vex, and trouble Mr. Cope, then celebrating divine service in the Church of England. We are not called upon to decide whether any other proceedings could be taken, for, as they are laymen, they could not be proceeded against in the Ecclesiastical Court. The 2nd section of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, says: "Any person who shall be guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour in any cathedral church, parish or district church, or who shall molest, let, disturb, vex, or trouble, or by any other unlawful means disquiet or misuse any preacher duly authorised to preach therein, or any clergyman in holy orders ministering or celebrating any sacrament or any divine service, rite, or office in any cathedral church or chapel, or in any churchyard or burial ground, shall on conviction before two justices of the peace be liable to a penalty of not more than 5*l.* for every such offence, or may be committed to prison in the discretion of the justices." It is a remarkable fact that the Act draws a distinction between a clergyman preaching in the church and the priest celebrating divine service, rite, or office. In the case of preaching, that it is said to be not strictly celebrating a rite or office shows that the Legislature meant to provide for that which in its character and nature is meant to be done by a clergyman in holy orders. The clergyman is said to have been celebrating divine service when he was molested, then being a clergyman in holy orders and celebrating divine service in a parish church of the Church of England. What Mr. Cope was doing was collecting alms. The clergyman, when walking from the reading desk to the communion table, or from the communion table to the reading desk, is doing part of his duty, and he is to be protected while making any movement in celebrating that office. But when the clergyman is engaged in doing something that is not a rite or office within the meaning of the statute he is not so protected, nor is he because he has been previously celebrating some rite or office with which his present occupation has nothing to do. Observe the words "ministering or celebrating any sacrament or any divine service." Now take the substantive words, "rite or office;" I take it these words would not apply to a collection of alms if a churchwarden was employed in collecting. It is necessary for a priest to be present at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and there ought to be one, although it is not necessary at baptism. Now, was the collecting of alms a rite or office ministered by him as priest? If the rubric imposed on the clergyman the collection of alms I should have thought that the words "ministering or celebrating" might be so strained, for I think the offering of alms in charity is as much a part of the service as the prayers that are offered up, but we can find no such provisions in the rubric that the collection of alms should be made by the clergy. But because the rubric does not impose that duty on the clergyman, it is not a bit the less a part of the divine service; for I do not consider the divine service, or even the sacrament, absolutely requires a priest to officiate. There is no doubt that baptisms may be administered irregularly but effectually without the presence of a priest—by a lay man or perhaps a lay woman. This was not part of the divine service where the interference of a priest was necessary, for the rubric clearly excludes the idea of the necessity of a priest for such purpose. The rubric says, "Whilst these sentences are in reading the deacons, the churchwardens, or other fit person appointed for that purpose shall receive the alms for the poor, and other devotions of the people, in a decent basin to be provided by the parish for that purpose and reverently bring it to the priest, who shall humbly present and place it upon the holy table." From this I infer that the rubric considers that if there be a deacon present he may properly collect the alms, but if he does not do so the alms are to be collected by the churchwarden, who, although he be an ecclesiastical officer in law, is a lay person. The rubric goes on to say, "or other fit person appointed for that purpose." The collection is therefore to be a collection by a person of a lower order than a priest. We are called upon to inquire who is to appoint such other fit person. Looking at the language of the rubric, that person is not to be a clergyman, and it is clear that sect. 2 of the Act would not apply for the protection of such lay person or of a churchwarden, although for a deacon it may; but that we need not decide. Originally the word "curate" meant priest or incumbent; "deacon" is used with reference to a person in a lower order. It is intended by the rubric that the proper place of the priest was at the communion table, and the deacon must go round and receive the alms. The words "other fit person" do not extend to persons of the higher order. In general, where a person of a lower order is mentioned, the words do not extend to persons of a higher order in a hierarchy. There is nothing improper in a priest or a patriarch if there be one, collecting the alms; but if he does so, he exercises an office which is not an office where the clergyman ministers or celebrates any divine service. I think that there would be no offence in Mr. Cope collecting the alms, only it cannot be said that he was celebrating divine service at the time. On the whole the magistrates were right, and the decision must be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The magistrates were right in their refusal to convict the respondents on this information, that they unlawfully did molest, let, disturb, vex, and trouble the said Francis Cope, then being a clergyman in holy orders celebrating divine service in a parish church in the Church of England. Now, for the reasons already given, and which it is unnecessary to repeat, it seems to me plain that the rubric never contemplated this to be a duty to be discharged necessarily by the clergyman; the rubric speaks of three persons who may collect; and therefore, without deciding whether a priest may or may not collect, it is clear that, while Mr. Cope was taking upon himself that duty, he was not a clergyman celebrating divine service. The decision of the magistrates must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed. Judgment for the respondent.

BAIL COURT.

Reported by JOHN ROSE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 11 and July 6, 1872.

REG. v. ARMITAGE AND BEAUMONT (Justices of the West Riding).

*Bastardy order—Application by mother—Her death before summons heard—Evidence—Cross-examination—*7 & 8 Vict. c. 101.

A woman having been delivered of a bastard child personally applied for and procured an affiliation summons to the putative father, under 7 and 8 Vict. c. 101 (a), but died before the hearing of the case.

Held that in consequence of the death of the mother, no valid affiliation order could be made, for that the statute required her to give evidence on oath as to the paternity of the child, and, by so doing, to submit herself to cross-examination.

Rule calling on the defendants, justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up a certain bastardy order made by them, to be quashed.

The facts were as follows: On the 23rd Jan. 1872, a woman was delivered of a bastard child. On the 13th Feb. she applied in person to Mr. Armitage, one of the defendant justices, for an affiliation summons to one Brierley, whom she alleged to be the father of her child. The summons was granted, and, on the 19th Feb., served upon the putative father. On the 20th Feb. the mother of the child died. On the 27th Feb. the case came on to be heard. An attorney, instructed by the grandmother of the child, appeared to support the application for an order on the father, and stated that the mother was then (a) 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, sect. 1, enacts that from and after the passing of the Act all powers for obtaining or making an order upon any putative father for the maintenance of a bastard child shall cease and determine except as hereinafter provided.

Sect. 2. That any single woman who may be with child, or who may be delivered of a bastard child, after the passing of this Act, or who has been delivered of a bastard child within the period of six calendar months before the passing of this Act, may, either before the birth, or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child, or at any time thereafter, upon proof that the man alleged to be the father of such child has within the twelve months next after the birth of such child paid money for its maintenance, make application to any one justice of the peace acting for the petty sessional division of the county, or for the city, borough, or place in which she may reside, for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of such child; and if such application be made before the birth of the child the woman shall make a deposition upon oath stating who is the father of such child, and such justice of the peace shall thereupon issue his summons to the person alleged to be the father of such child to appear at a petty session to be holden after the expiration of six days at least for the petty sessional division, city, borough, or other place in which such justice usually acts.

Sec. 3. That after the birth of such bastard child, on the appearance of the person so summoned, or on proof that the summons was duly served on such person or left at his last place of abode six days at least before the petty session, the justices in such petty session shall hear the evidence of such woman, and such other evidence as she may produce, and shall also hear any evidence tendered by or on behalf of the person alleged to be the father; and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony, to the satisfaction of the said justices, they may adjudge the man to be the putative father of such bastard child; and they may also, if they see fit, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, proceed to make an order on the putative father for the payment to the mother of the bastard child, or to any person who may be appointed to have the custody of such child under the provisions of this Act, of a sum of money weekly, &c.; and if the application be made before the birth of the child, or within two calendar months after the birth of the child such weekly sums may, if the said justices think fit, be calculated from the birth of the child, at a rate not exceeding five shillings per week for the first six weeks after the birth of such child; and in other cases such sum shall not exceed two shillings and sixpence per week from the time of the making of the application . . .

dead. The putative father also appeared by his attorney, who objected that, as the mother's evidence was not to be had, no valid order could be made. The justices doubted; but they heard such testimony as was given on behalf of the applicant, and made the order in question. This order was bad ex facie; but, that the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench might be obtained as to whether any valid affiliation order could, on the above facts, be made, it was assumed that the order was regular in point of form, and on such assumption

Waddy (Sir John Karslake, Q.C., with him) showed cause.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 3, enacts that any single woman who has been delivered of a bastard child may make an application to justices. It does not say that she, and she alone, must do so. But if such application be made before the birth of the child, the woman shall make adeposition on oath stating who is the father of such child. There is a change of phrase where an oath is required. Then sect. 3 is quite different: "the justices shall hear the evidence of such woman, and such other evidence as she may produce." Does that mean that the woman is a competent witness, and that the justices are empowered to hear her, with corroborative testimony? Or does it mean that no one else will be a competent witness unless the woman's evidence is first heard? The point has never been raised before, and no case is to be found upon it. [HANNEN, J.—You do not contend that if she died before taking out the summons any other person could make the application?] No; but here she herself had applied. [HANNEN, J.—The Act seems only to contemplate an application by the woman.] The argument that the words of 7 and 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 4, simply enjoin the justices to hear the evidence of the mother if offered, and do not make her testimony necessary, is supported by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, "An Act to make certain provisions for proceedings in bastardy," whereof sect. 5, after reciting the first part of sect. 4 of the earlier statute, and that doubts had been raised as to whether the mother could be heard by the court of quarter sessions on appeal by the father, enacts, "that on the trial of any such appeal . . . the justices . . . shall hear the evidence of the said mother, and such other evidence as she may produce." Therefore any decision which could be founded on those words would equally apply to the identical ones in the former enactment. Clearly the death of the mother after an order made, but before appeal, would not invalidate the order by reason of her evidence being wanting at the quarter sessions. Otherwise the man might, on her death after the making of the order, get rid of the order by appealing if time allowed. [HANNEN, J.—But in case of an appeal there would already have been an opportunity of cross-examining her, and her evidence, properly sifted by cross-examination, would have been obtained. QUAIN, J.—And she being dead, her evidence given at petty sessions might be read on appeal.] In Reg. v. The Justices of Middlesex (17 L. J. 111, M. C.) it was held, upon sect. 6 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, that the mother was a competent witness to prove that she had due notice of appeal. There again the competency of the woman to give evidence is the question considered. "Competent;" but suppose the woman were a lunatic, incapable of testifying, is the father of her child to escape liability on that account? The words are used in the Act not to insist that the mother shall give evidence, but to entitle her to be heard. These proceedings are quasi-civil. At the time of the passing of the statute it was doubtful whether she could be heard at all. So the justices were empowered to hear her, but must have corroborative testimony to support her. [QUAIN, J.—How do you meet the words of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 4, "and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated . . . to the satisfaction of the justices?" do you interpolate words such as "given on behalf"?] In Reg. v. Justices of Buckinghamshire (3 New Sess. Cas. 500; 18 L. J., M. C. 113), it was held that under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10 the woman need not be examined on the trial of an appeal against an order in bastardy, but that, if she be tendered as evidence, she must be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony; and Erle, J. (inter loq.) said (p. 505), "There was a doubt whether the evidence of the woman was admissible; and it was enacted that, if she offers herself, she shall be admitted to give evidence, subject to this, that, if they do hear her testimony, it must be corroborated in some material particular. If the woman's evidence be not wanted, the trial will go on as in any other case." And Wightman, J., delivering the judgment of the court, prepared by the former learned judge, said: "The objection that the woman was not examined before the quarter sessions was disposed of on the argument." [HANNEN, J.—But observe the ground upon which Erle, J. founded his remark. "Here, when judgment had been given on the point as to jurisdiction, the appellant said there was no further objection, and the order was of course confirmed:" (see 18 L. J. 116, M. C.) He meant that it would have been an idle ceremony to put in the evidence of the woman when the point raised was only as to the jurisdiction.] In Reg. v. The Justices of Leicestershire (19 L. J. 209, M. C.), the sessions had refused to hear an appeal against a bastardy order, on the ground that the statute had not been complied with by sending a notice by post to the residence of the woman after her decease. Paterson, J. (inter loq.) said, "If the appeal can be heard, I am disposed to think that the notice is sufficient; but can the appeal now be heard, as the statute requires it should be?" And the court held that the sessions ought to have heard the appeal. [QUAIN J.—Any other decision would have been perfectly monstrous, or the man would by the death of the woman have been deprived of his opportunity of appealing.] In some cases the mother's evidence would be immaterial, in others impossible to obtain. For example, suppose satisfactory independent proof of admissions by the father of his paternity, or suppose the mother is carried away or deserts her child. Then, is the father thereby to gain an exemption from liability, and the parish to maintain his child?

Besley in support of the rule.—Formerly the proceedings were instituted against the father of a bastard child in order to reimburse the parish, and not to cause payments to be made to the mother for its maintenance. By 4 & 5 Will 4, c. 76, s. 71, the mother was bound to maintain such child up to a certain age, and sect. 72 enacted that when such child became chargeable to the parish the overseers might apply for an order on the putative father, and the section went on to direct that "the court to which such application shall be made shall proceed to hear evidence thereon, and if it shall be satisfied, after hearing both parties, that the person so charged is really and in truth the father of such child, it shall make such order. . . Provided always that no such order shall be made unless the evidence of the mother of such bastard child shall be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to the satisfaction of such court." 2 & 3 Vict. c. 85 transfers the powers of quarter sessions to make such orders to special or petty sessions. Rex v. Ravenstone (5 T. R. 373), and Re Clayton (3 East. 58) are the only authorities in favour of the argument that the mother's evidence is not needed; but they were decided before the Act now in operation was passed. And in the Queen v. Read (9 Ad. & E. 619), an order was held to be bad which alleged that the sessions heard evidence in corroboration of the mother's statement, without adding that the corroboration was in some material particular. [QUAIN, J.—That does not help your argument much. Suppose a clearly proved admission of paternity by the man, would an order then be made without the evidence of the woman?] It is not necessary to go so far as to argue that it would. [HANNEN, J.—Might not a man be convicted of rape in the absence of the woman upon whom he is alleged to have committed the crime?] Probably, for, under certain circumstances, full proof of the offence might be given by other witnesses. The mother of a bastard child is not punishable under the Vagrant Act for running away and leaving her child chargeable: (Reg. v. Maude, 11 L. J. 120 M. C.) Even where the application being made before the birth of the child is on oath, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, yet sect. 6 of the later Act, which is to be read therewith, provides that it shall be lawful for the justices at the petty session to adjourn the hearing from time to time until the woman shall be able to attend. [HANNEN, J.—"It shall be lawful." The words are not imperative, and only aid to show a general intention that the woman shall be called as a witness.] If not imperative, they would be uselessly inserted. In Hodges v. Bennett it seems to have been taken for granted that the evidence of the mother was essential, although the case turned only on the point as to the necessity of her testimony given at the application being corroborated. Then this order is bad, because it is not in the form given by the schedule to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 60 (No. 8). It may not be necessary to follow the form exactly, but here an evasion is attempted by omitting the recital that the justices have heard the evidence of such woman. From the passing of the Act to the present time no like order has been made. Reg. v. Justices of Buckinghamshire (sup.) turns on a technicality.

Waddy, in reply, referred to a bastardy order (temp. Car. 2) set out in Reg. v. Eve (1 Show. 257), and expressed to be made on the evidence of persons named therein, of whom the mother was not one.

Cur. adv. vult.

HANNEN, J., delivered the judgment of the court.—This was a rule for a certiorari to bring up a bastardy order of justices for the purpose of its being quashed. The material facts are these: A bastard child was born on the 23rd Jan. 1872. On the 13th Feb. the mother made application to a justice for a summons against the alleged father under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2. On the 20th Feb., and before the hearing of the summons, the mother died. On the 27th the summons was heard, and an order made against the alleged father. The question we have to determine is whether the order was properly made without the evidence of the woman herself. This depends on the construction to be put on the 3rd section of the above-cited Act. By that section it is enacted that after the birth of such bastard child, on the appearance of the person so summoned, the justices in petty sessions shall hear the evidence of such woman, and such other evidence as she may produce, and, if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to the satisfaction of the justices, they may adjudge the man to be the putative father of such bastard child. It was contended, in opposition to the rule, that the object of the section was merely to clear up doubts as to the admissibility of the evidence of the mother, and that it did not render it obligatory that such evidence should be given if other sufficient proof could be afforded, and it was argued that this construction was to be adopted rather than one which would render proceedings in bastardy impossible, not only in case of death of the mother, but also in case of her being of unsound mind or otherwise incapable of being a witness. We, however, are of opinion that the statute makes it necessary that the mother shall be called as a witness. The remedy provided is given to the mother only. In the event of her death without having made an application, it is clear that no one else can take proceedings against the supposed father. It was to be expected, therefore, that in the event of the death of the mother before the hearing of the summons, proceedings which could not in that state of circumstances have been instituted should not further be prosecuted. But we are further of opinion that it was the intention of the Legislature, having regard to the peculiar nature of such inquiries, that the mother should support her accusation by her oath, and submit herself to cross-examination. The paternity of the child is a fact as to which no evidence can be satisfactory without the statement of the mother, and the peculiar language of the statute, requiring that the evidence of the mother shall be corroborated by other testimony, cannot, as it seems to us, be given reasonable effect to without holding that the mother herself must be a witness on her own behalf. With regard to the instances of alleged hardships, in which the production of the evidence of the mother may be impracticable, it is sufficient to say that these, if within the contemplation of the Legislature, were probably deemed to be of such rare occurrence as not to make it expedient to make an exception in their favour from the general law applicable to this peculiar class of cases. We do not pronounce any opinion upon the effect of the death of the mother after the hearing and before the appeal. That would undoubtedly be subject to consideration, which it is not necessary to enter upon in this case. For these reasons we think that the rule should be made absolute. Rule absolute.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Reported by H. LEIGH, Esqr., Barrister-at-law.

June 24 and 25, 1872.

ANTHONY v. THE BRECON MARKETS COMPANY.

Local Act—Erection of slaughterhouse—Consent of corporation—Licence of local board.

The corporation of B. was also the local board of health under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. By the Local Government Act, which is to be read with that Act, the clauses of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 34 (Towns Improvement Act) with respect to slaughterhouses are incorporated. The effect of the clauses as incorporated is to provide that no slaughterhouse shall be erected or used without the licence of the Board of Health. By the B. Market Act, passed subsequently to the Local Government Act for the better management of the property of the corporation of B., a company was incorporated, in which certain property of the corporation was vested, and the Act provided that the company, with the consent of the corporation in writing under the hand of the town clerk, might erect and maintain slaughterhouses in the borough. The company erected a slaughterhouse, having previously obtained the consent of the corporation in a memorandum of a resolution under the hand of the clerk; but the corporation, acting as local board, afterwards refused to licence the slaughterhouse.

The plaintiff, to whom the company had agreed to demise the tolls receivable under the Act for slaughtering cattle in the said slaughterhouse, brought an action against the company for not making a good title to the tolls. The Court of Exchequer decided that the consent given by the corporation alio intuitu did not operate as a consent by them as local board of health, and that therefore the defendants were liable. On appeal, Held, reversing the judgment below, that the consent given under sec. 65 of the Brecon Markets Act included the licence of the local board required by sec. 126 of the Towns Improvement Act, 1847.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Exchequer making absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff in an action brought for an alleged breach of agreement to let the tolls payable by the Brecon Markets Act, 1862.

The facts of the case will be found in the report of it on the argument of the rule (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 665); and the various sections of Acts of Parliament bearing upon the subject examined in the Exchequer Chamber are succinctly stated by Willes, J., delivering judgment infra.

The point in dispute was whether a consent given by the corporation of Brecon under 25 & 26 Vict. cap. clxxxvi. to erect a slaughterhouse in respect of which the tolls in question were to be taken, was given by them merely in respect of their rights under the above private Act, or whether it also amounted to a licence by them in their capacity of the Local Board of Health for Brecon under the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, sect. 126

Dowdeswell, Q.C. (with him G. B. Hughes) for the appellants.—The question is whether the defendants had a good title to let the tolls. First, the consent given by the corporation in pursuance of sect. 65 of the Brecon Markets Act, 1862 was a substitute for the licence required from the Local Board of Health. Secondly, if not, it was in itself a good licence. He referred to the various sections of the different Acts of Parliament discussed in the court below. The Legislature considered the Towns Improvement Act not to deal with matters of health, but questions respecting the safety and convenience of erections; for in the year following that in which the Act received the Royal assent the statute relating to local boards of health was passed, which operated to repeal the clause of the former Act relied on contra. It would be extraordinary if the same body had to give a double consent—viz., one assent quâ corporation, and the other quâ local board. Sect. 65 of the Brecon Market Act provides every required security. Under the Towns Improvement Act, s. 126, no licence to use is needed if there be a licence to erect the slaughterhouses. The Act contemplates offences which may be committed in unregistered slaughterhouses. "The rule as laid down by Sir Orlando Bridgman is, that 'the law will not allow the exposition to revoke or alter by construction of general words any particular statute, where the words may have their proper operation without it:'" (per Montague Smith, J., in Conservators of the Thames v. Hall, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 421.) And wherever there is a particular provision imposing one penalty, and an Act passed subsequently imposing another, the latter Act will be deemed to be a repeal of the former, as in Rex v. Cator (4 Burr. 2026) and Rex v. Davis (1 Leach Cr. Cas. 271), a doctrine quite borne out by Reg. v. Champneys (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 181) by the observation of Bovill, C. J., who says (p. 394): "It is a fundamental rule in the construction of statutes that a subsequent statute in general terms is not to be construed to repeal a previous particular statute, unless there are express words to indicate that such was the intention, or unless such an intention appears by necessary implication; we had occasion to consider that matter in the case of Thorpe v. Adams," in the same volume, at p. 120, where Willes, J. points out the distinction between an express repeal of a local Act and a general provision in a subsequent public Act inconsistent with the terms of the earlier one. [WILLES, J.—I only laid down there the general rule that generalia specialibus non derogant —part of the acrobatism of students.] See also per Lord Campbell, C. J. in Mitchell v. Brown (1 E. & E. 267). Here is a subsequent statute that gives authority to a corporate body to erect slaughterhouses in a particular manner, and supersedes and renders unnecessary the consent or licence to do so which was previously required by the statute 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98; for it would be straining language if, when the Legislature has said that persons may do a particular act in a particular way on a certain spot, subject to prescribed regulations, a local board could control that, and say, "You shall not do that on that spot, although it is a place designated by your special Act." Next, the consent of the local board is the same as the consent of the corporation. (Pedder v. The Mayor, &c., of Preston, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 540; 31 L. J. 291 C. P.) [WILLES, J.—There an account of the corporation generally was set off against an account of the corporation as a local board of health.] Precisely so; and the same principle appears in Nowell v. Mayor, &c., of Worcester, 9 Ex., expressed per Pollock, C.B., at p. 406. The licence was good. Sect. 76 authorised the taking of the tolls. By sect. 81 the tolls are granted to the company. Sect. 82 gives power to let the market. It is let to the plaintiffs, who say, "We are entitled to maintain an action against you for letting the tolls because you have not obtained a licence to erect this slaughterhouse." The only penalty is imposed on the person using the slaughterhouse.

Giffard, Q.C. (with him Rees), for the respondents.—There must be a licence for the slaughterhouse and use of it under the Towns Improvement Act, and there not being a licence, the plaintiff is entitled to the damages found by the jury, and it is not open for the other side to contend there was no proof of the breach relied on at the trial. The only point is whether the building erected by the defendants, which they purported to let, was a slaughterhouse in which tolls could be lawfully levied or not. The Acts relied on for the appellants have reference to totally different objects. The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act is for the purpose of allowing trading companies to obtain the franchise of holding a market, and to enable them to trade as private companies, and the sections which have been referred to in support of the plaintiff's case are provisions enabling them to manage their own property effectively. Then the bulk of the sections in the Towns Improvement Act relate to the public health (sects. 126, 127, 128, and 129), providing for the licensing, registration, and regulation of slaughterhouses. But the Local Government Act in effect repeals all the provisions having reference to slaughterhouses. The Brecon Act is but a local Act, and expresses merely a contract between the vendors and vendees of property, sanctioned indeed, but not devised, by the Legislature. The consent of the corporation was applied for and given, but the local board, who have to look after the general health, refused their licence. [BRETT, J.—Could the Legislature have meant that they in one capacity should allow a person to expend money in building, and then in another capacity refuse to license its erection?] There are cases going so far. [WILLES, J., intimated that it was unnecessary to cite them.] The Towns Improvement Act is not generally applicable to all boroughs. [BLACKBURN, J.—No, only to those in which it is adopted, and doubtless the Legislature in passing the Brecon Act were aware that the Towns Improvement Act had been adopted in Brecon.] The judgment below was right.

Dowdeswell, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 24.—WILLES, J.—This was an action brought by the plaintiff Anthony against the Brecon Markets Company stating that they had demised to him, amongst other things, the tolls of a new slaughterhouse, and the declaration showed, as a breach of the contract of letting the slaughterhouse, that they had not at any time during the period of the demise any right or title to let to farm to the plaintiff the tolls of the slaughterhouse, or any part thereof. It appeared at the trial that the defendants had erected a slaughterhouse, and had done so under the licence and consent of the corporation of Brecon. On the 14th May 1863, previously to its erection, the consent in writing of the corporation was obtained, purporting to be under sect. 65 of the Brecon Markets Act 1862. The document having been lost, evidence was given of its contents, and it appeared to have been in form of a resolution of the town council, signed by the town clerk, giving permission to the defendants to provide and maintain a slaughterhouse under sect. 65 of the Brecon Markets Act; not to maintain any particular slaughterhouse." The contention on the part of the plaintiff was that that was insufficient licence to erect a slaughterhouse, and he insisted that there ought to have been a licence pursuant to sect. 125 and the following sections of the Towns Improvement Act 1847, and he complained that by reason of the want of such licence the inspector of the Board of Health interfered with slaughtering, and prevented him earning the tolls of the slaughterhouse. The interference of the inspector went for nothing unless a licence was necessary under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 34, and the question arising for this court is whether consent of the corporation, under sect. 65 of the Brecon Markets Act, stood in the place of and included a licence under the Towns Improvement Act. The Court of Exchequer thought it did not, and founded their opinion on the notion that the application made to the corporation was in the express terms under the 65th section of the Brecon Markets Act, and was granted by the corporation intending to act under that 65th section, and, intending to act on that power only, they could not be deemed to have meant to act under the 125th and 126th sections of the Towns Improvement Act; that their intention was to be taken into consideration; that the consent was only in exercise of the power given under the local Act, and not in exercise of the power given under the public Act; and the special ground of the judgment was stated by the Lord Chief Baron to be that the 65th section of the Brecon Act had no intention to protect the public health, but was only introduced with respect to the claims of the Brecon Markets Company and the corporation on one another, and that still the power of the corporation under the public Act remained to be exercised. It is necessary to consider how these Acts of Parliament ran in point of time, and in the first place to deal with the local Act and its effect, and then to see what operation the public Act has upon it. It seems the corporation of Brecon, one of the most ancient in the kingdom, had got a right to various tolls for a fair or market, and it was thought advisable that power should be given of providing a slaughterhouse for the town, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 12 was passed, which gave the corporation power to provide slaughterhouses in the borough, and also gave them power to provide a market house in their borough, in exercise of their old right of market. They had before that provided a market house but not a slaughterhouse. They had become indebted to a great number of persons, and it was supposed that the tolls had not been properly collected, and would be better collected by constituting a new company or corporation to collect them. Accordingly, by 25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxvi., the Brecon Markets Company was formed of the creditors of the corporation, and by the recitals therein it is stated that it was expedient that parts of the estate of the corporation should be vested in certain members of the company, and provisions made for the discharge of the debts of the corporation. And further, that it was expedient to repeal the 1 Vict. c. xii., and make other provisions with respect to the markets and fairs, and that it was expedient that the company should be authorised to provide a new market place in the borough, to acquire a building for the purpose, and to remove the cattle market. Sect. 4 incorporated various Acts of Parliament, including the Markets and Fairs Act, but not the Towns Improvement Act, 1847. Provisions are made for the management of the company, for making payment to the corporation, and for the application of the tolls to be received. The latter provision is to be found in sect. 47. The tolls are to be applied to pay the debts of the corporation. By sect. 64 the company are to make, provide, and maintain a proper and sufficient place for holding a cattle market, and all such proper conveniences as they should think fit. That gives an absolute power to make a market. The corporation is given control over it. The next, sect. 65, is differently framed, and enacts that "the company from time to time, if and when they think fit, and with, but not without, the consent of the corporation, testified by writing under the hand of the mayor or town clerk, may provide and maintain slaughterhouses proper and sufficient for the slaughtering of cattle for the supply of the borough and its neighbourhood, upon such sites as they think expedient; but if any slaughterhouses be provided, they shall be provided as near as conveniently may be to the cattle market-place provided under this Act, and the slaughterhouses as provided shall be deemed part of that market-place. The only other sections in the Act to which it is necessary to refer are the 75th section, which gives power to the company to take tolls for slaughtering, and the 85th section, authorising the inspector of the company to enter into and inspect any building or place used for slaughtering cattle so as to keep up a monopoly, and sect. 86, by which the company are given control over the erection of slaughterhouses. Under that Act application was made to the corporation, and consent given by the town council and signed by the town clerk according to the provisions of sect. 65. Pursuant to that consent, the slaughterhouse was made. Everything up to that point appears to be regular, and it is in consequence of the operation of the Public Act that the present difficulty arises. It is to be observed that this analysis of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxxvi., clearly shows that the consent of the corporation under sect. 65 had something more than the interest of the debtors in its regard. The payment of the debts was provided for by other sections. The power to erect a market-house was given absolutely without any such consent at all, and it is with respect to the erection of the slaughterhouse that the consent is required. And for an obvious reason, because the slaughterhouse might become a nuisance, and the corporation, having charge of the inhabitants of the borough for their welfare, were entrusted with power to consent to or dissent from the erection of a slaughterhouse. On that point, without looking to the Public Act, it is difficult to follow the reasoning of the Court of Exchequer when they say that the consent of the corporation had nothing to do with public purposes. It is certainly difficult to consider the consent under sect. 65 given otherwise than with a view to those consequences. Now, it is necessary to turn to the public Act for the purpose of tracing the power which the corporation had to give a licence for the erection of a slaughterhouse apart from the privileges contained in the 25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxxvi.; and here we must begin with the session of Parliament in 1847. In this session two Acts were passed relating to slaughterhouses. One, the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 14, called the Markets and Fairs Act, 1847, and in the 17th and following sections thereof, up to and including sect. 20, provisions are contained for the erection of slaughterhouses. To these provisions it is unnecessary to refer more particularly, except in reviewing the history of the law giving a power to erect slaughterhouses under this Act or the special Act. The other statute of the same year relating to slaughterhouses is the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 34, by which, in sects. 125 to 131 inclusive, various powers are given as to slaughterhouses to commissioners appointed under the statute. It is called the Towns Improvement Act. By sect. 125 "the commissioners may license such slaughterhouses and knackers' yards as they from time to time think proper for slaughtering cattle within the limits of the special Act." Then sect. 126 enacts that "no place shall be used or occupied as a slaughterhouse or knacker's yard within the said limits which was not in such use or occupation at the time of the passing of the special Act, and has so continued ever since, unless and until a licence for the erection thereof, or for the use and occupation thereof as a slaughterhouse or knacker's yard, has been obtained from the commissioners." There the Legislature is speaking of future slaughterhouses, and omitting those previously erected. What is that licence to be for? It has hardly been even suggested that there was to be a separate licence for the erection of a slaughterhouse, and a subsequent licence for the use when erected. That might be a possible construction of the enactment, but it would practically be such a subtle and refined construction, preventing people spending their money on slaughterhouses, that it is one which ought not to be adopted. I think the true meaning of that was that a licence to erect a slaughterhouse means primâ facie to erect a slaughterhouse which shall be used as a slaughterhouse, and not that there should be two separate licences, one for the erection, and another for the use. True, in two subsequent sections the abuse of the slaughterhouse may lead to its suspension or its abolition, and perhaps then the licence for the use may come into play separately. But a licence given for the erection of a slaughterhouse means a licence for a house to be used as a slaughterhouse. The 126th section of the public Act, compared with sect. 25 of the Brecon Markets Act, shows that. That statute was followed by another, which made the corporation commissioners, substituting them for the commissioners under 10 and 11 Vict. c. 34. That later statute was 21 and 22 Vict. c. 98, known as the Local Government Act, 1858, an Act which is to be classed in the same category with the Acts relating to public health, and it refers to them in terms unnecessary now to dwell upon. By sect. 34 of that Act the duty of carrying into execution the Act is to be vested in a local board, consisting (1) in corporate boroughs of the mayor, aldermen and burgesses, acting by the council. The town council is the proper board, and therefore it was that I observed that the consent given was not a mere formal consent by the corporation, but a consent by the very council which, under the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 24, is constituted the local board. Then by sect. 45 the provisions of "The Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847," with respect to the following matters, shall be incorporated with this Act, and one of those matters is (7) with respect to slaughter-houses. Therefore, looking into the history of the licence to erect slaughter-houses under the public Act, it is found that, at the time when the 25 & 26 Vict. passed, the proper persons to give licence for the erection and use of a slaughterhouse were the corporation, acting by the council; and on turning back to sect. 65 of the local Act, on which our judgment must be given, this comes under contemplation, viz., that the corporation act first in the ordinary way by consenting. Sect. 65 says, "with the consent of the corporation," and in fact that was acted on by the council giving the consent. You have the same persons giving the consent, the same persons to receive the consent, and you have the thing consented to be licensed the same. The language is somewhat different, but the effect of that language is precisely the same, because the language of the Towns Improvement Act, s. 126, is "licence to erect and use," whereas the language of sect. 65 of the Brecon Act, is "consent to provide and maintain" a slaughter-house. The donors, therefore, are the same, the effects of the licence are the same, the language is the same, the donees the same, and the object, as already observed, for which the corporation must have been intended to give consent under sect. 65 the same (because if no other object is suggested the natural object is naturally presumed), viz., the preservation of public health and convenience. It seems therefore to result necessarily from the comparison of the two sections, on what has been done under sect. 64, that the consent under that section did include a licence under sect. 126. Now, the way in which the question was reserved at the trial ought to be regarded. The question was whether there ought not to have been a licence of the corporation as local board, and it would probably be inconvenient that we should go into the third point made by Mr. Dowdeswell, for that was rather raised by his ingenuity than actually reserved. But, looking at that question, it appears that the consent under sect. 65 is a licence under sect. 126. Whether by the provision as to the use of the slaughterhouse under sect. 129 in this Act, the Brecon Company are entrusted with the privileges of managing this slaughterhouse, or whether they are to fall under the supervision of the corporation, are questions on which it is unnecessary to give an opinion. It would be desirable that they should do so. It appears that the company have been recognised by 25 & 26 Vict. c. clxxxvi., as persons entrusted in the welfare of the borough by Parliament. Very likely the conduct of the market will be such as that no one in the borough would like to interfere. We think the market may be so used, and that the judgment of the Exchequer must be reversed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I agree in the result of my brother Willes's judgment, and only add these few words to express distinctly that we do not decide one point which is of very considerable importance. The result of the conflict of Acts is that where there is a borough in which the Towns Improvement Act is adopted, no new slaughter-house can be set up without a licence to erect and use granted by the local board, acting by the town council, and subject to the many provisions mentioned in the 129th section, in which the right to use a new slaughterhouse is on abuse taken away. Now when there is a borough in which that Act has not been adopted, and in consequence persons are permitted to have a market, and in the local Act there is a clause requiring them to have a licence, that incorporates the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act and gives a market place; and it is a question of general importance whether the board authorised under the Market Act to erect and use a slaughterhouse of this sort are to any and to what extent under the control of the local government board. I am anxious to point out that we do not decide that. I think that the licence given by the corporation, who are the local board, is to all intents and purposes a licence to erect and use, and therefore, either way, the judgment should be reversed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I concur with my brother Willes, and for the reasons he has given.

MELLOR, LUSH, and BRETT, JJ., also concurred.

Judgment reversed.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 29, 1871; Feb. 15, and April 30, 1872.

(Present, Lord CHELMSFORD, Lord WESTBURY, Lord COLONSAY, and Lord CAIRNS.)

DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH v. THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

Compensation—Award—Admissibility of umpire's evidence—Riparian proprietor—Lands "injuriously affected"—Lands Clauses Act 1845, s. 63—Thames Embankment Act, s. 27.

The plaintiff was the lessee of a certain house and premises, abutting on the river Thames at Whitehall, for the residue of a term of 99 years. Part of the premises in question consisted of a causeway leading from the garden of the house, and running out into the river at low water mark. This causeway had for a long period been used for landing and embarking goods. The defendants, under the powers of the Thames Embankment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 93) constructed an embankment, and in the course of so doing took away the causeway and a landing place connected with it and direct access from the plaintiff's premises to the river was cut off by a public roadway.

The plaintiff thereupon gave the defendants, under the Lands Clauses Act 1845, notice of arbitration and claim for compensation, stating in his notice that he was owner of the causeway, as lessee, and entitled to the use of the landing place, and claiming compensation for their removal and for the depreciation in value of the house and lands, and otherwise injuriously affecting them.

The arbitrators referred the question of amount to an umpire, who eventually awarded 8325*l. to the plaintiff. This sum the defendants refused to pay, and an action on the award was brought. Among other pleas, the defendants pleaded that the sum awarded included damages and compensation in respect of which neither the arbitrators nor the umpire had any jurisdiction whatever. At the trial the defendants called the umpire as a witness, who stated that among other items he had awarded* 5000*l.* for diminution in value of the house, and that in fixing the amount he had taken into consideration the loss of privacy and other "amenities" by reason of the defendants' works.

Held, first (affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber): That the umpire's evidence was admissible to show what matters were considered by him, and generally the course of the proceedings up to the making of the award; but not to show the considerations which affected the umpire's mind in determining the quantum of compensation. Secondly (reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber): That the plaintiff's property was "injuriously affected" by the interposition between it and the river of an embankment to be used as a public highway; and that the umpire was, therefore, authorised both by the special Act and the Lands Clauses Act, to give the plaintiff compensation.

Per Lord Cairns: The plaintiff was, as a riparian proprietor, entitled to compensation for depreciation in the value of his property arising from a deprivation of the right to water frontage.

ERROR from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in part affirming, and in part reversing, a judgment of the Court of Exchequer.

The facts are shortly stated in the head-note, and fully in the reports in the courts below: (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 906; 23 Id. 255; L. Rep. 3 Exch. 306; 5 Id. 221.)

The following judges were present at the hearing:—Martin, B., Byles, Blackburn, Smith, and Hannen, JJ., and Cleasby, B.

Sir R. Palmer, Q.C. and Kemplay for the plaintiff in error.

Hawkins, Q.C. and Philbrick for the defendants in error.

The following cases were cited as to the admissibility of the umpire's evidence:

The following questions were proposed to the judges: First, whether the evidence given by the umpire was admissible; and if so, to what extent, and for what purpose? Secondly, whether, upon the facts, admissions, and evidence set forth in the case and the appendix (so far as such evidence was admissible), the plaintiff in error is entitled to a verdict on the issue raised on the seventh plea?

CLEASBY, B.—Two questions were put by your Lordships to the judges in this case—First, whether the evidence given by the umpire was admissible; and if so, to what extent, and for what purpose? Secondly, whether, upon the facts, admissions, and evidence set forth in the case and appendix (so far as the evidence was admissible) the plaintiff in error is entitled to a verdict on the issued raised on the seventh plea? I answer the first question by giving it as my humble opinion—First, that the umpire was a competent witness, like any other person, to prove matters material to the issues; secondly, that questions might be properly put to him for the purpose of proving the proceedings before him, so as to arrive at what was the subject matter of adjudication when the proceedings closed, and he was about to make his award; thirdly, that as regards the effect of the award no questions could properly be put to the umpire for the purpose of proving how it was arrived at, or what items it included, or what was the meaning which he intended at the time to be given to it. First, with regard to the competency of the umpire as a witness, I am not aware of any real objection to it. With respect to those who fill the office of judge it has been felt that there are grave objections to their conduct being made the subject of cross-examination and comment (to which hardly any limit could be put) in relation to proceedings before them; and, as everything which they can properly prove can be proved by others, the courts of law discountenance, and I think I may say prevent them being examined. But those objections do not apply at all to a person selected as arbitrator for the particular occasion by the parties, and he comes within the general obligation of being bound to give evidence. The practice entirely agrees with this: for it is every day's practice for the arbitrator to make an affidavit where a question arises as to what took place before him, and I have known him to be examined as a witness without objection: secondly, being competent generally, it follows that he may be questioned as to what took place before him, so as to show over what subject matter he was exercising jurisdiction. He might, therefore, prove that a claim was made for compensation in respect of one matter, A., and also in respect of another matter, B., and that both were entertained without objection; or he might prove that claim B. was objected to and rejected, or that it was after objection received. He might, in short, give any evidence for the purpose of showing what was the subject matter into which he was inquiring, and upon which his judgment therefore was to be founded. This would enable us to judge whether he was acting within his jurisdiction or not, for a person exceeds his jurisdiction by prosecuting a judicial inquiry in a matter over which he has no jurisdiction, quite independent of the judgment eventually given. And it deserves notice, that as to this evidence the umpire would be no better witness than any other person, and would not have it in his power afterwards, by his own evidence, to sustain or destroy the award. He could be corrected by any other person present at the proceedings, including the shorthand writer, if there was one; thirdly, as soon as the award is made it must speak for itself. It must be applied, as in other cases, by extrinsic evidence to the subject matter, but cannot be explained or varied or extended by extrinsic evidence of the intention of the person making it. There appear to me to be the strongest objections against allowing the umpire to be examined for the purpose of showing what he intended to be included in the award. In the first place it is (and, indeed, must be) a written instrument, and the general rule is applicable, that its effect must be collected from the instrument itself. The subject matter to which it is applicable is ascertained by proof of the subject matter of the inquiry. I cannot think that if the umpire admitted upon the inquiry claims A. and B., and made a general award of one sum for compensation, he could be allowed to prove that in arriving at that sum he had rejected claim B. from the computation, or vice versâ, if he had rejected claim B. upon the inquiry could he be allowed to prove that he had included it in the computation. The award taken by itself is something certain and fixed, and settles the rights of the parties; but if evidence be admitted of the intention and state of mind of the umpire when he made it its certainty is destroyed, and its effect depends upon his memory, clearness of intellect, and perhaps upon his views and wishes taken up afterwards. Surely it would be a most dangerous thing, after an award has been made which becomes of itself the foundation of a right, to allow anyone to retain the power of explaining it away, or even of defeating it. We can properly investigate the acts of a judge or arbitrator in prosecuting a particular inquiry, and his judgment founded upon it; but how can we investigate his secret thoughts or intentions? He is the only master of them, and what he says must be conclusive, as there is nothing which can contradict or explain it. The objection to such evidence would be more striking if, instead of the umpire being appealed to, two arbitrators had joined in an award. Could each have been questioned as to the composition of the award? Although they had agreed as to the result and amount of the award, it would not at all follow that they agreed in the steps by which it was arrived at. Indeed we know that agreement in such a result is often only arrived at by some concession and compromise, and in case of a difference in the evidence of what was intended, which is to govern and influence the award? Or it may be further illustrated by supposing the case, instead of going to arbitration, to go to a jury. There is an assessor who presides, and he directs the jury to reject certain heads of claim and to compensate for others. The jury give a general verdict. Could the twelve jurymen be called as witnesses to show to what extent they had severally acted upon the direction given, or against it, so as to vitiate the verdict by showing that some of the jury included in it matters they could not properly include? I submit not, and that the verdict must speak for itself and be applied to the proper subject matter, viz., so much of the claim put forward as had been entertained. An authority has been referred to which does not seem to agree with the opinion which I have ventured to express, the case of Brophy v. Holmes (2 Molloy, 1), decided by Hart, L.C. A question arose in that case whether a certain equitable claim under a guarantee had been disposed of by arbitrators in a reference of all matters in difference. It appeared that the claim had been brought forward by the plaintiff, but the defendant protested the arbitrators had no right to consider it, and gave them a caution not to entertain it. The Lord Chancellor says, "If the arbitrators said we think the guarantee not within our jurisdiction, that would be one case." All would agree, I apprehend, that so far the view taken was correct, because there would be an act of the arbitrators in refusing to entertain the claim which would be decisive. But in what follows the Lord Chancellor appears to think the state of mind of the arbitrators is the subject of inquiry and not their acts; for he goes on to say, "The plaintiff might have examined each of the arbitrators, and put this plain interrogatory to each, Did you abstain in consequence of the caution, or for any other reason, from weighing the effect of the guarantee, or did you look into it and all the matters in difference between the parties, and conclude on the whole case?" I beg most respectfully to dissent from this, as not being a correct mode of dealing with the case. The acts of the arbitrators, and not the hidden operations of their minds, are the proper subjects of inquiry. If the claim was made and received, and evidence given upon it, this would be decisive of the jurisdiction exercised by the arbitrators, quite independent of any reservation in the minds of the arbitrators at the time. One cannot help asking what would be the effect in this case of the arbitrators giving different answers to the supposed question. It certainly strikes me very strongly that the state of the arbitrator's or judge's mind is of no importance, except so far as it is embodied in some judicial act done by him. His mind may fluctuate and change more than once until the decision is delivered, and then, whether it be upon an interlocutory or final matter, the case is so far bound. I wish to add that what has been said has reference only to such a proceeding as the present, and not to a proceeding of a different nature, viz., when an application is made (the submission having been made a rule of court) to refer back the award, or set it aside on the ground of some mistake or misconception of the arbitrator so as to make it wrong that the award should stand. In the exercise of such a jurisdiction the court to which the application was made would probably reject no means of informing itself whether the arbitrator had proceeded upon such a mistake or misconception. This was the nature of the application in the case Re Dare Valley Railway Company (L. Rep. 6 Eq. 429), where Giffard, V.C., thought a written statement by the arbitrator of his reasons admissible in considering whether the arbitrator had proceeded upon an erroneous view of his duties or not. The opinion given has reference only to an action at law upon the award, in which of course the rules of evidence must be attended to. I beg, therefore, to answer your Lordships' first question, by giving my humble opinion that the umpire was a competent witness, that he might be properly questioned as to the subject of claim put forward and inquired into before him, and that he could not be properly questioned as to the matters which he included in or excluded from his award. I am authorised by my brother Bramwell to state (by permission of your Lordships) that he was misunderstood when he gave his opinion in the Court of Exchequer, if he was supposed to hold that the umpire was not a competent witness; he did not hold that he was not competent for any purpose, but only that he could not be questioned as to the composition of his award. This appears from the report of what he said, especially from that in the Law Journal. The second question put to the judges is, whether upon the facts, admissions, and evidence set forth in the case (so far as the evidence was admissible) the plaintiff in error is entitled to a verdict on the issue raised on the seventh plea. The seventh plea alleges that the amount awarded by the umpire included certain damages and compensation in respect of which the umpire had no jurisdiction. The substance of the plea may be regarded as being that the award was made in respect of some claim for compensation which the claimant was not lawfully entitled to under his claim, and over which the umpire had not jurisdiction. And this raises the main question which has been argued before your Lord ships, viz., whether the Duke of Buccleuch can claim compensation for the depreciated value of Montague House, resulting from the loss of privacy, and the noise and dust caused by a public road between it and the river. Before answering the second question put to the judges, and which turns to some extent upon the form of the claim sent in by the Duke, and the terms of the plea, I which to be allowed to consider generally what compensation he could properly claim. He was the owner of Montague House for the unexpired term of a lease under the Crown, with an agreement to remain for ninety-nine years, from the 5th Jan. 1855. The premises adjoined the river, and the natural flow of the river brought it at high water up to his gardens. He had at the north-east corner of the gardens a landing-place and steps, with a causeway running down to low water mark, which gave him the convenient use of the river at all states of the tide. The ground between the house and the river is described in the lease of 1810 as being used and occupied for ornamental gardens or pleasure ground, and as being separated from the river by iron rails only. So that by the terms of his lease, which expressly gave him in the fullest terms all rights of water and other rights belonging to the premises, the Duke was entitled, as riparian owner, to the regular flow of the water all along the extremity of his garden. This valuable water right insured to the house and garden privacy, quiet, freedom from the noise and rattle of carriages by night and by day, and freedom from the dust of a public road. Now, the deprivation of the water right is clearly an injurious affecting of the premises to which it is annexed within the proper meaning of that term. It would be an actionable wrong at the suit of the owner of the premises unless justified by special Acts, and it is unnecessary to rely upon the 27th section of the special Act, which recognises the right to compensation for loss of river frontages, or to the 4th section of the Act. The last-named section, however, ought to be noticed, because it expressly makes such a right come within the meaning of the word "land" for the purposes of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. We must take it, therefore, that the defendants in taking from the Duke this right are to compensate as they would be bound to do if they took his land, with this difference, perhaps, they if they really took his land they might be said to take something separate from his house and garden, but by taking this right they take something which only exists as annexed to his house and garden, and may so be said to form a part of them. We have only then to apply to such a case the 63rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which enacts, that in estimating the compensation regard shall be had "not only to the value of the land" (in this case water right) taken, but to the damage sustained by the severance of the land taken from the other lands, or by otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands by the exercise of the powers of the special Act. The claimant may say to the defendants in the present case, "You sever and take away the water right annexed to my house and garden, and which gave value for habitation by securing to them privacy and freedom from noise and dust, and in the exercise of the powers of your Act, by constructing a public road where the water right existed, you actually deprive me of my privacy and my freedom from noise and dust." Independent of the 4th section of the Special Act, making the water right land for the purpose of compensation, it cannot be doubted that the construction of an embankment where the water flowed before would be an injurious affecting of the house and garden, and entitle the Duke of Buccleuch to compensation. And it appears to me that as regards the amount of compensation he may fairly and properly say that by the injurious act of the company his house and garden are changed from river-side premises to road-side premises; and it follows that in estimating the damage you must take into account the advantages of the one and the disadvantages of the other. would be unreasonable in such a case to separate the making of the road in the place of the river from the consequences of it, and to say that there was jurisdiction to compensate for the one and not for the other. I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with the authorities relating to this subject. It is not necessary to rely upon the case of the Stockport Railway Company (33 L. J. 251, Q. B.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426) in furtherance of the view above taken, because that view is not founded upon any land of the claimant; for example, the causeway being taken by the defendants. And it cannot be said that there is any analogy between the case of Brand v. The Hammersmith Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 H. of L. Cas. 171; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238), where the claim was for vibration caused by the use of the railway constructed on land to which the claimant had no title, and the present case, where the claim is for the injurious act of depriving the plaintiff of the flow of the river to which he had a complete right, by erecting an embankment for a public road in the place of it. I cannot help thinking that the claimant has caused the chief difficulty in this case by making the alleged ownership of the jetty or causeway the pivot of the whole case, as if the taking of the slip of land was the only injurious act, the only damnum cum injuriâ, whereas that appears to me to be only part of the case, the main grievance being the destruction of the valuable water right. If the only wrongful act against the defendants had been the taking of that strip of land leading, it might be to some distant stream, and the embankment and road had been built, not upon the site of a public river adjoining the claimant's property but upon other land of the defendants, I should hesitate in saying that because the taking this strip of land satisfied the word "injurious" in the statute, and so gave the claimant a locus standi for compensation, it could properly be made the foundation for the recovery of compensation for the inconvenience and annoyance or depreciated value of the house and garden caused by a public road so near, although the Stockport case, already referred to, is some authority for such a conclusion. Such being the real title of the claimant to compensation, it still remains to consider the exact question for compensation upon the issue joined on the seventh plea. The foundation of the umpire's jurisdiction is the claim made by the claimant. The umpire has nothing to do with the title of the claimant or the extent of his rights, but he is to assess the proper amount of compensation to which he is entitled in respect of what he claims. Before the claimant can recover the amount awarded, he can be put to proof of his title to what he claims, as is done in the present case by the second and third pleas. Upon the issues joined on those pleas, which involve the title of the duke to the soil of the jetty, no question is put by your lordships to the judges, and therefore I offer no opinion. It will be seen by reference to the terms of the claim that the duke claims to be owner of the jetty or causeway by virtue of the lease, and he claims compensation for the defendants having entered upon it and taken it, and having shut up and removed the landing place to it; and he also claims further large damages to his messuage and lands by the otherwise injuriously affecting the same by the execution of the works authorised by the Act, and by the exercise of the power of the Act. Now this claim makes no distinct reference to the depriving the messuage and lands of the water privilege as a head of compensation, except so far as the landing-place is shut up, and it may seem to put forward the taking of the land of the claimant, that is the jetty, as enabling him to claim compensation for the other premises being injuriously affected. At the same time the words are "otherwise injuriously affected," and they may, I think, be fairly read as putting forward a claim for a separate damnum cum injuriâ to the premises by the works which deprive the claimant of his water right all along his garden, and substitute for the river a public road. It is unfortunate that the claim is so defectively worded. I do not presume to say that it is clear that the view which appears to have been taken of it is an incorrect one, viz., that it limits the claim for deprivation of property to the jetty and landing-place only, but still it does appear to me that no undue effect is given to the words "otherwise injuriously affecting" by making them include the wrongful diversion of the flow of the river by an embankment and public road as well as the damaging consequence to the house and garden by that being done. If this construction of the claim be allowed, then for the reasons already given the umpire did not go beyond his jurisdiction in taking into account upon the claim the depreciatory effect upon the house and garden of having an embankment and public road constructed where there was a flowing river before. And I, therefore, answer the second question by giving my humble opinion that upon the facts, admissions, and evidence, so far as it is admissible, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict upon the issue joined on the seventh plea.

HANNEN, J.—My Lords.—In answer to the first question proposed by your Lordships, I say that I am of opinion that the evidence of the umpire was admissible, and, in support of this opinion, I beg leave to refer to the reasons given by my brother Blackburn in his judgment in the court below, to which I am unable to add anything. In answer to the second question, I say that I am of opinion that the verdict, on the issue raised by the seventh plea, should be entered for the plaintiff. The point submitted for our consideration is, whether the umpire, in assessing the sum he has awarded to the plaintiff, has included any head of damage not properly the subject of compensation. The facts which it is necessary to mention are these: The plaintiff is lessee under the Crown of a house and grounds abutting on the north bank of the Thames, to which house and grounds belonged a causeway projecting into the river, of which causeway the plaintiff had the exclusive enjoyment. The defendants, acting under the powers of the Act for embanking the north side of the River Thames, entirely deprived the plaintiff of the causeway, and constructed the Thames Embankment along the whole line of his garden which previously abutted on the river. No doubt has been entertained by any of the judges who have had to consider this case that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in respect of the taking of his causeway and the consequent injury to his property by depriving it of the direct access which that afforded to the Thames. The difference of opinion has been whether to any, and if to any, to what, further extent the plaintiff can claim compensation. This depends on the true construction and effect of the 63rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which is incorporated with the Special Act, and which enacts, that in estimating the purchase money or compensation to be paid by the promoters "regard shall be had not only to the value of the land to be purchased or taken by the promoters of the undertaking, but also to the damage, if any, to be sustained by the owner of the lands by reason of the severing of the lands taken from the other lands of such owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands, by the exercise of the powers of the Act." It is not disputed that the taking of the plaintiff's causeway brings him within the terms of this section as an owner of lands taken, and consequently that he is entitled to compensation for any damage sustained by severing the causeway from the house and garden; and the question is narrowed to this: has the umpire awarded compensation for anything not properly coming within the concluding words of the section, as "damage by reason of the plaintiff's lands being otherwise injuriously affected by the exercise of the powers of the Act?" It becomes necessary to see what claims the umpire has in fact allowed under this head of damage. They may be divided thus:—First, damage resulting from the making the embankment against the plaintiff's garden, not only upon the causeway, but along the whole front of his property, and by the interposition of the embankment between the plaintiff's land and the present shore of the river. Secondly, damage resulting from the use of the embankment when made as a roadway. I think that the umpire rightly included both these heads of claim in the compensation awarded, but the justification for his doing so rests upon different grounds in each case. With regard to the first, the plaintiff, as owner of land abutting on a navigable river, was entitled to a right of access to the stream along his whole frontage, and not merely at the spot where his jetty projected. If in the course of time it should have become advantageous to the plaintiff to use the whole of the land abutting on the Thames as a wharf, or for any other purpose, he would have been entitled to do so, and anything which would permanently deprive him of that right of property would be the subject of an action if it were not authorised by Act of Parliament. The causeway or jetty was only constructed for the purpose of more conveniently using the right of access to the river, which might have been exercised, if desired, at any other spot. This right of access to the river is expressly recognised by the 4th and 27th sections of the Special Act as one of the subjects of compensation. The 27th section makes special provison with reference to the compensation which the owner may be entitled to claim for the damage, if any, "to be sustained by loss of river frontage, or otherwise by reason of such embankment and roadway, or other the exercise of any of the powers of the Act." It seems to me clear, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled under this section to compensation, not merely for the damage resulting from the destruc- of his causeway by the embankment and roadway, but also for the loss thereby occasioned of his whole right of frontage. The extent of that damage must necessarily depend on the quantity of land interposed between the plaintiff's former frontage and the river, and on the level and disposition of its surface. These injuries to the plaintiff's property in the causeway and right of frontage are brought about by one and the same act, namely, the making of the embankment, and are inseparable the one from the other. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to be compensated for the whole loss he has sustained from the combined injuries resulting from the embankment, such as it is, being constructed along his whole frontage, and ought not to be limited to so much of the loss as can be ascribed to the mere deprivation of the causeway alone. The second head of damage, namely, that resulting from the use of the embankment when made as a roadway, is the one on which the objection to the umpire's award has been chiefly based. Again, referring to the language of the 63rd section of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, it is clear that the concluding words of the section give compensation not only for the damage sustained by reason of the severance of the lands taken from those left, but also for damage otherwise occasioned to the lands not taken, by the exercise of the powers of this Act. It appears to me that these words are wide enough to embrace damages much more extended than those now the subject of consideration; but construing them as applying only to damage strictly ejusdem generis with severance, I cannot doubt that the damage arising to the owner of property from the junction to his lands of others converted to a purpose detrimental to him is ejusdem generis with the damage arising from having his lands severed from others. It is obvious that the mischief which would arise from having the embankment converted into a road would be much greater than it would be if it were converted into a garden. If the Act of Parliament had not been passed the plaintiff would have had it in his power, by refusing to part with his rights, to prevent the land now made into a road from being so converted. It seems but just that if his power to prevent mischief being done to him is taken away by law, he should receive compensation according to the measure of the injury inflicted upon him. The language of the 63rd section is comprehensive enough to secure to the plaintiff such compensation; why, then, should it be construed in a more restricted sense so as to inflict on the plaintiff a wrong without redress? It has indeed been argued that this restricted construction ought to be put on the Act, because otherwise persons whose lands are taken will be able to obtain complete redress, whereas persons whose lands are not taken may suffer injury for which compensation is not given. I cannot see the force of this reasoning. It may well be that there is a hardship in awarding no compensation to a person who sustains loss for the public benefit unless his lands are taken; but there is a manifest difference between the position of a person whose lands are taken and that of one whose lands are not. The former was possessed of something without which the proposed public purpose could not be accomplished; he could have prevented the carrying out of the undertaking if he had not been deprived of his power by Act of Parliament, whereas the person whose lands are not taken had no such power, and could not have hindered the appropriation of lands not his own to any purpose not amounting to a nuisance. The Legislature has recognised this right of property, and the power growing out of it, as a fact, but has guarded against its abuse by compelling its possessor to avail himself of it only as means of obtaining a fair compensation for real damage. But it is contended that the decision of your lordships in Brand v. Hammersmith Railway Company (ubi sup.) is an authority that the plaintiff is not entitled to compensation for damage resulting from the use of the embankment as a roadway, because it is said, in that case as in this, the claimant was entitled to some compensation for obstruction to light and air, which would have been the subject of action but for this Act of Parliament, and which might therefore have been made an instrument by which to compel the company to give compensation for all injury resulting from the execution of the works authorised by their Act. It is, however, to be observed, that both the noble lords who gave judgment in favour of the railway company in that case agreed that the sections of the Lands Clauses Act referred to, includiug the 63rd, were not applicable. Lord Colonsay gives the reason, namely, "that no land belonging to the plaintiffs or in which they were interested was taken or touched by the railway;" and Lord Chelmsford expresses his regret that he is "compelled very relunctantly to come to the conclusion that the Legislature has not provided for the case of the respondents, but has left them without remedy." I respectfully submit, therefore, that that decision is not an authority applicable to the present case, where, as land of the claimant has been taken, the 63rd section of the Lands Clauses Act is applicable, and where, therefore, the omission to provide a remedy for real damage, which my Lord Chelmsford regretted in Brand's case, does not exist. This view of the effect of the Lands Clauses Act has the authority of the late Mr. Justice Crompton in the case of The Stockport Railway Company (ubi sup.), and I beg leave to refer to the reasons given by that learned judge in support of the opinion I have expressed.

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords,—In answer to your Lordships' first question, I have to state that I am of opinion that the evidence of the umpire was admissible, so far as it tended to show that he had exceeded his jurisdiction by including in the award compensation for matters for which he was not authorised to give compensation. I stated fully in the judgment I delivered in the Exchequer Chamber in this case (5 L. Rep. Ex. 228; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 256) my reasons for coming to this opinion, and then quoted all the authorities that I am aware of bearing on the question; and, as nothing has occurred to me in addition to what I there stated, I think it better to refer your Lordships to that printed judgment than to repeat the same words. I have only to add that I think the evidence of a juryman as to what were the grounds of the verdict of himself and his fellow jurors has always been rejected on grounds of public policy, some of which are well indicated in the opinion which my brother Martin is about to deliver to your Lordships in this case, and which I have had the advantage of perusing. I think those grounds are not applicable to an umpire, and consequently I do not think that a decision by your Lordships that the umpire's evidence is admissible would render it necessary to admit the evidence of jurors. In answer to the second question, I am of opinion that the plaintiff (the Duke of Buccleuch) is not entitled to a verdict on the issue raised on the 7th plea. I come to this conclusion because I think that the evidence shows that the umpire has included in his award compensation for the inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff in common with all owners of house property adjoining to the Thames Embankment, from the the general carrying out of the undertaking authorised by the Legislature; which inconvenience was not caused by the severance of the causeway from the rest of Montague House; and that to give compensation for such inconvenience was beyond the jurisdiction of the umpire. No fresh case bearing on this point has arisen since the decision below, except that in your Lordships' House, of The City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter (2 L. Rep. H. of L. Sc. App. 78.) The facts in that case approached very nearly to the present case; and the reasoning of the Lords Chancellor and Lord Chelmsford seems to me to be in favour of the view I take of the matter; but I do not think that the decision of your Lordships can properly be said to conclude this case. The present case was very much considered by the judges who formed the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and no fresh argument has occurred to me, nor did I hear anything suggested during the argument at your Lordships' Bar, which had not occurred either to those judges who took a different view from me, and whose reasons were fully stated by M. Smith, J. in his judgment, or to those judges who took the same view as myself; and I am unable to add anything to the judgment delivered by me in the court below, to the report of which I refer your Lordships without attempting to restate it in other words. I think it better to do so, because those words were adopted by the learned judges who agreed with me and expressed their opinion as well as my own. But there is an expression of opinion in my brother Martin's opinion which leads me to add this: If an action of trespass was brought, and the defence was that there was a public highway over the spot, if at the trial it turned out that those who dedicated the highway had mistaken the boundaries of their own land, and run the proposed highway over a small portion of the plaintiff's land, there would no doubt be a verdict for the plaintiff; and the judge ought to direct the jury in assessing damages to take into account not only the interference with the plaintiff's property but all damages directly arising therefrom. But I think it would be a misdirection if he were to add that they should in addition give damages for the "traffic, and dust, and dirt, and commotion and noise" on the part of the intended high road which was on the defendants' own land, and which, therefore, the defendants might lawfully dedicate to the public, and so lawfully bring all these things there, even though the jury were of opinion that the roads would not have been brought so near the plaintiff's land had the trespass not been committed. The supposed plaintiff could no doubt force them to divert the highway and go round his land; but I think the damages I have supposed would be too remote. I mention this because I think the umpire has in fact given compensation for such damages. The supposed case is perhaps only idem per idem, but it may illustrate the argument; and I mention it because I perceive that my brother Martin in his opinion seems to think that such damages might properly be given. I know of no authority directly bearing on the point, but the general principle that the damages resulting from any act are confined to the immediate and natural consequences of the act is, I believe, universally agreed on, though it is not easy always to apply it. In such a case as is supposed it seems to me the supposed damages would be too remote, and therefore were not in this case submitted to the umpire; and I think that where an umpire has one thing submitted to him, and gives an award on that and also on something not submitted to him, that award, so far as regards the latter, is not binding.

BYLES, J.—I entirely agree with the judgment about to be delivered by my brother Martin.

MARTIN, B.—My Lords,—In answer to your Lordships' first question, I am of opinion that the evidence given by the umpire was admissible, and I see no limit as to its purpose and extent beyond the ordinary one, that evidence is to be confined to the matter in issue. The object of calling him was to prove the seventh plea, viz., that the sum awarded by him included damages and compensation for matters in respect of which he had no power or right to award or assess compensation. Now, if this matter is to be the subject of judicial inquiry, there is no person who possesses the same means of proving the truth as the umpire. He must know in respect of what he awarded, and to exclude him would seem as if to exclude the truth. At the same time I cannot but feel that if he be an admissible witness there will be very great difficulty in excluding a juryman who has assessed compensation in a case under the Lands Clauses Act. The award is said to be bad, because the umpire has only a limited authority by virtue of the 63rd section, which it is alleged he has exceeded. By the 49th section the jury have precisely the same limited authority. They must deliver their verdict in two separate sums, but the same limited authority is conferred upon both. Now if the arbitrator or umpire is competent to give evidence that he exceeded his authority, and so to annul and defeat his award, what reason is there why a juryman is not competent to give evidence to prove that the jury included in their verdict compensation in respect of a matter which is without the 49th section? I find a difficulty in answering the question. There can be no doubt as to the inconvenience and uncertainty which will arise if jurymen are permitted to give evidence to defeat their verdicts. If one juryman is admissible all are admissible, and their evidence may be conflicting, and great inconvenience arise. In ordinary cases in the courts of law and equity jurymen are not permitted to make affidavits, or give evidence to affect or defeat their verdicts, and although I feel myself bound to answer your Lordships' question as I have done, I am conscious that your Lordships, as the court of ultimate resort, may, by reason of the great inconvenience, feel yourselves called upon to arrive at a different conclusion. I can find no authority against the umpire's admissibility. Two cases have been cited in its favour, and although I feel that great inconvenience may arise from permitting an award to be so impeached, I nevertheless feel constrained to answer your Lordships' first question as I have done. In answer to your Lordships' second question, I am of opinion that the plaintiff in error is entitled to the verdict on the issue raised on the seventh plea. The action is upon an award, and the substantial question is, whether an award of an umpire dated the 5th Aug. 1867 is good? It is admitted to be good upon its face, but it is alleged that there were certain facts proved by the umpire himself in his evidence at the trial before the Chief Baron which show the award to be bad. The seventh plea alleges that the sum awarded was an entire sum, and that it includes compensation for matters in respect of which the umpire had no power to assess compensation, and in respect of which he had no jurisdiction, and if this plea be true the award is bad. In the year 1862 an Act of Parliament was passed for embanking part of the north side of the Thames (25 & 26 Vict. c. 93), and by the 1st section the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 18 (the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845), except sects. 32 and 92, was incorporated with it; the excepted sections are not material to the present question. By the 4th section the word "lands" in the Lands Clauses Act is declared to include "easements, interests, rights, and privileges in, over, or affecting lands." By the 15th section, save as otherwise provided, it was lawful for the board to purchase and extinguish any easement which any person might have over the bed of the river Thames within the limits of deviation, and by the 27th section rights of frontage to the Thames are dealt with as a valuable property. When the Act was passed the Duke of Buccleuch was in possession, under two agreements with the Crown, of a leasehold interest for a long term of years of Montague House, the ancient London residence of his family. The property is shown on the plan; the front is to the west, and opens to Whitehall; the back is to the east, and was and is a garden which had a river frontage to the Thames of 145 feet. The tide flowed up to the garden wall, and at the north-east corner of the garden there was a flight of steps which led down to a private gate of the Duke's, which afforded access to the river by a causeway or jetty which ran from the bottom of the steps to low-water mark in the river. It was about four or five feet in breadth, and was covered by the river at high water. It was made of stone and timber, and was used for landing coals, ice, vegetables, and other matters brought by boats and barges for the Duke's use at Montague House. The embankment was intended to be made, and has since been made, upon the foreshore in front of the garden, and is made upon and over the causeway or jetty, and the consequence and intended consequence is, that instead of the river flowing at high water up to the garden wall, as it previously did, the embankment intervenes between the garden and the river, and was constructed, amongst other purposes, for making a public roadway upon it; the whole river frontage, together with the causeway and jetty, is therefore destroyed, and a road frontage substituted. Upon the 14th Feb. 1867, the Duke made his claim, which seems to me quite wide enough to include all rights of compensation to which he was entitled. By the 63rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act he was entitled to compensation, not only to the value of the land to be taken, which here (by virtue of the 4th section of the Embankment Act) includes "easements, interests, rights, and privileges in, over, or affecting lands," but "also to the damage to be sustained" "by reason of the severing of the lands taken from other lands of the owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands by the exercise of the powers" conferred by this Act or Acts. It was said, and said truly, that by the construction put upon the Lands Clauses Act, compensation can only be claimed when the act done is such that except for the Act of Parliament an action at law would have lain for doing it. Now, applying this to the present case, the Duke had the land constituting the residence, Montague House, with the courtyard, offices, and garden attached, and had annexed and appurtenant to it the jetty or landing place, and although he had not the soil of the bed of the river, he had the easement or right or privilege, by whatever name it may be called, of the flow of the water of the river Thames in its natural channel up to his garden wall. He had one entire thing. He had not the land alone, or the jetty alone, or the right to the flow of the water of the river alone —he had all combined together; and if anyone had done an act injurious to the land or the jetty, or to the right to the flow of the water, he would have had a legal right of action against him. If the owner of the soil of the bed of the river, or anyone else, had constructed an embankment and roadway upon the jetty or landing place, so as to shut out the Duke's premises from the river, he could have maintained an action against him for two causes; first, for destroying his jetty; secondly, for depriving him of his riparian right: (Miner v. Gibson, 12 Moo. C. P. 156; Lord v. The Commissioners of the City of Sydney, 12 Moo. P. C. 473). Now, supposing such an action tried, what would be the proper direction to the jury as to damages? In my opinion there is not a single matter mentioned in the umpire's evidence as operating upon his mind, and in respect of which he gave compensation, which would not have been a proper element to be submitted to the jury with a view to the legal assessment of damages. The only item complained of is the 5000*l.*, which he says in his opinion was the market value of the loss if a purchaser had desired to buy the residence or take it on lease. I think that the judge might properly tell the jury that Montague House with its belongings, corporeal and incorporeal, was one entire thing, and that in assessing the damages they might take into consideration the actual depreciation of its value as an entire thing in the market; that in doing so they might consider that when the river was the boundary of the garden there was perfect privacy, no noise, or traffic, or dirt, or dust, and that they might contrast that state of things with the noise, and traffic, and dirt, and dust which would be consequent upon the river boundary being converted into a boundary of roadway for the traffic of horses, carts, and carriages. Suppose at any of the residences higher up the Thames, or on the Wye, or Dart, or other beautiful river, where the owner was not the owner of the soil of the bed of the river, but was entitled to the flow of the water, and the owner of the soil of the bed made an embankment and shut out the river, could it be successfully contended that this being an unlawful act the injured person would not be entitled to recover damages (if it were persevered in by the wrongdoer) to the amount of the market value of the injury done to his property? By the 4th section of the Embankment Act the rights of the Duke to the jetty and to the flow of the river are included in the word "lands" in the Lands Clauses Act, and in my opinion the construction of the embankment and roadway, in exercise of the powers of the Embankment Act, was a severance from and an injury affecting the other land of the Duke, within the true meaning of the two Acts. An argument was adduced on behalf of the defendant in error, in which I cannot concur. It was said that upon the construction given by the courts of law and equity to the Lands Clauses Act, the immediate neighbour of the Duke might possibly have been damaged to the same extent, and yet be unable to obtain compensation. Supposing this to be so, what argument is to be derived from it? General Acts of Parliament must of necessity be framed in general language, and because a man who has sustained damage is not within the terms of the Act of Parliament, and therefore must submit to the loss, is that any reason why a man who is within the terms of the Act is not to recover compensation for the loss and damage he actually sustains? These were the reasons which led me to the conclusion I arrived at when the case was before the Court of Exchequer. I have read the judgments of the judges in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and heard the arguments before your Lordships, and I retain the opinion I originally formed; I cannot, however, but think that too little stress has been laid upon the right of the Duke as a riparian proprietor. There were very many wharves between Westminster and Blackfriars bridges for loading and unloading coal and other merchandise. The embankment does not touch very many of them; it runs quite outside the land whereon they stood, and the only legal right the owners had which was directly interfered with by the embankment was the right to the flow of the water of the river up to them. The bed of the River Thames belongs to the Crown. This was a few years ago contested by the Corporation of London, but I believe they have abandoned their claim, and that the Crown is now the undisputed owner. The embankment does not touch most of the wharves, and, so far as I can see, except the injury to their water rights gives them a locus standi for compensation, they would be entitled to none. In my opinion the Duke's right to compensation under the two Acts is not less extensive than it would have been to damage (excluding vindictive damage) in an action of tort in the event of the defendants in error having made the embankment without the authority of Parliament. As to the amount awarded it was a matter entirely and exclusively for the umpire. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff in error is entitled to the verdict on the issue raised on the seventh plea. I am authorised to state that Sir M. Smith, who heard the arguments, concurs in this judgment.

April 30.—Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, in this case the four judges in the Court of Exchequer were unanimous in favour of the plaintiff in error, but in the Court of Exchequer Chamber their judgment was reversed by a majority of four judges to three, the opinions of seven judges having been thus overruled by a minority of four. Of the six judges whose assistance your Lordships had upon the hearing of the appeal, all of them, with the exception of Blackburn, J., concurred in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer. The case upon the appeal may conveniently be considered under the heads of the two questions put by your Lordships to the learned judges: First, whether the evidence given by the umpire was admissible, and, if so, to what extent and to what purpose? secondly, whether, upon the facts, admissions, and evidence (so far as such evidence was admissible), the plaintiff in error is entitled to a verdict on the issue raised on the seventh plea. The Duke of Buccleuch is tenant to the Crown of Montague House in Whitehall-place. At the time the Metropolitan Board of Works was proceeding to construct the embankment on the north side of the river Thames, the duke held the premises under a lease dated the 19th April 1810, for a term of sixty-two years from the 5th Jan. 1806, by the description of "all the piece of ground, &c., abutting eastward on the river Thames, on which Montague House stood, together (inter alia) with all easements, waters, watercourses, profits, commodities, advantages, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said piece of ground belonging or appertaining, or therewith or with any part thereof held, used, occupied, or enjoyed, or accepted, reputed, deemed, taken, or known as part, parcel, or member thereof." This lease would have expired in Jan. 1868, but before its expiration, the duke, by agreements with the Crown upon spending 20,000*l.* upon the premises in rebuilding the house and in other improvements, was to be entitled to a renewal for a term of ninety-nine years. He had performed his part under these agreements, and therefore, at the time of the execution of the works by the Metropolitan Board of Works, his interest in Montague House and premises was that of a lessee for the residue of a term of 99 years Montague House and premises were bounded on the river side by a wall, along the whole length of which, at high water, the river flowed. There was a gate in this wall, usually kept locked, which led from some stairs in the garden of the house to a causeway or pier which ran out into the river at low water mark. The causeway had been used for more than forty years for landing coal from barges and for bringing vegetables, &c., for the use of the tenants in Montague House, who always repaired the causeway at their own expense when it needed repair. By the Thames Embankment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 93) the Metropolitan Board of Works was authorised to construct an embankment on the north side of the Thames, from Westminster-bridge to Blackfriars-bridge. In the course of performing the necessary works it became necessary to remove the causeway and the landing-place connected therewith, and also entirely to shut off Montague House and premises from direct access to the river. In the place where the water previously flowed a solid embankment was made which has since become a public highway. The plaintiff gave the defendants notice that he claimed compensation as well for the entering upon and taking by them of the causeway, pier, or jetty, as for the removal and obstruction of the use and enjoyment of the landing-place, and for all other damage sustained or to be sustained by him by such injurious affecting of his said messuage or dwelling house, and other lands, premises, and hereditaments. And he further gave notice under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts (which are incorporated with the Thames Embankment Act) that he desired to have the amount of such compensation settled by arbitration. Arbitrators were named by the respective parties, who nominated Mr. Charles Pollock, Q.C., as umpire. Mr. Pollock having taken upon himself the reference, ultimately made an award in the following terms: "I award, order, and determine that there is due from the said Metropolitan Board of Works, to the said Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, the sum of 8325*l.* as and for compensation for the interest of the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry in the said causeway, pier, and jetty, and for the shutting up of the said landing-place, and for the damage by the depreciation of the said mansion house, lands, tenements, and hereditaments by otherwise injuriously affecting the same by the execution by the said board of their said works and by the exercise of the powers of the said Act." The defendants having refused to pay the compensation an action was brought against them to recover the sum of 8325*l.*, the sum awarded. To the declaration upon the award the defendants pleaded several pleas; only one in this stage of the case is necessary to be considered. By the seventh plea the defendants pleaded that the sum of 8325*l.* awarded was and is one entire and indivisible, and unseparated and inseparable sum, and that the said sum includes damages and compensation for matters and things in respect of which neither the arbitrators nor the umpire had any power or right to award or assess damages or compensation, and over and in respect of which neither the arbitrators nor the umpire had any jurisdiction whatever. At the trial before Kelly, C.B., the defendants, in support of this plea, called Mr. Pollock, the umpire, as a witness. I do not quite understand whether an objection was made in limine to his admissibility as a witness, or merely to certain parts of his evidence; but I rather collect that the latter must have been the case, because at the close of his examination there follows the statement, "The evidence of the umpire was objected to by the plaintiff and admitted by the judge, subject to such objection, and on the terms that such parts as the court should think inadmissible should be deemed to be struck out." But if the umpire was not a competent witness the whole of his evidence ought to have been struck out. That the umpire was admissible as a witness was without a single exception the opinion of all the judges who have considered the question in this case, Cleasby, B., having been authorised to state (by permission of your Lordships) that Bramwell, B., was misunderstood when he gave his opinion in the Court of Exchequer, if he was supposed to hold that the umpire was not a competent witness, for he did not hold that Mr. Pollock was not competent for any purpose, but only that he could not be questioned as to the composition of the award. The umpire being a competent witness, the only question is to what extent the defendants were entitled to examine him as to the particulars of his award. They had an undoubted right to know from him whether in his estimate of the compensation he took into consideration any matters not included in the reference, and, therefore, not within his jurisdiction. To prevent the defendants from questioning so far would have been to deprive them of information to which they were entitled, by shutting them off from the only source of it in the breast of the umpire. He alone could tell what subjects he included under the general terms of his award. But, this having been ascertained, the defendants were not at liberty to go farther and to ask the umpire what were the elements which entered into his consideration in determining the quantum of compensation. Within the limits of the reference the amount to be awarded was entirely in the discretion and judgment of the umpire. His opinion as to the extent of the damage done to Montague House by the execution of the works of the defendants was necessarily of a speculative character, and founded upon a general view of the annoyance and inconvenience which would result from the new state of things after the embankment was made and publicly used. To ask the umpire, as the counsel for the defendants did, what led him to the conclusion as to the proper sum to be awarded, was really to inquire what passed through his mind before he formed his judgment. It would be, in my opinion, contrary to all principle so to scrutinise the exercise by an arbitrator of a discretionary power to award compensation; and I think that all the questions put with this object were objectionable, and the evidence given upon them ought to be struck out. Before proceeding to the next question, I must observe that, even if the evidence of the umpire had been admissible as to his reasons for thinking that Montague House would be depreciated by the construction and use of the embankment because "there would be traffic, and dust, and dirt, and commotion, and noise, which seemed to alter the character of the house entirely," I do not think it would prove that his award was invalid. In Hammersmith Railway Company v. Brand (L. Rep. 4 H. of L. 171; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 238), it was held that a person, whose land had not been taken for the purposes of a railway, was not entitled to compensation from the railway company for damage arising from vibration, occasioned (without negligence) by the passing of trains after the railway had been brought into use. And in City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter (L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. App. 78), it was held that compensation could not be claimed by reason of the noise or smoke of trains by a person, no part of whose property had been injured by anything done on the land over which the railway ran. In neither of these cases was any land taken by the railway company connected with the lands which were alleged to have been so injured, and the claim for compensation was for damage caused by the use, and not by the construction of the railway. But if, in each of the cases lands of the parties had been taken for the railway, I do not see why a claim for compensation in respect of injury to adjoining premises might not have been successfully made on account of their probable depreciation by reason of vibration, or smoke, or noise occasioned by passing trains. In this case (as I shall presently show) land of the plaintiff was taken, which would have given a foundation for a claim to compensation for other lands injuriously affected. But in addition to this in the two cases cited, there were distinct claims made in the one on account of vibration, and in the other on account of smoke and noise occasioned by the passing trains; whereas here the umpire did not say, "I gave so much for dust and noise, &c., but it occurred to my mind that these would be the consequences of the public use of the embankment, and would altogether alter the character of the house." I now proceed to consider whether the umpire has included in his award any head of damage not properly the subject of compensation. It appears to me that the notice of claim is rather imperfectly framed, as it does not point distinctly to the injury to Montague House arising from the construction and use of the embankment. It requires the Metropolitan Board of Works to pay the Duke of Buccleuch compensation, as well for the entering upon and taking of the causeway, pier, or jetty, as for the removal and obstruction of the use and enjoyment of the said landing place, and for all other damage sustained and to be sustained by him by such injurious affecting of his said messuage and dwelling house, the word "such" referring to the taking of the causeway and removing of the landing place. However, it has never been questioned that the umpire had authority to take into his consideration the injury to Montague House arising from the construction and use of the embankment. There can be no doubt, and none has been entertained, that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in respect of the taking away the causeway and landing place, and the injury arising to his house and premises by depriving him of access to the river. The only question upon which there has been a difference of opinion among the judges is, whether the umpire was authorised to give compensation in respect of the depreciation of Montague House, by the conversion of the land between it and the river into a highway, and the consequent public use of it. This question partly depends upon the 63rd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which is incorporated with the Thames Embankment Act, and which enacts that in estimating the purchase money or compensation to be paid by the promoters of an undertaking regard shall be had not only to the value of the land to be purchased or taken, but also to the damage (if any) to be sustained by the owner of the lands by reason of the severing of the lands taken from the other lands of such owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands by the exercise of such power." The plaintiff was the owner of lands within the meaning of the this clause, in respect of the causeway which was taken away from him. It is quite immaterial whether the soil of the causeway belonged to him or he had merely an easement over it; for, by the 4th section of the Thames Embankment Act, the word "land" is to include easements, interests, rights, and privileges in, over, or affecting lands; and the 27th section of the said Act empowers the Metropolitan Board of Works to appropriate, by grant or demise, any reclaimed land, &c., to any owner of lands now situated on the present left bank and river frontage of the river Thames, in front whereof the said intended embankment shall pass as aforesaid, in consideration of and in lieu, in whole or in part, of the compensation which such owner or person may be entitled to claim for the damage, if any, to be sustained by him by loss of river frontage or otherwise by reason of such embankment or roadway or other the exercise of any of the powers of the Act. This section contemplates two descriptions of damage likely to be sustained by the owners of lands on the river frontage of the Thames—one, by loss of the river frontage, the other, in any other manner by reason of the embankment or other the exercise of any of the powers of the Act. It seems to me to be quite clear that the umpire was entitled to consider, not only the damage which the plaintiff sustained by being deprived of the causeway, but also whether he was entitled to compensation in respect of damage otherwise sustained by reason of the embankment. Now if he was of opinion that Montague House was depreciated in value as a residence by reason of the proximity of the embankment, and of the consequences of its use as a public highway, he was bound to give the plaintiff some compensation, and the amount proper to be awarded was entirely for him to determine. It can hardly be doubted that, in addition to the damage sustained by the loss of the river frontage, the house must have been "injuriously affected," i.e., depreciated in value, by the interposition between it and the river of an embankment to be used as a public highway; and this seems to bring the right to compensation within the very words of the 27th section of the special Act, because it is a damage, otherwise than by loss by the river frontage, by reason of the embankment or roadway. It is unnecessary to consider the cases of the Hammersmith Railway Company v. Brand and The City of Glasgow Union Railway Company v. Hunter (ubi sup.), and other cases which were cited in argument, because their applicability to the present case depended upon that part of the evidence of the umpire which I think ought to be struck out as inadmissible. The only question then arises upon the award itself: whether the umpire had any power to give compensation for the damage by the depreciation of the mansion house, lands, tenements, and hereditaments by the otherwise injuriously affecting the same by the execution by the defendants of the said works, and by the exercise of the powers of the Act. Now he was authorised both by the special Act and by the Lands Clauses Act to give compensation if the premises were injuriously affected, a fact which it was the duty of the umpire to ascertain and determine. He has determined it, and awarded compensation in respect of the damage thereby sustained by the plaintiff, and I see nothing in the case to impeach the correctness of his award. I think that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber must be reversed.

LORD WESTBURY.—My Lords,—I concur entirely with the majority of the judges in the point relating to the admissibility of the evidence of the umpire, and also with respect to the limit to which the right of examining the umpire ought to be carried. On the other point I must confess, that on this occasion, as on some others, I do not concur in the principles which have been established. But it would be useless to enter into that discussion, as I understand that the majority of your Lordships is on that point in harmony with the opinion which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend who has just addressed the House, and, therefore, I concur in the judgment proposed to be pronounced.

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords,—I entirely concur in the judgment proposed to be delivered, on both grounds. First, as to the competency of examining the umpire, I think the distinction has been well drawn and the opinions of the majority of the judges are right. And, in regard to the other part of the case, I think that my noble and learned friend now on the woolsack (Lord Chelmsford) has stated the most conclusive reasons for the judgment he has proposed to pronounce. I, therefore, do not think it necessary to take up your Lordships' time by stating particularly the grounds on which I have arrived at the same conclusion.

Lord CAIRNS.—My Lords,—I must express my own sense of the obligation, and I am sure there is the same feeling on the part of your Lordships to the learned judges who have favoured us with their opinions upon this very important case. I own that, speaking for myself, both as regards the extent to which the evidence has been challenged as receivable, and as regards the other points in the case I should have felt great hesitation in coming to the conclusion at which I have arrived had I not had the advantage of the concurrence of so large a majority of the learned judges. As regards the reception of the evidence, in my opinion the line has been most properly and accurately drawn by Cleasby B. It appears to me that on every point which may be considered to be a matter of fact with reference to the making of the award the evidence of the arbitrator or umpire was properly admissible. He was properly asked what had been the course which the argument before him had taken—what claims were made and what claims were admitted—so that we might be put in possession of the history of the litigation before the umpire up to the time when he proceeded to make his award. But there it appears to me the right of asking questions of the umpire ceased. The award is a document which must speak for itself, and the evidence of the umpire is not admissible to explain or to aid, much less to attempt to contradict (if any such attempt should be made) what is to be found upon the face of that written instrument. My lords, upon the other part of the case I own I have had less doubt than I had with regard to the extent to which the evidence was receivable. It has appeared to me throughout that the property of the plaintiff in error in this case was what is commonly called riparian property. The meaning of that is that it had a water frontage. The meaning of its having a water frontage was this, that it had a right to the undisturbed flow of the river which passed along the whole frontage of the property in the manner in which it had formerly been accustomed to pass. That being the state of things, this water frontage, with these rights which the plaintiff in error possessed, were taken for the purposes of the Act. Beyond all doubt the water right was a property belonging to the plaintiff, for which compensation was to be made, and it was for the arbitrator to assess the compensation to which the plaintiff was entitled upon that footing. Now it is quite true that some difficulty might have arisen in consequence of the wording of the claim put forward by the plaintiff in error. In that claim undue weight, as it seems to me, is laid upon the possession of the causeway, that is to say, upon the one point in the whole frontage by means of which, for the time being, he enjoyed access to the water in a particular and convenient way. But it seems to me that his claim is quite large enough to cover the damage to the whole of his interest, whatever that interest might be, and that interest, it appears to me, was a claim to a water right along the whole of the frontage. Then, that being so, when the arbitrator came to consider that claim it seems to me that it was entirely open to the arbitrator to say what was the value of it. It was impossible for the arbitrator in estimating that value to reject from his mind the consideration of the entire depreciation of value which the property would be subject to by reason of its being deprived of that water right. If we are to look at the whole of the evidence, it appears to me that that is nothing more than what the arbitrator says. Upon these grounds it appears to me that the motion which has been submitted to your Lordships is entirely correct, and that judgment should be given for the plaintiff in error.

Judgment reversed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by E. STEWART ROCHE and H. PEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 28 and 29, 1872.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

LORD AUCKLAND v. THE WESTMINSTER DISTRICT BOARD OF WORKS.

Metropolis Local Management Acts (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 76, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 63, 74, and 75)—General line of buildings—Site of old buildings—Compensation—Injunction—Jurisdiction.

A person purchased from a railway company a piece of land formerly the site of houses which the company had taken for the purposes of their railway. The company had pulled down the houses and constructed their railway underground, and then restored the surface of the land, and advertised it for sale as building land. The land came within the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Acts:

Held, that the purchaser was in the same position as to his right of building on the site, as if he had bought the land with the houses standing on it, and had himself pulled them down for the purpose of rebuilding, and that the Metropolitan Board of Works had no power to require the new buildings to be set back to the general line of buildings in the street, without compensating him for damage under the 74th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1862.

The 75th section of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1862 only applies to buildings about to be erected on land not built on before, and not to buildings about to be erected on the site of old buildings, except where the owner of the old buildings has pulled them down without any intention of again building on the site.

THIS was an original hearing on motion for decree.

On the 21st Feb. 1871 the plaintiff purchased from the Metropolitan Railway Company a piece of vacant land on the south side of Buckingham-row, Westminster, which formed part of the surplus lands of the company.

The company had previously offered this piece of land together with other surplus lands for sale by public auction, and in the particulars of sale at the auction the piece of land afterwards bought by the plaintiff was described as "a plot of freehold building land."

This piece of land was conveyed to the plaintiff in fee by an indenture dated the 6th April 1871.

At the time when it was taken by the railway company this piece of land formed the site of three houses fronting Buckingham-row, and known as Nos. 1, 2, and 3, Buckingham-row.

The railway company pulled down these houses, and having constructed their railway underground, they restored the surface of the land and put it up for sale.

This piece of land abutted on the west on a passage about 5ft. wide, over the entrance of which part of the house No. 1, Buckingham-row, formerly extended. This passage led from Buckingham-row to Brewer's-row, past a row of small cottages, known as Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, York-place, which were built at right angles, or nearly so, to the line of the houses in Buckingham-row. These cottages were set back about 20ft. from the passage, with gardens between them and the passage. Beyond the cottages the passage was continued in a straight line for a distance about equal in length to the frontage of the cottages; but beyond the cottages, buildings ran close up to the passage.

The plaintiff, who had a house in Queen's-square, Westminster, purchased the piece of land in question for the purpose of erecting his stables on it.

Plans of the intended stables were prepared and submitted to the Board of Works for the Westminster district, and on the 24th June 1871, in accordance with the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Acts (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 76, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 63), due notice in writing of the intention to build was given to the board by the plaintiff's builder.

The 76th section of the 18 & 19 Vict., c. 120 provides that before beginning to lay or dig out the foundation of any new house or building within any parish or district mentioned in the schedules to the Act, or to rebuild any house or building therein, seven days' notice in writing shall be given to the vestry or board, by the person intending to build or rebuild such house or building; and every such foundation shall be laid at such level as will permit the drainage of such house or building in compliance with the Act, and as the vestry or board shall order; and the vestry or district board shall make their order in relation to the matters aforesaid, and cause the same to be notified to the person from whom such notice was received, within seven days' after the receipt of such notice; and in default of such notice, or if such house, building &c., be begun, erected, or made in any respect contrary to any order of the vestry or board made and notified as aforesaid, or the provisions of the Act, it shall be lawful for the vestry or board to cause such house or building to be demolished or altered, and to recover the expenses thereof from the owner thereof, in manner provided by the Act.

By the 63rd section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, it is enacted that where any notice shall have been given to any vestry or district board, pursuant to the 76th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, it shall be lawful for the surveyor of such vestry or board, if he shall deem it necessary or proper so to do, within three days after the receipt of such notice by the vestry or district board, by writing under his hand directed to and served upon the person giving such notice, to require that the buildings or works referred to therein shall not be proceeded with until after the then next meeting of the said vestry or district board, and until their directions in reference thereto shall have been notified to such person, provided that the order of the said vestry or district board shall be made and notified to the said person at the latest within fifteen days after the receipt of such notice by the vestry or district board.

No order was made by the board upon the notice of the plaintiff's intention to build within the period of fifteen days prescribed by the Act.

Shortly afterwards the surveyor of the district board gave the plaintiff's builder verbal permission to commence operations, but the permission was revoked again in a few days, on the plea that the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works was required.

The district board endeavoured to induce the plaintiff to apply to the Metropolitan Board, but having failed to persuade him to do so, they applied themselves to the Metropolitan Board.

On the 2nd Aug. 1871 Mr. Vulliamy, the superintendent architect of the Metropolitan Board, sent to the plaintiff's solicitors an order, purporting to be made by him under the 75th section of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict., c. 102).

The 74th section of that Act provides that in case any building situated within any of the parishes, districts, or places comprised in the schedules of the Act 18 & 19 Vict., c. 120, which shall in any part thereof project beyond the general line of the street in which the same may be situate, or beyond the front of the building, wall, or railing on either side thereof, shall at any time be taken down to an extent exceeding one half of such building, such half to be measured in cubic feet, or shall be destroyed by fire or other casualty, or demolished, pulled down, or removed from any other cause to the extent aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the Metropolitan Board of Works to require the same to be set back to such a line, and in such a manner for the improvement of any street as the board shall direct, provided that the said board shall make compensation to the owner of such building for any damage and expenses which he may sustain and incur thereby.

The 75th section of the same Act provides that no building, structure, or erection shall, without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate, in case the distance of such line of buildings from the highway does not exceed fifty feet, or within fifty feet of the highway when the distance of the line of buildings therefrom amounts to or exceeds fifty feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway, such general line of buildings to be decided by the superintendent architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the time being; and in case any building, &c., be erected, or be begun to be erected, without such consent, or contrary to the terms and conditions on which the same may have been granted, it shall be lawful for the vestry of the parish or the board of works for the district in which the building, &c., is situate, to cause to be made complaint thereof to a justice of the peace, who shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the owner or occupier of the premises, or the builder or person engaged in any work contrary to this enactment, to appear at a time and place to be stated in the summons to answer such complaints; and if the said complaint shall be proved to the satisfaction of the justice before whom the same shall be heard, such justice shall make an order in writing on such owner or occupier, builder or person, directing the demolition of any such building, or so much thereof as may be beyond the said general line so fixed as aforesaid, &c.

Mr. Vulliamy's order, after reciting the 75th section of the Act, went on thus: "And whereas, Mr. James Rogers, solicitor to the Board of Works for the district of Westminster, and Mr. R. R. Arntz, surveyor to the said board (Messrs. Lambert and Son, of No. 30, Bedford-row, having had notice to attend the hearing before me on behalf of Lord Auckland, but they declined to do so), have severally appeared before me and been heard regarding the proposed erection of buildings on the vacant land at the corner of Buckingham-row and York-place, in the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, and beyond the front or face of the buildings forming a row of houses on the eastern side of York-place aforesaid, such houses being Nos. 13 to 17 inclusive, and I have been required to decide the general line of buildings in such place as provided in the said statute. Now, therefore, having considered the several matters, I, the undersigned, being the superintending architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works, do hereby, pursuant to the said Act, decide that the main fronts of the buildings forming the row of houses aforesaid . . . is the general line of buildings on the eastern side of York-place aforesaid." And the order was signed, George Vulliamy.

The effect of this order would have been to deprive the plaintiff of the use of nearly one-half of the plot of land on which he was about to build.

On the 2nd Aug. 1871 the District Works and General Purposes Committee passed a resolution "that it be recommended to the board that should Lord Auckland, his agents, or any other person begin to erect, or raise, or erect, or raise any building, structure, or erection beyond the general line of buildings on the eastern side of York-place as decided by the superintending architect, the solicitors to the board have instructions to proceed against all persons so offending."

The plaintiff then asked the district board to purchase the land of him, but they declined to do so. He then appealed to the Metropolitan Board to review or correct Mr. Vulliamy's order; and having failed to obtain any redress in that way, he applied to them for compensation, but they replied that they had no intention of putting in force in the present case the provisions of the 74th section of the Act.

The plaintiff then filed his bill against the district board, praying for a declaration that no order having been given by the district board in relation to the matters contained in the notice given by the plaintiff's builder to the board on the 24th June 1871, within the period prescribed by the 63rd section of the Metropolis Management Act 1862, the power of the board to make any order in relation to those matters ceased and determined at the expiration of that period, and that the plans referred to in the notice were to be deemed and taken to have been approved by the board; it also prayed for a declaration that Mr. Vulliamy's order, dated the 2nd Aug. 1871, was invalid so far as it extended or operated to prevent the erection of buildings on any part of the site formerly occupied by the houses, Nos. 1, 2, and 3, Buckingham-row, and for an injunction to restrain the district board from taking any proceedings for the purpose of compelling the plaintiff or his builder to abstain from erecting buildings upon so much of the site of Nos. 1, 2, and 3, Buckingham-row as lies outside the line decided by Mr. Vulliamy to be the general line of buildings in York-place, and from taking any proceedings for the purpose of recovering from the plaintiff or his builder penalties under the 63rd section of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, and from interfering in any manner with the erection of the buildings proposed to be erected by the plaintiff on the site of those houses.

On a motion for an injunction, Malins, V.C. held that the district board had acted ultra vires in setting in motion the Metropolitan Board, which had no power where buildings had been taken down, and were about to be rebuilt, to require them to rebuild in a general line fixed by their architect, without compensating the owner of the land under the 74th section of the Act, and accordingly he granted the injunction prayed for.

From this order the defendants appealed, and, on the appeal motion coming on to be heard, it was arranged that it should stand over till the hearing, that the plaintiff should at once give notice of motion for decree, and that the hearing should be taken before the Lords Justices.

The cause now came on to be heard.

Glasse, Q.C. and Macnaghten, for the plaintiff. —We contend that the proceeding of the defendants is ultra vires, as they gave us no notice within fifteen days after the receipt of our notice that we intended to build, as required by the 63rd section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. Moreover the 75th section of the Act does not apply to this case at all. That section only applies to land which has not been built upon. It is only under the 74th section that we could ever have been required to set back our buildings to the general line of buildings, and then we should have been entitled to compensation. We contend that it makes no difference that the land in question was vacant when we purchased it, for we must stand in the shoes of the person from whom the railway company bought it, and we are in the same position, and have the same rights, as if we had pulled down the old buildings ourselves. We submit that we are entitled to the relief prayed for in our bill, and that the court has jurisdiction to grant that relief is clear from these authorities:

Prowin v. Lewis, 4 M. & C. 255;
Tinkler v. The Wandsworth District Board of Works, 2 De G. & J. 273;
Kerr on Injunctions, 295, 296;
Stone v. The Commercial Railway Company, 4 M. & C. 122;
The River Dun Navigation Company v. The North Midland Railway Company, 1 Rail. Cas. 153.

Bristowe, Q.C. and Cracknell, for the defendants.—We contend that this court has no jurisdiction in this matter. The plaintiff should have appealed from the order of the district board to the Metropolitan Board of Works, as provided by the 211th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, or he should have applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus, as was done in an unreported case of Reg. v. Vulliamy. But, assuming this court to have jurisdiction, we contend that our not having given notice within the 63rd section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, is immaterial. And we contend that the plaintiff having bought the land as vacant land, it must be subject to the provisions of the 75th section, for he must be held to have had notice of the powers of the district and metropolitan boards. They referred to

Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 533;

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice JAMES said:—I am of opinion that the order of the Vice-Chancellor granting an injunction in this case is perfectly right. The plaintiff Lord Auckland comes to this court and says, "A public body have threatened, and do still threaten and intend to pull down some buildings which I have a right to erect, and which I am about to erect on my property. That being so, I am embarrassed by what they are doing or intend to do under colour of the very great powers given them by certain Acts of Parliament. First of all they embarrass me in the application of my property to the purpose I desire, and I am in fact prevented from erecting my buildings, because they tell me in plain terms that, if I do build, they will put in force the powers of their Act, and pull down my house, or stable, or whatever it may be." Those being the facts, it appears to me to be a plain case for the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court. What is the case? A man files his bill with regard to a grievous wrong which is threatened to be committed upon him, and he has a right to see whether this body have the power to inflict this wrong upon him, or at all events to try and relieve his title from the cloud which is cast upon it by this proceeding, which has been taken under a public Act of Parliament by public functionaries entrusted with great and arbitrary powers. It seems to me to be the same kind of case as those well known cases in which this court has constantly exercised its jurisdiction by restraining railway companies from proceeding to take land, which they had power to take for one purpose, for some other purpose for which they were not entitled to take it, or to take part of a house only when the owner says, "You must take the whole of it." In those cases the court granted an injunction and stopped the company at once, because they were about to exercise their powers in a manner that was oppressive, and in a manner that was illegal. I have no doubt, therefore, that this is a case within the jurisdiction of this court, and that it is a proper case for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court so as to have the matter determined once for all, instead of leaving Lord Auckland to go before a magistrate and to discuss with him the question of jurisdiction and the construction of the Act of Parliament, which, it is said on the part of the defendants, involves some difficulty, and then to be obliged to take some other step, perhaps to go to the Court of Queen's Bench, and I know not where else, in order to have the thing tried by certiorari. Of course, some persons may object to this court; but it is not the habit of this court, at all events, to say that it is so bad a tribunal that people should go to all these different places rather than come here to have their grievances decided. I think, therefore, it is a case in which the jurisdiction of the court ought to be exercised. Then comes the question—Is what the board of works are about to do or threaten to do in any manner justified by the Act of Parliament? I am of opinion, on more grounds than one, that their whole proceeding is clearly ultra vires. It is beyond all question that Lord Auckland is the proprietor of the site of some lately existing buildings, which abuts upon York-place. The buildings upon that site were taken for some purpose or other in connection with the construction of the Metropolitan District Railway. I am of opinion that Lord Auckland, as the purchaser of that site from the Metropolitan District Railway Company, who were the purchasers from the former owners, has exactly the same rights in every respect as those owners had before their houses were taken down, and has exactly the same rights as he would have had if he had bought the ground with the houses standing upon it, and had taken them down himself for the purpose of building what he now intends to build upon the site of them, and that then this public body had interfered. The question is to be determined in the same way, in my opinion, as if Lord Auckland had, a day or two or a week before these proceedings begun, been the owner of the piece of land, with the buildings standing thereon. In that case it appears to me quite clear that his position would come exactly within the case which is provided for by the 74th section of the second Act, which enacts that, provided any part of a building which is demolished, pulled down, or removed had projected beyond the general line of the street in which the same was situated, it shall be lawful for the Metropolitan Board of Works when the owner is about to rebuild to direct him to put back his new building into such a line and in such a manner, for the improvement of the street, as the board should direct. The 74th section, to my mind, is clearly applicable to a case where any part of the building projects beyond the general line of the street. In that event the 74th section provides for taking away a man's property, giving him compensation for it; and then it is contended that after it has thus been provided that a man's property may be taken in a certain way upon giving him compensation for it, the very next section of the Act, the 75th section, goes on to enact that the property is to be taken away by the same body without any compensation at all. I am of opinion that having regard to the provisions in the former Acts, in lieu of which this 75th section was enacted, and having regard to the 74th section, which immediately precedes it, and to the whole context of the Act, and to the whole spirit of recent legislation with regard to dealings with private property, that the meaning of the 75th section was that it should apply only to a new structure or erection being built on land which for the purposes of the Act would properly be described as vacant ground; and, therefore, I am of opinion that there was no jurisdiction in the district board to interfere with any building which Lord Auckland might erect on that land, except according to the provisions of the 74th section. I am of opinion that the 75th section does not apply at all to this case; and that Mr. Vulliamy's line, whether rightly or wrongly laid down by him as the general line of the street, would not authorise the board to interfere with Lord Auckland's property. But I am also of opinion that Mr. Vulliamy's order is, on the face of it, perfectly, monstrously, and shockingly wrong. One can see at once how the error came to arise. Mr. Vulliamy treated the site of the old buildings as being vacant ground. That appears upon the face of the order itself, which he has pronounced. He came to the decision of the question as to the general line of the street on the assumption that Lord Auckland's property was to be treated as vacant ground, and then he found what he supposed to be a general line—the line made by four or five houses, that being, as he then thought, the only general line that he could find there. The question was submitted to him in a very curious manner. The order says: "And whereas Mr. James Rogers, solicitor for the district of Westminster, and Mr. R. R. Arntz, surveyor to the said board (Messrs. Lambert and Son, of No. 30, Bedford-row, having had notice to attend the hearing before me on behalf of Lord Auckland, but they declining to do so), having personally appeared before me, and been heard regarding the proposed erection and buildings on vacant land at the corner of Buckingham-row and York-place, in the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and beyond the face or front of York-place, forming a row of houses on the eastern side of York-place aforesaid, such houses being numbered from 13 to 17 inclusive" (the charge is that he is going to erect them beyond the face of that row), "and I have been required to decide the general line of buildings in such place, as provided in the said statute." It was assumed that there was no right to build beyond the front of that row of houses, and he dealt with that row of houses as being the only thing that he found standing there. I think if Mr. Vulliamy's attention had been drawn to this, that he was to ascertain what the general building line of York-place was as things stood before the old houses were taken down, he never could have made such an order as this, the effect of which is to say that the front of those five houses was the general line of building, not of a street, but of a small footway, which on the same side was bounded by a building or by a wall the greater part of the way, and was bounded by a building and a wall on the other side. It appears to me utterly impossible that any human being could ever have said that that line of houses in the middle of the whole thing was the general line of buildings, for the purpose of determining up to what point buildings might be erected on the property. It seems to me to be exactly the case which I suggested in the course of the argument. It is just the same thing as if a man had said that the old line of the front of Burlington House was the general line of building in Piccadilly. Mr. Vulliamy has fallen into a mistake, and I am, therefore, of opinion that he has not in fact ever determined the building line in the manner in which he ought to have determined it, namely, what as a matter of fact was the line of buildings before the old houses were taken down. It being clear to my mind that the defendants could not take this land, except under the 74th section, there will be an order for an injunction to restrain them from interfering with Lord Auckland's building, notwithstanding Mr. Vulliamy's order; and a declaration that, notwithstanding that order, they were not entitled to take any part of the site of the old buildings purchased by Lord Auckland, but that Lord Auckland is entitled to build on the whole of that site, and he must have the costs of the suit.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is impossible to read with any care the 74th and 75th sections of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1862 without coming to the conclusion that no case can be intended to be within the 75th section, which is within the 74th section. The 74th section gives power to the Metropolitan Board, if any house which is beyond the general line of the street is pulled down to the extent of more than one half or is destroyed, to require that when it is built up again it shall be set back, paying compensation. Now, it is absurd to suppose that the Legislature could have intended that in that very same case the board might, instead of proceeding under sect. 74, proceed under sect. 75, and say, "You shall put your house back to the general line of the street without receiving any compensation whatever." To make the two sections consistent with each other, I think that one must construe the words "no building, structure, or erection" in the 75th section to mean "no building, structure, or erection built or erected for the first time." Then comes the question whether this present case, assuming against Lord Auckland that there may be a general line of building in York-place, is within the 74th section. Of course, if the same person who had pulled the buildings down was intending to erect them again, it would be expressly within the 74th section. But ought the 74th section to be confined to such a case as that? In my opinion it would be very absurd to confine it to such a case, because if a man pulls down his building, intending to erect a new one, why should he not be allowed to sell the site with the same power of erecting the building as he himself had? It appears to me that the purchaser must be in the same position as the vendor, and so the purchaser from the purchaser must be in the same position as the original purchaser. Then does it make any difference that a railway company was the first purchaser, that it was a railway company who bought the property from the original owner and pulled down the buildings? I do not think that that makes any difference. I do not mean to say that in every case after a building has been once erected, the site of that building is to remain for ever thereafter within sect. 74, and never to come within sect. 75. Suppose the case of a building being pulled down, and its site turned to a totally different purpose—made, for instance, into an open garden; or suppose the case of a man pulling down his building voluntarily, and setting it back to the general line of the street—I do not suppose that after he had done that, after something had taken place which would be evidence that the owner had abandoned the land as a site for building, and had devoted it to other purposes —I do not suppose that anyone who might subsequently acquire that land by purchase, or the original owner of it, could after that take advantage of its having been the site of old buildings, just as in questions which constantly occur when a house is pulled down and a new house is erected, whether the right to the ancient lights is gone. If a man pulls down a house, and it is left down for so many years that all supposed intention of rebuilding is gone, then all the right to the lights may be gone also. But if there is an intention to rebuild, though the building is put off for a year, or two years, or three years, the right to the lights would remain when the house was built up again; and I do not suppose that it would make any difference if when the owner had pulled down the house he had sold the land with the right of building upon the house again. The right which belonged to it as a house would still remain. So I think here, if the houses are pulled down under circumstances which would lead everyone to suppose as a matter of course that they were going to be rebuilt on the site, the site practically being of no value except for building purposes, it would be wrong to say that the rights formally attached to it as to the building line are gone by the mere circumstance that the house has been pulled down. In this case the railway company found it necessary for the purposes of constructing their railway to take down these houses, or, if they had not done so, the houses would probably have fallen down while the railway was being made. There is no doubt that there was a permanent intention on the part of the railway company, at some time or other, when their underground railway was built, to sell this land for the purpose of building, as they in fact afterwards did, the land being sold in the open market. I cannot help thinking that it would be a hard thing on the railway company, if, having purchased these houses at the full price as existing houses, and being obliged to pull them down for the purposes of their railway, they were not at liberty to sell the site for the purpose of being built upon. So far as appears, they did sell the site, and Lord Auckland bought it on the assumption that it might be built upon. If the Metropolitan Board are right in their contention, there was a defect in the railway company's title; because they would have had no power to sell it as building land, and it would have been right to know what the Metropolitan Board intended to do before the railway company attempted to sell the land as building land. Therefore, I am of opinion that the case is exactly the same as if the houses had been pulled down and were about to be rebuilt by the same persons; and therefore that, as regards the site of the old buildings, the case is clearly within the 74th section, and that there was no jurisdiction in the district board to proceed under the 75th section, and that being so, I am of opinion that this court has jurisdiction to grant relief in this case. What the district board are threatening to do is that, if Lord Auckland should erect stables on this land they will proceed to pull them down. It is true that they must first go before a magistrate, but when they get before a magistrate he will probably tell them he has no jurisdiction, because I think it is perfectly clear that he has no jurisdiction under this section. I think Lord Auckland is entitled to say, I will not wait to see whether a magistrate will decide rightly or wrongly, I will not go before a magistrate at all, but I will come into the Court of Chancery, and will have you restrained by injunction from pulling down my stables, as you have no right to do so. The only part of the case on which there can be any doubt at all is, whether there is any difference between the actual site of the old house and the bit of courtyard which was behind the house. In my opinion there is no difference. The front of the old house was not towards York-place, but the side of the house ran along York-place, and beyond that there was a continuous wall of some height which separated the courtyard from York-place. Even assuming that there was a general line of building in York-place, I do not think that courtyard would be an open space within the meaning of the 75th section. The owner had a house and a wall beyond his house, which separated his courtyard from the public road. His courtyard was as much a secret and private place as any other part of his property. It was not in any way dedicated to the use of the public. I entirely agree with what the Lord Justice has said, that, looking at the state of things, which ought to be looked at, existing before these buildings were pulled down, there really was no general line of building at all, except a line coming right up to the footpath itself. Here there was a house and a long wall, which, if I read the distance right, was by itself quite as long as the space of ground in front of the five cottages, and then at the other end there were buildings also coming down to the footway of York-place. Upon the whole I am of opinion that Lord Auckland is entitled in point of law to build upon the whole of this land, which he has purchased from the Metropolitan District Railway Company, and that he is entitled to have the relief which he prays for in this suit, and his costs of the suit.

Lord Justice JAMES.—I do not think we ought to say anything in our order about the 74th section, because we have not got the Metropolitan Board before us. We will make a declaration that, notwithstanding Mr. Vulliamy's order purporting to set out the general line of buildings, Lord Auckland is entitled to build on the whole of the land included in his purchase, and we will grant an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering.

Market—Dwelling-place or shop—Selling or exposing for sale within limits of a market—Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 14) s. 13 *—Rights or privileges—*21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 50.

Sect. 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act provides that "after the market-place is opened for public use, every person, other than a licensed hawker, who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling-place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s.

M. had erected, in 1865, on his own land, with the approval of the local board, a large hall capable of holding about 100 head of cattle; and adjoining the hall and communicating with it was a large open yard, with fixed pens capable of holding 1400 sheep, the sheep being penned there till required in the hall for sale. His dwelling-house adjoined and communicated with the yard, but not with the hall. M. advertised and held sales by public auction, of cattle, sheep, and horses, on one day each week, being the market day of the town; the average sale each day being about 100 cattle and 1000 sheep. The sheep and cattle sold, belonged to other persons; M. charging a commission on the sale. Market having been duly opened in the town in 1871, under the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 14), M. was charged under sect. 13 of that Act with having sold certain sheep in a place (the hall above mentioned) other than the market, not being his own dwelling-place or shop, but the magistrates dismissed the information.

Held, that the place where the sheep were sold was not the dwelling-place or shop of M., and, therefore, the magistrates were wrong in not convicting him.

Sect. 50 of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98 provides that "no market or slaughter-house shall be established in pursuance of this section so as to interfere with any rights, powers, or privileges enjoyed within the district by any person, chartered, joint-stock, or incorporated company, without his or their consent."

Held, that M. did not, before the establishment of the market in 1871, enjoy any right, power, or privilege within the meaning of this section.

CASE stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

2. At a petty sessions holden at Cockermouth, in the division of Derwent Division, in the county of Cumberland, on the 10th July 1871, an information preferred by John Fearon, hereinafter called the appellant, against Robert Mitchell, hereinafter called the respondent, charging, for that the said respondent on the 15th May 1871, at the town of Cockermouth, in the parish of Brigham, in the said county, not then being a licensed hawker, unlawfully did sell and expose for sale, in a certain place there called the Agricultural Hall, within the district of the local board for the township of Cockermouth, in the said county, in which said township the Local Government Act 1858 has been duly adopted, but not within the market there, regulated by the said Local Government Act, and the bye-laws made by the said local board, in pursuance of the said Act, and the provisions of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, with the first-mentioned Act incorporated; and there opened for public use within the said district, not within his own dwelling-place or shop there, certain marketable articles, to wit, twelve sheep, in respect of which toll was by the said Acts and the bye-laws made as aforesaid, authorised to be taken in the said market; contrary to sect. 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, was heard and determined by us, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information with costs.

3. The appellant, being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid, for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

4. Now, therefore, we the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case:

5. Upon the hearing of the information, the following facts were admitted and agreed to by both parties, that is to say:

(a) The Local Government Act 1858 was on the 26th Sept. 1863 adopted by the said township of Cockermouth, and has had the force of law within such township since the 1st Jan. 1864.

(b) The local board for the said township on the 20th March 1869, pursuant to the Local Government Act 1858, and the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, made bye-laws for the regulation of markets and fairs held within their district, and they were duly confirmed by the Right Hon. Henry Austin Bruce, one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, on the 29th April 1869, and the same, so far as is material to the question to be submitted to the court, are in the words and figures following, that is to say:

Bye-laws made by the local board of Cockermouth, in the county of Cumberland, for the regulations of markets and fairs held within the district of the said board, this 20th day of March, 1869.

i. That markets and fairs shall be held as hereinafter provided, except when otherwise specially appointed by the said local board.

ii. That the market and fair days throughout the year shall be held as follows:—

Every Monday—Cattle, corn, butcher, vegetable, and general markets.

iv. That the cattle markets and fairs, and annual show of entire horses heretofore held in the main street of Cockermouth, shall be held in a field situate near the railway station, and known by the name of Tarn Close, otherwise the New Fair Field, or elsewhere as the board may direct.

xv. That the following tolls and dues shall be payable in respect of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, or other animals brought into or exposed for sale in the cattle market:

For sheep, rams, lambs, or goats, per score, not exceeding tenpence;

For each sheep, ram, lamb, or goat, when in lots under half a score, not exceeding one penny.

(c.) The field specified in article 4 of the said bye-laws is the place prescribed by the said local board for holding the cattle and sheep market, and was on the said 15th day of May, 1871, open for public use.

(d.) That at the time of the adoption of the local government Act, 1858, by the said township of Cockermouth, and previously thereto from time immemorial, markets for the sale of cattle, sheep, grain, &c., were held in the town of Cockermouth, in the said township, on every Monday, and the said local boards are now the owners of such markets. No evidence was offered that tolls had been collected upon such sales.

(e.) The respondent, on Monday, the 15th day of May, 1871 (as charged in the said information), at the town of Cockermouth aforesaid, not then being a licensed hawker, in a certain place there, called the Agricultural Hall, within the district of the said local board, but not within the field or space prescribed by the bye-laws of the said board for holding the markets for the sale of sheep, did sell 12 sheep, in respect of which toll was, by the said Local Government Act, 1858, and the Market and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, and the bye-laws made by the said local board in pursuance thereof as aforesaid, authorised to be taken in the said market; but it was contended on behalf of the respondent that, inasmuch as the said sheep were not sold within the field or space prescribed by the bye-laws of the said board for holding the markets, but within the respondent's own private and exclusive premises, in the ordinary way of trade, they were not tollable under the bye-laws.

(f.) The Agricultural Hall was erected by the respondent in the year 1865, on plans submitted to and approved of by the said local board, with knowledge that it was the intention of the respondent to use the same as an auction mart for the sale of cattle, sheep, &c.

(g.) The Agricultural Hall is a large building of brick, stone, and mortar, and slated, and contains a large ring or area, in which the respondent sells, and stalls for the accommodation of about 100 head of cattle. On the east side and partly across the south end of the hall, and adjoining and communicating with it, is a large open yard with fixed pens, capable of holding 1400 sheep, and in which sheep are penned till required in the hall for sale.

(h.) The Agricultural Hall and yard are both the private property of the respondent, built on his own private land, at his own cost, and in his own occupation. The respondent's dwelling-house, which is also his own property, adjoins and communicates with the said yard, but not with the Agricultural Hall. The dwelling-house is separated from the Agricultural Hall by the respondent's harness room and stable, also in his own occupation.

(i.) The respondent advertises and holds sales by public auction in the Agricultural Hall every Monday of cattle, sheep, horses, &c. The average sale in the Agricultural Hall on each Monday amounts to about 100 cattle and 1000 sheep, much exceeding the sales in the market regulated by the board held on these days.

The respondent also holds many other sales of cattle, horses, and sheep, in the same place, on other specified days throughout the year. The respondent also uses the Agricultural Hall for furniture and other sales.

(j.) The cattle, sheep, horses, &c., so sold by the respondent in the Agricultural Hall as aforesaid, are the property of farmers and others, who take them there for sale from all parts of the county.

(k.) The respondent charges the vendors a commission on the sales, and guarantees payment to them of the amount of the sales.

(l.) The respondent has been an auctioneer for twenty-two years, and for sixteen years previous to erecting the Agricultural Hall was accustomed to hold sales by public auction at Cockermouth, on market and other days, in the streets and elsewhere in the town of Cockermouth, without molestation or interruption; and no toll was demanded or received by any person on account of such sales, save that the respondent paid tolls for pens for holding sheep which he put up upon the street on these occasions, the same as other persons who put up pens for the same purpose, or put up stalls on the said street for the sale of wares on market days.

6. The question of law arising on the above statements therefore is:

Whether the place where the sheep in question were sold was or was not the respondent's own dwelling-house, place, or shop, within the meaning of the exception in the 13th section of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, which enacts that, "After the market place is opened for public use, every person, other than a licensed hawker, who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40*s.*"

WM. WOOD.
RICHARD BELL.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him C. Hutton), for the appellant, contended that the justices were wrong in not convicting. The hall in which the respondent effected his sales of cattle, sheep, horses, &c., was neither a shop nor a dwelling-place, and therefore not within the exception contained in the 13th section of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vic. c. 14), which provides that "After the market-place is opened for public use, every person other than a licensed hawker who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling-place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40*s.*" Pope v. Whalley (6 B. & S. 303), and the Llandaff Market v. Lindon (8 C. B., N. S., 515), were cited. In the former case Blackburn, J., said: "Wherever a person is really selling in his own private shop, there he will not be liable to a penalty now, just as he would not have been liable to an action in olden times. But when parties are in reality setting up a market, this is not a private shop within the meaning of this Act, but is a market, for holding which they would be open to an action at common law." This is exactly what the respondent in the present case has done.

Sir J. Karslake, Q.C. (with him Brown, Q.C. and C. Crompton) for the respondent, contended that the place where his sales were effected was to be considered as his dwelling place or shop, and so within the exception made by the Act In Ashworth v. Heyworth (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 316; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 439), the appellant was convicted for having exposed for sale under a wooden shed affixed to his house or shop and supported on wooden posts, which had been erected for a period of eighteen years. It was held that the wooden shed was part of the appellant's house or shop, and so came within the exception in the 13th section, and therefore, that the conviction was wrong. Cockburn, C.J., said: "I think that the magistrates have taken a narrow view of this matter, and that where a piece of ground or a shed, such as that in the present case, adjoins the dwelling-house or shop, and is used for the same purposes as the shop, it may be said to be substantially an accessory to the shop, and therefore within the meaning of the words 'dwelling-place or shop' in the Act of Parliament." The extent of the business carried on by the present respondent is not a matter which should influence the decision of the court; neither ought the fact that he sells as auctioneer and not for himself. See Wiltshire v. Willett (11 C. B., N. S., 240), where it was held that a sale by auction in a shop attached to and being part of any dwelling-house was privileged. "I see no reason," said Erle, C. J., "why a man, selling goods in a shop, may not sell them by auction or on commission as agent for another; more especially as an auctioneer can maintain an action for the price of goods so sold by him." The same judge said, during the argument, that "The objects of the Act of Parliament were to get the highways cleared of obstruction, and to have all marketable commodities carried to the new market-place for sale. Are not these objects attained if the shop is in any dwelling-house?" [COCKBURN, C. J.—I take a shop to mean a place where goods are kept and sold by one person to another, as between buyer and seller, and not a place where anything is sold by auction.] Further, it is submitted that, after the establishment of his auction premises, the respondent had a right or privilege which could not be taken away from him. Sect. 50 of the Local Government Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) provides that "no market or slaughter-house shall be established in pursuance of this section so as to interfere with any rights, powers, or privileges, enjoyed within the district by any person, chartered, joint-stock, or incorporated company, without his or their consent." [COCKBURN, C. J.—What right had he different from that of the rest of Her Majesty's subjects? Those who had not already set up such a business had an equal right with him to do so. BLACKBURN, J.—He has merely used a right which was common to everybody; he has acquired none.] Harris v. Mayor of Bridgnorth (15 C. B., N. S., 89), was referred to.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think our judgment must be in favour of the appellant, the case coming, I think within the 13th section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 13, which enacts that "After the market place is opened for public use, every person, other than a licensed hawker, who shall sell, or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40*s*." Now, there is no doubt that this was a market properly established by the local authority under an Act of Parliament, empowering them to do so. There is no doubt that the things sold, or exposed for sale, come within the 13th section of the Act, as things in respect of which tolls are authorised to be taken. Therefore, the only question remaining which requires consideration is, whether this case comes within the exception of "his own dwelling-place or shop." Now, I think it is impossible to say that these are things sold in his dwelling-house. The facts lie in the narrowest possible compass. The respondent has premises extending over a very considerable area; in the first place, a large building called the Agricultural Hall, and contiguous to it another building or yard communicating with the Hall, and adjoining and communicating with this yard is a third building, the respondent's own dwelling-house. That being so, I think it is impossible to say that the hall is the dwelling place of the respondent. We find that it is separated from his dwelling-house by something which entirely divides the one place from the other. It is not necessary to determine whether there is any distinction between dwelling-house and dwelling-place; I cannot think that any such distinction, if any exists, was here intended. If there is a distinction between the two, and dwelling-place has a more extended meaning than dwelling-house, I do not think that in any sense whatever of the term, can this Hall be said to be part of the dwelling-place of the respondent. Then is it a shop? I am of opinion that it cannot, in any proper sense of the term, be called a shop. I agree with Sir John Karslake that there may be cases in which the term "shop," in its popular sense, would not be applicable, under the Act, to the place where things are sold or exposed for sale, but where, under a rational and liberal construction of the case, it might come within the exceptions mentioned in the Act; for example, the case of a horsedealer who keeps premises where he exposes the horses which he sells. It would be a great deal too much to say that the horse dealer is not at liberty to sell horses on his premises, because he does not come within the exception in the Act. Such a place might be taken to come constructively within the meaning of the word shop. But in all these cases we must judge by the surrounding circumstances. The question may be one more or less of degree. But it is very different where we come to deal with an extensive case like this, an area as extensive as the market place itself. Here the sale is by auction; the action of the auctioneer takes place, it is true, in a building, but the sheep which are sold are exposed in this large yard and kept there. To say that that is a shop is out of the question. I own that my individual inclination is to doubt whether an auctioneer's premises are a shop at all, within the meaning of the Act of Parliament; but it is not necessary to determine that question now. It is enough to say that it is impossible to hold that the large premises used by the respondent can, in any sense of the term shop, come within the exception made by the Act. The only further question is whether the case does not come within the 50th section of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, which provides that "no market or slaughter-house shall be established in pursuance of this section, so as to interfere with any right, powers, or privileges, enjoyed within the district, by any person, &c., without his consent." Now the right which the respondent was enjoying at the time the market place was established, was not such a right as was contemplated by the Legislature in that section. It was a right which he enjoyed only in common with all Her Majesty's subjects. He had no greater right in that respect than anyone else. I think that the word "right" in that section, especially when taken in conjunction with the other words used in it, must mean a right acquired adversely to the rights of the rest of the world and peculiar to the individual. It never could have been intended that powers given for the benefit of the inhabitants of a particular place, should not be exercised, by reason of some person having, already existing, premises used for a similar purpose. Our judgment must, therefore, be for the appellant.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. We must consider a little what was the reason and the motive with which the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act was passed. It was considered prudent to give in certain cases a market; and not only that, but prudent also to give that market a monopoly; and the Crown had, and still has, a prerogative to grant such a market. Now upon this subject there has been, as I pointed out in the case of Pope v. Whalley (6 B. & S. 303), and there still is some doubt as to what is exactly the Sovereign's prerogative. There may be a grant of a market, prohibiting the sale elsewhere of any articles whatsoever, even in a shop. This was very clearly settled in the case of Moseley v. Walker (7 B. & C. 40.) But it was intimated in a case in 12 M. & W., that though that might be by ancient prescription, yet that it was extremely doubtful whether a modern grant of a market could be equally extensive. But I do not think there is any doubt that, however modern the franchise, if a person gets up a rival market that would be an infringement of the previous grant. The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 was passed as a code of the various clauses which the Legislature was desirous of putting into force. Amongst others, they inserted this 13th section, which enacts that, "after the market place is opened for public use, every person, other than a licensed hawker, who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling place, or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by the special Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40*s*." What the Legislature was then probably thinking of was this; that whereas there was a doubt as to the grant of a modern franchise having the effect of stopping sales in a private shop, such doubt should be put an end to. The Legislature says, "We do not prevent such sales, but we do prevent a sale anywhere else than in a shop." Then, to come to the present case. To say that the respondent was selling in his dwelling place, would be, I think, an absurdity. The only question is whether he sold in a shop. Though a sale by an auctioneer might, in some conceivable cases, be said to be a sale in a shop, yet, primâ facie, such a sale is not what one is thinking of, when one speaks of selling in a shop. The case states that "the respondent advertises and holds sales by public auction in the Agricultural Hall every Monday of cattle, sheep, horses, &c. The average sale in the Agricultural Hall on each Monday amounts to about 100 cattle and 1000 sheep; much exceeding the sales in the market regulated by the board, held on these days." When I read that, I must consider whether that is keeping up a market in rivalry to and disturbance of the market authorised to be set up, or whether it comes within the exception made by the Act in the case of a man selling in his own shop. I do not pretend to be able to define precisely where market begins and where shop ends. But in the present case, I think no one can doubt that the respondent has been keeping up a disturbing market, and therefore that the case does not come within the exception of a person selling in his own shop. But it is said that the 50th section of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98 gives the respondent a privilege or right. [His Lordship read the section above set out.] Now I think that the respondent having furnished the town with a very good market, this would have been a very good reason why he should ask the authorities of the place when they were discussing the question whether they should set up another, not to do so. He might have had a very strong case in urging that upon them. That is a different matter however. He is still keeping up a market in rivalry to theirs. If he had any privilege or right, such as has been contended for, they could not have set up that market without his consent; but he had not any such privilege or right. Being one of the public, and having the right which the public in general has, of selling anywhere, provided no nuisance is created by the mode of sale, he simply used that right. But he had neither right, power, nor privilege peculiar to himself; and no other would give him, I think, any right to prevent the establishment of a market. The Legislature gives the protection of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act wherever the local board chooses to set up such a market as this, and it seems to me that the respondent in the present case was doing the very thing which the Legislature intended to prevent. Our judgment, therefore, must be for the appellant.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not propose at all to determine or to express any opinion upon the question whether an auctioneer selling by auction in his auction rooms, sells in a shop within the meaning of the Act. I should be unwilling to say that he does not. In determining whether the premises used in the present case were a shop or not, it is necessary to regard the nature and character of the premises, and the circumstances under which the sales were carried on. Now the respondent, who, it seems, used to sell cattle and sheep in the streets, before building these premises, built a large hall in the year 1865, and a large open yard with pens in which the sheep were penned till required in the hall for sale. He advertises periodical sales of cattle, sheep, and horses, besides other things. I find it stated that there are pens capable of holding 1,400 sheep; and I take it that when penned they are exposed there for sale, though the actual knocking down to the purchaser takes place in the hall. We find here a business carried on, not in a shop, but in a field, though it is more convenient to have many of the things sold under cover. This latter circumstance does not, however, make a difference when we are considering what is the nature of a shop, and it would be a large rendering, indeed, of that word, to hold it applicable to such a concern as this. It seems to me much more like a rival market.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The 13th section of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 was intended to provide a summary remedy for preventing the infringement of the rights of a market; and I think it ought to be read with reference to what would be an infringement of a grant of a market at common law. The doubt existing about this matter has been referred to by my brother Blackburn. It appears to me to be the better opinion that the grantee of a modern grant of a market would not have the right to prevent persons carrying on sales in their own dwellings or shops. Is the respondent's business carried on in his own dwelling-place or shop? It clearly is not. What the respondent does is to take advantage of the market days, when the people of the neighbourhood are collected, and to advertise his sales for those days. I think that if an action had been brought, on a charter by the Crown, and the facts stated in the present case were proved, the defendant would clearly be held to have been guilty of an infringement of the grant from the Crown. Judgment for the appellant.

GALWAY COUNTY ELECTION PETITION.

June 6, 7, and 11, 1872.

(Before MONAHAN, C. J., KEOGH, MORRIS and LAWSON, JJ.)

TRENCH v. NOLAN.

Election petition—Spiritual intimidation—Disqualification of candidate—Status—Notice to electors—Claim of candidate in minority to the seat—31 & 32 Vict. c. 125 s. 12.

N. and T. were candidates for G. county. N. before the nomination day had been adopted as the candidate of the Roman Catholic clergy, who individually and collectively, by threats of spiritual chastisement and temporal injury, coerced the electors to promise their votes for N. A petition was presented against the return of N., and the election judge found that the exercise of such intimidation and undue influence had become publicly known amongst the electors previous to the day of nomination; that on the day of nomination T., the petitioner, had caused a notice to be posted at and in the immediate vicinity of the place of nomination for the said county, and to be advertised in several of the newspapers published in the county, and to be extensively posted in the different polling places for such county, cautioning the electors that N. was disqualified from being elected; that notices were served at each of the polling places (with one exception) on some of the electors previous to their voting, the aggregate of such personal services not amounting to more than a few hundreds; and that numbers of the notices were scattered about the floors of the polling booths, but were all in the English language, whilst many of the electors could not speak English.

Held (Monahan, C.J., dissentiente), that the status of N. was destroyed the moment that he or his agents were guilty of undue influence, and that sufficient notice of his disqualification had been conveyed to the electors to cause all the votes given for him to be thrown away.

Held further (Monahan, C.J., dissentiente), that T., who obtained 658 votes only, and was in a minority of 2165, was entitled to the seat.

THE following case was stated by Keogh, J., under the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 for the determination of the court:

1. I hereby certify that the above petition, to which I refer, came on for trial before me at Galway on the 1st April last, and that, said trial having been continued from day to day, at the conclusion thereof, on the 27th May inst., it appeared to me requisite that, before finally determining as to that portion of the petition which prayed that the said petitioner might be declared duly elected, and that he should have been returned, I should, under the 12th section of said Act, reserve certain questions of law for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas, and that I should accordingly postpone the granting the certificate directed by the said Act, until the determination of such questions by the said court.

2. I came to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that the said respondent had, previously to the said election, by himself and his agents, committed the offence of undue influence upon the electors in order to induce and compel such electors to give their votes for him or to refrain from voting against him at said election, contrary to law, and against the provisions of the statutes against such practices made and provided, and especially against the provisions of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 5.

3. It was proved before me that the number of electors on the registry for such county was 5346; but that, making allowance for double entries and deaths, the real number of electors available to vote at the time of such election, which took place on 6th Feb. in this year, did not exceed 4686. Of them 2823 voted for respondent, and 658 for the petitioner. The respondent was declared by the sheriff duly elected.

4. It was further proved before me that such undue influence had been practised upon the electors of the county, and had been carried out in pursuance of arrangements made by the said respondent and his agents previous to such election, and especially during the months of November and December of the last year, and the month of January of the present year.

5. It was also proved that certain of the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church had, by letters written to and read at public meetings, and by resolutions adopted at meetings and conferences of the Roman Catholic clergy, at which they presided, and which resolutions were printed, published, and made known throughout the county by the respondent and his agents, aided and assisted in the exercise of such undue influence. It was also proved that many of the Roman Catholic clergy, discharging ecclesiastical duties in such county, by their speeches at public meetings, held in various parts of the county, commencing on 19th Dec. of last year, and continued through the month of January in the present year, and by denunciations and threats of temporal injury and spiritual punishment, uttered during and after divine service, and in the presence of their congregations, had intimidated and unduly influenced the electors of such county; and that the said respondent had made himself liable for their acts.

6. It was also admitted upon both sides, on such trial, that at least nine-tenths of the electors were members of the Roman Catholic Church.

7. I was satisfied that, by reason of the foregoing and other acts of intimidation proved against the respondent and his agents, the status of the said respondent as a candidate qualified to be elected was destroyed, and that he was disqualified to be elected for the said county by such acts, committed by him and his agents, as hereinbefore described, and that such disqualification existed previous to the day of nomination for such election; and that the knowledge of such acts, and especially of such intimidation and undue influence, had become generally known through and amongst the great body of the electors throughout the county, and especially amongst those who afterwards voted for the said respondent.

8. It was further proved before me that large numbers of the electors, who had previously declared their intention to vote for said petitioner, had been compelled to vote for said respondent, or to refrain from voting for the said petitioner, and had avowed that they were so compelled by such intimidation and undue influence.

9. It was proved that the exercise of such intimidation and undue influence had become publicly known amongst the electors of such county, previous to the day of nomination.

10. It was further proved before me that, on Feb. 3, being the day of nomination, the said petitioner caused a notice to be posted at, and in the immediate vicinity of the place of nomination for said county, and to be advertised in several of the newspapers published in the county, and to be extensively posted in the different polling places for such county, cautioning the electors that said respondent was disqualified from being elected for the said county, as set forth in the petition.

11. It was further proved that, at each of the different polling places, and of the respective polling booths, the said petitioner had persons stationed with copies of such notice, with the view of serving them on the electors previous to their recording their votes at the poll.

12. It was further proved that these notices were served at each of the polling places (with one exception), on some of the electors previous to their voting, the numbers of such services varying considerably in different polling places, but not amounting in the aggregate of personal services to more than a few hundreds; and furthermore, it was proved that attempts were made to serve numbers of such notices on the voters as they came to the poll, who either refused to receive them or were prevented receiving them by the confusion in the booths, sometimes by the agents of the respondent, and frequently by the members of the Roman Catholic clergy, who were engaged conducting the electors to the poll. In the excepted booth to which I have referred, the person placed to serve the notices did not do so until after the electors had polled, having been told by one of the agents of the petitioner that was the proper time to do so.

13. It was further proved that numbers of these notices were scattered about on the floors and tables of the polling booths. They were all in the English language, and it was proved that many of the electors could not speak English.

14. It was, on the foregoing facts, contended before me on behalf of the petitioner, that, the status of the said respondent being destroyed thereby, the petitioner was the only candidate before the constituency eligible to receive their votes and be declared elected; and that I should, accordingly, declare him duly elected.

15. It was, however, contended on the part of the respondent, that, notwithstanding the said respondent being found ineligible, yet the votes given to him were not thrown away, as the electors were not bound to act upon his ineligibility, even though made known to them by sufficient notice, until so declared by some competent legal tribunal; and, furthermore, that, even if they were bound to act upon such ineligibility, though not so previously bound, knowledge thereof was not sufficiently brought home to a sufficient number of electors to displace the majority of the said respondent, and to justify me in declaring said petitioner duly elected.

16. I, therefore, request the opinion and determination of the Court of Common Pleas upon the following questions: First, were the electors who constituted the majority of said respondent fixed with sufficient knowledge of the disqualification of the said respondent, and should they have acted upon such disqualification and refrained from voting for said respondent? secondly, was the petitioner (there being no disqualification on his part) entitled to be declared elected for said county?

Armstrong, Serjt. (with him Murphy, Q.C., and Persse), on behalf of the petitioner, contended that the disqualification was complete before the election took place; the notice of that disqualification given was such as reason demanded, and the nature of the case allowed; and that notice had been brought home to the electors who constituted the respondent's majority, before a single vote had been recorded: consequently, votes then given in wilful perverseness against the law were as absolute nullities as if given for a dead man, and the only candidate existing in the eye of the law should be returned.

Macdonogh, Q.C. (MacDermot with him), contra. —We contend that the case does not show that the 2165 voters constituting the respondent's majority had knowledge of his being disqualified at the time they voted; that, even if they had notice of acts which a judge would hold amounted to the statutable offence of undue influence, previous to the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854, such notice would not cause the votes to be thrown away in the sense of the reservation, and that, since that Act, there must be a declaration by a committee or a report by a judge before a candidate is disqualified in the sense mentioned. The notice stated not a proved or specific fact, but a mere general assertion. Actual knowledge of undue influence is not brought home, and it cannot be held that the electors had even constructive knowledge of the disqualification or of agency. Notoriety and notice are only evidence of knowledge, and knowledge has not been found as a fact by the judge. There should have been a direct finding; and if found, it should have been on the allegations in the petition, but those allegations are either unproved or disproved, and there is no power to draw an inference of notoriety not suggested by the petition. The incapacity rests upon the statute law, and by a provision of the Corrupt Practices Act, introduced in consequence of the report in the Clitheroe case, an express declaration of disqualification, or a report by a judge is necessary as a condition precedent to notice of disqualification; while here, the judge's report is still incomplete. There is no case since the passing of that Act in which the election was declared otherwise than void; and void this election should be held.

Cur. adv. vult.

LAWSON, J.—In this case two questions have been submitted by my brother Keogh to the court for its determination, arising out of the Galway County Election Petition, in pursuance of the 12th section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125. [His Lordship read same.] The questions so reserved for our consideration are as follows: First. Were the electors who constituted the majority of said respondent fixed with sufficient knowledge of the disqualification of the said respondent, and should they have acted upon such disqualification and refrained from voting for such respondent? Second. Was the petitioner, there being no disqualification on his part, entitled to be elected for said county? It was contended by Mr. Macdonogh in his argument that the first of these questions was one of fact, not of law, and that the court could therefore return to it no answer. It is, however, very clear to my mind that it involves a serious and important question of law, namely, whether the facts as found in the case are sufficient, in point of law, to affect the electors with sufficient knowledge of the disqualification of the respondent, and whether votes recorded for him after such notice are thrown away. Mr. MacDermot, in arguing on the same side, admitted that a difficult question of law was saved by the case. His logical intellect recognised that question, and upon it he addressed to the court an argument distinguished by singular ability and acumen. Now, the propositions contended for before us, on behalf of the petitioner, who seeks the seat, were—first, that the respondent was disqualified for being elected for the county, and that the disqualification was complete before the election took place; secondly, that, before a single vote was recorded at the election, sufficient knowledge of such disqualification was brought home to the electors who constituted the majority of the respondent; third, that the petitioner, a duly qualified candidate, was entitled to be seated. Before I approach the special facts of the case, it is absolutely necessary to consider what the rule of law is which is applicable to cases of this kind. We are directed by the 26th section of the Act to pursue, as far as may be, the principles, practice, and rules on which committees of the House of Commons have heretofore acted in dealing with election petitions. So far as these principles fail to guide us we are, according to the second section, to have the same powers as we would possess if the petition were an ordinary cause within our jurisdiction, and we must then be governed by the principles of the common law. I have, therefore, approached the consideration of this case as if it were a new trial motion or a case reserved from Nisi Prius, endeavouring to ascertain, in a manner to us somewhat novel, what are the principles of law which govern this case, and then to apply them to the facts. In the first place then, it is necessary to ascertain whether there are any principles to be deduced from the decisions of committees of the House of Commons, upon the question whether a duly qualified candidate is entitled, although in a minority, to be seated, should the other candidate be proved to have been disqualified at the time of the election, and should the electors have been duly apprised of such disqualification. The research and assiduity of counsel have referred us to nearly all the cases upon the point, from the earliest time before committees of the House of Commons. I need not travel through them in detail, but the result is this—that in very many cases the candidate in the minority has been seated, upon proof of his opponent's disqualification to the knowledge of the electors, while in many other cases, upon a state of facts apparently similar, the committees have simply unseated the disqualified candidate, and declared the election void. Two remarkable instances of apparently contradictory decisions are the Cheltenham and Horsham cases, decided about the same time. In the Horsham case, the committee seated the other candidate; in the Cheltenham case they declined to do so; in both there was a divided opinion among the members of the committees. The result of the decisions therefore appears to be that the jurisdiction to seat the candidate in the minority was undoubtedly possessed by committees; that they frequently exercised, and in many other instances refused to exercise that jurisdiction. Failing in this chaos of decisions to discover any settled principle which should absolutely govern us, we must have recourse to our common law for rules and analogies to guide our judgment, an alternative to which, for my part, I turn with pleasure, because there we shall find, though often intermixed and obscured by much that is technical, or that perhaps may be deemed narrow, principles of the soundest sense, the truest wisdom, and, above all, a power of expansiveness and adaptation, which when properly applied is adequate to the solution of the novel questions that, in the complex relations grown out of an advanced civilisation, are continually coming to the surface. That power of expansion is well stated by Coleridge, J., in Gosling v. Veley (4 H. L. Cas. 768), and in the language of Eyre, C.J., in Ilderton v. Ilderton (2 H. Bl.), where he says that when one mode of trial is obsolete or inapplicable the common law, "out of its own inexhaustible fountain of justice," will devise another. The first case then to which I shall refer is Rex v. Hawkins (10 East, 211). That is a case of the very highest authority. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench is delivered by Lord Ellenborough, and the case was carried to the House of Lords, where the decision was affirmed (2 Dow. P. C. 124). The question there discussed was, whether the notice of the other candidate's incapacity was given too late, not having been given until after two persons had voted. At page 217, Lord Ellenborough says, "The general proposition that votes given for a candidate after notice of his being ineligible are to be considered the same as if the persons had not voted at all is supported by the cases of the Queen v. Boscawen (East, 13 Anne); Rex v. Withers (East. 8 G. II.); Taylor v. Mayor of Bath (M. 15 G. II.), all of which are cited in Cowper 537, in Rex v. Monday. In the first, Boscawen and Roberts, the two candidates, had an equal number of votes, but because Boscawen was incapable the votes given for him were considered as thrown away, and the other duly elected. In the second case, Withers had five votes out of eleven, and the other six refusing to vote at all, the court held Withers duly elected, and that the six who refused to vote were virtually consenting to the election of Withers. In the third case, Taylor, Bigg, and Kingston were candidates. Bigg was objected to as a disqualified person, notwithstanding which Bigg had fourteen votes, Taylor thirteen, and Kingston only one. There Lee, C.J., at Nisi Prius, directed the jury that, if they were satisfied that the electors had notice of Bigg's want of qualification, they should find for Taylor, because Bigg not being qualified, should be considered as a person not in esse, and the voting for him a mere nullity. The jury found for Taylor, and the court on motion for a new trial agreed with the law as laid down by Lee, C.J., and refused a new trial. And in Rex v. Monday and Rex v. Coe this doctrine was not denied, although the cases then before the court went off on other points." Lord Eldon, in giving the judgment of the House of Lords, puts it upon the ground that "the majority knowingly voted for this dead man." It is quite true that, as has been stated in the argument, the candidate in that case admitted his own incapacity, but in later cases it will be found that that circumstance is immaterial, and that if the elector votes after he knows of the disqualification, he does so at the peril of losing his vote. Again, in Rex. v. Parry (14 East, 549), this rule is recognised. And in Gosling v. Veley (7 Q. B. 406), Lord Denman, a great constitutional lawyer, expressly lays down the rule as applicable to elections to the House of Commons. At p. 436 he says—"Upon the argument of this case the counsel for the defendant did not shrink from meeting his opponent on the principle. Majority he truly asserted to be legal majority, and he contended that though there might be numerically more vestrymen present who were in intention adverse to the rate, than those who voted for it, yet the majority of votes legally expressed was in its favour. This position he sought to establish by showing that the vestrymen who were so adverse had thrown away their votes, and he likened this case to those which have been decided in regard to corporate assemblies for corporate elections, or the meetings of freeholders or burgesses in the elections to the House of Commons. It may be convenient, therefore, in the first place, to examine into the principle on which this rule as to corporate and other elections appears to have been established, and then, after stating the facts which these pleadings disclose, with regard to the proceedings now in question, to see whether it is properly applicable to those facts, so as to be the groundwork of our decision. First, the cases in which the rule has been either stated or applied in regard to corporate elections are very numerous. It may be sufficient to refer to four of the most important, either for the arguments or the judgments—Oldknow v. Wainwright, Rex v. Monday, Rex v. Hawkins, and Rex v. Parry. The result of the decisions appears to be this—when the majority of electors vote for a disqualified person, in ignorance of the fact of disqualification, the election may be void or voidable, or in the latter case, may be capable of being made good, according to the nature of the disqualification; the objection may require ulterior proceedings to be taken before some competent tribunal, in order to be made available, or it may be such as to place the elected candidate on the same footing as if he never had existed, and the votes for him were a nullity. But in no such case are the electors who vote for him deprived of their votes, if the fact becomes known and is declared while the election is still incomplete. They may instantly proceed to another nomination, and vote for another candidate. If it be disclosed afterwards, the party elected may be declared ousted, and the election declared void; but the candidate in the minority will not be deemed ipso facto elected. But where an elector before voting receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise, and therefore, however strongly he may in fact dissent and in however strong terms he may disclose his dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted, that is, the helping to the election of some other person. He is present as an elector; his presence counts as such to make up the requisite number of electors, where a certain number is necessary; but he attends only as an elector, to perform the duty which is cast on him by the franchise he enjoys as an elector; he can only speak in a particular language; he can do only certain acts; any other language means nothing, any other act is merely null; his duty is to assist in making an election. If he dissents from the choice of A. who is qualified, he must say so by voting for some other also qualified; he has no right to employ his franchise merely in preventing an election, and so defeating the object for which he is empowered and bound to attend. And this is a wise and just rule in the law. It is necessary that an election should be duly made, and at the lawful time; the electoral meeting is held for that purpose only, and but for this rule the interest of the public and the purpose of the meeting might both be defeated by the perverseness or the corruption of electors, who may seek some unfair advantage by postponement. If then the elector will not oppose the election of A. in the only legal way, he throws away his vote, by directing it where it has no legal force, and in so doing he voluntarily leaves A. unopposed, i.e., assents to the voices of the other electors. When the disqualification depends upon a fact which may be known to the elector, he is entitled to notice, for without that the inference of assent could not be fairly drawn, nor would the consequence as to the vote be just. But if the disqualification be of a sort whereof notice is to be presumed, none need expressly be given; no one can doubt that if an elector would nominate and vote only for a woman to fill the office of mayor or burgess in Parliament, his vote would be thrown away; there the fact would be notorious, and every man would be presumed to know the law upon that fact." This decision was reversed in the House of Lords upon a collateral point, but the principles laid down by Lord Denman have never been questioned. The last proposition of Lord Denman, that a person having notice of the facts is presumed to know the law has been qualified by a recent decision in the Court of Queen's Bench in England, which has been much relied on in argument on both sides. I refer to Reg. v. Mayor of Tewkesbury (L Rep. 3 Q. B. 634; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 851), which decides that notice of the facts creating the disqualification is not necessarily notice of the disqualification. The general rule, however, is there thus laid down by Blackburn, J.—"The candidate for the office of town councillor is duly elected if he has an actual majority of valid votes. This was decided in Rex v. Hawkins, and it was also decided that if an elector, having notice of the disqualification of a candidate, chooses to vote for that candidate, it is the same thing as if he did not vote at all. From the illustrations in the cases it is plain that if an elector knows as a fact that the candidate for whom he is about to vote is disqualified, and yet persists in voting for him, the elector's vote is as utterly thrown away as if he had voted for a dead person or for the Man in the Moon. In the case of Reg. v. Coaks, Lord Campbell, C.J., says—'Blake was in fact a candidate, but he was an alderman, and therefore ineligible, and that fact was known to the electors. Now it is the law, both the common law and the Parliamentary law, and it seems to me also common sense, that if an elector will vote for a man who he knows is ineligible, it is as if he did not vote at all, or voted for a non-existent person, as it has been said, as if he gave his vote for the Man in the Moon.'" Here we have Lord Campbell, another great master of the common law, laying down this rule as explicit. Such being the undoubted rule of the common law, applicable to Parliamentary as well as to other elections, let us see what are the special facts stated in this case (out of which I shall not travel), in order to ascertain whether that rule is applicable to them, so as to form the groundwork of decision. First, then, was there a disqualification of the respondent before the election took place? It appears by the case that he was personally guilty of acts of intimidation and undue influence, before the election; that he entered into a combination to procure his own return by undue influence, long before the election took place. [His Lordship read paragraphs 2 and 4 of case.] These are the findings on which the fact of disqualification depends. The question is, do these acts amount to a disqualification? Mr. MacDermot argued with great ingenuity that such acts do not amount to a disqualification unless they had been adjudicated upon by a committee or by the report of a judge; that there was no such disqualification at common law; that the several statutes before the passing of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854) created such disqualification, upon the commission of one of these offences, but that the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act repealed all those earlier Acts, and creates no disqualification except that contained in sect. 36. [His Lordship read the section.] This construction of the Act would lead to some very startling consequences. If the earlier sections, two, four, and five, defining the offences of bribery, treating, and undue influence, and making them misdemeanours, do not destroy the status of the candidate who is guilty of them, upon what ground is a judge to unseat him? He cannot be unseated, because he has committed a misdemeanour; and it would seem, therefore, to follow in strictness from this argument that the judge could not unseat him unless he had been already found guilty. This is an absurd consequence, and I think that the true construction of the statute is, that the commission of any one of these offences ipso facto disqualifies the candidate from being elected, or, to use the language of Martin, B., in the Norwich case, annihilates his status as a candidate. Sect. 36, then, imposes an additional disqualification by rendering the candidate, once reported guilty, incapable of being elected for the same constituency during the then existing Parliament, and in such case the mere production of the report is sufficient, without going into the facts, so to disqualify him. This was obviously intended in order to prevent what might otherwise happen, that if a candidate were unseated and a new election ordered he might renew his candidature for the same constituency. Therefore, were sect. 36 unenacted, I should hold that the commission of any of such offences specially disqualified the candidate from the moment of its commission. I do not think that sect. 36 which imposes this disability can be held, as was argued, by implication to alter the rule of law to which I have referred, and to enact that no previous disqualification of a candidate, unless evidenced by a report of a judge, shall have the effect, no matter how clear it may be, of destroying his status, so that votes given for him after notice of the disqualification to the electors would be thrown away. The Legislature has not said so, and the result, were we to accede to this argument, would be that a candidate might appear upon the nomination day publicly with a bag of sovereigns, and in the presence of every elector promise a certain sum to every one who voted for him; and yet he could be merely unseated, and although the electors had personal knowledge of his disqualification, the seat could not be transferred to the qualified candidate next him on the poll. Nay, according to this doctrine, it is manifest that the process might be repeated from time to time, and a series of disqualified candidates brought forward one after another, and no matter how open notorious and palpable were the corrupt practices used by them, they could only be unseated, and the candidate seeking the seat by fair means and a free election would be placed in a position which the law never contemplated. I think, therefore, in this case, that the disqualification of the respondent before the day of nomination was complete. The next question and the important one is, whether such knowledge of that disqualification was brought home to the electors so as to let in the application of the rule of law to which I have adverted. I turn again to the case. [His Lordship read paragraphs 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13.] From the statement it appears that the electors knew, and must have known by reason of the very nature of the case that this undue influence was practised before the election by the respondent. This is a case very special indeed in its circumstances. The candidate entered into a combination—not a secret one, but open and avowed—to obtain his return by bringing undue influence to bear upon the body of the electors. That was carried out publicly for months before the election. Its success depended upon its universality, upon its being brought to operate upon and to control the volition of the electors. I cannot therefore doubt, upon these findings, that every elector must be held to have known, as a matter of fact, that the respondent was guilty of practising undue influence and intimidation upon the electors. Therefore, the only question, as it appears to me, is whether, knowing all these facts, the electors must be taken also to have known the legal consequence—that the commission of these offences created a disqualification in the respondent to be a candidate, or to be elected as a member of Parliament. Now, in order to arrive at a sound conclusion upon this question, it is absolutely necessary to consider what, in point of law, is the character of the acts done by the respondent and his agents, to the electors' knowledge. I emphatically say that they were criminal acts. I am not at liberty, sitting here as a judge, to gloss over these acts—to say that they were the results of indiscreet zeal or mere breaches of decorum. I feel myself bound, even at the peril of giving offence, to designate them by their name—crimes; and to pronounce those, whether lay or clerical, engaged in them criminally engaged in an unlawful combination. In Reg. v. Conway (7 C. L. Rep. 519), which was a prosecution against the Rev. Peter Conway for offences like the present, at the Mayo election, Perrin, J.—a judge whose authority will not be controverted—says: "One of the charges is for using what is called spiritual intimidation, and calling down and using imprecations of a very shocking nature, to prevent persons from the due exercise of the elective franchise. The charges laid in the information are grave and serious offences—offences which require suppression, and, if necessary, punishment." When it appears then that this system of intimidation was carried on throughout the country, publicly and openly by the candidate himself, seen and known by the electors—when denunciations were ringing from the altars, am I, sitting here as a judge, at liberty to presume that the electors who saw these offences committed did not know that they were offences, and that their commission created a disqualification? I cannot lay down any such principle. I hold that every man must be presumed to know the criminal law, and to be aware when he sees or knows an offence to have been committed that it is an offence, and that it entails penal consequences upon the offenders." I do not think that Reg. v. Mayor of Tewkesbury at all applies to a case like the present. There the disqualification was that the candidate was mayor and returning-officer, and as such was disqualified for being a candidate, according to the decision of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Owens. Blackburn, J. says: "It is, therefore, necessary to decide whether the mere knowledge of the fact that Blizard was the mayor and the returning-officer must be taken to involve knowledge of his being disqualified for election. Every elector in the borough must have known that Blizard was the mayor, and every elector who saw him presiding at the election must have known as a fact that he was the returning-officer, and every elector who was a lawyer, and had read the case of Reg. v. Owens, would know that he was disqualified. From the knowledge of the fact that Blizard was mayor and returning-officer, was every elector bound to know as a matter of law that he was disqualified? I think that when a voter is informed that a certain circumstance in point of law disqualifies a candidate, even although he may hold a different opinion, yet if he afterwards vote for that candidate his vote is thrown away." That has a very important bearing upon the argument that an elector is not bound to notice the disqualification unless it has been the subject of adjudication. He proceeds to ask, "In the present election, a voter may possibly have been told by the one party that Blizard, being returning-officer, could not be elected, by the other party that he could be; if this could be shown, the vote would be thrown away; but the case merely shows as a fact that Blizard was returning-officer, from which a lawyer would be aware he was disqualified; and, in my opinion, the knowledge that Blizard was returning-officer does not, in law, necessarily involve the knowledge that he was disqualified." Now, does that apply to the present case? Can any elector be assumed to be ignorant that a candidate, openly practising intimidation and undue influence, was not by law disqualified to be elected? I think not. It is quite true that a man cannot be presumed to know legal technicalities, or, as Maule, J. says in a case there cited: "It would be too much to hold that ordinary people are bound to know in what particular court such and such a practice does or does not prevail." In Cooper v. Phibbs (L. Rep. 2 H. L. Cas. 170) Lord Westbury says:—"It is said 'ignorantia juris haud excusat,' but in that maxim the word jus is used in the sense of denoting general law, the ordinary law of the country." That I believe to be the true distinction. In Reg. v. Mayor of Tewkesbury, Lush, J. says:—"For the reasons given by my brother Blackburn, I am of opinion that it is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only, but that it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew the fact amounted to a disqualification. It cannot be said, in all cases, that the mere knowledge of a fact, which in law disqualifies a candidate, must be taken to be knowledge of all the accompanying circumstances." Now, taking the rule to be as thus laid down, I am clearly of opinion that it is not only a reasonable but a legal inference from the facts stated which I am bound to draw, that the electors who knew of the exercise of these acts of undue influence—spiritual intimidation—knew that those acts disqualified the candidate. But the case does not rest upon the general notoriety and publicity of this intimidation. It was provided that, on the day of nomination, two days before the polling, a notice was posted at and in the immediate vicinity of the place of nomination. That notice is signed by a responsible person, the conducting agent for the petitioner. It is very accurately prepared, and substantially informed the electors that the respondent was disqualified by acts of treating and undue influence, and that votes given for him would be thrown away. That notice was also published in the local newspapers, and extensively posted at the different polling places in the county. The case further states that the petitioner had persons stationed at each of the polling places and booths in order to serve the electors previous to their coming to the poll. It states that these notices were served at each of the polling places, except one, on some of the electors previous to their voting—the number of such services varying considerably in different polling places, but not amounting in the aggregate of personal services to more than a few hundreds—and that attempts were made to serve numbers of such notices on the voters as they came to the poll, who either refused to receive them or were prevented from receiving them by the confusion of the booths, sometimes by the agents of the respondent, and frequently by the members of the Roman Catholic clergy who were engaged in conducting the electors to the poll. It appears that in the excepted booth, the person employed to serve the notices did not do so until after the electors had polled, having been told by an agent of the petitioner's that was the proper time to do so. And it is further stated that these notices were scattered about on the floors and tables of the polling booths; that they were all in English, and that many of the electors could not speak English. Upon these facts it is clear that notice was not served personally upon all the electors; but I think that the petitioner did all that could be reasonably done in order to apprise the electors of the disqualification by posting, publishing, and serving these notices. The question is, were they fixed with knowledge? Notice is only one mode of bringing home knowledge, and, taking the facts as stated regarding these notices with the facts of previous knowledge on the part of the electors stated in the case, I cannot avoid drawing the conclusion that sufficient knowledge of the respondent's disqualification is brought home to the electors who constituted the majority of the respondent. It is said that no case has occurred since the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, in which a candidate in a minority has been seated. The point does not appear to have arisen. It could not arise unless the disqualification existed before the election, and was brought home to the knowledge of the electors. In the case of the Norwich election petition, before Martin, B., the bribery relied on in order to disqualify the candidate did not take place until three o'clock on the day of polling, and the candidate was not personally implicated, therefore the question could not have arisen. The case, however, now arises and calls for a decision. I decide it upon its own special facts—facts which I hope are of rare occurrence. I find existing, as reported in this case, a system of spiritual intimidation, organized by the candidate, and successfully carried out through the county for months before the election. It is found that large numbers of the electors who had previously declared their intention to vote for the petitioner had been compelled to vote for the respondent, or to refrain from voting for the petitioner, and had avowed that they were compelled to do so by such intimidation and undue influence. How jealously the law regards the exercise of spiritual influence in the various transactions of life every lawyer knows. Just in proportion as it is powerful and all-prevading so are the safeguards which the law interposes for the protection of those on whom it is exercised. Not only does the law of the land condemn its undue exercise, it is contrary to the moral law, and the best interests of our nature revolt against it. It is an application to base purposes of an influence accorded for a pure and holy purpose. If it is inhibited when exercised in the private affairs of men, what judgment should the law pronounce when a minister of religion, robed in the sacred vestments of his order, surrounded by the most sacred mysteries of his creed, claiming the power to bind and to loose, misuses that position to denounce and expose to public odium those who dare to exercise their civil rights and franchises in a way that he disapproves, and to threaten them with temporal injury and spiritual punishment? When such words fall from the lips that should only utter the message of love and mercy to sinners, the words of the great Catholic epistle of St. James recur to my mind—"Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. These things ought not so to be. Does a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?" We have been told in the argument of the constitutional rights of the electors. Their rights are to be protected, so far as we by our decisions can protect them, against undue influences. The qualified candidate also, against whom such influences have been exerted, has a right to be protected against them as far as the rules of law will admit. I believe that the conclusion at which I have arrived, after careful consideration, is in strict conformity with the rules of the common law, in harmony with the principles of our free constitution, and calculated to promote that which, in the preamble of the Act we are administering, is declared to be expedient—the freedom of elections; for a candidate may henceforth hesitate to invoke to his aid spiritual influence and altar denunciations, if it be decided that the effect of introducing into a contest such tremendous weapons will be, not merely to cause the ultimate defeat of the person who resorts to them, but further, to render probable the success of the candidate against whom they have been employed. For these reasons I am of opinion that both the questions reserved should be answered in the affirmative.

MORRIS, J.—In this case the judgment pronounced so well and ably by my brother Lawson upon the questions reserved for the determination of the court obviously leaves to me nothing to add, nor is there anything to alter. In fact, I have but to express my concurrence.

MONAHAN, C.J.—I regret that I feel obliged to differ from my learned brethren, but in my opinion an opposite reply should be returned to the question submitted in the present case for our determination. For my part, I should be disposed to answer in effect that the petitioner should not be seated. The case is one of serious difficulty, and as it has required so it has received our calm and careful consideration. I shall refer to the facts in so far as they appear to me to be material. Making allowance for deaths and for double entries on the registry, the number of electors found competent to vote at the election was 4686. Of these, 2823 voted for the respondent and 655 for the petitioner, leaving 1205 voters unpolled, and giving a majority of 2165 votes in favour of the respondent. To me it appears that these figures have a very material bearing upon the question to be resolved. According to the statement next presented—and let me observe that I do not desire to question any statement of fact reported in the case—it appears that the respondent by himself, his agents, and by persons for whose acts as detailed he had rendered himself responsible, was guilty of that which the law defines as undue influence, which was practised upon the electors and carried out in pursuance of some arrangements made previous to the election, and especially during the months of November, December, and January preceding the election; and therefore, that he ought not to have been elected. Accepting the accuracy of that statement, I have no doubt whatever that, so far as the respondent is concerned, the consequent decision by which he is declared to have been disqualified to be elected was a correct and right decision. But there remains the question, whether the facts were such as to justify us in replying upon the case reserved in the manner stated by my brother Lawson, and upon that question I entertain an opposite opinion. The case affirms that certain prelates, their numbers undisclosed, and that certain other members of the Catholic priesthood, how many not specified, had combined or entered into an arrangement with the respondent, in consequence of which undue influence was exercised, and that the respondent being responsible could not properly have been returned. And accordingly, as properly stated by the case, the respondent was disqualified. But that which appears to me the most material is the statement that the knowledge of such acts and especially of such intimidation and undue influence had become generally known to and among the great body of the electors throughout the county, and especially amongst those who afterwards voted for the respondent. Now what is found by the case is the fact that undue influence existed, and was known to have existed; but not so that the electors had become aware that, as the consequence of its exercise, the candidate was disqualified. [His Lordship read paragraphs 8 and 9 of the case.] What number of electors were compelled to vote for the respondent, or voted for him, having promised their suffrages to the petitioner, what proportion or how many of them became aware of the acts which disqualified the respondent, we find unspecified. [His Lordship read paragraphs 10 and 11 of the case.] We find that the notice relied upon was not duly served at all the polling booths; there was one exception, for, owing to a mistake of an agent of the petitioner, it appears that at one of the booths the notice was not served until after the votes had been recorded, and that is of no avail. However, it is found that, with this exception, copies of the notice were served at each booth, so far as was allowed, upon some of the electors previous to their voting, such personal services not amounting in the aggregate to more than a few hundreds—whether two, three, or five hundred is not specified, nor can I determine. How many services were attempted but frustrated, even an approximate number, is not specified, neither have we any means of ascertaining. In conclusion, the learned judge who tried the petition correctly states the questions arising. [His Lordship read paragraphs 14 and 15.] It has been contended, on the part of the respondent, that, notwithstanding that he was found disqualified the votes recorded for him were not thrown away in the sense of the reservation. Now, were the electors fixed with notice of the respondent's disqualification? From the case, as presented, I infer that the learned judge who heard the petition has not, as a fact, found, nor has he stated to us that the existence of the respondent's disqualification was brought home to the actual knowledge of any number of electors. We have it that a few hundreds were served with a certain notice; we are told that there was a general knowledge throughout the county amongst the electors of acts that would constitute a disqualification; but it is not found as a fact that those whom now it is intended to disfranchise for the purpose of the late election had actual knowledge of the existence, as a matter of fact, of such disqualification. There being no finding that the fact of disqualification was known to the body of the electors, are we to draw an inference that in point of fact it was known to them? I should have some hesitation in saying that it ever was intended that, presiding and dealing with this case under the Elections Petitions' Act, we could draw inferences of fact. That which we are to determine is—what is the law that should govern a given state of facts. Were this case being tried with the assistance of a jury, it would be one question whether there was evidence enough to go to them of knowledge, on the part of the great body of the electors, that the respondent was de facto disqualified so as to reduce the respondent's large majority of 2165, and to seat the petitioner. We are placed here instead of a jury, and assuming, as I do, that we are bound to reply as best we can, the question is this: Upon the state of facts given should we come to the conclusion that a number of votes were disqualified sufficient to reduce the respondent's majority so far as to justify us in declaring the petitioner entitled to be elected? Let us then consider the facts so found. It is found in fact that, through the county, the commission of the acts which amount to undue influence was known to the general body of the electors; it is not found in fact how many of the electors knew of the commission of those acts, or that they amounted to a disqualification. In my opinion, in order to justify us in reducing the respondent's majority, it should be found how many voters knew both the fact of the commission of undue influence and its consequence as a disqualification. Did the course taken at the trial admit of a scrutiny, it would be necessary, in order that the votes should be struck off the poll, to prove that notice was given to a certain number of the voters. In some of the recent cases, in which the question arose before committees of the House of Common, the course pursued was, if objection were taken to a particular voter, his name was struck off the poll on proof of service of the notice upon him; a similar ruling was applied to others; and so the votes were reduced until the petitioner was left in a clear majority. But here, there was no attempt at anything of that description; and there is no finding to enable us now to strike off any one or any number of the respondent's votes, so as to leave his opponent in the majority. Even supposing for a moment that knowledge of the facts could be established as against a number of those electors by reason of their having seen the notices in the halls of the polling places, nay, even were they aware that the clergymen acted as has been alleged in this case, would it be possible fairly to infer as a matter of fact, and not as a mere legal presumption, that these country people knew that the respondent's status was destroyed, and that he was disqualified for election? Anyone who knows the class of voters in those country districts must be aware that a great many are illiterate, that a great many, as found by the case itself, speak only the Irish tongue. They know that the Catholic priest exercises considerable influence, and that it is not illegal to exercise that influence; for the Catholic priest has as much as any elector in the community, a constitutional right to exercise his legitimate influence. If, indeed, clergymen will act as by the findings in this case they are stated to have acted, the same law applies to them as to others, and such acts would amount to the offence of using undue influence, for the purpose of procuring the return of the candidate whom they supported. But it is a wholly different thing to ascribe to the electors a knowledge of the illegality of the acts exercised, and of their effect to vitiate the election. To all it is a very difficult matter to know with anything like certainty where fair influence ends, and where undue influence begins; and though I am satisfied that as a matter of fact, a great number of the electors were aware of the influence practised by the priesthood, I do not believe, and cannot persuade my own mind that, as a matter of fact, they knew that influence was such as to be illegal and to vitiate the election. As to the question of legal presumption, I do not think that the maxim, ignorantia juris haud excusat, applies exactly as it has been laid down by my brother Lawson. If a person is accused of a crime, he cannot himself be excused by his ignorance of the law which rendered the particular act illegal; but I am unaware that it has ever been decided that a third person, no party to the illegal act, is to be presumed to know that the act is illegal, or that being so it would involve the effect sought to be attached to the commission of the offence here in question. Now, by sect. 26 of the statute we are administering, we are directed to have regard to the law as laid down in decisions pronounced by committees of the House of Commons, and, should that course prove inadequate, we are then to resort to the law as dispensed in analogous cases by the ordinary tribunals. It happens that the cases before committees, which in respect of time and circumstance invite attention, are but few in number. The second Horsham and second Cheltenham cases appear to have been decided contemporaneously. In the former it was proved that the elected candidate had been guilty of treating; notice had been given to each elector; and the committee, holding that the election was at his peril, seated his adversary. But in the latter the committee refused to act upon the supposition of knowledge of guilt, and there, although notice had been given and the candidate was declared disqualified, they ordered a new election. In the Tavistock case subsequently it had been publicly intimated that the candidate had not the necessary qualification; he came forward and made a solemn declaration that he possessed the necessary qualification; yet, although no actual personal service of notice that he was disqualified had been proved, his opponent was seated. I confess that I cannot understand the propriety of that decision. Later occurred the Clitheroe case. It there appearing that the successful candidate had been guilty of bribery at a former election, the question arose whether that fact and notice of it given should vitiate his present election and entitle his antagonist to be seated. The committee unanimously held that the defeated candidate should not be seated, and they merely held the election void. On that petition it was resolved—"That from the proceedings before the committee they think it right to draw the attention of the House to the unsatisfactory state of the law with regard to the effect of a notice to electors, in the case of a candidate who is returned by a majority of votes. By the common law the principle seems to be firmly established, that when a candidate is in point of fact disqualified at the time of an election, all votes given for him, with knowledge of the fact upon which such disqualification is founded, must be thrown away. This knowledge may be established either by distinct notice or by notoriety, and it will in all cases be inferred that when the voter is aware of the facts he is aware of the legal deduction from those facts, however intricate and doubtful such deduction may be. It is obvious that on these principles it may be contended that in all cases without exception, where notice of disqualification is served on a sufficient number of voters of the majority, and where the fact of such disqualification existing at the time of the election is subsequently established, the candidate who was in a minority on the poll is entitled to the seat, and some cases before election committees appear to have been decided on principles which lead directly to this conclusion. On the other hand, other cases point to the conclusion that to give effect to the notice the disqualification must be founded on some specific and definite fact existing and established at the time of polling, so as to lead to the fair inference of wilful perverseness on the part of the electors voting for the disqualified persons." And here I may be permitted to express that, as the Act under which we sit will expire at the end of the present Parliament unless renewed by the Legislature, I do sincerely hope that the report of the committee in the Clitheroe case will be taken into consideration, and that some enactment may be passed declaring a rule fixed and definite to be administered in cases of this description. The Clitheroe is the last case in which the question arose, but it certainly is not conclusive. Yet it is a circumstance not unworthy of consideration that, from the period of that report up to the time of the passing of the statute under which we are now proceeding, there is not a single instance to be found in which a committee of the House of Commons in cases of treating, bribery, or undue influence, have done more than unseat the sitting member—in none have they seated the unsuccessful candidate. But failing to discover any settled principle or assured rule in the conflicting decisions of the Parliamentary committees, I am bound as best I can to ascertain and apply the rule of the common law adapted to this case. But in the common law again changes from day to day are brought to pass by the adjudications of competent tribunals, and neither does it supply a sufficing substitute for a determinate statutory enactment. Nevertheless, if I too am to adopt the common law, I confess that for my part I am unable in principle to distinguish this case from that of Reg. v. The Mayor of Tewkesbury, which was decided so recently as 1868, a case which has never been questioned. There Blizard, one of the candidates for the office of town councillor in a borough, was elected, notwithstanding that, inasmuch as he was mayor and acted as returning officer, he was incapable of being elected. The question arose whether another candidate should be declared elected. It appears that on the morning of the election notices stating that Blizard was so disqualified, and that votes for him would be thrown away, were served upon the deputy mayor and his assessors, and posted on the town hall, public market-place, and in other conspicuous places. Others were carried on boards through the public streets, or distributed at various shops and houses throughout the borough. Blackburn, J., says: "There were five candidates, and four vacancies in the office of town councillor. Amongst the candidates were one Blizard, who was the mayor, and Moore. Blizard, as mayor of the borough, was the returning officer, and, as such, presided at the election. It is quite clear, on the authority of Reg. v. Owens, that a returning officer cannot return himself, and consequently Blizard was disqualified, and therefore could not be elected, although he had an actual majority of votes; and in Reg. v. Blizard we granted a quo warranto to oust him. The question now is whether Moore, who had the smallest number of votes, has been elected. The candidate for the office of town councillor is duly elected if he has an actual majority of valid votes. This was decided in Rex v. Hawkins, and it was also decided that if an elector, having notice of the disqualification of a candidate, chooses to vote for that candidate, it is the same thing as if he did not vote at all. From the illustrations in the cases it is plain that, if an elector knows as a fact that the candidate for whom he is about to vote is disqualified and yet persists in voting for him, the elector's vote is as utterly thrown away as if he had voted for a dead person or for the Man in the Moon. Does it appear in this case that those who voted for Blizard without knowing of his disqualification were a smaller number than those who voted for Moore? If it does, Moore is entitled to be declared duly elected; if it does not, then the election is void. It is, therefore, necessary to decide whether the mere knowledge of the fact that Blizard was the mayor and returning officer must be taken to involve knowledge of his being disqualified for election. Every elector in the borough must have known that Blizard was the mayor, and every elector who saw him presiding at the election must have known as a fact that he was the returning officer, and every elector who was a lawyer and had read the case of Reg. v. Owens, would know that he was disqualified. From the knowledge of the fact that Blizard was mayor and returning officer, was every elector bound to know, as matter of law, that he was disqualified? I agree that ignorance of the law does not excuse. But I think that in Martindale v. Falkner, Maule, J., correctly explains the rule of law. He says:—"There is no presumption in this country that every person knows the law; it would be contrary to common sense and reason if it were so." In Jones v. Randall, Dunning, arguendo, says:—"The laws of this country are clear, evident, and certain; all the judges know the laws, and, knowing them, administer justice with uprightness and integrity." But Lord Mansfield, in delivering the judgment of the court, says:—"As to the certainty of law mentioned by Mr. Dunning, it would be very hard upon the Profession if the law was so certain that everybody knew it; the misfortune is, that it is so uncertain that it costs much money to know what it is even in the last resort." It was a necessary ground of decision, in that case, that a party may be ignorant of the law. The rule is, that ignorance of the law shall not excuse a man, or relieve him from the consequence, or from liability upon a contract. There are many cases where the giving up a doubtful point of law has been held to be a good consideration for a promise to pay money. Numerous other instances might be cited to show that there may be such a thing as a doubtful point of law. If there were not, there would be no need of courts of appeal, the existence of which shows that judges may be ignorant of the law. That being so, it would be too much to hold that ordinary people are bound to know in what particular court such and such a practice does or does not prevail. I take this to be the rule of law applicable to this case. And, accordingly, it was in that case held that, although the electors had knowledge of the facts which created the disqualification, there was no inference of law that they knew that these facts amounted to a disqualification. I regret very much that in this case my opinion differs from that of the other members of the court, and it may be that I have come to a wrong conclusion; but, in my own mind, I am satisfied that, as a matter of fact, the respondent's majority did not know, at the time they were voting, that they were voting for a disqualified candidate. I am of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence that the notice was known to a majority of the electors who polled—for there is no mode of taking any distinction between the entire number and the number who voted for the respondent. The case, if it does anything, disqualifies every man who gave his vote, to the number of 2823. I cannot come to the conclusion that all these voters, many of whom—I do not know how many—did not speak English, and several of whom, I am satisfied—but there is no finding on the matter—were not at all in the town of Galway during the election proceedings, were aware of the legal disqualification of the candidate for whom the majority voted. And I may add that it is stated in the case that there were eight polling places; and the county is a very extensive one. It seems to me it would be going a long way in this case, the first of its kind, to make a precedent such as will be made by the present decision, upon the idea that the legal disqualification was generally known, without a finding and without any means of ascertaining to how many it was known. That conclusion strikes off the poll the 2823 who voted for the respondent. In the propriety of that conclusion I cannot concur, and neither, upon the facts stated, can I declare that the petitioner is entitled to be seated. I am decidedly of opinion that he is not. That the respondent was properly unseated, I entertain no doubt upon the facts reported; but my opinion is that the electors had not sufficient notice of his disqualification. The judgment of the court, however, will be that the electors who constituted the majority of the respondent were fixed with sufficient knowledge of the respondent's disqualification; and, there being no disqualification on his part, that the petitioner is entitled to be elected for the county.

KEOGH, J.—It now becomes my duty to express my opinion on this case—the first time I have done so since the questions involved came before me. I gave no opinion upon the matter in the court at Galway, though there the questions were most ably argued by counsel, and especially so, there as here, by the junior counsel for the respondent, Mr. Mac Dermot. I have not given any opinion upon the questions since, but I have heard and concur in the judgment delivered by my brother Lawson, and in a grave constitutional question, such as this undoubtedly is, involving the knowledge not only of the law, but of the history and constitution of England, unfettered by small legal technicalities, I with confidence rest my judgment on that which my brother Lawson has delivered, supported and sustained as it is by that of my brother Morris. I regret that there should be any division of opinion in the court, but I cannot discern this momentous case by the lights or authorities which my Lord Chief Justice has brought to bear upon it; and I rejoice that the conclusion at which the court has arrived is fortified by the authority of that great jurist and magistrate, Lord Denman, Chief Justice of England, who, when he believed that the liberties of his country were in danger, knew how to use words fit for the occasion and calculated to arrest the attention of the people of England. I stated, in the case submitted to this court, and for the purpose of the questions I reserved, that the electors of the county of Galway had been intimidated by threats and denunciations of temporal injury and of spiritual punishment. I stated that in the case which now rests before us. I now, sitting on this bench, which I am warned that I occupy at the will and in subordination to powers other than my Sovereign, here declare that I have been obliged to consider this case and to deliver this judgment, namely, that Capt. William Le Poer Trench is entitled to be declared the representative of the county of Galway,—under many terrible threats and denunciations, public and private.

Order accordingly, adjudging in the affirmative on the questions reserved, respectively.

Agent for the petitioner, J. B. Concannon.

WINCH v. CONSERVATORS OF THAMES.

Negligence—Towing path—Taking toll—Liability to repair.

The defendants were incorporated under private Acts of Parliament for the purpose of maintaining and protecting the navigation of the river Thames. They had power to acquire, for the public use, the towing paths along the river, and also to maintain and repair the same. In the exercise of their powers, they had provided a towing-path for the use of the public, they invited the public to use it, and took toll, as they were authorised to do by their Acts, for the use of it.

Held, that the defendants were bound to take reasonable care that the towing path was in a reasonably fit condition to be used as a towing path, and that an action lay against them for neglecting this duty, whereby the horses of the plaintiff, who was lawfully using the towing path with his horses, and had paid them toll in respect thereof, fell into the river and were drowned.

THIS was an action to recover damages in respect of three horses which slipped into the river Thames and were drowned while towing a barge up the river. It was contended by the plaintiff that the accident happened owing to the rotten state of the banks of the river at a part where the towing-path ran close to the water's edge.

The defendants were a corporation constituted by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 89 for the purpose of maintaining and protecting the navigation of the part of the river Thames where the accident happened. The plaintiff had paid the defendants toll for the use of the towing-path with his horses.

At the trial, before Cockburn, C.J., at the spring assizes at Kingston, it was urged by the defendants as a matter of law that they were not bound to repair and maintain the towing path, so as to be responsible to the plaintiff for a loss sustained by him through a default on their part to perform this duty.

The learned judge left the questions of fact to the jury, who found for the plaintiff, that the towing path and banks were not in a proper condition relatively to the purpose and proper use of them as a towing path; that this was the cause of the accident to the plaintiff's horses, and that there was no neglect in the navigation of the barge or in the management of the horses. They assessed the damages at 100*l.*, whereupon a verdict for the plaintiff for that amount was entered, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to have this verdict set aside, and a nonsuit or verdict for the defendants entered, if the court should be of opinion that the defendants were under no legal liability to repair and maintain the towing path. A rule having been obtained accordingly.

Denman, Q.C. and Macleod showed cause.

Hawkins, Q.C. and Joyce supported the rule.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment. They turned for the most part on the provisions of the Acts under which the defendants were incorporated.

Cur. adv vult.

July 5.—BOVILL, C. J., delivered the judgment of the court, (Bovill, C. J., Byles and Brett, JJ.)—The defendants in this action were charged with negligence in the management and control of a portion of the banks and towing paths of the river Thames, and in not keeping and maintaining them in a reasonably safe and proper condition for the purpose of towing barges, whereby certain horses of the plaintiff employed upon the towing path in towing a barge and for the use of which towing path toll had been paid to the defendants, fell into the river and were drowned. The principal question of law which arose at the trial and was reserved for the consideration of the court, was, whether, under the Acts of Parliament which regulate the upper navigation or by force of those Acts and the application of the common law, the defendants were under any legal liability with respect to the maintenance and repairs of the towing path on the river bank. The defendants are a corporation constituted for the purposes of the upper navigation of the Thames by the Thames Navigation Act 1866, having been originally incorporated for other purposes by the Thames Conservancy Act 1857. By the Act of 1866, sect. 26, the previous Acts relating to the upper navigation were to remain in force and to be construed as if the present body of conservators had been named therein instead of the former commissioners, and it therefore becomes necessary to examine the provisions and the language of the earlier statutes. The first statute which appointed Commissioners, the 24 Geo. 2, c. 8, in the preamble refers to abuses by the owners of the towing paths and other passages on the banks of the river. Sect. 2 gives powers to the commissioners to settle amongst other things the rates to be taken by the tenants or occupiers of the towing paths, locks, &c., and to regulate the towing paths, &c., for the benefit and safety of the navigation, making compensation to owners or occupiers of mills or lands, and they were also to give such reparation, satisfactions and damages to persons grieved as to them should seem meet, but with an express proviso by sect. 3 that they should not change the towing paths or landing places without consent of the land owners. The 4th section provided for the mode of proceeding by the commissioners in making orders. By sect. 8 power was given to the commissioners to view the towing paths, &c., to inquire into their state and condition and to make orders thereupon, giving notice to the persons concerned of their intended orders. Sect. 9 imposed a penalty on persons disobeying the orders of the commissioners, and by sec. 11 parties aggrieved by any such orders might within eight months appeal against them to the Judges of Assize or of Nisi Prius in Middlesex. The next Act was the 11 Geo. 3, c. 45, the title of which was for improving and completing the navigation, and it refers to the abuses and exactions of the owners of several towing paths and other passages on the banks of the river and of the locks, &c.; it also refers to an estimate which had been made of the expense of (inter alia) embanking divers parts of the river, and for purchasing land for the making of towing paths in order to complete the navigation; and by sect. 7 power is given to the commissioners to purchase and make towing paths, &c., for towing with horses or otherwise; to settle the rates to be taken for the use of the towing paths, &c., by the tenants or occupiers of the same, and they were to have regard (amongst other things) to the expense of repairing and supporting the towing paths, &c., and to make orders as to the towing paths, &c., making satisfaction to the owners of mills and lands, and giving reparation, satisfaction, and damages to parties aggrieved in the same terms as in the former Act. By sect. 19 they had power to view the towing paths, &c., and the state, condition, reparation, and circumstances thereof, and to make orders as in the previous statute, giving notice of their intention to do so to the persons concerned, and by sects. 28, 29, and 31, the commissioners acquired compulsory powers to purchase property necessary for the purposes of the Act, subject to certain consents in the cases specially mentioned in sects. 31 and 33, and such purchases by sect. 28 might be made in consideration of a sum in gross or of an annual rent to be secured as mentioned in the Act, and the contracts, conveyances and assurances were to be enrolled with the clerk of the peace. The commissioners had very large powers conferred upon them for regulating not only the navigation but also the tolls and lock dues as well as the rates for carriage of goods and hire of horses upon the river, and they were invested with authority to determine all complaints subject to appeal. It also appears from the 24th section, as well as from the 7th section, that in some places there were at that time no horse towing paths, and that the towing had there been done by men, but that the extension of the horse towing path was then contemplated. There are powers given to the commissioners to borrow money on the security of the tolls, and by sect. 55 there is a general power to appeal to the quarter sessions against any orders of the commissioners. The next Act which is material is the 28 Geo. 3 c. 51. The preamble refers to money having been raised and expended in making horse towing paths, &c., and by sect. 2 the tolls and moneys to be raised or paid under that Act or the former Acts and the property in the lands and works erected or purchased by the commissioners were vested in them, and they were empowered to sue and prosecute for injury to any of the towing paths, &c., by virtue of the Acts, purchased, rented, hired, or used for the benefit of the navigation. By sect. 5 they had further borrowing powers conferred upon them, and by sect. 6 it is enacted that for providing a fund for securing the money borrowed with interest and for repairing and maintaining the navigation the commissioners shall have full power to settle and direct the taking of such tolls and rates as they shall think necessary within certain limits for barges and also for horses used in towing for the use of (inter alia) the towing paths and ways then or to be thereafter made, purchased, or hired by the commissioners on the navigation. The commissioners by sect. 18 had power to make bye-laws as to the rates for towing, for the use of any towing paths and for carrying or repairing and regulating the navigation subject to the general power of appeal given by sect. 24. By the 35 Geo. 3. c. 106, s. 18, further powers were given to five of the committee to survey and view the river and to hear and examine evidence as to the state and condition of the navigation and the wants of repairs, amendments, alterations and improvements therein and to make reports to the general meetings of the commissioners of all alterations, improvements, repairs, and other works which they should think needful or proper to be done at any place or places for the benefit and improvement of the navigation, and to cause estimates to be made of the expense of doing such works; and when the commissioners ordered any works, the committee of five of them might take on themselves the management, direction, and execution of them, and give orders to the surveyors and others to proceed in the execution of such works, and the expenses after having been reported and allowed by a general meeting of the commissioners were to be paid out of the moneys raised under the Acts. By sect. 22 the commissioners were to make satisfaction to parties aggrieved, damaged, or injured by the works, and with a power of appeal as there provided. The 23rd section authorised the purchasing and making by the commissioners of a free continued uninterrupted and public horse towing path throughout the whole of the navigation without interruption or impediment; the commissioners making compensation for the lands taken, and for all losses and damages by reason of the taking of lands or grounds for making a towing path, way, or road for the use of the navigation. The next and last Act was that by which the powers, rights and duties of the commissioners were transferred to the present defendants, viz: The Thames Navigation Act, 1866. The title of that Act is for vesting in the Conservators of the river Thames the conservancy of the upper part of the river, and some of the objects for which the defendants were thereby incorporated as mentioned in the preamble were, "The preservation and improvement of the streams, bed and banks of the upper part of the Thames as a matter of great local and public importance." The Act recites that the locks and works under the previous control of the commissioners were in a very bad and dangerous condition, and that their income had long been insufficient to defray the necessary expenses of the repair and maintenance of the locks and works, and that considerable debts had been incurred by the former commissioners. By sections 25, 26 and 30 the powers, authorities, rights and interests, duties and obligations of the former commissioners were transferred to the defendants. As to certain locks, dams and weirs existing on the navigation before the passing of the Act of 1866, the owners of them were entitled to take toll and were bound to repair them, but by this Act the traffic was relieved from the tolls payable to these private owners, the property in these locks, dams and weirs was transferred to and vested in the defendants, and the obligation to maintain and repair them was by express words imposed upon the defendants. By sect. 55 the defendants were authorised to take tolls and charges for the navigation, and under sect. 70 to borrow money on the security of the tolls, and their funds were to be applied by the defendants under sect. 88 (1) inter alia in defraying the expenses of the repair and maintenance of the works vested in, or acquired, or constructed by them by or under that Act, and (6) in carrying into execution the purposes of that Act. There are no words directly imposing the obligation to repair the banks and towing paths upon the defendants, as is the case with respect to the locks, dams and weirs by the 43rd section, but then the towing paths and the right to take tolls for passing along them are not absolutely transferred to the defendants in the same manner as the locks, dams and weirs, so that there was no necessity for any such express enactment with respect to the towing paths, and the powers, rights, duties, obligation and liability of the defendants with respect to the towing paths and banks must be ascertained by reference to the provisions of the former Acts as well as to the general scope and language of this Act. It appears from the earlier Acts already mentioned that originally there were owners and by subsequent Acts tenants or occupiers of towing paths who took toll for horses passing along them, and that such persons were bound to keep the towing paths in repair, and by those statutes the commissioners had extensive powers of supervision and control over the towing paths, and power to make orders respecting them, and to regulate the toll to be taken by the persons entitled to take it. They subsequently acquired power to purchase and take lands compulsorily, and to execute works for the purposes of the navigation, and by the Act of the 28 Geo. 3, c. 51, sect. 6, were authorised themselves to take tolls for (amongst other things) the towing paths purchased or hired by them, and there are similar expressions in the next section as to towing paths purchased or hired by the commissioners. By the later Act of the 35 Geo. 3, c. 106, sects. 18 and 23, they obtained power to execute any works or repairs that they thought needful or proper, and to pay for them out of the rates and tolls, and also to make and establish a continued horse towing path throughout the navigation, and to purchase land for that pupose. And by the last Act of 1866 the present defendants are authorised to take the tolls, and by sect. 88 are bound to apply their funds, first, in defraying the expenses of the repair and maintenance of the works vested in, acquired, or constructed by them under that Act, and secondly, in carrying into execution the purposes of that Act which, as it incorporates, necessarily includes, the purposes of the former Acts. Those purposes, as stated in the preamble of the last Act, as well as in the former Acts, are the preservation, repair, maintenance and improvement of the navigation, and which would we think include the banks and towing paths. The defendants in pursuance of the powers vested in them, made arrangements in 1866 to secure the use of the towing path at the place in question for the purpose of the navigation, and it was agreed on the argument that the defendants under that arrangement now pay an annual rent per rod to the owner of the soil of the towing path and take an aggregate toll in one sum at Teddington Lock for the use of the entire navigation and towing paths, and it is to be taken as a fact that the defendants have under the provisions of the statute acquired and have the use of the whole of the towing paths along the river, and the right to take toll in respect of the use of them as well as for the use of the navigation generally. Somewhat similar Acts of Parliament were under consideration in the case of Badger v. The South Yorkshire and River Dunn Company (1 El. & El. 349), and the Navigation Company there, as in this case, appeared to have paid an annual sum to the owner of the towing path in order to secure the use of it for the public. It was considered by the Court of Exchequer that the company had thereby acquired the soil in the towing path, but this decision was afterwards reversed by the Exchequer Chamber, and that court decided that the company had acquired only an easement over the towing path such as was necessary for the purposes of the undertaking, and that the arrangement for the payment of an annual sum was a purchase within the meaning of the statutes. The Court of Exchequer Chamber also laid down that generally speaking in the absence of express words the courts were not inclined to infer that statutes of this kind gave more than such an use of the soil as was necessary for the purposes of the navigation, and a similar view was taken by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Stracey v. Nelson (12 M. & W.) with respect to commissioners of sewers. It is quite true that the arrangement in the present case between the commissioners and the owner of the towing path was by parol only, but the owner of the land letting the right to use the towing path and receiving a rent for it must be taken to know the powers of the conservators and to have assented that they might do that which was necessary to enable the public to have and enjoy the use of the towing paths, including the power to repair them, upon the same principle that when the use of a thing is granted everything is granted by which the grantee may have and enjoy such use (Pomfret v. Ricroft 1 Wms. Saund. 322), and with respect to a question which was raised as to what is to be deemed the towing path, it seems to us that it is impossible to confine it to the mere beaten track which is described to have been made principally by single horses towing down stream, for in towing up stream the horses cannot always be in a direct line, and there must be space for them as well as for the driver and for the proper use of the tow line, and we think the towing path must be taken to include so much of the bank as is necessary and proper for the purposes of towing barges, and is reasonably and properly used as such, and which in this case would include that part of the bank which gave way. The defendants having acquired the towing path in the manner before mentioned for the use of the public subject to the payment by the public of the toll to them, they invited the public to use the towing paths and to pay them the tolls. They have also employed their superintendent and their engineer from time to time to inspect and report on the banks and towing paths, and it was proved to be part of the duties of the engineer to see if the banks were being washed away. The plaintiff in this case was lawfully using the towing path with his horses in towing a barge for which the proper toll had been paid to the defendants and for the purpose of the navigation. It was alleged by the plaintiff that the towing path was in an unsafe and dangerous state and that in consequence his horses fell into the river and were drowned; whilst the defendants alleged that the bank was in a safe and proper condition and that the accident arose from the sole fault of the driver of the horses or of the man who had charge of the barge. No question was raised (indeed upon the evidence there was no ground for contending) that if the bank was in a dangerous state and it was the defendants' duty 'to maintain it, they had been guilty of negligence in that respect. The case having been left to the jury, they found that the towing path and banks were not in a proper condition relatively to the purpose and proper use of them as a towing path; that this was the cause of the accident to the plaintiff's horses; and that there was no neglect in the navigation of the barge or in the management of the horses. The verdict was thereupon entered for the plaintiff for 100*l*., the value of the horses, subject to the point, which was reserved, as to the liability of the defendants in point of law, and this question was to be raised without reference to the particular form of the pleadings. A rule was accordingly obtained by the defendants to enter the verdict in their favour, and upon the argument the plaintiff contended that the case fell within the principle which was established by the case of the Mersey Docks v. Gibbs (L. Rep. 1 Eng. & Ir. App. 93). In that case it was laid down that the general rule of construction of statutes like the present was that, in the absence of something to show a contrary intention, the Legislature intends that the body created by the statutes shall have the same duties, and that its funds shall be subject to the same liabilities, as the general law would impose upon a private person having and exercising the same rights, and that the trustees in that case were bound to take reasonable care that their works were in such a state that the public might use them without danger. In the case of Nicholl v. Allen (1 B. & S. 916 and in error 934) it was held that a person being authorised to make a bridge and to take toll upon it was liable to repair it, upon the principle that taking the benefit of the tolls he must bear the burthen of the repairs, and it was considered that the statutes in that case contemplated that both the tolls and the liability to repair should go together. This was also in accordance with the decision in the earlier case of The Mayor of Lyme Regis v. Henley in the House of Lords (reported in 1 Bing. N. C. 222 & 2 Cl. & Fin. 331), and was confirmed by the case of Parnaby v. The Lancaster Canal Company (11 Ad. & El. 230) and the decision of the House of Lords in the Mersey Dock case. Upon the true construction of the statutes in this case, construed according to the rule laid down in the cases cited, we are of opinion that the defendants had power to maintain and repair the towing paths; they had provided that towing path under the Acts of Parliament for the use of the public; they invited the public to use it; and they took a toll as they are authorised to do for the use of it, and it appears to us therefore that they were bound to take reasonable care that the towing path was in a reasonably fit condition to be used as a towing path, and that the present case does fall within the principle of the decision in The Mersey Docks v. Gibbs and the other cases to which we have referred, and must be governed by them. It is also to be observed that after having acquired the right to use the towing path from the owner of the soil, and having the power themselves to repair and maintain it, it would be very strange if they were at liberty to make orders upon the owners to do the repairs whilst they received the toll from the public. It was contended for the defendants that there was no public right of towing on the banks of the river, and the case of Bell v. Herbert (2 T. R. 253) was relied upon by the defendants in support of this view, but that case only decided that there was no such right merely at common law, and the decision in fact affirmed that there may be and in fact is, on most navigable rivers such a public right by custom, and that slight evidence of usage would generally be sufficient to support it on the ground of the public convenience. We see no objection to a dedication of a way to the public for such a limited purpose and in Rex v. The Severn and Wye Navigation (2 B. & A. 648) Holroyd and Bayley, JJ. both laid it down, and we think correctly, that a towing path may be a highway to be used only for the purpose of towing barges or vessels. It was further contended that if a public right of way existed for the purpose of towing, that the parish alone had the power, and were liable to the duty of repairing it, but we can find no sufficient grounds in fact or law under the circumstances of this case, and upon the proper construction of these statutes, for supporting that contention; nor is this case like some which were suggested, such as that of a road washed away by the sea, where no person or body may be liable to repair or restore it. The authorities to which we have already referred seem effectually to dispose of this point. It was further contended that if there was a public right of towing upon the river banks, and the defendants were bound to repair them, the only remedy for breach of that duty was by indictment, and that no action could be maintained by an individual; but if the duty of keeping the towing paths and banks in repair be imposed upon the defendants, and they have neglected that duty, we are at a loss to understand upon what principle it can be said that a person who has sustained a particular injury from such neglect, and which is not common to the public at large, is precluded from maintaining an action to recover damages for the injury which he has thus individually sustained. The cases before referred to are direct authorities in favour of the plaintiff upon this point also. It was further contended that the defendants did not collect the tolls for their own advantage, but merely as trustees for the benefit of the public; but in the Mersey Dock case that circumstance was held not to make any difference in principle with respect to the liability in such cases, and all the grounds upon which it was sought to distinguish the case from the previous cases have in our judgment entirely failed. Some questions were raised as to the sufficiency of the declaration, and which are material only for the purpose of the demurrers, but as the defendants denied their liability altogether under any form of declaration it was arranged that the plaintiff should be at liberty to make any such amendments as he might be advised consistently with the facts of the case and the finding of the jury, and which he is still at liberty to make if he thinks fit. Our decision upon the main point in the case is in favour of the plaintiff, and the rule obtained by the defendants to enter the verdict for them under the leave reserved at the trial will therefore be discharged, and judgment will be entered for the plaintiff on the demurrers, upon the present or the amended form of the declaration, at the option of the plaintiff. The remaining point argued before us was that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that there ought to be a new trial on that ground. Upon reading the notes of the evidence we have not been able to satisfy ourselves that the verdict is so clearly against the weight of evidence that it ought to be set aside, but at the same time the Lord Chief Justice before whom the case was tried has certified to us that he is dissatisfied with the verdict, and under any other circumstances than those which have occurred we should almost certainly have thought it right in deference to such an opinion, that the case should undergo further investigation before another jury. But it must be remembered that this was a second verdict obtained by the plaintiff, and after the first verdict in his favour had been set aside; the questions left to the jury were peculiarly matters within their province, the evidence upon them was contradictory, and two special juries having, after the summing up of the presiding judge, found their verdict upon all the points submitted to them in favor of the plaintiff, and as we see little or no probability that another jury would be likely to come to a different conclusion upon a third trial, we think we ought not to send the case down for trial again, and that the rule so far as it relates to a new trial should also be discharged.

Rule discharged.

POWER v. WIGMORE.

Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122)—Surveyor's fees—Inspecting arches or stone floors —Power for justice to state case,

The Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, s. 49) enacts there shall be paid to the district surveyors in respect of the several matters in the second schedule the fees therein specified, or such other fees as may from time to time be directed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, but one fee only shall be chargeable with respect to any such works done in, to, or upon any building as are included in one notice. The second schedule, as far as is material, is as follows: "Fees for additions or alterations. For inspecting the arches or stone floors over or under public ways, 10*s.*"

The 106*th section provides that for every case, except in reepect of fees of a district surveyor in which jurisdiction is hereinbefore given to a justice of the peace, if either party is dissatisfied with the determination of the justice so convicting, such party may appeal to any of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster.*

The appellant having received notice from the respondent of his intention to build fifty-two arches, inspected and measured them on several occasions. The arches were built on a vacant space of ground under what was and is a public highway, and were built on the four sides of a parallelogram.

The appellant claimed 26*l., being* 10*s. per arch, while the respondent refused to pay more than* 10*s. altogether.*

Upon appeal to the alderman, he was of opinion that 10*s. was all that the appellant was entitled to, but stated a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas.*

It was objected on the part of the respondent that the alderman had no power to state a case, which was taken away by the 106*th section of the Metropolitan Building Act:*

Held, that the appellant was entitled to a fee of 10*s. for every building; and that the alderman must say how many buildings there were:*

Held, also, that the power of the alderman to state a case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, was not taken away by the 106*th section of the Metropolitan Building Act.*

CASE stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

1. Upon hearing of a summons obtained by the appellant against the respondent under sects. 25, 31, 49, 51, and schedule 2 of the Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122), whereby the respondent was summoned for that on the 26th July 1870, certain arches under the public way, situate in Newgate Market and within the limits of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, and within the district of the southern division of the City of London, of which the appellant was district surveyor under the said Act, were completed, and that at the expiration of fourteen days after such completion on the 10th Aug. 1870, the appellant became entitled to receive from the respondent, as the builder employed in erecting such arches, the amount of fees due to him, specified in the second schedule of the Act, to wit, 25*l.* 10*s.*, and that on the 29th Aug. 1870, the appellants caused a proper bill specifying the amount of such fees to be sent to the respondent in a registered letter, but the respondent had, contrary to the form of the statute, refused to pay the same. The respondent was ordered to pay to the appellant the sum of 10*s.* and costs.

2. The following facts were proved and admitted by both parties.

3. (1.) The appellant was and still is the District Surveyor for the Southern Division of the city of London, and his district includes the old Newgate Market.

(2.) On 8th June 1870 he received a notice from the respondent that he intended to build fifty-two arches under a public highway in old Newgate Market.

(3) The appellant went to the place described on 12th June, and measured and surveyed the place where these arches were intended to be built.

(4) About ten or twelve days afterwards he found one or two of the arches completed.

(5) By 26th July fifty-one of the arches were completed, and in the time between 12th July and 26th July he was obliged to go, and went fifteen, or sixteen times to inspect them while they were in progress.

(6) In the discharge of his duties under the above mentioned statutes he was obliged to measure the said arches from time to time to see that the walls were of a proper thickness, and that the arches were of a proper width and span, and constructed in accordance with the statute.

(7) The arches varied in size, and he was therefore obliged to measure and examine every one of them separately.

(8) They were not arches attached to houses, but were built on a vacant piece of ground, under what was, and is a public highway. The arches were built on the four sides of a parallelogram.

(9) Each arch or vault was separated by a pier in brickwork and open in front, and there was no internal communication or mode of access whatever from one vault to another.

4. On the part of the appellant it was contended that each arch was a separate structure, and that he was entitled to a fee of 10*s.* for each, amounting in the whole to a sum of 25*l.* 10*s.*

5. On the part of the respondent it was contended that the words in the schedule "for inspecting the arches or stone floors over or under public ways, 10*s.*," meant that the appellant was only entitled to one sum of 10*s.* for inspecting any number of arches under or over any public way, and that no greater fee could be demanded. It was also contended on the part of respondent that under the 106th section of the Act the decision of the justices is final, and that no appeal can be made.

6. The magistrate being of opinion that the contention of the respondent was correct, and that the appellant was only entitled to a sum of 10*s.*, gave his determination against the larger claim of the appellant. The question of law upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court is, first, whether the justices have any power under the 106th section to state a case when the subject matter of dispute is in respect of district surveyor's fees; and secondly, whether, under the circumstances above stated, the appellant is entitled to any and what larger fee than the fee of 10*s.*

8. If the court should be of opinion that an appeal can be made, and that the appellant is only entitled to the fee of 10*s.*, then our determination is to stand.

9. If the court should be of opinion that the appellant is entitled to a larger sum, the case to be remitted to the justices with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court shall seem fit.

Geary, for the appellant.—The Metropolitan Building Act renders it compulsory on the district surveyor to inspect all buildings within his district, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the dimensions and requirements of the Act have been carried out. The 25th section enacts what are to be the span and thickness of the arches. He is entitled to a fee of 10*s.* for inspecting the arches or stone floors over or under any public way, but the Act says that one fee only shall be chargeable with respect to any such works done in, to, or upon any building, as are in pursuance of the provisions included in one notice. This clearly means that he is entitled to one fee of 10*s.* for inspecting each arch, or else in an extreme case the surveyor might be entitled to only one fee of 10*s.* for inspecting all the arches in London. The Act does not define the word building. Secondly, the magistrate is not prevented by the 106th section from stating a case for the opinion of the court. Under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, the 106th section only refers to the powers of appeal of the parties themselves.

Grove Chapman for the respondent.—The schedule clearly states the sum to be paid to the surveyor for inspecting the arches or stone floors over or under public ways in 10*s.* It is as easy to inspect several arches as one, and in the case of some hundreds of contiguous arches the costs would be very heavy if 10*s.* was to be paid for each arch. The decision of the alderman was conclusive in this case, and the case having been settled by him there is an end of it. The 106th section enacts that in every case, except in respect of fees of a district surveyor, in which jurisdiction is hereinbefore given to a justice of the peace, if either party to any such case is dissatisfied with the determination of the justice so convicting in respect of any point of law, or of the admission or rejection of any evidence, such party may, upon giving notice within seven days to the other party of his intention to appeal, appeal therefrom to any of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, subject to this restriction, that no such appeal shall be made by any district surveyor, except with the consent of the justice before whom the case is tried, and that no such appeal shall be made by any other party to the case except upon giving such undertaking as the justice thinks fit.

Geary in reply.

WILLES J.—This case was reserved for our opinion by the alderman under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. The appeal was by his leave under this section; for it is not the sort of appeal which the parties are allowed under the 106th section of the Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122). That section explicitly gives jurisdiction to the justices, and justices alone in respect of the fees payable to the district surveyor, where such jurisdiction has been given by a former section of the Act; but the fact is that the alderman has power to allow the parties to appeal, by his stating a case under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and the two are consistent, for the Metropolitan Building Act does not take away the power the alderman possesses under that Act. This appeal, therefore, as far as it relates to a point of law, comes before this court for our decision, and the point of law may be stated thus: whether, if a number of arches are made under a public highway, of some miles in length, or surrounding a square, whatever be the number of arches built, as long as the arches are in one continuous way, is the surveyor to be satisfied with 10*s.*? Under the second schedule to the Act, Part I., but one fee is given. It is obvious that the alderman has decided the point of law against the appellant, for he has adopted the rule in favour of the respondent, that the surveyor is entitled to 10*s.*, and that no greater fee can be demanded; the facts are not found specially, and as the case has been sent up in so bare a manner, this is all we have to decide, viz., whether under any state of circumstances, the surveyor is only entitled to one fee. The 49th section contains the whole thing; it says there shall be paid to the district surveyor, in respect of the several matters specified in the first part of the second schedule hereto, the fees therein specified, or other such fees not exceeding the amounts therein specified as may from time to time be directed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, but one fee only shall be chargeable with respect to any such works done in, to, or upon, any building as are in pursuance of the provisions hereinbefore contained, included in one notice. On construction of this section it would appear that 10*s.* is all that is to be paid for inspecting arches; but, on referring to sects. 24 and 25, each arch is referred to separately, and the section is seen to distinguish arches from works. If a builder constructed one arch under and one arch over the same highway, and the surveyor inspected the two, could it be said that entitled him only to 10s., or would not the more reasonable conclusion to draw be, that the schedule is dealing with a genus, and that the 10*s.* deals with each individual class? I think 10*s.* per arch would be the reasonable interpretation of such a case. The 49th section deals with the payment to be made in respect of one heavy building, but even then the surveyor may charge 10*s.* for arches under that building by virtue of that section. It is necessary to inquire whether these are arches belonging to one building or to several? If they are in a direct line joining one another, they may be one building, but if houses which stand upon them are in a square, then they would be several buildings. These illustrations show what we mean. It is for the alderman to determine how many buildings there ought to be. He has jurisdiction alone over the question of fact, and the case must be remitted to the alderman for him to say whether in his opinion there was one or several buildings. If there are several buildings, then the decision of the alderman was wrong.

KEATING, J., concurred.

Case to be remitted to the alderman to say how many buildings there were; if more than one, judgment for the appellant.

CORY v. THE CHURCHWARDENS OF GREENWICH.

Poor rate—Occupation—Rateability of moorings—Easement—Bed of river—Floating derrick.

The Conservators of the Thames, who are the owners of the soil and bed of the river, gave permission to one C. to lay down moorings in the river for the purpose of mooring a derrick coal hulk, it was expressly agreed between them that if at any time it should be found inexpedient to permit the moorings for the derrick to remain in that position assigned to it or in any other, that it should at once be removed.

The derrick was moored by two single fluke anchors, and two heavy stones, which were simply dropped into the bed of the river, and not fastened to the soil in any way.

Held, that the derrick was enjoying a mere easement in her occupation of the bed of the river.

Held also that there was no occupation of the soil, and that therefore the occupier was not rateable.

SPECIAL case stated for the opinion of the court.

The appellant was summoned before the Greenwich police magistrate for that he being possessed of property within the parish of Greenwich, in the county of Kent, rateable to the relief of the poor ain the said parish, and duly charged, rated, and aassessed in respect of the houses, buildings, land, tenements, or hereditaments, or other property, by law rateable to the relief of the poor, had neglected or refused to pay the same to the collector of the rates, notwithstanding that the same had been duly and respectively demanded. The appellant having duly appeared before a magistrate, contended that he was not possessed of property, and did not occupy or possess houses, lands, or tenements chargeable or rateable to the relief of the poor within the said parish, as alleged in the said summons, and the magistrate having duly considered the appellants' objection gave his decision against them, and in support of the said summons.

1. The following are the facts of the case, and the question for the opinion of the court is as to the rateability of the appellants to the poor rate for the parish of Greenwich.

2. In the rate made under the local Acts relating to Greenwich, viz., the 4 Geo. 4, c. lxx, and the 9 Geo. 4, c. xliii, the appellants are rated, and the following is a copy of the appellant's rating in the said rate-book, so far as is material:

Name of occupier.	Name of owner.	Description of property rated.	Name and extent of property.	Gross estimated rental.	Rateable value.	Poor rate at 2s 2d. in the pound.
Cory.	Cory.	Land and coal hulk thereon.	Derrick coal haulk.	£600.	£480.

3. The coal derrick mentioned in the list is similar to a very large coal barge, and is about 250ft. long and 90ft. wide. It is fitted up with the necessary machinery for the purpose of unloading coal from the colliers and reloading into vessels and barges brought alongside. No coals are deposited or stored in the derrick.

4. The derrick is the property of the appellant, and rides afloat on the River Thames within the boundary of the parish of Greenwich. It has been anchored at the same place for some years, but daily changes its position slightly with the ebb and flow of the tide.

5. The derrick is retained at the spot where she floats in the following way, i.e., by two single fluke anchors on the side nearest the shore, by two stones on the channel side and by two stream anchors, one at the head and the other at the stern; the anchors and stones were merely dropped into the river, no force being used for the purpose of fastening either anchors or stones. Before dropping the stones a small quantity of ballast was removed in the bed of the river, so that the stones might lie flat and securely. These stones served only the purpose of anchors, and are used in this as well as many other instances on the channel side only for the avoidance of accidents, there being danger of vessels when passing in mid channel at low water damaging themselves against anchors, if anchors were used.

6. These anchors and stones can be hauled on board by the machinery thereon, and the derrick moved to any other part of the river, and she was in fact formerly stationed at another part of the river, and was moved from thence to her present position, bringing with her her present anchor and stones which were dropped down as stated in the preceding paragraph.

7. The soil and bed of the river Thames are, by the Thames Conservancy Acts ,rested in the conservators of the river, and they have the management of the river.

8. The derrick is stationed at the place where she now rides under the following resolution passed by the conservators on the 6th Dec. 1861, "Resolved that permission be given to Messrs. Cory and Sons to lay down moorings (at which they may place the derrick hulk) immediately opposite the sluice next eastward of Angerstein's wharf, East Greenwich, and 510 feet from the river wall at the said sluice, the work to be done to the satisfaction of the Conservators of the river Thames, and under the inspection of the harbour-master, and to remain on the following conditions being agreed to and observed by Messrs. Cory, viz.: That the accommodation be assessed, and the rent paid thereon; that the hulk be not used for the purpose of storing coals; that it be for the general use of the coal trade, but the cargo to or from the hulk be in all cases towed by a steam tug to or from the Custom house, London; that all vessels leave the hulk immediately after being discharged; and that sailing colliers when discharged be towed away to such parts of the river as the harbour master may direct; and in all other respects to be worked to the satisfaction of the conservators, under the inspection of the harbour master, and with the full understanding on the part of Messrs. Cory that if at any time hereafter it shall be found by the conservators inexpedient to permit moorings for the derrick hulk to remain in that or any other part of the river, the conservators will, under the powers vested in them by the 9th section of the Thames Conservancy Act, cause the same to be removed.

9. The rent paid by the appellants to the said conservators under the document aforesaid has been assessed, and now stands at the sum of 600*l.* per annum.

10. Reference was made upon the hearing of the summons to the case of Watkins v. The Overseers of Milton-next-Gravesend (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 350), and the learned magistrate found as a fact that the appellants were occupiers of the soil in the bed of the river on which the moorings were placed, and therefore decided against the present appellants, and that they were liable to be rated.

11. The appellants have given due notice of appeal against this decision. It is agreed that neither party shall raise any technical difficulties or objections, and that the case shall be decided upon the merits, the court to be at liberty to draw any inferences of fact if it should think fit.

12. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the appellants are liable to be rated to the relief of the poor of the parish of Greenwich in respect of their occupation of moorings under the circumstances stated.

The following were the points relied on by the plaintiff appellant in the argument of the case:

That the rate-book does not show any property in respect of which the appellants are liable to be rated to the relief of the poor; that by the rate-book it appears that moorings are proposed to be rated, but moorings being merely appliances for staying a vessel stem and stern are not the subject of a rate; that by the case it appears that the appellants have no legal interest or exclusive right in the soil or bed of the river, but only a licence to use, which, like an easement, is not the subject of a rate.

The respondents contended that under the circumstances set forth in the case, the appellants were rateable in respect of the occupation by them of the soil of the River Thames within the parish of Greenwich.

Patchett for the appellant. — The derrick was capable at any time of moving from her moorings, and only remained in her position upon the sufferance of the Conservators of the Thames. The stones which held her were practically anchors; they only rested on the surface of the soil, and were used for the purpose of avoiding an accident which might have occurred if the fluke of her anchors had at low tide touched the bottom of any ship going up the channel of the river. When persons are rated it is for the occupation of the land, and the magistrate must find that there was an occupation by the appellant of the bed of the river before he is liable to be rated. The rule is that there must be a sufficient occupation for the party occupying to maintain trespass, which the appellant could not do, for the permission granted to him by the conservators was to lay down moorings, not to occupy the soil. Unless the casting of an anchor in the bed of the river is a sufficient occupation of the soil, the appellant cannot be rated:

Grant v. The Local Board for the District of Oxford, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 378; L. Rep. 4. Q. B. 9; Forrest v. Churchwardens of Greenwich, 8 El. & Bl. 890; 27 L. J. 96, M. C.

Barrow for the respondent.—The question is, whether the mooring is meant only for a temporary or for a fixed and permanent position for the derrick to occupy? If the latter, she is rateable. The agreement between the conservators and the appellant is more than a mere licence, it is a right to occupy the moorings exclusively, and there is such an occupation by the appellant as renders him liable to be rated. The stones were placed instead of anchors, but it is found by the case that the soil of the river bed was disturbed for the purpose of laying them down. Watkins v. The Overseers of Milton-next-Gravesend (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 350; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601) is in point. There it was decided that the conservators who had placed two large iron fan-shaped screws in the bed of the river were the occupiers, and would be rateable; the value of the occupation being measured by the amount paid to them for their licence to attach vessels and barges to the moorings, and in that case the appellant was held not liable to be rated as occupier, being a person having a mere licence to use the moorings which could be determined by the conservators at a brief notice, and did not prevent other parties making use of the same moorings if the conservators had thought fit to give permission.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate ought to be reversed. The magistrate found that the appellant was the occupier of the bed of the river, but it is not found in the case that the stones to which the derrick was attached were fixtures, nor were they secured as they were in Watkins v. Overseers of Milton-next-Gravesend (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 350; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601) where the screws were fixed in the soil with bricks and mortar. The magistrate has not found that the stones were fixtures, he has found them to be moorings. It is found by the case that the vessel was retained in her position by two single fluke anchors, and two single stone anchors; that the latter were not fastened to the soil in any way, but were dropped into the river without force, and were used for the purpose of anchors, because, at low water, the fluke anchors were likely to occasion damage to the bottom of any ship which might happen to come against it; the stones could be hauled on board if necessary, so that the derrick was anchored, not to an immovable, but to a movable thing, which was quite separate from the soil. Although the stones were not often moved from their resting place, and in consequence were silted over by the ebb and flow of the tide, they were still moveable, and one tide may wash away the soil which the former tide had covered them with. The derrick was therefore no more occupying the bed of the river than any vessel which casts anchor for a temporary purpose. It is only because she had remained there a long time that it is contended that she is rateable; but if such were the case, every vessel which loiters in the river might be rated. The derrick was enjoying a mere easement in her occupation of the bed of the river. On reviewing the other cases which show when a vessel is rateable for the occupation of the soil, I find that they are all distinguishable. This derrick is moveable, and assuming that Mr. Barrow is correct in his statement, there is reserved to the Conservators of the Thames a power to compel the derrick to change her position whenever they think proper, or when they think her position interferes with the navigation of the river. In one case cited by the learned counsel, the derrick floated with the rise and fall of the tide; there were blocks fixed in the ground for her to rest upon at low water, until she was floated off by the tide, and there was consequently an occupation of the ground at low water twice every day. That case is distinguishable from this. I have already observed that in Forest v. The Overseers of Greenwich (8 El. & Bl. 890), relied upon by the other side, that the moorings were secured in the soil with bricks and mortar, and the moorings were no part of the vessel; here they are part of the vessel, and can be put on board and carried away at a few minutes' notice. The judgment must therefore be for the appellant.

KEATING J.—I am of the same opinion; and for the reasons given by my brother Willes. This was a case practically of nothing more than a floating barge; and I think we should be interfering with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Grant v. The Local Board of Oxford (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 378) if we were to decide otherwise.

Judgment for the appellant.

JOHNSON v. BARNES.

Trespass to land—Rights of common—Grant by a corporate body—Common appurtenant and common in gross.

To an action of trespass to land, the defendant justified as grantee under a conveyance from the corporation of Colchester, and also as a burgess of the borough of Colchester, and claimed right of common in the lands.

The corporation has from time immemorial exercised an exclusive right of pasturage upon certain lands round the walls of the town, for cattle levant and couchant within the borough, from Lammas to Candlemas; and they have conveyed the common rights to persons at various times, who have subsequently exercised commonable rights over the lands. The plaintiff's land was conveyed to him "subject to any rights or privileges which the corporation or any person claiming under them might possess over the same."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that the right of common was appurtenant, and therefore inalienable, and that a release of part was a release of the whole commonable lands.

Held, that, admitting the plaintiff's contention to be correct, yet that the conclusions to be drawn from the repeated grants by the corporation, were that they were made in pursuance of a legal right, which, in the absence of proof that it was modern, must be deemed to have originated before the time of legal memory; and that the court would assume therefore, that the common was originally granted in gross, with power to release any portions without releasing any other part of the commonable lands.

THIS was an action brought to try the existence of an exclusive or other right of common claimed by the defendant over part of certain land, called Drury Farm, within the borough of Colchester, in the county of Essex, and by consent of the parties, and by the order of Byles, J. dated the 3rd Nov. 1871, according to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, the following case has been stated for the opinion of the court, without any pleadings.

1. The plaintiff is the tenant in possession of Drury Farm, consisting of 115a. 1r. 31p., or thereabouts, in the parish of St. Mary at the Walls, in the borough of Colchester aforesaid, and 11a. 3r. 24p., or thereabouts, in the adjoining parish of Lexden, in the said borough. The plaintiff is the lessee of the Drury Farm from Adam Rivers Steele, and others, who claim title to the said farm under a deed of conveyance, dated the 29th Nov. 1838, from the trustees under the will of Richard Bradstreet, Esq., and which farm was by that deed conveyed subject to any right or privileges which the mayor and burgesses of Colchester, or any person claiming under them, might possess over the same. The title deeds of the said farm go back so far as the year 1583, and in none of them other than in the said conveyance is there any reservation of any rights or privilege which the mayor and burgesses of Colchester, or any person claiming under them, might possess over the said farm, or any mention of any rights of common as existing upon the same.

2. The defendant is a free burgess of the borough of Colchester, and he is and for many years has been resident within that borough.

3. The borough of Colchester is an ancient borough, whereof the free burgesses are and have been from time immemorial a body politic and corporate by divers different names.

4. The said body politic and corporate for themselves and the resident free burgesses claimed from time immemorial to have exercised and to be entitled to exercise an exclusive right of commoning in certain lands round the walls of the town, including 110a. 2r. 35p. of that portion of Drury Farm which is situated within the parish of St. Mary at the walls aforesaid.

5. The right as claimed is for common of pasture for all cattle, sheep, and other commonable animals levant and couchant within the borough from Lammas-day, the 1st August in every year, till the Feast of the Purification of the Virgin, being the 2nd February in the succeeding year, on the said lands, save as to any part thereof sown at or before the commencement of such period with corn or other grain, and in that case only after such crops should be harvested, or otherwise removed in a due course of husbandry; but the plaintiff does not admit that the right as claimed ever existed.

A book entitled Morant's History may be considered on the argument of this case to set forth such portions of documents correctly, and also to state accurately the fact as to the exercise of such alleged right by the corporation, and the free burgesses up to the time of such publication, but this admission is not to extend to any deductions or inferences of law or fact drawn or expressed by the author of the work, or to contradict or qualify any statement of fact in this case.

6. In the year 1807 a survey and plans were made by the corporation of the contents and extent of the common lands, which were thereby stated to be 1023a. 3r. 38p., including the 110a. 2r. 35p., part of Drury Farm.

7. It is admitted for the purpose of this case that the common rights of the corporation of Colchester over the said lands commenced, and were continuously exercised from time immemorial down to and inclusive of the year 1807, and that from the year 1807 down to the year 1830 the account books of the conservators of the said half years' lands appointed by the corporation as hereinafter appearing, show that an annual sum had been paid to them by the occupiers of the said Drury Farm, in lieu of the exercise of the right of common until the sale of such right hereinafter mentioned, to Robert Skitter, who was then the occupier of such lands, and from the time of the conveyance hereinafter mentioned to George Henry Errington, Elizabeth Skitter, the wife of the said Robert Skitter, Robert Maitland Savill, and William Gooday, the respective occupier next before the plaintiff of the said Drury Farm, paid an annual sum for such right of common to the said George Henry Errington.

8. These Lammas lands do not lie together.

9. From the fourteenth year of the reign of Henry II. down to the reign of Queen Elizabeth there are no extant orders or regulations by the corporation concerning the said Lammas lands. A constitution or bye-law was made by the corporation on 2nd Aug. 1573, that the number of cattle which each burgess was to put on should be three head of great cattle, or in lieu of the said three head ten sheep.

10. The constitutions or bye-laws made by the corporation for regulating the enjoyment of the rights of common as between the free burgesses as to the said Lammas lands down to the year 1768 are set out in Morant's book at page 92 to 94 inclusive, and page 4 of appendix thereto, and are to form part of this case.

11. Prior to the publication in 1768 of Morant's history, parcels of the Lammas land had by the corporation, and by way of release to the owners of such lands, been at divers times made several or whole year lands, and at page 29 of Morant there is set out an entry on the court rolls of the corporation in the time of Henry VIII. upon the occassion of certain of the said Lammas lands as so being made several or whole year lands.

12. Prior to the same year 1768 certain others of the said lands had been also exonerated by the corporation from their right of common of pasture in consideration of small quit rents paid to the towns.

13. In or prior to the year 1549 certain commissioners are directed by the King's writ to hear, examine, and determine certain matters of controversy then depending in Parliament amongst the bailiffs, aldermen, common council, and commonalty of the corporation of the Borough of Colchester, and by certain original articles settled by the said commissioners in the said last-mentioned year, it was ordered that the bailiffs, aldermen, and common council, being the name of the incorporation of the free burgesses, should not at any time thereafter alienate or sell any lands, tenements, or hereditaments appertaining to the said borough or corporation, or make several, or sell any common or commons, &c., without the whole assent, consent, and agreement of the bailiffs, aldermen, and common council of the said town or borough, or the most part of them.

14. On the 10th Aug. 1807, at an assembly of the mayor and free burgesses of the borough of Colchester (being a legal assembly of the governing body thereof), a constitution relating to the common lands belonging to the said borough was made and ordered to be acted on immediately, by which constitution certain officers, called conservators, were chosen out of the free burgesses of the borough for the purpose of surveying and managing the common land and selling and releasing the rights of common over them, and doing other things in relation thereto, as specified in the said constitution.

15. After this constitution was passed, the alleged right of common over these lands for the season was sold by auction by the corporation annually both to persons who were, and to persons who were not owners of the commonable lands and not free burgesses, and such right was exercised accordingly by the said purchasers.

16. From time to time the common rights of the burgesses over divers of the land included in the said 1023a. 3r. 38p. have been by the corporation conveyed and released. The following are instances of such conveyance and release:—In the year 1816 the corporation released the right of common over certain of the said lands to John Killingworth Bowland, who was the owner of the said lands. In the year 1819, the corporation conveyed the right of common over other of the said lands, to Samuel Phillips, who was not the owner of the same lands, or a free burgess. On 26th July 1834, other rights of common over certain of the said lands were conveyed by the corporation to Charles Gray Round, who was not the owner of the lands; and in the year 1855, the corporation in like manner conveyed their right of common over other parts of the said commonable lands, to Samuel Puplett Carr, who was not the owner of the same, or a free burgess. Subsequently to the said respective sales to the said John Killingworth Bowland, Samuel Phillips, Charles Gray Round, and Samuel Puplett Carr, the said rights of common were never exercised by the corporation, or the free burgesses, or any of them, over the lands, or any of the lands, the rights of common over which had been so conveyed, and the respective grantees thereof enjoyed the full benefit of such, several grants by themselves, or their respective licencees.

17. In the year 1834 the position of the said lands was as follows, that is to say, the right of common over 831a. 0r. 33p. of the said lands, including the aforesaid 110a. 2r. 35p., part of Drury Farm, had been sold or released, and the produce thereof, so far as the same land had been received, had been invested in the purchase of 10,479*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* in the Three per Cent. Consols, the dividends whereof have been hitherto divided annually amongst the resident free burgesses. 151a. 1r. 2p. were said to remain subject to the rights of common, and produced from payments made by the owners or occupiers, to prevent such right of feeding being exercised annually, about 52*l.*, which has been divided in the same way, and 44a. 2r. 3p. were disputed, and said not to be subject to common, making a total of 1026a. 3r. 38p.

18. Copies of the assembly books of the Corporation of Colchester, the plans, account books, conveyance, and other documents relating to the said lammas lands were set forth in the appendix, and formed part of this case.

19. In Sept. 1830, in pursuance of a resolution of the mayor and free burgesses of Colchester, at an assembly held on the 7th July 1830, the then conservators, one of whom was the defendant, contracted with the said Robert Skitter, who was then lessee of Drury Farm, for a term of years expiring on the 29th Sept. 1854, and who was not a free burgess, for the sale by the corporation to him of their alleged right of common over that farm for 700*l.*, of which sum 100*l.* only was then paid by the said Robert Skitter.

20. The said Robert Skitter died in 1837, leaving a will, by which his widow, Elizabeth Skitter, was constituted sole devisee in fee of his real estate.

21. On the 27th July 1840, by a deed of that date, the corporation, at the request of the said Elizabeth Skitter, and in consideration of 600*l.* paid by her, being the residue of the above-mentioned sum of 700*l.*, conveyed, or purported to convey, to Henry Wittey, his heirs, and assigns, the same right of common, in trust for the said Elizabeth Skitter, her heirs, and assigns.

22. On the 30th Dec. 1841, by a deed of even date, the same Henry Wittey, by directions of the said Elizabeth Skitter, conveyed, or purported to convey, the said right of common lastly hereinbefore mentioned to George Henry Errington, his heirs, and assigns. After this conveyance, Mr. Errington, by indenture dated 31st Dec. 1841, demised, or purported to demise, such right to the said Henry Wittey, in trust for the said Elizabeth Skitter and her assigns, for the term of fifty years, if the said Elizabeth Skitter should so long live, at the rent of 1*d.* only, and the said George Henry Errington covenanted with the said Elizabeth Skitter that in case she died before 29th Sept. 1854, when the lease under which she then held the farm called the Drury Farm would expire, then he, the said George Henry Errington, would, at the request of the executors, administrators, or assigns of the said Elizabeth Skitter, or of the person or persons for the time being entitled to the remainder of the term then expired in the farm then called Drury Farm, grant unto him, her, or them a further lease of the said right of common from the day of decease of the said Elizabeth Skitter for all the then residue of the existing term in the lease of the said farm at the rent of 40*l.* for the same right of common payable half yearly. On the 19th Nov. 1844 Mrs. Skitter and her trustee, Mr. Wittey, by indenture then dated, assigned, or purported to assign unto Robert Maitland Saville, all her estate and interest in the said right of common, in the event of her departing this life on or before 29th Sept. 1854, subject to the yearly rent of 40*l.* during the said term. Mrs. Skitter died about the year 1848, and from her death the said Robert Maitland Saville and Mr. William Goodday, the subsequent tenants and assignees of the said lease of the Drury Farm, paid, until the 29th Sept. 1854, the annual sum of 40*l.* per annum to the said George Henry Errington, and since that period, until the occupation of the said farm by the plaintiff, an annual sum was paid by the said Mr. William Godday to the said George Henry Errington for the said alleged right of common.

23. The said George Henry Errington, who was not a free burgess of the borough of Colchester on the 1st. Jan. 1870, by a deed of that date conveyed or purported to convey the right of common to the defendant, his heirs, and assigns.

24. Copies of the contract and deeds in this case mentioned accompanied and formed part of this case.

25. On the 10th Jan. 1870, the defendant, for the purpose of asserting the right of common which he claimed to exercise either under the said conveyance to him from Mr. Errington, or as a burgess, entered with a horse and one sheep being levant and couchant within the borough, and the sole property of the said defendant upon one of the fields comprised in Drury Farm aforesaid, such fields not being sown with corn or grain, and depastured the said field.

26. The court is requested to draw inferences of fact. The questions for the opinion of the court are firstly whether at the time of his said entry the defendant was entitled under the deed of 1st Jan. 1870, to the right of common purporting to have been conveyed to him by that deed over such parts of the said 110a. 2r. 35p., part of Drury Farm as had not been sown with corn or grain at or before the 1st Aug. preceding the said entry, and, if so, for what period and to what extent? secondly, whether, if not entitled under that deed to the said right of common, he was entitled to such right of common as a free burgess, and as against the tenant and owner of the land? If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative on either of the above questions, judgment is to be entered for the defendant, with costs of defence. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative on both the above questions, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff, with costs of suit.

The following were the plaintiff's points of argument:—First, that the right of common as claimed by the defendant never existed over the plaintiff's land; secondly, that the facts set out in the case show no justification for the defendant's trespass upon the plaintiff's land; thirdly, that the defendant is not entitled to the right of common claimed by him, either as a free burgess of the borough of Colchester or as the grantee of G. H. Errington; fourthly, that the said right as claimed, being identical with the entire right exercised over all the Lammas land, became extinguished by the release of the right over part of such lands; fifthly, that the facts set out in the case show an extinguishment of the right of common over the plaintiff's land; sixthly, that the said right is not and never was exercisable by any other than a free burgess of the said borough.

The defendant's points were, first, that the case shows that an exclusive right of pasturage over Drury Farm existed in the corporation from time immemorial; secondly, that this right was assigned by the corporation to Wittey, and is now vested in the defendant; thirdly, that if such right was not assigned to Wittey, and is not vested in the defendant, then, that the defendant, as a burgess, is entitled to common over Drury Farm.

Joshua Williams, Q.C., Prentice, Q.C., and the Hon. Alfred Thesiger for the plaintiff.—I contend this is common appurtenant, and that when there is a release of part, there is necessarily a release of the whole. The burgesses of Colchester were entitled to the right of commoning their cattle on these lands, but they ought not to have released any part of them if they desired to retain their commonable rights over the remainder. The question here is whether the defendant is entitled to a right of common over such parts of Drury Farm as have not been sown with corn, but a release of part of the lands is a release of the whole. Neither common appendant nor common appurtenant can be aliened as to be converted into common in gross. In Tyrringham's case (4 Rep. Fol. 36b), T. S. was seised of a house, meadow, and pasture, to which he and those whose estate he had agreed to have common of pasture for oxen, cows, and heifers, levant and couchant upon the house, meadow, and pasture, as well in thirty acres in the same town of which one A. was seised in fee, as in forty acres of land whereof B. was seised in fee to the house, meadow, and land appertaining. Afterwards B. purchased the house, meadow and pasture, and demised the same to the plaintiff, who put his cattle into the thirty acres to common, and they were driven out by defendant, farmer to A., with his dog. It was held that prescription does not make a thing appendant to another, unless it agree in nature and quality with it. Secondly, common appendant, being of common right, is apportionable by the commoners purchasing part of the land to which the common is appendant and cannot be extinguished by the acts of the parties; but common appurtenant, being against common right, by the said purchase all the common was extinguished. So in Rotherham v. Green (Croke Eliz. 592), where the defendant's father released part of his right to the plaintiff's ancestors, in an action of trespass for commoning the land by the defendant, judgment was given for the plaintiff, for it was said, by release of the common in part of the land the whole common is gone and extinct; for otherwise the tenant of the residue of the land should be charged with all the common, which is not reasonable, and thereupon it is that if a lord releaseth his signiory in one acre all is gone. [WILLES, J.—That is the real reason; it burthens the rest of the land.] Also in Miles v. Etheridge (1 Shaw 326) it is clearly settled. There the whole case is contained in those words. A release of common in one acre is an extinguishment of the common. He referred to Co. Lit. 122a, to powers of alienation, and to Co. Lit. 476b. If a man have common appurtenant to a messuage and land for a certain number of beasts, he may alien the same; aliter, if it be common for all his beasts, levant and couchant upon the land, he cannot by his alienation sever that from the land. He referred also to Dennett v. Pass, 1 Bing. N. C. 388.

Hon. G. Denman, Q. C. (with whom was Turner), for the defendant.—The right of common set up has been exercised for a very long period, and has been constantly dealt with by the Corporation of Colchester. It is a peculiar right which might be the subject of a grant, the owners of the lands having formerly granted the common rights to the free burgesses on certain conditions, to be exercised by them, and their cattle levant and couchant within the borough. [WILLES, J.—Is the borough within any manor?] It is a manor of itself, and these lands are within the precincts of the borough, and this is a common of which the Corporation were the lords of the manor. We must not look at the statement of the rights of common alone, but together with the manner in which the rights have been exercised, and dealt with by the Corporation; and we shall then see that it is a right which is capable of being granted. [KEATING, J.—In fact that the land having been severed, we are to attribute some legal origin enabling the corporation to release the lands.] There might have been a grant to enable such to have been done, and such grant would immediately account for all dealings with the lands which are stated to have occurred. In Co. Lit. 122a. it is stated that if a man purchase part of the land, wherein common appendant is to be had, the common shall be apportioned, because it is of common right, but not so of common appurtenant, or of any other common of what nature soever. Common in gross appertaineth to no land, and must be by prescription or by writing. This may be common in gross for cattle levant and couchant in certain places; and my contention is that the original grantor gave the right of common to the Corporation of Colchester with a right to alien portions of their commonable lands, and still so as not to destroy their right to the remainder of the land. The continuous practice of the corporation to exercise these rights of alienation from the earliest times show this right of existence. [WILLES, J.—The question then would be whether a common in gross with such a limitation could be the subject of a valid grant.] The lands are so separated that it would seem as if the original grant to the corporation had been made by several owners.

Joshua Williams, Q.C. in reply.—This is not a common in gross; the same reason that applies to a common appurtenant applies to a common in gross: (Attorney-General v. Matthews, 4 K. & J.)

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5.—The judgment of the court was delivered by WILLES, J.—This was an action for putting horses and sheep upon a field of the plaintiff. The defendant justifies under a right of common; and the question is whether such a right of common exists. The defendant claimed either as a burgess of the borough of Colchester or as grantee under a conveyance of the 10th June 1870 from a person claiming under a grant from the corporation of Colchester of the 29th Sept. 1830, by which the common, once the farm in question, was sold for 700*l*. The corporation claims, and has from time immemorial exercised, either by actual enjoyment or by receipt of rent or acknowledgment, an exclusive right of common of pasture in certain lands round the walls of the town, including the place in question, and containing in all 1023a. 3r. 38p., for all cattle, sheep, or other commonable animals, levant and couchant, within the borough, from Lammas to Candlemas, on the said lands, save as to any part thereof sown at or before the commencement of such period with corn or other grain, and in that case only after such crop should be harvested or otherwise removed in a due course of husbandry. The "Lammas lands," as they are called, do not lie together; the corporation from time to time commencing, as far as we are informed, in the reign of Henry VIII., exercised the right of releasing for valuable consideration their rights of common over certain of the lands subject thereto, still continuing to exercise their rights over the rest as before, without any resistance thereto upon the ground that the release of part of the land extinguished the whole. The first instance of this is to be found in Morant's History of Colchester, p. 94. A variety of other instances in which this was done appear in the special case. Parcels of the land had been at divers times so exonerated before 1768, and many such in respect of small quit rents paid to the town. In many instances, also, the common rights of the corporation had been conveyed to various persons, and those persons, and not the corporation, had thereupon exercised the rights of common. Between 1807 and 1820 releases were made to more than thirty persons for sums amounting to more than 4000*l*. In 1834 the common over 831a. 0r. 33p. had been sold or re-leased, producing the sum of 10,470*l*. 4*s*. 4*d*. in the Three per Cent. Consols; 151 acres remained subject to the rights of common, and 50*l*. a year in all was paid in lieu of the right of feeding there, and as to 44a. 2r. 3p. (not including the place in question) the right was disputed. The plaintiff is the lessee of the place in question under Mr. Steele, who purchased the property in 1838. In the previous title deeds, which go back to 1583, there is no mention of the right of common, therefore it is admitted to have been exercised. The conveyance of 1838 was made "subject to any rights or privileges which the corporation or any person claiming under them might possess over the same." Upon the argument for the plaintiff it was insisted that the right of common was appurtenant, and not alienable, and that it had been lost by the first release of part of the land; and the subsequent enjoyment was said to be immaterial as being bad under a mistake of law; and Mr. Denman, in his forcible argument for the defendant, did not dispute these propositions as applicable to an ordinary common appurtenant, but he insisted that the proved exercise of the right was reconcilable with, and only to be legally accounted for, by concluding that the common was originally granted in gross out of the land, and each atom thereof, with power to grant or release any part, as in the case of a several pasture. To this it was replied that no such conclusion ought to be drawn from the facts. We are therefore to pronounce upon the mixed question of law and fact, whether the evidence establishes the grant of a common in gross with power of severance, or only a common appurtenant, inseparable from the land, and destroyed by the first release. In dealing with this question we must bear in mind the cardinal rules of prescription; first, that no length of enjoyment can establish a title which could have no legal origin, as, for instance, of an estate or interest which the law does not recognise: (Bailey v. Stephens 12 C. B., N. S., 91; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 356; Attorney-General v. Matthews, 4 K. & J.). And next that the "antiquity of time justifies all titles, and supposeth the best beginning the law can give them." So that, if evidence be given after long enjoyment of a property to the exclusion of others, of such a character as to establish that it was dealt with as of right as a distinct and separate property in a manner referable to a possible legal origin, it is presumed that the enjoyment in the manner long used was in pursuance of such an origin which, in the absence of proof that it was modern, is deemed to have taken place beyond legal memory. In the present case there is nothing improbable in the grant having been in gross. There are instances in the books in which such presumptions as to corporations appear, of which Mellor v. Spateman furnished one. The fact that the common is claimed for cattle levant and couchant, may be thought to indicate appurtenancy; but it is far from conclusive. Levant and couchant, as pointed out in many cases (see Carr v. Lambert, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255; 35 L. J. 121, Ex.) is an expression commonly used, and understood to express a measure of the number of cattle that may be put in, and it does not necessarily refer to cattle actually fed upon the particular land. There could be no objection to a grant in gross of common for so many cattle as a certain known farm, not in the possession of the grantee, could sustain by its natural and artificial products, with the assistance of the common, which is the description of the number of cattle, levant and couchant, upon a given place, and is considered certain enough to be granted. The right of common being "exclusive" tends to show that it was common in gross. All the other evidence in the case goes to show that the right was in gross, and not defeated by a grant or release of part. The recognition and repetition of such releases from the early part of the sixteenth century downwards, without any questioning of the right of common, is strong evidence that the right admitted of such severance as in law the original grant might well have expressly allowed, supposing such an express allowance to be needful in the case of an exclusive right of common in gross. We took time to consider the evidence in this case, which we have carefully examined without finding a single circumstance to interfere with the conclusion, that a right so long exercised did originate in the legal origin suggested, and that it ought to be sustained. Nor can the plaintiff justly complain, because the person under whom he claims had ample notice of the right at the time of his purchase. We answer the first question in the affirmative, and give judgment for the defendant.

SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT.

THE SHEFFIELD WATERWORKS COMPANY v. BENNETT.

Water company—Power to charge water-rates according to the amount of rent—Water rates, poor rates, and district rates paid by owner—Tenements under 10*l. a year—Rent or annual value—What deduction to be allowed from rent—Meaning of word "rent" in Sheffield Waterworks Act* 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. xciii.), sect. 79—The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), sects. 68-72.

By sect. 79 of the Sheffield Waterworks Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. xciii., local and personal), the company are empowered to charge for the supply of water to the inhabitants at a rate per annum, according to the rent of the dwelling house supplied, as follows, viz.:—"Where the rent shall not amount to 7*l. per annum, at a rate not exceeding* 6*l. per cent. per annum on such rent; where such rent shall amount to* 7*l., but not to* 8*l. per annum, at a rate not exceeding* 8*s. per annum; where such rent shall amount to* 8*l. but not to* 10*l. per annum, at a rate not exceeding* 10*s. per annum; where such rent shall amount to* 10*l. but not to* 12*l. per annum, at a rate not exceeding* 12*s. per annum;" and so on in a graduated ascending scale up to a rent of* 100*l. and upwards per annum.*

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), which is incorporated with the above-mentioned special Act, enacts by sect. 72 that the owners of all dwelling houses, or parts of dwelling houses, occupied as separate tenements, the annual value of which houses shall not exceed the sum of 10*l., shall be liable to the payment of the rates instead of the* occupiers.

The defendant being the owner of several dwelling houses in Sheffield let to tenants at weekly or monthly rents, the yearly aggregate amount of such rents respectively not exceeding the sum of 10*l. by the year, the tenants of which dwelling houses were supplied by the company with water at the defendant's request, the company claimed to charge the water rates, in respect of the houses so supplied, upon the rents or sums at which the same respectively were let, without making any deduction therefrom; the defendant, on the other hand, contending that the charge should be upon the annual value of the dwelling houses free of all tenants' rates and taxes, and that in ascertaining such value a deduction should be made from the rents or sums at which the same houses were respectively let, in respect of the amounts allowed or paid by him for poor's rates, district rates, and water rates, in respect of the said dwelling houses respectively.*

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.), upon a special case stated for the opinion of the court, that the word "rent" in sect. 79 of the Company's Act of 1853 meant the proper rent to a tenant paying the rates and charges regularly paid by the tenant, of which the actual rent, when the tenant does pay those rates and charges is in general the proper criterion; and that, therefore, the contention of the defendant was right, and he was entitled, before charging the water rates on the rent, to deduct, from the actual amount of rent paid to him, the sums allowed or paid by him for poor's rates, district rates, and water rates.

Rook v. The Mayor, &c., of Liverpool, 7 C. B., N. S., 240, discussed and distinguished.

THIS is an action brought to recover the sum of 31*l.* for water rates claimed to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs, for water supplied by the plaintiffs to the occupiers of ninety-two dwelling houses or tenements, situate in the townships of Sheffield and Brightside Bierlow, in the parish of Sheffield, in the County of York.

The defendant pleaded to the declaration in the action; first, except as to 24*l.* 10*s.*, parcel of the plaintiffs claim, never indebted; secondly, except as to the said excepted parcel, payment before action; and, thirdly, as to the said excepted parcel, payment into court of 24*l.* 10*s.*

The plaintiffs joined issue upon the first and second pleas; and as to the third plea, accepted the sum paid into court in satisfaction and discharge of the cause of action, in respect of which it was paid in. The cause came on to be tried at York, at the Spring Assizes 1872, before Quain, J., when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, for the amount claimed in the declaration, subject to the following.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiffs (hereinafter called the company) were incorporated by an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1830, intituled "An Act for better supplying with Water the Town and Parish of Sheffield." And thereby powers were given to the company for supplying the town and parish of Sheffield with water.

2. In the year 1845, another Act was passed, intituled, "An Act for better supplying with water the Town and Parish of Sheffield in the County of York, and for amending the Act relating thereto," and thereby powers were given to the company to raise further capital, and construct additional works.

3. In 1853, The Sheffield Waterworks Act 1853, was passed, whereby, after reciting the said Acts of 1830 and 1845, such last mentioned Acts were repealed, subject to the provisions contained in the said Act of 1853.

4. By the 6th section of the said Act of 1853, the company was reincorporated as from the passing of the said Act of 1830, and the said Act of 1853 contained the following provisions.

Sect. 3.—That The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and The Water Works Clauses Act 1847, except sect. 54 of the said last-mentioned Act, and save so far as any of the clauses in any of the said Acts may be expressly varied or excepted by this Act, shall be and the same are hereby incorporated with this Act.

Sect. 9.—That notwithstanding the repeal of the respective recited Acts, the several clauses and provisions whatsoever in favour of the company respectively contained in any Act or Acts (other than the said recited Acts respectively), and which immediately before the passing of this Act are in force, shall continue and be in full force accordingly; and the company and their directors, officers, and servants may and shall accordingly, and for the purposes of this Act, be entitled to, and have, exercise, and enjoy, under or by virtue of those claims and provisions respectively, all such rights, interests, powers, authorities, and privileges whatsoever, as if this Act had not passed.

Sect. 79.—That the company shall, and they are hereby required to furnish a sufficient supply of water to every inhabitant occupying a private dwelling house, or part of a dwelling house, in any square, street, close, or lane of the town and borough of Sheffield aforesaid, and in any other place or places within the limits of this Act, where the pipes of the company are now, or hereafter shall be laid, for the use of his or her family, at the following rate per annum (that is to say):

Where the rent of such dwelling house, or part of a dwelling house, shall not amount to 7*l.* per annum, at a rate not exceeding 6*l.* per cent. per annum on such rent, but not in any such case to exceed the sum of 7*s.* 2*d.* per annum.

Where such rent shall amount to 7*l.*, but not to 8*l.* per annum, at a rate not exceeding 8*s.* per annum,

Where such rent shall amount to 8*l.*, but not to 10*l.* per annum, at a rate not exceeding 10*s.* per annum.

Where such rent shall amount to 10*l.*, but not to 12*l.* per annum, at a rate not exceeding 12*s.* per annum.

And so on in a graduated ascending scale, according to the amount of rent, up to a rent of 100*l.* or upwards per annum.

Provided, nevertheless, that the company shall not be entitled to receive from any such inhabitant more than the sum of 6*l.* in any one year for such supply, nor shall such company be obliged to furnish such supply to any inhabitant for less than 7*s.* 2*d.* in any one year, unless they shall think fit so do do.

Sect. 80.—That in cases where the landlord or owner of a number of houses, let at rents not exceeding 7*l.* a year respectively, shall agree with the said company to pay the water rent for the same, the company shall not in such case charge more than 6*s.* 4*d.* a year for each house for such supply, anything to the contrary in this Act contained notwithstanding.

5. In 1860, the Sheffield Water Works Act 1860 was passed, whereby the limits of the Act of 1853 were extended to include the parish of Ecclesfield, as well as the town and borough of Sheffield.

6. In 1864, the Sheffield Water Works Act 1864 was passed, the 105th section of which was as follows:

The provisions of the Company's Act of 1853, relative to the water rents or rates to be taken by the company shall, from and after the time for the first half yearly collection of the company's water rents after the passing of this Act, and thenceforth for a period of twenty-five years, have effect as if the several maximum water rents or rates, in those provisions specified, were increased in each instance by 25 per centum: Provided always that all water rents or rates authorised to be taken by this Act, or the Company's Act of 1853, for any purposes whatever, shall be charged to all persons impartially and without favour, according to the scale of rents or rates specified as aforesaid, for the several purposes respectively, except that such rates may by agreement be reduced for the sanitary purposes of the town.

7. In 1867, the Sheffield Water Works (Amendment) Act 1867 was passed, whereby the limits of the company's former Acts were further extended, to include the township of Tinsley, in the parish of Rotherham and the parish of Handsworth, all in the West Riding of the county of York, and the parish of Norton, the townships of Dore and Totley, in the parish of Dronfield, and the liberty or extraparochial place of Beauclief, all in the county of Derby.

8. Copies of the said Acts of 1830, 1845, 1853, 1860, 1864, and 1867 accompany, and are to form part of this case.

9. Under the powers conferred by the several special Acts before mentioned, the company is authorised to supply water within the following thirteen townships and places, namely the townships of Upper Hallam, Nether Hallam, Ecclesall Bierlow, Sheffield, Brightside Bierlow, and Attercliffe, all in the parish of Sheffield, the parish of Ecclesfield, the township of Tinsley, in the parish of Rotherham, and the parish of Handsworth, all in the West Riding of the county of York, and the parish of Norton, the townships of Dore and Totley, in the parish of Dronfield, and the liberty or extra-parochial place of Beauclief, all in the county of Derby.

10. The company are now supplying water in all the said townships and places, except in the townships of Dore and Totley, and the liberty or extra parochial place of Beauclief.

11. The dwelling-houses or tenements at present supplied by the company with water, within the limits of their district, are about 48,400 in number, of which about 30,000 are of an annual value not exceeding 10*l.* Of these houses some are occupied by the owners thereof.

12. The water rates payable to the company are due quarterly—on the 25th March, the 24th June, the 29th Sept., and the 25th Dec. in each year.

13. A separate poors' rate is levied in each of the townships, parishes, and places included within the limits of the company's district. The poor rates in the said several townships, parishes, and places respectively, vary in amount from time to time, and at the same periods of time are larger in some of the said townships, parishes, and places than in others.

14. The mode of ascertaining the rateable value of premises rateable to the poors' rate is not the same in the said several townships, parishes, and places, the consequence of which is that the sums at which similar premises are rated are relatively lower in some of such townships, parishes, and places than in others.

15. The borough of Sheffield is co-extensive with the parish of Sheffield, and comprises the several townships of Upper Hallam, Nether Hallam, Ecclesall Bierlow, Sheffield, Brightside Bierlow, and Attercliffe.

16. The Local Government Acts have been applied to, and are in force within, the said borough of Sheffield, but not to or within any other of the townships, parishes, or places included within the limits of the company's district. General district rates, which may vary in amount from time to time, are levied under these Acts in the borough of Sheffield.

17. On the 20th Sept. 1865, after the Local Government Acts had been applied to the borough of Sheffield, the town council of Sheffield, which is the local board for the said borough, passed a resolution in the following words: "It was ordered that the general district rate be laid and levied upon the owners, instead of the occupiers, in cases where the rateable value of any premises liable to assessment under the Local Government Act 1858, does not exceed the sum of 7*l.*, and that the same be assessed at the reduced estimate of three-fourths of the net annual value of such premises."

18. The defendant was, at Christmas Day 1870, and during the two quarters of a year then next following, the owner of ninety-two dwelling-houses or tenements, specified and described in the schedule marked A, which accompanies, and is to form part of this case; and the same were let by him, during such period, at the rents or sums, and in the manner specified in the said schedule.

19. The occupiers of the said respective dwelling-houses or tenements were, at the request of the defendant, supplied with water by the company during the said two quarters of a year.

20. Sixteen of the said dwelling houses or tenements are situated in the township of Sheffield, and the remainder of them are situated in the adjoining township of Brightside Bierlow.

21. During the two quarters of a year for which the water rates in question are claimed, the poors' rate levied in the township of Sheffield was after the rate of 2*s.* 10*d.* in the pound, and in the township of Brightside Bierlow after the rate of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound.

22. During the same period the general district rate, in the borough of Sheffield, under the Local Government Acts, was after the rate of 2*s.* in the pound, subject to the deduction mentioned in the aforesaid resolution of 20th Sept. 1865.

23. The company claim to charge the water rates, in respect of the dwelling houses or tenements in question, upon the rents or sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements respectively were let, without making any deduction therefrom.

24. The defendant on the other hand, contends that the water rates ought to be charged upon the annual value of the said dwelling houses or tenements, free of all tenant's rates and taxes, and that, in ascertaining such annual value, a deduction should be made from the rents or sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements are respectively let as aforesaid, in respect of the amounts allowed or paid by him for poors' rates, district rates, and water rates, in respect of the said dwelling houses or tenements respectively (whether such allowance or payment is made by him by virtue of statutory obligations imposed upon him in that behalf, or by reason of agreements voluntarily entered into between himself and his tenants).

25. The schedule hereinbefore referred to specifies and describes the dwelling houses or tenements in question, and, in addition to the matter before referred to, the gross estimated rental of the said dwelling houses or tenements for the purposes of the poor rate, the sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements were respectively rated for poors' rate; the rates claimed to be deducted by the defendant from the rents or sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements respectively were let, as hereinbefore mentioned, and other particulars relative to the question in dispute. The matters stated in, or appearing from, the said schedule are to be taken as correct, and it is admitted that, if the defendant is entitled to make the deductions he claims, the amounts mentioned in the said schedule, under the respective heads of poors' rate, district rate, and water rate, are the amounts proper to be deducted from the said rents or sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements are respectively let as aforesaid.

26. The sums, in respect of which the above mentioned deductions are claimed by the defendant, were allowed or paid by the defendant, as specified in the said schedule, for poors' rates, district rates, and water rates, respectively, either by virtue of statutory obligations imposed upon him in that behalf, or by reason of the terms (voluntarily agreed to between himself and his tenants) on which the said respective dwelling houses or tenements were let by him. The statutory obligations above referred are, as regards poors' rates, sect. 1 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), as regards district rates sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), and as regards water rates, sect. 72 of the Water Works Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17).

27. All the said dwelling houses or tenements, in respect of which the water rates in question are claimed, were, during the period for which they are claimed, respectively let for terms not exceeding three months, within the meaning of the 1st section of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869. The 4th section of the last mentioned Act has not been adopted in either of the townships of Sheffield and Brightside Bierlow.

28. The tenants of several of the said dwelling houses or tenements for which the water rates in question are claimed (namely those numbered in the said schedule 11, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21), held their respective dwelling houses or tenements of the defendant, on the terms that they should not take advantage of the 1st section of the last mentioned Act, and should pay their respective rents for the same, without deducting the sums paid by them for poors' rates.

29. The water rates in respect of all the said ninety-two dwelling houses or tenements for the quarter of the year next following Christmas 1870, became due on the 25th March 1871, and the water rates for the same dwelling houses or tenements for the next quarter of a year became due on the 24th June 1871.

30. The water rates in respect of the said dwelling houses or tenements for the said two quarters of a year amounted, according to the mode of computation adopted by the company, to 31*l.*; and, according to the mode of computation contended for by the defendant, to 24*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

31. The rents or sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements are respectively let as aforesaid, are to be taken to be the full rents or sums obtainable for the said dwelling houses or tenements respectively upon the terms upon which the same are respectively let as aforesaid.

The question for the opinion of the court is,

Whether, in calculating the water rates, any deductions should be made from the rents or sums at which the said dwelling houses or tenements are respectively let as aforesaid, in respect of the payments made or allowed by the defendant, for poors' rates, district rates, and water rates, or any and which of them, in either and which of the following cases, namely:

(A.) In cases where the poors' rates, district rates, and water rates respectively were allowed or paid by the defendant by virtue of statutory obligations in that behalf.

(B.) In cases where the poors' rates, district rates, and water rates respectively, were allowed or paid by the defendant by reason of the terms (voluntarily agreed to between himself and his tenants) on which the respective dwelling houses or tenements were let by him.

If the court shall be of opinion that none of the aforesaid deductions ought to be made, the judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs, with costs of suit, for the sum of 6*l.* 10*s.*, over and above the 24*l.* 10*s.* paid into court.

If the court shall be of opinion that all of the deductions claimed by the defendant, as appearing in the said schedule, ought to be made, then judgment is to be entered for the defendant, with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion that some, but not all, of the deductions claimed by the defendant, as last aforesaid, ought to be made, then judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs, with costs of suit, for such sum, over and above the 24*l.* 10*s.* paid into court, as, according to the judgment of the court, in that case remain due to the plaintiffs; such sum, in case of difference, to be settled by one of the masters of the court.

In deciding the above question, the court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact:

Points for argument on the part of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, upon the argument of this special case, will contend, That the water rates payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs, in respect of the water supplied by them to the several dwelling houses or tenements specified in the schedule A to the said case, should be calculated upon the full rents or sums at which such dwelling houses or tenements were respectively let, and for which the defendant, as landlord, was legally entitled to distrain, without making any deductions therefrom for poors' rates, district rates, and water rates, or any of them, whether such poors' rates, district rates, and water rates, or any of them, were respectively allowed or paid by the defendant, by virtue of statutory obligations in that behalf, or by reason of the terms (voluntarily agreed to between the defendant and his tenants) on which the respective dwelling houses or tenements were let by him.

Points for argument on the part of the defendant:—First, that the word "rent" in the 79th section of the Sheffield Water Works Act of 1853 is synonymous with the words "annual value" in the Water Works Clauses Act 1847; secondly, that the word "rent" in the said Act of 1853 means the rent that might reasonably be expected to be obtained for the dwelling-house free from all usual tenants' rates and taxes; thirdly, that the poor rates, district rates, and water rates mentioned in the special case are usual tenants' rates; fourthly, that the word "rent" in the said Act of 1853 cannot mean the rent actually paid, because such rent is the criterion of the actual value of the houses, and because such a construction would produce inequality of rating.

In addition to the sections of the Sheffield Waterworks Act of 1853, which are set out in the case, the following sections of the several after-mentioned Acts of Parliament were referred to in the case, the arguments, and the judgment of the court, as having a material bearing upon the question at issue:—

The Sheffield Water Works Act 1830 (11 Geo. 4, c. lv., local and personal, repealed by the subsequent Act of 1853), enacted:

Sect. 93. That the company should furnish a supply of water to every inhabitant of a dwelling house at the several rates per annum respectively, according to the rent of the dwelling house supplied, according to the scale in the said section mentioned; and it further enacted that such rate should be payable according to the actual amount of the rent, where the same can be ascertained; and where the same cannot be ascertained, according to such rent as such inhabitant shall be assessed at for the house tax.

The Inhabited House Duty Act (48 Geo. 3, c. 55) charges the tax upon houses, in schedule B, as follows:

For every such inhabited house which, with the household and other offices, &c., therewith occupied and charged, are or shall be worth the rent hereinafter mentioned by the year, there shall be charged the yearly sums following, videlicit.

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) enacts:

Sect. 68 (with respect to the payment and recovery of the water rates) that "the water rates, except as hereinafter and in the special Act mentioned, shall be paid by and recoverable from the person requiring, receiving, or using the supply of water, and shall be payable according to the annual value of the tenement supplied with water; and if any dispute arise as to such value, the same shall be determined by two justices."

The Parochial Assessments Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96) enacts:

Sect. 1. That from and after such period, not being earlier than the 21st March next after the passing of this Act (Aug. 1836), as the Poor Law Commissioners shall by any order under their seal of office direct, no rate for the relief of the poor in England and Wales shall be allowed by any justices, or be of force, which shall not be made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenants' rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rent-charge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent.

The Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41) enacts:

Sect. 1. The occupier of any rateable hereditament let to him for a term not exceeding three months shall be entitled to deduct the amount paid by him in respect of any poor rate assessed upon such hereditament from the rent due or accruing due to the owner, and every such payment shall be a valid discharge of the rent to the extent of the rate so paid.

Sect. 4 enables the vestry of any parish to make the payment of the poor rates obligatory on the owner, instead of the occupier, in cases where the rateable value of the hereditament (except in London, Liverpool, Manchester, or Birmingham) does not exceed 8*l.*

The Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) enacts:

Sect. 55. That the general district rates shall be made and levied upon the occupiers of all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are or may be assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor, and shall be assessed upon the full net annual value of such property, ascertained by the rate (if any) for the relief of the poor made next before the making of the assessments under this Act, subject to the following exceptions, regulations, and conditions, namely,

The owner, instead of the occupier, may, at the option of the landlord, be rated in cases where the rateable value of any premises liable to assessment under the Act does not exceed the sum of 10*l.*; or

Where any premises liable to an assessment are let to weekly or monthly tenants; or,

Where any premises so liable as aforesaid are let in separate apartments, or where the rents become payable or are collected at any shorter period than quarterly; subject to this proviso, that in cases where the owner is rated instead of the occupier he shall be assessed upon such reduced estimate as the local board deem reasonable of the net annual value, not being less than two-thirds, nor more than four-fifths of such annual value.

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) enacts:

Sect. 72. The owners of all dwelling-houses or parts of dwelling-houses occupied as separate tenements, the annual value of which houses or tenements shall not exceed the sum of 10*l.*, shall be liable to the payment of the rates instead of the occupier; and the powers and provisions herein or in the special Act contained for the recovery of rates from occupiers, shall be construed to apply to the owners of such houses and tenements. . . .

Field, Q.C. (with him were Kemplay, Q.C. and Barker) for the plaintiffs, contended that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, and to recover the full amount claimed by them in the action for water rates supplied to the defendant's dwelling-houses. By sect. 79 of the company's Special Act of 1853, such rates were chargeable in respect of the water supplied by the company to dwelling houses within the limits of their Act, upon the full or actual rent or sum at which such dwelling houses were let, and not a word was there said about any deduction or abatement being made from such rent or sum before charging or assessing the water rate thereon. Their original Act of 1830 empowered them to charge the rates according to the rent of the dwelling house, and it was to be payable "accordingly to the actual amount of the rent paid." The Waterworks Clauses Act 1849 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 68, provides that the water rates shall be payable "according to the annual value" of the hereditament supplied with the water. The terms "annual value" and "rent" in these Acts respectively mean the same thing, namely, the sum actually paid for rent, the amount for which the landlord could distrain. That is to be the guide and the criterion for charging the water rate, and any other mode would be inconvenient, uncertain, complicated, and difficult to be ascertained, and unequal in its imposition. The lettable value of a house is increased by this water supply, and a larger rent is consequently obtainable. It is as though a well had been dug on the premises, the benefit arising from which would have to be calculated in arriving at an estimate of the renting value of the premises. The case of Rook v. The Mayor, &c. of Liverpool (7 C. B., N. S., 240), is a decisive authority in favour of the plaintiffs and of their construction of the section of the Act in question. He cited also, as authorities in support of the view contended for on the part of the plaintiffs:

Rex v. The Inhabitants of St. Paul, Deptford, 13 East, 320;
Rex v. Inhabitants of Framlingham, Burr. Sett. Cas. 748;
Rex v. The Inhabitants of Thurmaston, &c., 1 B. & Ad. 731;
Elstone v. Rose, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 280; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 4; 38 L. J. 6, Q. B.;
Reg. v. The Overseers of Bilston, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 18; 35 L. J. 73, M. C.;

and referred to the Inhabited House Tax Act (48 Geo. 3, c. 55), sched. B; the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), sched. A, defining the meaning of annual value, and the Poor Rate Assessment, &c. Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), s. 1.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him was Cave) for the defendants, contra.—The construction for which the plaintiffs contend cannot be correct, and would lead, if it were to be adopted, to obvious absurdity, inconsistency, and injustice in many cases. If the word "rent" in the section in question is to be construed as necessarily meaning the sum actually paid in all cases as rent, and such sum is to be the guide in charging the water rate, how is the test or criterion to be applied in cases where a furnished house is rented, or where a house is let to a son or other relative, or to an employer's servant at a lower or even a nominal rent, or where a house is occupied by the owner, or where land is let on a building lease at a ground rent? These illustrations show that "rent" in sect. 79 cannot mean the rent actually paid, for that forms no criterion of the true value of the premises, and would lead to unequal rating; but it means the rent which may reasonably be expected to be obtained for the particular dwelling house, free from all usual tenant's rates and taxes, such as poor-rates, district rates, and water rates. The case of Rook v. The Mayor of Liverpool does not apply here, for the decision there was founded on a special agreement between the parties. The liability of the landlord to pay rates in certain cases has been imposed by Acts of Parliament passed subsequently to the company's Act of 1853.

Kemplay, Q.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

26*th June*.—The following judgments were now delivered:—

BRAMWELL B.—This was an action by the plaintiffs for the recovery of a water rate or rent from the defendant, who was the owner of many small houses in Sheffield; and the question was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to charge him according to what is called, and what in one sense is, the rent paid; that is, the sum paid by the tenant to the landlord for the right to occupy the premises, without deduction; or whether the landlord paying the water rate or rent, was entitled to deduct from the so-called rent of the premises, the poor rate, district rate, and the water rate itself. On the part of the plaintiffs, it was said that the defendant had no right to deduct these items, or any of them; and on the part of the defendant it was contended that he had the right to deduct all of them. Now, what the plaintiffs strongly relied upon was, the language of sect. 79 of their private Act; that is to say, that the company are required to furnish a sufficient supply of water to every inhabitant and occupier of a private dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house, at the following rate per annum: that is to say, where the rent of such dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house, shall not amount to 7*l.* per annum; and then, where such rent shall amount to 7*l.*, and then going on to various amounts. And sect 80 has these words: "in cases where the landlord, or owner of a number of houses let at rents not exceeding 7*l.* a year," and so on. These are the words on which the plaintiffs mainly relied, and they contended that those words showed that what was commonly called the rent, that is to say, that sum which the occupier paid to the landlord for the right to occupy the premises, was the sum upon which the water rate was to be calculated according to this Act of Parliament, and that no mention was made of any abatement from it. The consequence was, that all that had to be done, was to look at what the occupier paid to his landlord for the right to occupy the premises; and it was said that this was a convenient way of ascertaining the amount to be paid, and that if a discussion was once gotten into as to what the true rent was, it would be a thing almost impossible to settle. For instance, a landlord might say, "Why, I do not receive as much rent in reality for the use of these premises as my neighbour does for similar premises, for mine are dilapidated, and a large sum of that which I receive goes to keep them in repair." In answer to that argument, it was said that one cannot always look to the rent, for the reasons which I will presently mention. The plaintiffs said that the rent must be looked at when it can be, and that, when it cannot, another criterion need be taken to see what the rent will be. The plaintiffs further argued that, in truth, it might be said that the value of the premises for occupation was the rent, notwithstanding these deductions; because, if the landlord had to pay them instead of the tenant, the premises would become of so much greater value to occupy. It was also urged on the part of the plaintiffs, that with respect to this very water rate, for example, it was as though the landlord had dug a well, or laid on a conduit from a river, or what not, which had made the premises all the more valuable to the occupier; at least, that is what I understand to be the nature of the argument, and no doubt it had some weight, and as such was entitled to consideration. On the other hand, the defendant said that it was impossible that the word "rent" could be looked at as having the signification and operation for which the plaintiffs contended. The defendant called attention to this, that the rent was always spoken of as a rent that did not amount to 7*l. per annum;* so that, if one looked at it literally, in cases where there was no letting at a rent per annum at all, but where there was only a letting, say from week to week, or month to month, that was not provided for. Then the defendant further contended that there were cases where the rent could not be looked at; for instance, there were cases where a man occupied his own house; and again, there were cases where a man occupied a furnished house, and paid a gross or lump sum for the occupation of the house and use of the furniture; and again, there were cases where a man might occupy a house for which he was only paying what is commonly called a ground rent, that is to say, where he had taken the land and built a house upon it, and was paying rent for that. Therefore the defendant argued, with real force, that it was impossible that the word rent could be looked at as having that effect and force which the plaintiffs desired to attribute to it. Then, as to the argument that it would lead to difficulties if these deductions were once to be admitted, the defendant met that argument with this answer: he said, it is not so at all; because if, instead of the word "rent," the words "annual value" had been used, all these difficulties would have existed, and yet nobody supposes that they would have been insuperable; therefore, what is to be done in all cases, is to ascertain, if the word "rent" is used, what is the annual value, or what is the real rent of the premises, as distinguished from any adventitious advantages which the premises may chance to enjoy. I am not myself going to attempt to give a definition of "rent," either to satisfy a political economist, or to meet all possible cases in which one might require to know what the meaning of the word was. Everybody understands pretty well what it is. It is that sum which the tenant pays to the landlord for the right to occupy the premises in a normal state, with nothing but what may be called their freehold advantages, and not including any such as I have before called adventitious or abnormal advantages, such as that of having the water rates or poor rates or district rates paid for him. Therefore, the defendant said there was no difficulty in construing the Act of Parliament as he desired it to be construed, or in supposing that the Act of Parliament meant what he, the defendant, contended that it did mean. Well, then came this observation on the part of the defendant, that at the time when this water company's Act of Parliament passed, they would have a right to charge upon the then rents of the houses at the outside. There does appear to be a possibility, under Sturges Bourne's Act, that the houses or some of them might have been made liable to a rate under that Act, but it has never been put in force. Saving that exception, at the time when the water company's Act passed, the tenant paid all the tenant's rates. The obvious consequence of putting them on the landlord is to raise the rent—to raise what is called the rent; to raise the sum which the tenant will pay for the occupation. It is perfectly manifest that, if a man gets a house of which he has not to pay the rates which he would have to pay if he accepted the next house of a similar value, he would pay more for the former house than he would for that of which he would have to pay the rates; and, therefore, the argument on the part of the defendant was, that if the plaintiffs are right in their construction, the result of putting on the landlord the district rate, the poor rate, and the water rate is to increase the nominal rent paid to the landlord, and consequently to increase the sum at which the occupier of the premises may be charged for the water rate; and, therefore that, in effect, these Acts of Parliament, passed with a wholly different object, would have the effect of adding perhaps ten per cent. to the water rates or rents of the people of Sheffield. Certainly, that was a very strong observation. And it was also pointed out that certain ridiculous and impossible consequences would follow; for instance, there might be two houses of precisely equal value, of both of which the same man is the owner, and he occupies one of them, which is worth 9*l.*; and he lets the other of them and has to pay the district rate, the water rate, and the poor rate upon it, and therefore he lets it for upwards of 10*l.* a year. The result will be that, in respect of the house which he himself occupies (I am not now dealing with the particular figures, but merely giving an illustration), he would be liable to be charged with one rate for his water, and in respect of the neighbouring house, which his tenant occupied, he would be liable to be charged with another rate for the water supplied to his tenant. Now, that cannot in reason be, unless there is some positive necessity for it, and extremely plain words to that effect in the Act of Parliament. Another thing, as was also shown, would follow; I may take the very figures I have mentioned. As soon as the landlord has to pay the district rate and the poor rate and the water rate upon his house, the rent becomes upwards of 10*l.* a year, and then he is not the man to be charged with the rates, because it is only when the rent is 10*l.* a year that the clause applies. When I say 10*l.*, it may be that the illustration ought to be limited to 7*l.* I am not going into any entanglements of that description; it is not necessary for the purpose which I have in hand. But taking 10*l.* or 7*l.* to be the criterion, he will, when he pays the district rate, the water rate, and the poor rate for his house, raise the rent above the statutory amount, and the consequence will be that he will not be under an obligation to pay; whereas, as soon as his tenant pays it, the rent will go down below the statutory amount, and then the landlord will be under an obligation to pay it. The consequence would be that there would be certain houses which it would be impossible to say were within the Act of Parliament so as that the landlord must pay the rate or that the tenant must pay the rate; and, indeed, that is true, I think, of the other rates, the district and the poor rates. Well, that seems to be an absurdity. Then, as I said before, the defendant says that this really is no part of the rent, if we call it rent; it is no part of the annual value of the premises. It is of no use to liken it to the case of a well that has been dug, or of a conduit that has been brought from the stream, which would have become part of the freehold, and might be taken into account in estimating the value of the premises. This is not so. It is something which is enjoyed in conjunction with the freehold and its advantages, and it is no more a part of the freehold than gas supplied for the purpose of lighting, or, what it is perfectly possible might be had, warm air; as for instance, suppose a row of houses next to a factory, and the owner of the houses to be the owner of the factory, and that he could conveniently warm all the houses with hot air from the factory, and so save his tenants the expense of coals to a considerable extent, for which he might charge them an additional rent; or it might be, as is not uncommon in manufacturing districts, that steam power might be laid on. Let us take all those cases. It would be unreasonable to say that they contributed to the rent of the houses, although, as between landlord and tenant, they might conveniently use the word "rent," and they might agree that it should be distrained for, and, in point of law, it might all issue out of the realty. But it is impossible to suppose, under these circumstances, for the purposes of this Act of Parliament of enabling the water company to charge, that the sum so payable would be rent. This was the argument on the part of the defendant, and I own that it prevailed with me. I cannot think that there is much difficulty in the case. No doubt the word "rent" is used in the Act of Parliament, but it is spoken of as a yearly rent, which would exclude probably the most numerous class of cases where there is no yearly rent at all. It means value. It must mean value for the other reasons that are urged, namely, that there are some houses without any rent at all. It cannot be said that this is a part of that for which a tenant pays under the name of rent or yearly value as in the Act of Parliament, and the absurd consequences that would result from the plaintiffs' being in the right in this case show that they cannot be so, and consequently that our judgment should be for the defendant. I am not going into the authorities, because I know that my brother Cleasby has done so. The only case on which I will make any observation is that of Rook v. The Mayor, &c., of Liverpool (sup.), which certainly to my mind was decided by the court on the ground that the parties had come to an agreement. There appears to have been, under the Act of Parliament, a sort of right to come to an agreement; but in point of fact they had come to one, and had agreed that the particular sum there mentioned should be the sum upon which the water rate should be fixed. I have thus expressed my views in order that the parties may see that my brother Cleasby and I have not merely adopted the one of us the opinion of the other; but I have my brother Cleasby's written judgment here, which I will read immediately, having only one more observation of my own to make. I have delivered a separate judgment in this case partly because I might say something which perhaps might not be contained in my brother Cleasby's judgment, and partly for the purpose of its being seen that we have attended to the case, although I am quite aware that, from the amount in dispute and the importance of the question, let the judgments be on which side they may, and let the arguments used in them be what they may, the probability is that the present are very much pro formâ judgments, and that our delivering them is merely for the assistance of the parties in getting to the next stage in which the case will make its appearance.

The learned Baron then proceeded to read the following written judgment of CLEASBY, B.—In this case the question for our consideration is, what is the proper meaning to be given to the word "rent" in the 79th section of the Sheffield Water Works Act 1853. According to that section, houses are to pay water rates upon a different scale, according to the rents of the houses; not in exact proportion to the rents, but going by steps. For example, if the rent shall not amount to 7*l.* per annum, then at a rate for the whole year not exceeding 6*l.* per cent. per annum on such rents; but not in any such case to exceed the sum of 7*s.* 2*d.* per annum; if the rent exceeds 7*l.*, but not 8*l.*, then at a rate not exceeding 8*s.* per annum, and so on upon a varying scale; and if the rent amounts to 100*l.* per annum, the rate is not to exceed 3*l.* per cent. upon such rent. By "The Water Works Clauses Act 1847" (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 68, water rates are to be payable according to the annual value of the premises, and this Act is only incorporated with the Sheffield Act where the provisions of the latter do not vary the former; and as the standard of rating is different, the 68th section of the general Act is not so entirely applicable as to justify us in saying that the effect of the two Acts is, that the "annual value" mentioned in the 68th section of the general Act, and the "rent" mentioned in the 74th section of the special Act must mean the same thing. It should be noticed that, in the earlier Sheffield Water Works Act (11 Geo. 4, c. lv.), s. 93 the water rates were payable according to the rent, taken by certain steps in a similar manner, though not exactly the same, as in the present Act. But that Act is repealed, and is only adverted to on account of the general provision in sect. 93, "that the rate shall be payable according to the actual amount of the rent, where the same can be ascertained; and where the same cannot be ascertained, then, according to such rent as such inhabitant shall be assessed at for the house tax." Now, when we refer to the Act for assessing the house tax (48 Geo. 3, c. 55), and to the schedule (B) thereto, we find that the assessment is at certain rates where the houses shall be worth the rents after mentioned, and then follow the scale of rents, and the assessment at so much in the pound. This, though not forming part of the Act in question here, is well worthy of notice, as showing the use of the word "rent," as signifying the rent which a house is worth, which is, in other words, the yearly worth or value. For, although the actual rent is to be the guide, when it can be ascertained, this must mean the actual rent when it represents the value, and not where, from other conditions, under which it is paid as rent, it is no criterion of value at all. And the same reasoning, we think, applies to the Act in question. The word "rent" cannot signify, strictly, the rent actually or accidentally paid. In a row of houses, all of equal value, one might be let at a nominal rent from love and affection; another might be let at a greatly reduced rent to a servant in the employ of the landlord; another might yield a small rent because the tenant had repaired the house himself, or paid a premium; and no one would contend that, in any such cases, the actual rent paid would be the criterion. It would not be the criterion in any case in which it does not form a means of comparison with other houses, as regards their worth. In general the rent paid is what the house is worth, and is the real criterion of value, as distinguished from estimates. It makes a fact the test, which is certain, and excludes partiality. Having arrived at the conclusion that the actual rent is not necessarily the "rent" referred to in the 79th section of the Sheffield Water Works Act of 1853, but the proper rent for the houses which would, in general, correspond with the actual rent of small houses let at weekly rents, it follows, as we think, that the proper rent must be ascertained by some regular and fixed standard, and not by a standard depending upon whether the house is let or occupied by the owner, or let for more or less than three months, or for a greater or less value than a particular sum, or upon the application of certain Acts of Parliament to the property, or upon the particular arrangement made between the landlord and his tenants. Now, upon the proper construction of the 79th section, standing by itself, supposing no subsequent Act of Parliament on the subject of rating to be applied to the premises, the rent paid by an ordinary tenant, who himself paid all the rates and charges properly borne by occupiers, would clearly satisfy the word "rent." It may appear that this would be so only as regards houses above the annual value of 10*l.*, because, as regards houses below that value, by the 72nd section of the general Act the owners of such houses are liable to the water rate instead of the occupier, so as to make the water rate necessarily, as regards such houses, part of the rent, but this is an apparent objection only. It would be an objection if the word "rent" in the clause in question must signify the rent which the tenant pays; whereas the more reasonable meaning is what rent the premises are worth as "rent" under ordinary conditions. The word "rent" may, we think, be read to mean what the landlord gets as "rent," under the usual conditions, though technically this is not its meaning; and, if the landlord is obliged to pay the water rate, all that he gets as rent, and all that he ought to have taxed as rent, is the whole payment after deducting what he is so obliged to pay. The same reason applies with equal force to the payment of poor rates and district rates. We thus hold the word "rent" in the 79th section of the Act in question to mean the proper rent to a tenant paying the rates and charges regularly paid by the tenant, of which the actual rent, where the tenant does pay those rates and charges is, in general, the proper criterion; and this is the same thing as the yearly worth or annual value. And by so holding, we escape from the inconsistency of rating the premises upon a different standard, according as the value of the premises makes the actual payment of the rates fall upon the tenant or the landlord. The words "rent" and "annual value" are often used indiscriminately, and we think that they are done so in the 68th section of the general Act, and the 79th section of the special Act. As another instance, although it is not allowed to refer to the marginal reference in construing the clause in an Act of Parliament, yet we may do so in considering the general sense in which words are used. The 72nd section of The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, makes the rate payable by the landlord when the annual value of the premises does not exceed 10*l.*; and the marginal note is "owners of houses not exceeding 10*l.* rent to be liable to the rates." We have referred to the various authorities cited in the course of the argument. We do not think that the settlement cases have any real bearing upon a case like the present, where we are considering a system of rating houses. But it may be noticed that it would appear that the case of Rex v. The Inhabitants of St. Paul's, Deptford, in 13 East, 320, was decided because the court felt bound by a previous decision in the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of Framlingham (Burrow's Settlement Cases, p. 748); and, as regards the case of Rex. v. The Inhabitants of Thurmaston (1 B. & Ad. 731), the words of the Act of Parliament therein referred to were, as to one of them, that the houses must be bonâ fide hired for 10*l.* by the year, and the rent paid for one year, and as to the other of them, that the house must be rented at 10*l.* a year, and the rent actually paid for that term; so that the payment by the tenant of the rent of 10*l.* for one year is the criterion of settlement, a reason which does not apply to the present case at all. The case of Elstone v. Rose (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 280; 38 L. J. 6, Q. B.; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 4) raised a question as to the jurisdiction of the County Court judge, and the grounds of decision there do not at all assist the decision in the present case. In Reg v. The Overseers of Bilston (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 18; 35 L. J. 73, M. C.), a poor rate case, it was held that a payment made by the landlord as a water rent ought not, in ascertaining the rateable value of the premises, to be deducted from the amount, 9*l.* 2*s.*, found as a fact by the sessions to be the gross rental, on the ground that it did not come within any of the deductions allowable under the Parochial Assessment Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96), s. 1. In that case there was nothing in the nature of a water rate, but the water was supplied at the option of the inhabitants, and the agreed rent paid by the landlord or tenant as arranged between them. The court held it to be clear, and could not do otherwise, that the so-called water rent was not a tenant's rate or tax, and that it did not come within the other head of deductions, as an expense necessary to maintain the premises in a state to command the rent, any more than the supplying by agreement of gas instead of candles, or of meat, or any other necessary of life, would have done so. That case, therefore, has no bearing upon the question in the present case, which is, how the compulsory water rate is to be imposed. In the present case, all the deductions claimed are in respect of charges which are the subject of rates, and compulsory so far as the property is concerned. But the case mainly relied on by the plaintiffs was that of Rook (app.) v. The Mayor, &c., of Liverpool (resp.) (7 C. B., N. S., 240). According to the marginal note that case would be a strong authority in their favour; and, if the question raised in that case and decided had not been complicated by an agreement between the parties, which was relied on in the judgments, and in fact formed the foundation of them, we should have felt bound by the decision upon a question of such a general nature as rating, and have decided accordingly. In that case the water rate was to be upon the annual value of the premises, and there was a power to compound where the yearly rent or value did not amount to 10*l*. There had been a composition paper by which the appellant agreed to compound for the water rates, and in a schedule the rental of the two sets of premises was stated to be 4*s*. 6*d*. per week and 3*s*. 6*d*. per week, respectively; and there was a proviso that, in case the rentals were not correctly stated, the corporation might insert the correct rentals and recover the water rates accordingly. It appeared that, in fact, the rentals were sixpence a week more in respect of both sets of premises, the landlord claiming to deduct the sixpence for the rates paid by him. The court held that in that case the appellant must be rated to the full amount; but not, it is submitted, because that would be the correct mode of rating independently of the terms of the composition, but because the appellant had agreed to make the actual rental the criterion, or rather the corporation had a right to act upon his having so agreed. Erle, C.J., in the course of the argument says (at p. 257 of 7 C. B, N. S.): "You say the written contract between the parties is on the rental and with a view to that alone; and that, for aught that appears, the council would not have entered into it upon any other footing." And the whole of his judgment afterwards given is to the same effect. The conclusion of it is as follows: "My judgment is founded upon the terms of the composition paper which is before us." Mr. Justice Willes says: "It seems to us to have been agreed on both sides that the rent should be taken to represent the value." So that no judgment whatever is given upon the general question of annual value, but only upon the proper construction of the composition paper. There is no such question as that before us now, and therefore that decision does not in any way conflict with the reasons which we have given for the conclusion arrived at in the present case. For the reasons above given we think that in determining the class to which the houses belong, the actual rent paid by the tenant is not to be taken, but the sum which comes into the landlord's pocket as rent, after the deductions for water rates, poor rates, and district rates, whenever he pays them. Our judgment therefore will be for the defendant.

The same question arises in the case of Bennett v. The Sheffield Waterworks Company, stated by the magistrate. And according to our judgment already given, the decision in that case will be reversed.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

PRESTON v. THE CORPORATION OF GREAT YARMOUTH.

Corporation—Mortgage of rates—Local Act—Provision for repayment by ballot—Right of mortgagee to repayment of principal—Account—Receiver.

The corporation of a borough were, by Act of Parliament, authorised to raise a certain sum of money for local improvements by mortgage of the general district rates. In the form of mortgage prescribed by the Act, no time was specified for the repayment of the money, and the only mode of repayment mentioned in the Act was that the Corporation should yearly and every year pay off 100l., at the least, of the moneys borrowed under the Act, and it was provided that the mortgagees to be paid off should be ascertained by ballot.

On a bill by one of the mortgagees for payment of the principal moneys owing to him, and for the appointment of a receiver:

Held (affirming the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that the mortgagee was not entitled to be paid the principal moneys owing to him, except by the means and in the manner provided by the Act, nor to have a receiver of the district rates appointed by the court.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

The hearing before the Vice-Chancellor is reported in 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 235, where the facts of the case are fully stated.

The Vice-Chancellor having dismissed the plaintiff's bill with costs, the plaintiff appealed.

Eddis, Q.C. and W. Pearson, for the appellant, contended that he was entitled under the Act to have his mortgage paid off after six months' notice, and as the corporation had, after such notice, failed to repay him his principal, he was entitled to have a receiver appointed of the rates: (Hopkins v. The Worcester and Birmingham Canal Proprietors, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 437.) If the contention of the corporation that they were only bound to pay off 100*l*. in each year were correct, it would take them 200 years to pay off the 20,000*l*. which they had borrowed; and the rights of the mortgagees could not be prejudiced in this way for the benefit of the ratepayers. Rodwell, who appeared for a bondholder representing the mortgagees who did not wish to be paid,

Lord Justice JAMES said:—This litigation, in which the plaintiffs, not satisfied with the case being argued and decided in the court below, have occupied the time of this court for some hours, is only explicable by the fact that one of the plaintiffs appears to be a solicitor. A more idle contention appears to me never to have been raised than whether a person who has lent money to the Corporation of Great Yarmouth, on the security of the rates, is entitled to get his money back by having a receiver appointed of the rates and tolls of the borough of Great Yarmouth, when he might sell his bonds in the market for a price which would no doubt be within a few pounds of their nominal value. The plaintiffs, as representing the other bondholders, raise a great many nice points about this matter, which involves only a few pounds at the utmost, and institute an expensive litigation, the costs of which they may find that they will have to pay personally. In my opinion the litigation is as idle in point of legal contention as it is in substance. I cannot bring myself to doubt at all as to what the meaning of this Act of Parliament is, looking at the whole context of it, and the proper construction to be put upon its provisions with regard to these mortgages. The Commissioners of Great Yarmouth, who are only public functionaries, were authorised to raise money on the rates of the borough for certain public purposes, and were authorised to take the money, not as a loan to themselves, for they were not the debtors, or as money advanced on their own property, for they had no property, but as money lent on the security of tolls to be raised under the Act. The Act having provided that they should take the money in the shape of annuities on lives, or by means of the credit of the Act of Parliament, it contained an express provision how the principal was to be paid off. The provision is this. It was supposed it would take a long time to pay the money off, and the provision was that they were at all events to apply 100*l.* in each year, and if they had more than 100*l.*, they were to apply at least 100*l.* every year in payment of the creditors by ballot. There was a particular machinery provided for the ballot, and notice was to be given to the creditors whose names were drawn, and that was the sole provision made by the Act for the repayment of the principal. This provision is, to my mind, plainly inconsistent with the idea that a creditor whose name was not drawn at the ballot would be entitled immediately to go and demand the whole of his money, which is the contention here. The contention raised by the plaintiffs would amount to this, that although the Corporation were to begin to pay off the money in the way I have mentioned, any of the creditors had power to call on them to repay their principal at once, and in default to come to this court for a receiver. I am of opinion that there has been no default. The interest has been paid regularly. There is no default as to the principal, for the Corporation have continued to pay (at least there is no allegation to the contrary) 100*l.* a year in discharge of the principal. They have done all that the Act of Parliament intended them to do, and there being no default in payment of principal or interest, it appears to me that this court has no jurisdiction or power to interfere with the application of these moneys by the person whom the Act of Parliament has appointed to apply them, namely, the treasurer of the Commissioners of the borough of Great Yarmouth. I am of opinion that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor is perfectly correct, and that it ought to be affirmed with costs.

Lord Justice MELLISH:—I am of the same opinion. Appeal dismissed with costs.

CHAMBERLAYNE v. BROCKETT.

Will—Charitable legacy—Legacy to be applied to such charitable purpose as legatee should think fit—Death of legatee in lifetime of testatrix—Lapse—Bequest for building almshouses when site should be given—Perpetuity.

A testatrix bequeathed legacies to several persons, to be applied by each of them to such charitable purposes as each might deem most advisable:

Held, that such legacies lapsed by the death of the legatees in the lifetime of the testatrix.

Testatrix directed that a number of almshouses in different parishes should be erected at the expense of her residuary personal estate, when and as soon as land should at any time after her death be given for that purpose:

Held, void on the ground of remoteness.

SARAH CHAMBERLAYNE, by her will, dated the 13th Jan. 1838, bequeathed to several persons, some of whom died in the lifetime of the testatrix, the sum of 100*l.* each, to be applied by each of them to such charitable purposes as each might deem most advisable, and she directed that out of the residue of her personal estate, when and as soon as land should at any time thereafter be given for the purpose, as thereinafter mentioned, that an almshouse, or almshouses, consisting of ten rooms, with suitable appendages for ten poor persons, should be built in the parish of Southam, in the county of Warwick; also an almshouse, or almshouses, consisting of five rooms, with suitable appendages for five poor persons, in the parish of Long Itchington, in the county of Warwick; also an almshouse, or almshouses, consisting of five rooms, with suitable appendages for five poor persons, in the parish of Okeley, in the county of Essex; and also an almshouse, or almshouses, consisting of six rooms, with suitable appendages for six poor persons, in the hamlet of Bushend, in the parish of Hatfield Broad Oak, in the county of Essex, all to be built in a plain substantial manner, without any expensive ornament whatever.

The questions raised were first whether the legacies of 100*l.* each to such of the legatees as died in the lifetime of the testatrix lapsed; and, secondly, whether the direction for the erection of almshouses failed on the ground of remoteness.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C. and Speed for the plaintiffs.—The legacies to such of the persons as died in the lifetime of the testatrix must be treated as having lapsed. Although the gift for the erection of almshouses is not invalid under the Mortmain Act, yet it is void for remoteness, as no land has been given, and the court will not hold the fund for an indefinite time to see whether land will be given: (Sinnett v. Herbert, L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 232; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 7.) They also cited:

Philpotts v. St. George's Hospital, 6 H. L. Cas. 338;
Henshaw v. Atkinson, 3 Mad. 306;
Mather v. Scott, 2 Keene, 172;
Re Watmough's Trusts, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 272;
Edwards v. Hall, 11 Hare, 1.

Fry, Q.C. and Cadman Jones for the defendants in the same interest.

Hemming, for the Attorney-General.—The legacies to such of the persons as have died in the lifetime of the testatrix ought to be applied cy près to charitable purposes, on the ground of the general charitable intent; and as regards the bequest for the erection of almshouses, it is not void under the Mortmain Act; and the objection on the ground of remoteness does not apply to a charity. There ought to be an inquiry whether lands will be given for the purpose.

Lord ROMILLY held that the legacies to those persons who had died in the lifetime of the testatrix lapsed, and that the gift for building almshouses was void, not as being within the statute of Mortmain, but because the gift being to a charity to be ascertained, not immediately, nor within any given time, but when and as soon as land should at any time be given for the purpose of almshouses being erected in the parishes mentioned, the testatrix had transgressed the rule against perpetuities, for an indefinite time might elapse before the gift could take effect as a charitable gift.

SECOND COURT.

REG. v. THE REGISTRAR OF FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Trade union—Disruption of society—Mandamus to register—Trade Union Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31).

The Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners was a trade union which had deposited its rules under sect. 44 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, with the Registrar of Friendly Societies, before the passing of the Trades Union Act 1871. A disruption of the society took place in May 1871, and the society was divided into two sections, one of which consisted of the executive council and some of the members, whilst the other represented the larger number of members and a larger part of the funds; the former continued its place of business in London, the latter set up at Manchester. Applications were made by both sections to be registered in the name of the society under sect. 6 of The Trade Union Act 1871; but the registrar refused to register either of the sections, on the authority of a regulation made by the Secretary of State under sect. 13, forbidding the registration of a trade union under a name identical with that of any other existing trade union, whether registered or not registered. The London section obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to compel the registrar to register them, contending that this regulation was beyond the powers conferred by the Act, and invalid; and that having complied with the provisions with respect to registry, they were entitled to registration.

Held, that the dispute between the members of this society was one which ought to be decided by the Court of Chancery, and that this court would not enter into the merits upon a rule for mandamus.

Mac Donald had obtained, on the 29th April, a rule nisi calling upon the Registrar of Friendly Societies in England, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to him, commanding him to register the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, meeting at East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars, London, as a trade union, upon the application, dated the 15th April 1872, of T. T. Matthews and others, according to the provisions of the Trade Union Act 1871. Notice of the rule was directed to be given to J. Thompson and others, the representatives of the Manchester portion of what was the same society, a disruption having taken place amongst the members. The registrar had refused applications made by both sections to be registered in the name which had been used by the society when united, for reasons which he stated in writing, as hereinafter appears.

By The Trade Union Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31) s. 6:

Any seven or more members of a trade union may, by subscribing their names to the rules of the union, and otherwise complying with the provisions of this Act with respect to registry, register such trade union under this Act, provided that if any one of the purposes of such trade union be unlawful, such registration shall be void.

By sect. 13:

With respect to the registry, under this Act, of a trade union, and of the rules thereof, the following provisions shall have effect.

1. An application to register the trade union, and printed copies of the rules, together with a list of the titles and names of the officers, shall be sent to the Registrar under this Act.

2. The Registrar, upon being satisfied that the trade union has complied with the regulations respecting registry in force under this Act, shall register such trade union and such rules.

3. No trade union shall be registered under a name identical with that by which any other existing trade union has been registered, or so nearly resembling such name as to be likely to deceive the members or the public.

4. Where a trade union applying to be registered has been in operation more than a year before the date of such application, there shall be delivered to the registrar before the registry thereof a general statement of the receipts, funds, effects, and expenditure of such trade union in the same form, and showing the same particulars as if it were the annual general statement required as hereinafter mentioned to be transmitted annually to the registrar.

5 The registrar upon registering such trade union shall issue a certificate of registry, which certificate, unless proved to have been withdrawn or cancelled, shall be conclusive evidence that the regulations of this Act with respect to registry have been complied with.

6. One of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State may from time to time make regulations respecting registry under this Act, and respecting the seal (if any) to be used for the purpose of such registry, and the forms to be used for such registry, and the inspection of documents kept by the registrar under this Act, and respecting the fees, if any, to be paid on registry, not exceeding the fees specified in the second schedule to this Act, and generally for carrying this Act into effect.

By sect. 17,

The registrars of the friendly societies in England, Scotland, and Ireland shall be the registrars under this Act.

Under clause 6 of sect. 13, regulations were made as follows:

Trade Union Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31).

In pursuance of the powers vested in me by the above-mentioned Act, I, the Right Hon. Henry Austin Bruce, one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of State, make the following regulations:

1. The registrar shall not register a trade union under a name identical with that of any other existing trade union known to him, whether registered or not registered, or so nearly resembling such name as to be likely to deceive the members or the public.

2. Upon an application for the registration of a trade union which is already in operation, the registrar, if he has reason to believe that the applicants have not been duly authorised by such trade union to make the same, may, for the purpose of ascertaining the fact require from the applicants such evidence as may seem to be necessary.

3. Application for registry shall be made in the form subjoined to these regulations.

4. All documents transmitted to the registrar relating to any registered trade union shall be open to inspection of any person on payment of 1*s.*

5. The certificate of registry shall be delivered to the applicant on payment of 1*l.*

(Signed) H. A. BRUCE.

Whitehall, 8th Dec. 1871.

The following was the registrar's refusal to register the applications made in this case:

Trade Union Act 1871.

In the matter of the applications to register the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners as a trade union.

An application is before me dated 23rd Dec. 1871, requiring me to register the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners as meeting at East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street, London. This application (hereinafter called "the London application") is signed by H. P. Colliver and others, who state they are authorised to make it by a resolution passed by the executive council of the above-named society.

Another application is before me dated 30th Dec. 1871, requiring me to register the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners as meeting at 53, Grosvenor-street, Chorlton-on-Medlock, Manchester. This application (hereinafter called "the Manchester application") is signed by John Thompson and six others, who state that they are authorised to make it by a vote of the whole of the members of the society, taken at meetings summoned for the purpose in the month of Sept. 1871, when 3821 votes were recorded in favour of registering the society, 125 members only voting against the proposal to register.

As both applications are to register a trade union under the same name, if one had been complied with the other must have been refused: (34 & 35 Vict. c. 13, s. 13, sub.-sect. 3.)

It appeared from the balance sheets accompanying the respective applications, that both related to one and the same society, whose rules, as the rules of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, had been deposited with me under sect. 44 of the Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), previous to the passing of the Trade Union Act 1871.

I therefore served notice on both applicants that on the 15th Jan. 1872, I should be prepared to hear evidence for or against their respective applications.

Though I am authorised, by regulation 2 of the Secretary of State's Regulation of 8th Dec. 1871, to require from the applicants such evidence as may seem to me necessary, no power is given me by the Trade Union Act 1871 to administer an oath, or to compel the production of any evidence; but I was willing and desirous to hear anything that either of the applicants for registration might be disposed voluntarily to lay before me, with the view of ascertaining whether I could satisfy myself as to the right of either party to obtain registration to the exclusion of the other, without requiring that right to be established by litigation; or of ascertaining whether by mutual consent their differences could be arranged, or whether the applicants could be registered under different names.

The London applicants were represented before me by Mr. MacDonald, barrister, instructed by Mr. Howard; the Manchester applicants by Mr. Shaen of the firm of Shaen, Roscoe, and Massey.

Both parties stated that they could not consent to take my decision, if adverse, as binding, and would reserve their rights to compel me, by mandamus or otherwise, to register upon their application, if I should refuse to do so.

Mr. Macdonald delivered to me a protest in writing in the following terms:

"Trade Union Act 1871.

"The Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners. Take notice, that on behalf of this trade union, I protest against the proceedings to hear evidence for and against its application to be registered under the Trade Union Act 1871, and that the said hearing is attended by the said union, subject to all the rights reserved by this protest. And further take notice that on behalf of the said union, I hereby intimate that it is advised the regulations of Mr. Secretary Bruce, dated the 8th Dec. 1871, are illegal, and in contravention of the said Act, and that it reserves to itself the right and power, by mandamus or otherwise, to compel its registration in terms of the said Act.

"And further take notice that this protest will be used in any legal steps the said union may be advised to take.

"Dated this 15th Jan. 1872.

"(Signed) A. HOWARD,

"37, Queen-street, Cheapside, Solicitor for the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners.

"To A. K. Stephenson, Esq., Registrar of Friendly Societies."

Subject to this statement and protest, each party tendered evidence which satisfied me that differences had occurred in the society, as it existed under the rules deposited with me, previous to the passing of the Trade Union Act, which differences had led, on the 18th May, 1871, to a division of the society into two sections, which were represented by the applicants before me. It also appeared that the funds of the society in the possession of its various branches, as returned by the applicants in their respective balance sheets, amounted on the 31st Dec. 1870, to £17,568 19*s.* 4*d.* It also appeared that the books of the society, whose rules were, as above stated, deposited with me as registrar of friendly societies, were, and still are, in possession of the London applicants; but it was contended by the Manchester applicants that such possession was illegal.

It appeared, therefore, that the questions at issue were mixed questions of fact and law, depending on the application of the legal construction of the rules as deposited, to disputed facts; and that such questions involve very large interests. I am of opinion, that under the Trades Union Act 1871, the duties of the registrar are ministerial, not judicial; that no power is either expressly or impliedly given to him by the Act to call for evidence either oral or documentary, or to administer an oath; and that the regulations made by the Secretary of State cannot confer on the registrar any power which the Act does not give him.

Though the applicants have voluntarily given me information, they have declined to give me any authority beyond what the Act gives to the registrar.

I express no opinion on the merits of the case of either party; but decline to register the trade union under either application, unless directed by mandamus so to do, or until the decision of a competent court determining the legal status of the applicants to my satisfaction has been obtained by one or other of them.

To facilitate the determination of the question, I hereby refuse to register the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, upon the application of John Thompson and others, dated 30th Dec. 1871.

(Signed) A. K. STEPHENSON,
Registrar.

London, 19th Jan. 1872.

From the time of this refusal, the Manchester section took no further steps for the purpose of obtaining registration; but on the 15th April 1872, a further application for the registration of the society was made on behalf of T. T. Matthews and others, representatives of the London section. This application, concerning which the rule nisi was obtained, produced the following:

Notice of Refusal to Register.

Friendly Societies' Registration Office
28, Abingdon-street, S.W., London,
16th April, 1872.

Trades Union Act, 1871.

The accompanying documents are returned unregistered, for the following reasons:

They are a renewal of the application to register made to me on the 23rd Dec. 1871, which I refused, in writing, on the 19th Jan. 1872, until the decision of a competent court, determining the legal status of the applicants to my satisfaction, had been obtained, either by them or by the other applicants for registering the same trade union.

No such decision having yet been obtained, I hereby again refuse to register the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, on this application;

(Signed) A. K. STEPHENSON,
Registrar.

A. Howard, Esq., Solicitor.

The rule was enlarged last term.

The Registrar of Friendly Societies was not represented by counsel.

H. James, Q.C. and Besley now showed cause on behalf of the Manchester applicants.—This is an attempt by the London section to snatch the whole of the funds which belonged to the society when united. The proper court for the decision of this dispute between the two branches is a court of equity. The registrar, at all events, was right in refusing to register either branch whilst the other claimed to be called by the same name, and this court will not in its discretion consider the various claims of a dissolved partnership upon a rule for mandamus under the Trade Union Acts. If it were necessary to enter here into the merits of the dispute, and to consider how far either party was justified by the rules, it would first appear and must be admitted by the other side, that the Manchester section represents the larger part of the branches and the funds, as well as the majority of the members; how far that is to balance the fact that the London section consists of those members who were originally elected by the whole society to be the executive council is a matter solely and entirely for a court of equity. All that the Manchester section now desires is to prevent the registration of the London section in the name claimed by both.

Mac Donald supported the rule.—The only effect of sects. 2 and 3 of the Trade Union Act 1871, are to protect members of a trade union from an indictment for conspiracy, and to prevent the contracts which they enter into from being void. The Act does not bring such a society as this within the cognisance of the Court of Chancery. It does not give a trade union a legal existence, at all events before registration. It has been held that the objects of this very society were partly in restraint of trade, and therefore illegal, viz., in Farrer v. Close (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 602, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 802), where, although the court was equally divided, the principle of the previous case of Hornby v. Close (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 563; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 153) was affirmed. As no illegal transaction can be brought before a court of equity, the London section cannot establish the rights which the members claim in pursuance of their rules by any other mode than this application. [BLACKBURN, J.—There is nothing to deprive the Court of Chancery of jurisdiction in a dispute of this kind. Even if a judge in equity refused to interfere, upon the authority of those two cases, under the old law, the Act of 1871 is sufficient to bring trades unions within the jurisdiction now.] At all events the London branch has a right, under the rules of the union, and under sect. 6 of the Act, to be registered. The only ground upon which the registrar has refused is that he is prevented by the regulations of the Secretary of State, dated the 8th Dec. 1871. These regulations are far beyond the provisions of the Act, and cannot be binding upon the registrar. [LUSH, J.—The Secretary of State has power to make regulations for the purpose of carrying the Act into effect; and surely these rules are within the meaning of the words of sect. 13, sub-sect. 6.]

BLACKBURN, J.—I have no doubt that this rule should be discharged. It is a great mistake to imagine that societies of this kind are out of the protection and jurisdiction of the courts of equity. If any objection could formerly be raised to an application in Chancery for the settlement of such a dispute as this, the 3rd section of the Trade Union Act 1871, at all events, has now put an end to it. By that section, "the purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be unlawful so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust." What the registrar has to do under this Act is to register a trade union, of which seven members have complied with the provisions of the Act with respect to registry. The object of this application to be registered is no doubt to obtain for the applicants the benefits conferred by the 8th section, which vests all the property of such societies in trustees. The effect of registering either of these sections in the name claimed by both, would be to give that section the power to nominate trustees, to whose management the whole of the large sum of money belonging to the society would immediately be subject. The registrar has considered that he had no power to register either of these sections whilst the other claimed the same name, and that so long as both these branches existed, neither of the two sets of applicants could be said to have complied with the provisions of the Acts. At all events neither set has complied with the second of the regulations issued by the Secretary of State. I cannot see why those regulations are not within the authority given to him by the last clause of the 13th section; but even if not, I should say the registrar, immediately that he found out that the parties who were applying to him were really claiming a large sum of money against each other, was bound to say, "I will not alter the position of these disputants." It is quite clear that we have no power to compel the registrar to do otherwise; but I see no reason why the Court of Chancery should not decide what is right to be done. That is the proper court to which application should first be made. All that we decide now is that the registrar was right in refusing to alter the positions of the parties.

MELLOR, J.—It would not be right to compel the registrar to prefer one branch of this society to the other. A court of equity would have power to deal with this dispute, and when the respective rights of the two sections are settled, there will be no objection to registration. The 2nd and 3rd sections of the Trade Union Act 1871 have removed all the difficulties which previously existed in obtaining such a settlement.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged.

MILDMAY (app.) v. THE PARISH OF WIMBLEDON (respa.).

Poor-rate—National Rifle Association—Rifle butts—Store shed—Wimbledon and Putney Commons Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. ccix.).

The respondents made two poor rates, one on the 11th Aug. 1871, the other on 27th March 1872, in both of which the National Rifle Association, the appel- lants, were assessed for their storehouse, butts, &c., on Wimbledon Common, used by them only during their summer shooting.

The lord of the manor had agreed to let, and the appellants to take, a part of the common, to be occupied by the latter from the 10th July to the 12th Aug. 1871, with liberty to use and erect butts and temporary buildings, to occupy and drain the part let, and to have the free and sole use of the ground, so far as the lord of the manor could confer it, for the purpose of their meeting. The association, after their meeting, were to fill in all holes and remove all erections made by them.

By 34 & 35 Vict. c. cciv., which was passed on the 16th Aug. 1871, the association are authorised exclusively to occupy and use this part of the common as a rifle ground and place for an encampment, for all purposes of the annual meeting of the association during seventy-seven consecutive days between the 1st May and 31st Aug. every year, and for purposes of rifle shooting and a review during fourteen of those days. They may put up a paling or fence during this period round their ground. They are to pay to the conservators of the common 100l. a year. Certain rifle corps are also authorised to shoot upon the ground at certain times. But nothing in the Act shall give to the association or any corps any right in or easement over any part of the common; and every such body shall be deemed to be by virtue of this Act merely in the enjoyment of a statutory privilege, subject, and without prejudice, to all rights or easements enjoyed by other persons.

During the shooting period the association receive payment for the admission of persons to the ground enclosed by the palings, and from the volunteers and others who encamp there.

The butts remain all the year round, and are fenced in. There is a brick store shed, in which materials are generally stored; but during the shooting period it is used as a workshop for the repair of targets, &c.

Held, that the association were liable upon these two rates to assessment for the store shed only, and not for the butts or ground.

On the the 11th Aug. 1871 a poor rate was made for the parish of Wimbledon, in which the appellant was rated, as follows:-

No. of Assessment.	Names of Occupiers.	Name of Owner.	Description of property rated.	Name or situation of property.	Gross estimated rental. £ s. d.	Rateable value. £ s. d.	Rate at 1s. 6d. in the pound.
279	National Rifle Association.	The same	Storehouse, Butts, &c.	Wimbledon Common.	1000 0 0	900 0 0	67 10 0

Upon the 27th March last a further rate was made precisely in a similar form, except that the number of the assessment was 277.

It is admitted that notice of appeal against each of the said rates has been duly given, and that all conditions to the right of appeal have been fulfilled. The following case, in pursuance of the order of Mellor, J., made on the 10th April 1872, has been stated under the provisions of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11. It was agreed that this case should be deemed, if necessary, to have been separately stated in each of the said appeals.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, first, as to the liability of the appellant (subject to the statement hereinafter contained) to be rated to either of the poor rates hereinbefore-mentioned at all; and next, if so, as to the principle on which he should be rated, and the extent of his liability.

The appellant is the secretary of the National Rifle Association. This association was formed in the year 1860, for the purpose of giving permanence to volunteer corps, and to encourage rifle shooting throughout the Queen's dominions. The association is not incorporated. It does not possess a charter, and is entirely a voluntary association. H.R.H. The Prince of Wales is the patron, and H.R.H. The Duke of Cambridge acts as president. The affairs of the association are managed by a council or committee of noblemen and gentlemen, for whom the appellant acts as permanent secretary. The privileges of members, and the objects and rules of the association, are stated and are contained in a certain book, which may be taken as part of the case. The funds out of which the expenses are defrayed are derived from donations, subscriptions of life members, the entrance fees charged for admission to the part of Wimbledon-common temporarily inclosed by the association for the purpose of their annual meetings, and the entrance fees charged to competitors at such meetings. Up to the year 1871 there had been 439 life members, each of whom had paid 10*l.* 10*s.*, and thirty-two life members, each of whom had paid 5*l.* 5*s.* In the year 1871 there were 855 annual members, each of whom had paid not less than 1*l.* 17*s.*, and 1701 members, being volunteers, each of whom had paid not less than 10*s.* The annual income from members, exclusive of life members, for the twelve years ending 1871, has been on the average 1832*l.*

Wimbledon-common is a large tract of uninclosed land, partly in the parish of Wimbledon, partly in the parish of Wandsworth, and partly in the parish of Putney, and all lying within the manor of Wimbledon. The soil of the said common was, at the time when the said rate was granted, vested in Lord Spencer, as lord of the manor of Wimbledon, subject to the rights of the freehold and copyhold tenants of the said manor over the same.

Prior to the year 1871 the council of the association, by the permission of Lord Spencer, formed out of the soil of the common numerous butts for the purpose of rifle shooting at their annual meeting. The permission was given in writing, but not under seal, and was in the form set out in the case, or in a somewhat similar form. These butts were made of earth and turves dug from the common and heaped together in masses of certain dimensions. The general position of such butts, which are fenced in, was shown on a plan which accompanies this case. When the shooting was about to take place the targets were placed in front of these butts. When not in use the targets were removed, but the butts remained standing on the common, fenced in as aforesaid. In the year 1870, or in the early part of 1871, two of the butts were removed by persons acting under the directions of the council, and in lieu thereof one butt was erected in the rear, which butt was described on the said plan as "Long Range Butt," at a cost of 770*l.* or thereabouts. A store shed has been formed at the back of this butt, which store shed is formed of brick, with a corrugated iron roof. This store shed is 208 feet in length and twenty-six feet in width, and the cost of erection was about 400*l.* It is used and intended to be used for storage of materials only, except during the annual meeting, when it is intended to be used as a workshop for repairs to targets, &c. The store shed was not used for any purpose until after the close of the last annual meeting, the same not having been completed fit for use.

In the month of May 1871, under the direction of the council, certain persons employed by them began to erect on the common temporary refreshment buildings and sheds, required for the purpose of the meeting to be held in the month of July. About a fortnight previous to the meeting a portion of Wimbledon common, partly situate in the parish of Wimbledon and partly in an adjoining parish, was inclosed, by persons acting under the direction of the council, with a close wooden hoarding. The meeting commenced on the 10th July, and terminated with the review held by H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge on the 22nd July. During the meeting, except the intervening Sunday, an entrance fee of 1*s.* was charged for admission within the inclosure to all pedestrians not having passes, a fee of 2*s.* 6*d.* was charged for horses, and a fee varying from 5*s.* to 20*s.* for carriages. On the review day an additional fee was charged for entrance to a temporary stand erected within the inclosure. A public footpath and bridle path run across the inclosure. Within the hoarding the rifle shooting took place, and a camp of military tents was formed, in which certain members of the volunteer force, some of the competitors for the prizes, and a company o the Royal engineers and men from other regiments of the Queen's army, who assisted in the proceedings, lived during the meeting. Each volunteer using a tent paid 1*s.* 2*d.* per day for the same, except the officers of volunteer regiments, each o whom paid 25*s.* for the use of a tent during the meeting. The tents were supplied from Government stores, and the payments made for the use of them by volunteers are estimated to cover only the expense incurred by the council in procuring and erecting the tents, and in supplying water and straw for use during the meeting. The hoarding was removed within a few days after the meeting, and all the temporary buildings, including the refreshment buildings, were removed by the 25th Aug., or thereabouts. The materials of the refreshment buildings and other temporary buildings were removed to the said storehouse for the purpose of being used at subsequent meetings. All the acts aforesaid were done by the council under the permission of Lord Spencer, and no payment in the nature of rent was made by them to Lord Spencer for such permission.

On the 16th Aug. 1871 the Royal assent was given to an Act of Parliament entitled "The Wimbledon and Putney Commons Act 1871," whereby the right and interest of Lord Spencer in Wimbledon Common aforesaid were vested in certain persons named in the said Act, and therein called Conservators, but subject to certain rights and privileges reserved to the said National Rifle Association, for the purpose of enabling the said association to hold meetings for rifle shooting on Wimbledon Common. A copy of this Act was to be taken as part of this case.

Up to the time of the making of the rate on the 27th March, the Common has remained in its ordinary condition of an open common, subject to the provisions of the said Act. The conservators have not interfered with the use of the storehouse, but the said materials and things still remained thereon at the time of the making of the last-mentioned rate.

It is agreed that no objection of form is to be taken on either side, and for the purposes of this case it is admitted that the appellant is the proper person to be rated, assuming that either he, as such representative of the council of the said association, or the said council, or the members of the said association, or some or one of them, or the Association as a body, is or are liable to be rated.

The questions for the opinion of the court are as follows:—First, is the appellant liable to be rated at all to the poor rates hereinbefore mentioned, or to either of them? secondly, if liable to be rated at all, in respect of what property, and upon what principle?

If the court should be of opinion that he is not liable to be rated at all, then the rate book is to be amended by striking out the assessment of the appellant.

If the court should be of opinion that the appellant is liable to be rated, it is agreed that the amount of the rateable value shall be settled by an arbitrator.

And it is further agreed that judgments in conformity with the decision of the court, and for such costs as the court may adjudge, may be entered in both of the said appeals on motion by either party at the sessions next after such decision.

The following is the agreement alluded to in the case, and stated to be set out in the schedule;

Memorandum of an agreement made this 22nd May 1871, between the Right Honourable John Poynts Earl Spencer, K.G., of the one part, and the Right Honourable Francis Douglas Charteris, commonly called Lord Elcho, and John Sidney North, M.P., of 16, Arlington street, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, two of the members of the council of the National Rifle Association, of the other part. The said Earl Spencer, as lord of the manor of Wimbledon, in the county of Surrey, and so far as he in respect of such seigniory or lordship can or lawfully may, hereby agrees to let, and the said Lord Elcho and John Sidney North, for and on behalf of the National Rifle Association, hereby agree to take all such portion of Wimbledon Common within the said manor as was taken and occupied for the purposes of the said association last year, on the terms and conditions, and for the purpose hereinafter mentioned, and for no other purpose.

1. The part of the common agreed to be let is to be occupied by the National Rifle Association from the 10th July to the 12th August next, and no longer, and is to be used as the shooting ground of the said association during its forthcoming meeting, in the month of July next, and at no other time.

2. The association are to be at liberty to enter on the ground on the 22nd May 1871, for the purpose of preparing it for the use of the members during the meeting in July next. The association are also to be at liberty to use the butts now standing on the ground, and to erect new butts and such temporary buildings as the purposes of their said meeting may require; and they are to remove all such erections at the expiration of the tenancy, if thereunto required, as stipulated in the 9th condition.

3. The association are also to be at liberty, during the period they are hereby empowered to occupy the portion of the common agreed to be let, to do all things needful for draining the same in a proper manner, and also to use a wooden shed at the back of the Mill stables as or for a storehouse during the meeting, and for no other purpose, and are to remove such wooden shed after the expiration of their meeting if required, according to the terms of the 9th condition; and the drainage works and sheds so authorized to be done and used respectively shall be subject in all respects to the supervision of the lord of the manor, his agents and servants, who shall be at liberty to give any directions respecting the same that to him or them may seem expedient; and the association shall be bound to carry out such directions, and shall not depart therefrom.

4. The association during their occupation under this agreement are, so far as the lord of the manor can confer the power, to have the free and sole use of the ground for the purpose of their meeting, with full power to keep off and remove any intruders, and to allow the erection of tents or booths for the sale of refreshments or otherwise, for the use of the members of the association, their friends, and servants.

5. All claims (if any) for compensation on account of the temporary interruption caused to any right of pasturing on the commons are to be settled and paid by the association to the claimants; and the lord of the manor is to be in no way responsible for the settlement or payment of such claims, or liable on account of the temporary interruption of the right (if any).

6. As regards any paths or ways which may exist across the portion of the common comprised in this agreement, the association undertake to accommodate the public satisfactorily for any interruption of their use of such paths or ways during the existence of this agreement; and as between himself and the association, the lord of the manor is not to be held responsible for the interruption in the use of such paths or ways.

7. The association undertake to indemnify the lord of the manor against all claims, damages, costs, and expenses which he may incur or be put unto in consequence of their occupation of the portion of the common comprised in this agreement.

8. The association undertake that all proper precautions shall be taken by means of signals and otherwise to prevent any accidents arising from the firing or otherwise, and that the proceedings shall be conducted peaceably, and with as little annoyance as possible to the residents in the neighbourhood and the public generally.

9. At the expiration of this agreement the association undertakes peaceably to yield up the portion of the common hereby agreed to be let, and within three weeks from the termination of their meeting to fill in all holes and trenches, so as to render the ground safe for pedestrians and equestrians; and also, if thereunto required by the lord of the manor, to remove all erections, and restore as nearly as may be the face of the common to its original state and condition.

10. In case of breach or default in performance of any one or more of the foregoing conditions on the part of the association, the lord of the manor is to be at full liberty, by notice in writing addressed to the secretary of the association at the offices of the association, to determine this agreement, and thereupon the same shall be at an end, and the association shall immediately yield up possession in the same manner as is provided in the ninth of these conditions, and comply with the other requirements of that condition.

The said Lord Elcho and John Sidney North hereby for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, undertake and agree with the said Earl Spencer that they will be jointly and separately personally responsible for the performance of this agreement, as witness the hands of the parties.

Sects. 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 51, 56, and 67 of the Wimbledon and Putney Commons Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. cciv.), bear on the case.

Denman, Q.C. (with him F. M. White) for the appellant.—These are separate questions as to the rateability under the agreement and under the Act of Parliament, although the same authorities should be discussed in determining them. In Reg. v. Morrish (32 L. J. 245, M. C.), the appellant was rated for his occupation of a certain space in the Exhibition building of 1862, under an agreement with the royal commissioners, for the sale of refreshments. He was to fit up this space with counters, and lay on gas and water; he was to be subject to the bye-laws and regulations made by the commissioners for the orderly conduct of the Exhibition and the persons employed therein; all fittings and erections were to become the property of the commissioners upon their erection. The appellant carried out this agreement, and continued to sell refreshments through the whole time the Exhibition was open. The keys of the doors opening from the refreshment rooms into the Exhibition buildings were always kept by the police employed by the commissioners, and the police usually locked the appellant and his servants out every evening, and admitted them again in the morning, but during part of the time the appellant had an entrance from the outside. It was held that he was not liable to be rated to the relief of the poor, inasmuch as he had no exclusive occupation of the space so allotted to him. In Watkins v. The Overseers of Milton-next-Gravesend (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 350), it was held that the document under which the appellant was licensed to keep his coal bulk moored in the Thames did not constitute a demise to him, and therefore did not render him liable to be rated for his occupation of the soil of the river. The conservators thereby only granted to the appellant a licence to use the moorings, and the court therefore held that he was not the occupier. Grant v. The Local Board of Oxford (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 9), was a similar assessment of the University Boat Club with respect to certain posts in the river and a barge which was moored to them; the court considered there was no proof of occupation as of right, and therefore the club was not liable to be rated. The case of Reg. v. St. Mary Abbot's, Kensington (12 A. & E. 824) bears some analogy to this, in that a cemetery company was held liable to be rated for the whole of their cemetery, although they had in fact sold in perpetuity the exclusive right of burial in the vaults, catacombs, &c., made by them; had ceased to exercise any act of ownership over them after the sale; and had delivered the keys to the purchasers. Here the lord of the manor, under the agreement, and the conservators under the statute, have given to the association far less rights of occupation than those which the purchasers of the vaults enjoyed. In Reg. v. St. Martin-in-the-Fields (3 Q. B., 204), Miss Burdett Coutt's box at Drury Lane Theatre was held to be rateable; but that decision depended entirely upon the special words of a local Act, and has no application to this case.

Thesiger for respondents.—The principles to be derived from the authorities, applicable to this particular assessment are,—first, the overseers must rate the persons in occupation of the land, and it matters not how short may be the actual use those persons make of it; secondly, the overseers must rate the occupiers upon the whole annual value, subject to the deductions mentioned in the first section of the Parochial Assessment Act 1836, (6 & 7 Will 4, c. 96); thirdly, the overseers must consider in the value the absence of the occupiers. As to the first rate, the association must be liable under the agreement, which is an absolute demise by Earl Spencer for a certain period of occupation, extending over the 11th Aug. 1871, the date of this rate. The term of the agreement was from the 10th July to the 12th Aug., and it makes no difference that the hoardings were down, and the place given up before the date of the rate. [LUSH, J.—If this were a demise, it was for the express purpose of the shooting, which terminated, as is found, on the 22nd July. The demise therefore terminated when its object was completed.] The agreement demises the exclusive occupation to the 12th Aug. With regard to the second rate, I cannot contend that the association made any use of the butts at the exact time when the rate was made, but the words of the Act are such as to make the Association's interest in the land a rateable occupation, and that occupation as a matter of fact is secured throughout the year by the fences mentioned in the case. [HANNEN, J.—Mere fences do not reserve occupation exclusively.] The words of the Act are very strong, and the store shed is clearly rateable. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Does not the 67th section shut out your contention? We think the effect of that section is to preclude the occupation of the soil by the association. The store shed is another matter.]

Denman in reply.—The store shed at all events was not used for any purpose until after the close of the last annual meeting, and could not, therefore, be subject to the first rate. [Theeiger.—Not so; your contention is that the meeting closed on the 22nd July; it might, therefore, well have been used before 11th August.] The store shed is a mere appendage to the butts.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This occupation of the area is not sufficient, for by sect. 67 the association is not to have any right in, or easement over any part of the common, but is to be deemed simply to be in the enjoyment of a statutory privilege of the nature described in the Act. Inasmuch, however, as the store shed is a building erected and left upon the ground, and occupied by the association, the appellant must be considered as liable to be rated in respect of so much.

LUSH and HANNEN, JJ. concurred.

BARRETT (app.) v. MARKHAM (resp.).

Friendly society — Treasurer making default — Absence of fraud—Summary remedy—18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s. 24.

Summary proceedings under sect. 24 of the Friendly Societies Act 1854, can be taken against an officer of a friendly society for withholding the funds thereof only in cases when such officer has been guilty of fraud in so doing.

ON appeal from the decision of a metropolitan police magistrate dismissing a summons preferred under sect. 24 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, against the treasurer of a friendly society for withholding its funds, the following case was stated:

The appellant was one of the trustees of a friendly society called "The Prince of Wales Lodge, Order of Ancient Shepherds, Ashton Unity, South London District," and the respondent was, until the 28th Oct. last, the treasurer of that society.

The parties appeared before one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis sitting at the Lambeth Police Court, upon a complaint preferred by the appellant, as such trustee under the Act to Consolidate and Amend the Law Relating to Friendly Societies 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63) s. 24, in which the respondent was charged, "For that he being an officer of a friendly society, did, having in his possession certain moneys belonging to the said society to the amount of 31*l.* 2*s.* 11½*d.*, unlawfully withhold and misapply the same."

The following facts were proved: That the respondent was duly appointed treasurer of the said society, but had not been required to give the security directed by sect. 21 of the Act. That the moneys which he was charged with withholding and misapplying had been received by him in his character of treasurer for the use of the society; that it was his duty to render quarterly an account of all moneys received and paid by him on account of the society, and to pay over to the trustees on demand the balance due from him on such accounts: that the last account rendered by him was dated the 5th Aug. last, and it appeared therefrom that he was indebted to the society in the sum of 26*l.* 10*s.* 2½*d.* to that date, and from subsequent entries in the treasurer's book further sums making a total sum due by him to the society of 31*l.* 2*s.* 11½*d.*, the amount charged in the complaint.

This sum he was unable to pay, and as he could not give such security for the payment as was satisfactory to the trustees, these proceedings were taken.

There was no charge of fraud or misrepresentation against the respondent in respect of these moneys.

The magistrate held that the inability and consequent refusal of the respondent to pay the balance was not a withholding or misapplying under sect. 24, and for the following reasons.

That although the words in sect. 24 are sufficiently general to include the treasurer, yet having regard to the provisions of sects. 21, 22, and 23, it was not the intention of the statute that a treasurer should be dealt with under sect. 24, unless some fraudulent circumstances accompanied the act with which he is charged, and fraud is not imputed to the respondent.

The sects. 21, 22, and 23, appeared to him to contain all that was thought necessary for the regulation of office of treasurer, his duties and liabilities, and sect. 22 directs the manner in which any balance found due from him to the society shall be recovered, as also the proceeding to be taken in the case of a treasurer who detains property belonging to the society, which in the case of any other person, is provided by sect. 24.

That a treasurer is not bound to account for any specific sum received by him; he may place it in his banker's hands or elsewhere, and may use such particular money as his own without incurring any liability beyond indebtedness, but he is required to render an account of all moneys received and payments made by him, and the balance, if any, due by him on such account becomes a debt due by him to the society.

That this relation of debtor and creditor is shown by sects. 21, 22, and 23, and that upon the facts proved, a treasurer cannot be said to have withheld or misapplied moneys within the meaning of sect. 24; that the words "withhold" and "misapply" in sect. 24, must apply to some specific moneys which the party holding has no right to use except for some particular purpose, and who misapplies by employing it, though without fraud, in his own business, and withholds it when he refuses to pay, though from inability, to those authorised to receive it.

That where a debt has been created, the refusal —not a refusal to account, for the account has been justly rendered—but to pay, and this from inability, is not a "withholding" within this section, nor the act whereby the inability arises a "misapplying."

That a contrary construction would encourage friendly societies to neglect those precautions which the Act has provided and required to protect their members against defalcations of their treasurers, while at the same time it would render a treasurer liable to be imprisoned for refusing to pay money which he honestly believed not to be due by him to the society.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the decision of the magistrate was right or wrong.

Oppenheim for the appellant.—The magistrate ought to have convicted. The proceedings were taken under sect. 24 of the Friendly Societies Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63). The appellant was an officer of the society. The question raised is whether an officer of a friendly society who, without fraud, "withholds or misapplies" the funds of the society entrusted to him, can be proceeded against under the 24th section. In Sinden v. Bankes (30 L. J. 102, Q. B.), Hill, J., an analogous question having arisen, said: "I think, also, that it was intended to give cumulative remedies against treasurers, and not to prevent the society from availing itself of the common law remedy." The fact, then, that the society might have proceeded under the 22nd section, does not preclude them from proceeding under the 24th. The word "withhold" does not necessarily imply fraud. A man withholds money when he is simply unable to pay it, because he has not got it. Ex parte O'Donnell (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 274), does not apply to this case. There, it was the assignee of the officer of the society who had the money, and it was not shown that he had the specific moneys of the society in his hands, and it was for that reason that the Court of Queen's Bench decided that he could not be proceeded against under the 24th section.

J. Thompson for the respondent, was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—The statement in the case that the respondent was not guilty of any fraud in my judgment puts an end to the whole matter. The 23rd section of The Friendly Societies Act gives a civil remedy, and the 24th section, which is a penal one, was intended to meet the case of a default of a criminal character, where the defaulter had been guilty of fraud or imposition. It does not refer to defalcations of so criminal a character that an indictment would lie in respect of them, but to such as are of a criminal nature. That is plain from beginning to end of the section. The words are "withhold or misapply" the funds or "wilfully apply them" to purposes other than those expressed in the rules of the society. These words imply imposition. Penal consequences do not apply in this country in cases where there is no criminal intent. The concluding part of the section shows that it was intended to create an offence, and that, though it is not meant to apply to a case where the society might proceed by indictment, the acts it refers to must be of the same character as a criminal offence.

KEATING, J., concurred.

PEGGE v. GUARDIANS OF THE LAMPETER UNION.

Criminal lunatic — Maintenance by guardians — Order of justices—3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, ss. 1 and 2.

The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, ss. 1 and 2, enacts that if any person imprisoned in any prison shall appear to be insane, it shall be lawful for one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State to direct such person to be removed to a county lunatic asylum or other proper receptacle for insane persons until such person has become of sound mind, and has been certified to be so by two physicians or surgeons.

Sect. 2 enacts that it shall be lawful for two justices of the peace to inquire into the place of last legal settlement of such insane person, and if it does not appear that he or she is possessed of any property which can be applied to his or her maintenance, they may direct the board of guardians to pay all reasonable charges for the weekly maintenance of such lunatic.

The defendants had paid from the year 1855, a weekly sum of 16*s. to the plaintiff for the maintenance of a criminal lunatic.*

On 19*th Oct.* 1869, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff to say that they in future should pay no more than 11*s.* 1*d. a week for the care of the lunatic. The plaintiff continued to keep the lunatic, and on the defendants still refusing to pay more than* 11*s.* 1*d. per week, brought his action to recover the difference. There was no evidence to prove that the plaintiff had ever procured a justices' order to be made on the guardians under the 2nd section of 3 & 4 Vict. cap. 54.*

Held that it was competent for the guardians to agree to pay for the maintenance of the lunatic without an order of justices; that as the plaintiff could not get rid of the lunatic without an order of the Secretary of State, the defendants could not determine the contract by a notice refusing to pay; also that the court would infer from the fact of the guardians having paid 16*s. a week for fifteen years, that they had agreed to pay* 16*s. a week as long as the lunatic remained in the asylum.*

THE declaration stated that the plaintiff sued the defendants for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiff for care, board, lodging, attendance, and maintenance bestowed and supplied by the plaintiff to Mary Hughes, a criminal lunatic, at the request of the defendants, concluding with the ordinary money counts

The defendants pleaded: First, never indebted; thirdly, payment into court of 21*l.* 12*s.*

Issue joined.

The action was brought by the keeper of the Briton Ferry private lunatic asyium for the maintenance of one Mary Hughes, a criminal lunatic, from the 24th Dec. 1870 to the 24th Dec. 1871.

In the year 1848 the lunatic was indicted at the Carmarthen Assizes for the murder of her three children, and being found insane, she was ordered to be kept in safe custody during her Majesty's pleasure. She was accordingly removed to the Devizes Lunatic Asylum, where she remained for several years.

In or about the year 1855 she was removed, by order of the Secretary of State, to the private lunatic asylum at Briton Ferry, where the guardians of the Lampeter Union duly paid for her maintenance.

In the year 1865 an asylum for the counties of Cardigan, Camarthen, and Pembroke was opened at Carmarthen, and all lunatics belonging to the Lampeter Union confined in various private asylums were removed to the county asylum, but Mary Hughes, being a criminal lunatic, was unable to be removed without a warrant from the Secretary of State, which, however, not being obtained, she remained as before an inmate of the Briton Ferry Lunatic Asylum. The plaintiff had always charged 16*s.* a week for the keep of Mary Hughes, which sum the guardians had paid, but in Oct. 1869 they wrote the following letter to the plaintiff:

Lampeter Union, Lampeter.
19th Oct. 1869.

Re Mary Hughes, a lunatic.

Dear Sir,—I am directed by the guardians of the poor of this union to inform you that after this date they will not pay you for the care and maintenance of this lunatic a higher amount than they pay for the care and maintenance of lunatics at the joint counties asylum at Carmarthen, which is at present 11*s.* 1*d.* per week.—Yours truly,
D. LLOYD.

Charles Pegge, Esq.,
Vernon House, Briton Ferry.

To this letter Mr. Pegge wrote to say that he could not keep her for so small a sum, but took no further steps in the matter, and in January sent in a claim for 16*s.* a week, but the guardians only sent him a cheque for 11*s.* 1*d.* per week, and on the 18th Feb. 1870 wrote the following letter:—

Lampeter Union, Lampeter,
18th Feb. 1870.

Dear Sir,—I am directed by the guardians of this union to inform you that they have been advised to resist the payment to you of any cheques for the care and maintenance of Mary Hughes, a lunatic, beyond the amount remitted by me to you, the same being in the opinion of the guardians a fair and reasonable allowance. The guardians are prepared to defend any action or other proceedings you may bring against them for the recovery of the balance claimed by you.—Yours truly,
D. LLOYD.

Chas. Pegge, Esq.,
Vernon House, Briton Ferry, Neath.

The plaintiff therefore brought his action for the keep of the lunatic from 24th Dec. 1870 to 24th Dec. 1871, when the defendants paid into court 21*l.* 12*s.*, being at the rate of 11*s.* 1*d.* per week from 24th March 1871 to 24th Dec. 1871. At the trial before Bramwell, B., and a common jury at the last Bristol spring assizes it was contended for the defendants that the plaintiff ought to have obtained an order of justices under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 54, ss. 1 and 2.(a)

It was proved that at the time that Mary Hughes was sent to the Briton Ferry Lunatic Asylum the guardians wrote to the owner of the

(a) Sect. 1. If any person while imprisoned in any prison or other place of confinement, under any sentence of death, transportation, or imprisonment, or under a charge of any offence, or for not finding bail for good behaviour, or to keep the peace, or to answer a criminal charge, or in consequence of any summary conviction or order by any justice or justices of the peace, or under any other than civil process, shall appear to be insane, it shall be lawful for any two justices of the peace of the county, city, borough, or place where such person is imprisoned, to inquire, with the aid of two physicians or surgeons, as to the insanity of such persons, and if it shall be duly certified by such justices and such physician or surgeons that such person is insane, it shall be lawful for one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, upon receipt of such certificate, to direct by warrant under his hand that such person shall be removed to such county lunatic asylum or other proper receptacle for insane persons, as the said Secretary of State may judge proper and appoint; and every person so removed under this, or already removed, or in custody under any former order relating to insane prisoners shall remain under confinement in such county asylum, or other proper receptacle as aforesaid, or in any other county lunatic asylum, or other proper receptacle to which such person may be removed, or may have been already removed, or in which he may be in custody by virtue of any like order, until it shall be duly certified to one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, by two physicians or surgeons, that such person has become of sound mind, whereupon the said Secretary of State is hereby authorised, if such person shall still remain subject to be continued in custody, to issue his warrant to the keeper, or other persons having the care of any such asylum or receptacle as aforesaid, directing that such person shall be moved back from thence to the prison, or other place of confinement, from whence he or she shall be taken, or if the period of imprisonment or custody of such person shall have expired, that he or she shall be discharged.

Sect. 2. That in all such cases as aforesaid, unless one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State shall otherwise direct, it shall be lawful for such two justices, or any other two justices of the peace of the county, city, borough, or place where such person is imprisoned, to inquire into, and ascertain by the best evidence or information that can be obtained under the circumstances, of the personal legal disability of such insane person, the place of the last legal settlement, and the pecuniary circumstances of such person, and if it shall not appear that he or she is possessed of sufficient property which can be applied to his or her maintenance, it shall be lawful for such two justices, by order under their hands, to direct the overseers of the parish where they adjudge him or her to be lawfully settled, or in case such parish shall be comprised in a union declared by the Poor Law Commissioners, or shall be under the management of a board of guardians, established by the Poor Law Commissioners, then the guardians of such union, or of such parish (as the case may be), to pay on behalf of such parish, in the case of any person removing under this Act, all reasonable charges for inquiring into such person's insanity, and for conveying him or her to such county lunatic asylum or receptacle for insane persons, and to pay such weekly sum as they or any two justices shall, by writing under their hands, from time to time direct for his or her maintenance in the asylum or receptacle in which he or she shall be confined; and in the case of any person removed under any further Act relating to insane prisoners, to pay such weekly sums as they or any two such justices as aforesaid, shall, by writing under their hands, from time to time direct for his or her maintenance in the asylum or receptacle in which he or she is confined, and when the place of settlement cannot be ascertained, such order shall be made upon the treasurer of the county, city, borough, or place where such person shall have been imprisoned; but if it shall appear upon inquiry to the said, or any other two justices of the county, city, borough or place where such person is imprisoned that any such person is possessed of property, such property shall be applied for or towards the expenses incurred, or to be hereafter incurred on on his or her behalf, and they shall from time to time, by order under their hands, direct the overseers of any parish wheresoever asylum, stating that they would pay 16*s.* a week so long as Mary Hughes remained in his custody.

A verdict was found for the defendants, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to set it aside and enter a verdict for the sum of 9*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.* beyond the amount paid into court, on the ground that the facts disclosed ample evidence of a contract by the defendants to pay a reasonable sum to the plaintiff for the maintenance of the lunatic, until she was legally discharged from his custody, and in the meantime the judgment should be stayed. The court were to be allowed to draw inferences of fact. A rule having been obtained.

Kingdon, Q.C. and Kinglake showed cause.—The sum of 16*s.* a week was paid until it was discovered that the cost of lunatics in the joint counties asylum was only 11*s.* 1*d.* per week, and after the guardians found out that fact, it became their duty to pay no more for this lunatic. Whatever contract there was between the parties was determined by the guardians' letter of the 19th Oct. giving the plaintiff notice that they would not pay more than 11*s.* 1*d.* The plaintiff ought to have obtained an order of justices to inquire and determine what sum shall be paid by the guardians under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 54, s. 2, and if he has not done that he must accept the offer of the board of guardians. [WILLES, J.—The guardians are liable for the maintenance of the lunatic; it is only a question of how much they are to pay. The plaintiff cannot get rid of his charge, being a criminal lunatic.] The plaintiff never dared to say that an order of justices had ever been made. [KEATING, J.—Suppose the guardians agree with the plaintiff to waive the order of justices?] The guardians may waive the order, and the case is reduced to a question of contract determinable by either party. Otherwise we shall have a contract existing between the parties, to bind them through all time. There clearly not having been an order made, we ought not to act as if there had been one: (The Bradford Union v. The Clerk of the Peace for the County of Wiltshire, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 604.) Although in all cases within the scope of this authority, a contract of the guardians binds them without being under seal, yet this was not a contract which they had power to make:

Chitty on Contracts, last edit., p. 265, and cases there cited;

Nicholson v. The Guardians of the Bradfield Union, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 620.

We do not contend that 16*s.* is an unreasonable sum to pay, but that the plaintiff is entitled to no more than 11*s.* 1*d.* per week.

H. James, Q.C. (Pinder with him), were not called upon.

WILLES, J.—This case turns on the construction of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 34, and the course taken by the guardians under that Act. The case turns on the statute, because by it any person in the position of the lunatic may be dealt with and sent to a lunatic asylum under the order of the Home Secretary. It occasionally happens that a person in a good condition of life commits an offence, and being adjudged by the verdict of a jury to be a lunatic, is sent to a public lunatic asylum, thereby throwing the cost of maintenance upon the union, when the friends of the lunatic would rather pay a small sum and have the advantage of the treatment of a private lunatic asylum. In any case of the kind two questions arise, whether the lunatic should be sent to a private or public asylum. It becomes necessary, when persons are sent to a private asylum, to provide for the mode of their maintenance, and that is provided by the second and following sections, and the justices are given power, where the lunatic is possessed of property and is a person of means, to issue their warrant to the overseers to seize the money or sell the goods and receive the rents of the lunatic for the purpose of paying the expenses of the lunatic's keep; but, in the case of a pauper lunatic, the justices are to make an order upon the guardians of the union to pay such weekly sum for the maintenance of such person as they shall by writing under their hands direct. I need hardly say that if the owner of a private asylum accepts the care of a criminal lunatic under the order of the Secretary of State, he is bound to keep him; but there seems nothing in the statute obligatory to keep him in the first instance. That, however, it is not necessary for us to decide here; it is only necessary to state that once having accepted such care, nothing would entitle the keeper to transfer the lunatic except the warrant of the Secretary of State to remove the lunatic from his custody. The plaintiff here was, therefore, obliged to continue to keep Hughes until he received an order for her removal. We are, by the leave reserved at the trial, allowed to draw inferences of fact, and I draw the inference that the plaintiff was maintaining the lunatic on behalf and at the request of the guardians of the Lampeter union. The 2nd section says that it shall be lawful for two justices of the peace to inquire into and ascertain the personal legal disability of any insane person, the place of last legal settlement, and his or her pecuniary circumstances; and, if it does not appear that he or she is possessed of any property which can be applied to his or her maintenance, they may direct the overseers or the board of guardians, as the case may be, to pay all reasonable charges for inquiring into such persons' sanity and for their weekly maintenance at an asylum or receptacle for insane people; and if they have any property they, the justices, are authorised to direct such property to be applied on behalf of their maintenance so long as they remain in confinement. The result of the section is that any lunatic who turns out a pauper shall be maintained by the guardians of the union to which he or she formerly belonged. The justices are to inquire and to act, but the guardians are liable to pay. If the individuals who are to pay choose to waive the expenses of an inquiry before the justices and the provisions of the statute, and pay without such inquiry they are at liberty to do so. As to the expenses of the lunatic they would only pay a reasonable sum for her maintenance, for what was a reasonable sum they could ascertain as well as the justices, and it necessarily results from the fact that the guardians paid 16*s.* per week for sixteen years, without any money, goods, chattels, land, or tenements, of such person shall be, to seize so much of the said money, or to seize and sell so much of the said goods and chattels, or receive so much of the annual rent of the lands or tenements of such person as may be necessary to pay the charges, if any, of inquiring into such person's insanity and of removal, and also the charges of maintenance, clothing, medicine, and care of any such insane person, accounting for the same at the next special petty sessions of the division, city, or borough, in which such order shall have been made, such charges having been first proved to the satisfaction of such justices, and the amount thereof being set forth in such order.

objection, that the plaintiff considered that if he took the lunatic to his asylum he would have 16*s.* per week as long as he kept her, and this is the inference we draw. The guardians, however, instead of keeping to their contract, attempted by their notice of 19th Oct. to strike off 4*s.* 11*d.* a week, although the order of justices, and we may assume there was one, was still unaltered. There was clearly an agreement to pay 16*s.* or a reasonable sum to sustain the plaintiff's right, which could not be altered by the guardians. As to the question whether a right of action given by statute would lie on the statute, I am of opinion that it would, as it is clearly stated by Comyns, C.B. in his Digest, title Action upon the Statute (F), where he refers to 2nd Inst. 486: "If a statute provide a remedy for a party grieved, though it do not give any express penalty or forfeiture he may have an action on the statute."

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. There was clearly at one time an actual contract for 16*s.* a week until the lunatic should be removed. The defendants refused to continue to pay 16*s.*, and proposed to substitute 11*s.* 1*d.*, the same as they paid for lunatics at the joint counties asylum. The plaintiff accepts the lunatic on the understanding that he is to receive 16*s.* a week, and when he has once got her he cannot turn her out, and she must remain on his hands until an order of removal is obtained from the Home Secretary.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Previously to 1871 there must have been some arrangements made between the guardians and the keeper of the lunatic asylum, and I think we are at liberty to assume an order was made. Otherwise the guardians being satisfied that the maintenance of Mary Hughes must fall on them, entered into an agreement to pay 16*s.* a week. If that is so, the only question that remains is whether they could make such a contract, and for the reasons given by my brother Willes it appears that they were able to contract and be bound by such contract. The rule must, therefore, be made absolute. Rule absolute.

BRECON MARKETS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. NEATH AND BRECON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Toll—Railway—Highway.

Plaintiffs were possessed of an ancient toll on every carriage and on every one of certain specified articles brought into or driven through the town of B. Defendants' line of railway ran through the town of B., and they ran on it into and through the town railway carriages of the ordinary description, and trucks containing the specified articles above referred to.

Held that defendants were not liable to pay plaintiffs' toll on the carriages or on the trucks or the articles carried in them, for that, if the toll claimed was a toll thorough, plaintiffs did nothing on defendants' line to earn the toll, and if it was a toll traverse, plaintiffs must be taken to have parted with the soil over which defendants' railway ran, without any reservation of the toll, and without having stamped upon it the character of a highway.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiffs are incorporated by the Brecon Markets Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 86), hereinafter called the Market Act.

2. The defendants are incorporated and regulated by the Dulas Valley Mineral Railway Act 1862, and by the Neath and Brecon Railway Act 1863, hereinafter called the Railway Acts. The defendants' principal office is in London.

3. The most material parts of both Acts are in the appendix, Nos. 1 and 2, but either party may refer to any of the said Acts, and the Acts incorporated with such Acts respectively.

4. The plaintiffs claim in this action payments described as drift tolls and dues in the Market Act. The pleadings and particulars (which may respectively be amended on either side, as the court may think fit) are in the appendix Nos. 3 and 4.

5. The following items of the 4th schedule to the Markets Act describe the tolls claimed in this action. The 4th schedule: "Drift tolls and dues, and fair tolls payable within the borough. For every score of horned cattle driven through the borough, 10*d.*; for every score of swine, ditto, ditto, 5*d.*; and so on in proportion for any number of horned cattle, sheep, or swine, less than a score. For every waggon or carriage with four wheels, belonging to any person not residing in the county of Brecon, passing to, through or from the borough, 1*s.* For every waggon belonging to any person residing in the county of Brecon, passing through the borough to any place in any other county, 1*s.* For every waggon belonging to any person not resident in the county coming to the borough with hops, leather, or other articles to be sold, 1*s.* For every waggon bringing stone coal, 6*d.*" The tolls mentioned in the said 4th schedule to the Market Act are tolls formerly due and payable to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Brecon as mentioned in the Market Act, and transferred to the plaintiffs by the Markets Act.

6. The defendants under the powers of the railway Acts constructed the railway mentioned therein, and the greater part of such railway has been applied for passenger traffic since 3rd of June 1867. It joins the Brecon and Merthyr Tydfil Railway (hereinafter called the Merthyr Railway), belonging to the Brecon and Merthyr Tydfil Junction Railway Company (hereinafter called the Merthyr Railway Company) by a junction with it within the borough of Brecon aforesaid, referred to in the Market Act, and therein and hereinafter called "The Borough." The defendants have a station within the borough, called the Brecon Station. The Vale of Neath Railway belonging to the Great Western Railway Company forms a junction with the defendants' railway, and with it the Vale of Neath Railway, by means of the said junction at Neath forms, by means of the said junction in the borough, a continuous railway system with the Merthyr Railway, which continues on from such junction within the borough to various stations on that railway outside the borough. The Hereford, Hay, and Brecon Railway Company, and the Mid Wales Railway Company exercise running powers, and run trains into the borough over the Merthyr Railway. The said junction has not yet been opened for public passenger traffic, as that has been restrained by injunction at the instance of the plaintiffs, but it has been and is used for the transmission of the goods and cattle traffic.

7. The mode of conducting the traffic on the several railways at present and during the period referred to in the particulars of demand is as follows:

8. The defendants at their various stations on their railway outside the borough, some of which are within the county of Brecon, and others beyond that county, book passengers to the borough, and convey them in their carriages in trains in the ordinary manner to their station in the Borough, but not beyond it.

9. The Great Western Railway Company book passengers from Swansea to the borough, and from other stations belonging to them to Neath, where passengers rebook to the Borough. These passengers are conveyed by the Great Western Railway Company in their carriages to the said junction at Neath, and such passengers then leave those carriages, and are conveyed by the defendants in their carriages, as their other passengers are, to their said station in the borough, but not beyond. The fares from Swansea to the borough, and from other stations to Neath, as the case may be, are received by the Great Western Railway Company at the time of the booking of the passengers.

10. The defendants also at their said station within the borough book passengers to Swansea outside the borough; these passengers are conveyed by the defendants in their carriages in trains in the ordinary manner to the stations on their railway, or if for any station on the Vale of Neath Railway, such passengers change from the defendants' carriages at Neath Junction aforesaid, and are then conveyed by the Great Western Railway Company in their carriages to the destinations of the passengers. The fares from Brecon to Swansea, and to the other stations on the defendants' railway are received by the defendants at the time of the booking of the passengers.

11. The passenger carriages so used by the defendants are the ordinary four-wheeled railway carriages drawn in a train by a six-wheeled engine with a tender or by a six or eight-wheeled tank engine. The same carriages frequently pass from and to the station in the borough in the above manner several times a day.

12. The defendants also, at various stations on their railway outside the borough, some of which are within the county of Brecon, and others beyond that county, receive horned cattle, sheep, and swine consigned to different persons at various stations both within and beyond the county of Brecon on the Merthyr Railway and other railways communicating with it. Such horned cattle, sheep, and swine are carried by the defendants in their trucks beyond the said junction in the borough to the station of the Merthyr Railway Company, also in the borough, and are there delivered to the Merthyr Railway Company and other companies in the waggons or trucks in which they have been brought there, and the Merthyr Railway Company, or the other companies, convey them from such station in the same trucks, to their respective destinations, and there deliver them to the consignees. The defendants use the ordinary four-wheeled cattle waggons or trucks which are drawn in trains by the usual engine and tender. The tolls in these cases for the whole journey are received by the defendants from the consignors; but cases do occur where the carriage is not prepaid. This mode of conveyance has affected the passage of such animals by other means through the borough which before the construction of the defendants' railway passed in large droves and greater numbers.

14. The defendants also, at the various stations on their railway outside the borough, some of which are within and others beyond the county of Brecon, receive stone coal (which expression is used in this case in the same sense as in the Market Act), lime, and other articles consigned to different merchants and persons at the Brecon station and the various stations both within and beyond the county of Brecon on the Merthyr Railway and other railways in connection therewith. Such of the stone coal, lime, and other articles as are consigned to different persons and merchants in the borough, are delivered there by the defendants to the consignees within the borough, and such as are consigned to different persons at stations beyond Brecon are carried by the defendants beyond the said junction to the goods station of the Merthyr Railway Company in the borough, and there delivered to the Merthyr Railway Company and other companies, in the waggons or trucks in which they have been brought there, and such last-mentioned railway company carry them therefrom in the same waggons or trucks to their respective destinations, and there deliver them to the consignees. The tolls in these cases for the whole journey are received by the defendants from the consignors when it is prepaid. The defendants also bring into the borough for their own use, and keep at the Brecon station, quantities of stone coal.

15. The Great Western Railway Company also at the various stations on their railway receive stone and other coal, lime, and other articles consigned to different merchants and persons at the defendants' station in the borough, and at various stations both within and beyond the county of Brecon, on the Merthyr Railway Company's and other railways in connection with it, and such stone, coal, lime, and other articles, are conveyed by the defendants to the said junction at Neath, and are there delivered to the defendants in the waggons or trucks in which they have been brought there, and the defendants convey them in such trains and waggons or trucks in the manner mentioned in the next preceding paragraph according to their destination. The tolls in these cases for the whole journey are received by the Great Western Railway Company from the consignors when prepaid.

16. With reference to the two last preceding paragraphs, the defendants and the Great Western Railway Company use the ordinary four-wheeled railway waggons or trucks, and they are drawn in trains by the usual engine and tender or tank engine.

17. The fares or tolls so received as aforesaid for a through journey, on more than one railway, are apportioned at the Railway Clearing House, according to the system there established by law.

18. In some instances the passenger carriages, cattle or goods waggons or trucks, used for the purposes above-mentioned, belong to the defendants, in others they belong to the Great Western Railway Company, in others to other persons or companies residing within the county of Brecon, in other cases to persons or companies residing beyond the limits of the said county. The coal waggons frequently belong to the coal masters who raise the coals.

19. In many instances such passenger carriages, cattle and goods waggons, or trucks, belonging to the defendants or used by them, pass into, through, or from the borough, empty, once or several times a day.

20. The court may make such inferences of fact as it may think proper.

21. The question for the court is, Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover any and what tolls or payments under the various circumstances above described? The amounts recoverable, if any, to be ascertained on the principle settled by the court as arranged between the parties, and judgment is to be entered up according to the opinion of the court, either for the plaintiffs for such amount with costs (including the costs of ascertaining such amount), or for the defendants with costs.

The following were the plaintiffs' points: First, the expression "waggon" and "waggon, or carriage with four wheels," comprise railway passenger trucks and railway goods' trucks; secondly, cattle, sheep, and swine conveyed through the said borough are driven through it within the meaning of the schedule; thirdly, a railway truck bringing stone coal into the borough is a waggon bringing stone coal, within the meaning of the schedule; fourthly, the defendants are not only liable in respect of their own trucks, but also in respect of trucks belonging to others drawn by the defendants; fifthly, the defendants are liable in respect of horses, cattle, sheep, and swine conveyed by them into and partly through the borough, and by other companies through the remainder and out of the borough; sixthly, the defendants are liable to tolls whether they act in fulfilment of their own contracts or as agents or carriers for other companies or persons, and whether they convey their own goods and animals or those of others; seventhly, the ancient tolls mentioned in the Act of Parliament, and which received their full confirmation by the 79th and 81st sections of the Act, are payable irrespective of any particular mode of conveyance through, to, or from the borough.

The following were the defendants' points: First, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any tolls or payments under any of the circumstances stated in the case; secondly, that the tolls imposed by the Brecon Markets Act 1862, were never intended to, and do not, in fact, apply to cattle, goods, and waggons conveyed by and upon a railway; thirdly, that such tolls are applicable only to cattle, goods, and waggons passing to, through, or from the borough upon the highways in the customary and ordinary manner; fourthly, that the plaintiffs are not legally entitled to recover any of the items of their claims in this action.

Dowdeswell, Q.C., for the plaintiffs, was stopped by the court.

[WILLES, J.—The question seems to be whether, when toll traverse has been granted in respect of land, although, if any one passes over the land, the grantee of the toll may waive the trespass and demand the toll, yet, if he parts with the land without having stamped the character of a highway upon it, he is still entitled to toll on that land in the hands of his grantee. What seems uncertain is this: He being entitled to the tolls, so long as any one passes over the land, whether he has made it a highway or not, if he grants the land away to another without having made a highway upon it, is he entitled to the toll, while the land belongs to his grantee.]

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5.—WILLES, J., delivered the judgment of the Court (Willes and Keating, JJ.)—This case raises a question which, chiefly upon the ground of its general importance, we took time to consider, viz., whether the carriage of goods by a railway company upon their railway, or to their railway station, entirely upon land belonging to the railway company, and not upon any highway or in the enjoyment of any easement or other right reserved by the former owners of the land, or those under whom he claims, can be subject to a toll thorough or toll traverse arising by prescription or grant; for, the tolls claimed are admitted to be of that description, and not tolls created by the statute under which the company was incorporated, and by which it appears they are invested with the rights previously existing in the corporation of Brecon for the purposes mentioned in that Act. We are of opinion that no such toll can be imposed. The enjoyment of the railway company is a proprietary one of their own land, purchased without any reservation as to the use thereof by the seller or by the person or persons from whom he bought. It is not the use of the land or easement of another, nor the enjoyment of any benefit directly or indirectly conferred upon them by another. There are cases, doubtless, in which tolls are sustained in respect of some advantage of which each member of the public may avail himself if he thinks proper, and which must be paid in respect of the opportunity and capacity of enjoyment in the individual and general public benefit, whether there be any actual enjoyment by the particular individual or not, as, for instance the payment or render of the best fish by each boat frequenting a particular cove to the owner of the land, who provided there a rope and windlass to assist fishing boats in landing in rough weather (Earl of Falmouth v. George, 5 Bing. 286), or anchorage in respect of the provisions of buoys, a landing place, or other conveniences for the public (Foreman v. Free Fishers of Whitstable, 38 L. J.

345, C. P.), or metage in respect of providing for the measurement or weighing of goods brought into a port which there was an obligation to maintain, or other port dues of a like kind (Jenkins v. Harvey, 2 C. M. & R. 393). The rule applicable in such cases in respect of the obligation to maintain ports or other conveniences for public use, that an individual frequenting the place and having the power of taking advantage of the benefit provided shall pay the due whether he takes advantage of the benefit or not, has no application to the case of toll for passing upon land. Tolls for passing upon land are granted by the Crown in respect of a consideration to be enjoyed by the persons who are to pay them, and they cannot be effectually granted without such a consideration or so as to extend or to be taken beyond the place in which such consideration arises. They consist of two sorts, toll thorough and toll traverse. Toll thorough may be taken upon land not belonging to the grantee, and, consequently, no consideration can be implied for such grant. It is taken upon a highway and granted to some one who undertakes some public work for the benefit of those who use the highway, as, for instance, in making the road or keeping it in order and repair for the use of the passers by, and it can only be taken in the way or ways to which such obligation applies. Therefore, if a person were entitled to toll thorough in a town, in consideration of keeping certain streets in order, the toll would apply only to such streets, and persons using other streets could not be made subject to the toll: (Trueman v. Walgham, 2 Wils. 299; Brett v. Beales, 10 B. & C. 508.) Accordingly it was not argued that the claim in question could be maintained as a toll thorough, because nothing is done by the corporation or by the plaintiff towards the repair of the railway or otherwise to aid or assist the traffic of the railway company. It was, however, insisted that the claim might be maintained as for a toll traverse, which consists of a toll granted and claimed for going over the land of the grantee. A toll traverse is said to differ from a toll thorough in this, that no consideration for it need be averred. This does not, however, mean that there need be no consideration for it; it merely expresses that, as there can be no toll traverse except in respect of going over the land of the grantee, the consideration of using the land is implied from the character of the toll, and need not be further averred than by stating that it is a toll traverse. The consideration is the giving up the land of the grantee. This does not make it necessary that the grantee should actually retain the soil in the land. It is enough that he should have the land at the time of the grant, and allow the use of it to the persons who are to pay the toll; and it is not necessary that he should be the lord of a manor, though such grants have usually been made to lords of manors. Whilst the grantee has the land, he is entitled to the toll in respect of the use of it. If he part with the land, he may still retain the right to the toll, as in the case of Lord Pelham v. Pickersgill (1 T. R. 667), where a toll traverse over a public road was sustained upon the footing that the public road had been originally laid out on the grantee's land in consideration of payment of the toll, and that the grant of the land was subject to the public right of way to which the toll attached, and which secured to the person charged with the toll that user which was the consideration for it. The same law was acted upon in Crisp v. Belwood (3 Lev. 424), Cotton v. Smith (2 Comp. 47), and in the case so much relied upon for the plaintiffs of Richards v. Bennett (1 B. & C. 223), more fully reported in 2 D. & R. 389. In all these cases the grantee either reserved the land or, by dedicating it to the public as a highway secured to persons who used it, the consideration for which the toll was granted. Some of the expressions attributed to the court in the report of Richards v. Bennett were relied upon as meaning that it was sufficient that the grantee should be possessed of the land at the time of the grant, without regard to his having subsequently parted with it by a general conveyance without granting a public right which remained impressed upon the land, and secured the use of it to the public, and without any exception or reservation in the grant (if such could legally exist apart from a public right), enabling the grantee to allow of such use, and so to earn the toll. It will be found, however, upon examining the case of Richards v. Bennett, and the authorities upon which it was founded, that no such opinion was there held. The question arose upon the validity of a plea stating that the goods came upon the manor, which was considered to mean that they came upon land which continued to be the plaintiffs, or upon which he had reserved a right to have them landed so as to earn the toll. We are not dealing with a case of prescriptive taking of tolls in the places in question, to sustain which any such reservation could be implied. This land is still the plaintiffs'. If they were not the original owners of the land, they can have no right there. If they were the original owners, they have parted with it without devoting it as a highway or otherwise to the use of the public or other persons using it. It is at best the simple case, then, of a landowner entitled to toll traverse parting with his land out and out, without having any right therein. According to the argument for the plaintiffs, after such a grant without reservation the grantor could sue the grantee for doing upon his own land any of the things for which a toll could be claimed if it remained the property of the grantor. This would be in derogation of the right of possession granted, and could only be secured by reservation; and there is no reservation. So much for use by the grantee; but suppose a third person were to enter without leave from the grantee, he would, according to the argument, have to pay damages for the trespass to the grantee, and toll also to the grantor; and if the toll were (as a toll may be) not fixed, but of a reasonable amount (Corporation of Stamford v. Lambert, 1 C & J. 57, 400), he must pay twice over for the supposed valuable consideration. No authority was cited to sustain this strange conclusion; but reference was made to the numerous cases in which a right in gross (separate from the proprietary right) has been held not to pass with the land over which it was to be exercised; and it was said that as such a right does not pass to the grantee, therefore it must remain in the grantor, and may be exercised by him in spite of his grant of the land. One of these cases will suffice for an illustration, viz., that of a free warren which may exist either in a man's own land or in the land of another, and which, if in gross, does not pass by the grant of the land. But, suppose a man having free warren in gross in his own land, grants the land without reservation to another, what is the result? May he enter and disturb his grantee? The case of Morris v. Dimes (1 Ad. & E.), furnishes no authority upon the question, for it only shows that the grantee takes nothing in the warren, and so cannot enforce it against a third person. The answer is to be found in Brooke's Abridgment, Grauntes, 144, where the better opinion is said to be that, if a person having a right of warren in gross in his own land demises for years without mentioning the warren, the lessor cannot have the warren, because it is not reserved, and the lessee shall not have it, because it is not granted, and such warren in gross is suspended during the term. And so in the present case, the corporation, if they were originally owners of the land, have in like manner parted with it. There is no evidence of any reservation, express or implied, and the railway company, the present owners of it, may use it for all lawful purposes, including those for which toll is claimed. We are well impressed with the importance of maintaining rights founded upon ancient usage, and of maintaining any right that has been long enjoyed in fact, to the extent to which such usage points out a possible legal origin. Such a consideration is, however, inadmissible in the present case because, allowing the usage to be just, and assuming toll traverse established through the borough, such toll traverse has for the reasons mentioned been parted with, or at least suspended until the land finds its way back to the corporation, or their statutory grantees. Whether upon goods finding their way from the land of the railway company into the streets of Brecon a toll will become payable, has not been argued, and the decision of that question is beside the present litigation. Our judgment affects tolls upon goods which have not left the land of the railway company.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and H. LEIGH, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 20, 1872.

(Before MARTIN, CHANNELL, and PIGOTT, BB.)

DYTE v. THE ST. PANCRAS BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

Board of guardians—Appointment by of medical officer to infirmary—Appointment not under seal—Necessity of seal to validity of contract—Corporation — Distinction between an ordinary and trading one—Executed and executory consideration—Difference between—Estoppel.

The appointment by a corporation, such as a board of poor law guardians, of a person to be "medical officer" to the corporation for any fixed or definite period of time, ought to be under seal.

D., being a candidate for the post of medical officer to the H. infirmary, the appointment to which was in the hands of the defendants, as poor law guardians of St. P., a resolution, passed at a meeting of the infirmary committee, was approved of and adopted at a board meeting of the guardians on the 6th Dec., "That D. be appointed medical officer for three months, at and for a sum of 100l. and board and rations;" and on the 9th Dec. D. received a letter from the clerk to the guardians, announcing to him his appointment, and inclosing a copy of the above resolution.

On the 7th Jan. D. entered upon his duties as medical officer, and fulfilled them up to the 25th March, when the three months expired, and he received 100l. salary for that period of service. He continued on in the office, nothing being said or done on either side until the 6th April, when a resolution was passed by the infirmary committee, "That the medical officer and other officers" (naming them) "whose engagements expired at Lady-day should be employed monthly, at the several salaries assigned to them by the guardians." This monthly appointment was approved of by the Poor Law Board "until the infirmary should be transferred to the management of the C. L. District Board," which transfer it was expected would take place about Midsummer, but which did not, in fact, happen until Michaelmas.

On the 24th May, at a meeting of the infirmary committee, a written notice from the board of guardians, signed by their clerk, was handed by the chairman of the committee to D., that his appointment of medical officer would terminate on the 24th June; the chairman at the same time verbally telling him that the notice was formal only, and that, if the infirmary were not transferred by the 24th June, the notice would go for nothing.

On the 23rd June D. was informed by an official letter from the clerk to the guardians that his successor had been elected by the guardians, and would commence his duties about noon on the 24th Thereupon D. retired from the office under protest against his illegal dismissal, and brought an action against the guardians to recover 100l. for salary, and an equivalent for board and rations, for three months, in lieu of three months' notice.

At the trial there was a conflict of evidence as to whether D. had been informed of the resolution of the 6th April, the clerk of the guardians stating that he had notified it to D., and D. averring that he was never informed of it.

Held by Martin, Channell, and Pigott, BB. (discharging the plaintiff's rule to set aside the nonsuit entered at the trial), that the plaintiff had failed, for want of a contract under seal, to show a contract binding upon the corporation to employ him beyond the time for which he had been actually employed and paid by them; and that, not being a case of an executed consideration or of a contract with a trading corporation, it did not come within either of those exceptions to the general rule which requires contracts with corporations to be under seal.

Held also, that the verbal statement of the chairman of the infirmary committee at the time when the notice terminating the appointment was given to the plaintiff, did not amount to an estoppel as against the defendants, the poor law guardians.

THIS was an action brought by the plaintiff, a medical practitioner, to recover from the defendants, the guardians of the poor of the parish of St. Pancras, the sum of 127*l.* 6*s.* the amount of one quarter's salary, at the rate of 400*l.* a year, and also the equivalent for apartments and rations for three months, alleged and claimed by him to be due to him, in lieu of notice, by reason of his alleged illegal dismissal by the defendants from the post or office of medical officer of the Highgate Infirmary under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

The plaintiff, by his declaration in the first count, charged that in consideration that the plaintiff would enter into the service of the defendants and serve them from the 25th March 1870, till such time as the management of the Highgate Infirmary Board should be transferred from the defendants to the central board, in the capacity of resident surgeon to the said infirmary at the salary of 400*l.* per annum, with board and residence, the defendants promised the plaintiff to retain him in the said service during the said period in the capacity and on the terms aforesaid. Averment, that the plaintiff entered into the said service in the capacity and on the terms aforesaid, and continued therein for a part of the said period and until the breach of the said promise hereinafter alleged, and was always ready and willing to continue in the said service during the year of the said period, whereof the defendants always had notice, yet the defendants, before the said transfer, dismissed the plaintiff from the said service, and refused to retain the plaintiff therein for the remainder of the said period, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the salary and profits which he would have derived from being retained in the said service, and remained for a long time unemployed. There were then the ordinary money counts.

The defendants pleaded—first, to the first count, denying the promise as therein alleged; secondly, to the money counts, except as to 26*l.* 5*s.* parcel, &c., never indebted; thirdly, further, to the said money counts, except as to the said parcel, &c., satisfaction and discharge by payment before action; fourthly, further, to the said money counts, as to the 26*l.* 5*s.* parcel, &c., payment into court.

Replication 1: Issue joined on the first and second pleas; 2, issue taken on the third plea; and as to the fourth plea the plaintiff takes the 26*l.* 5*s.* out of court in satisfaction, &c.

Rejoinder: Issue joined by the defendant on plaintiff's second replication to third plea.

The facts, as they appeared at the trial of the action, before Pigott, B., at the London Sittings at Guildhall, after Trinity Term 1871, were, briefly stated, as follows:—In Dec. 1869, the plaintiff was a candidate for the then vacant post of resident medical officer to the Highgate Infirmary, the appointment to the post being in the gift of the defendants, the guardians of the St. Pancras Poor Law Union. On the 5th Dec. 1869, the Infirmary Committee passed the following resolution:—"Resolved, that it be recommended to the guardians at their meeting this afternoon, to appoint Dr. Dyte medical officer for three months, and that he devote his whole time during such period, at and for a sum of 100*l.*, board, and rations." This resolution, and the appointment therein recommended, was approved by the board. On the 7th Dec. 1869, the plaintiff wrote as follows to the clerk of the board, Mr. Fildew:—"Dear Sir,—I have been expecting to receive an official intimation of my having been temporarily appointed to the office to which I was recommended yesterday by a resolution of the special Infirmary Committee. Overwhelmed with work as you no doubt are just now it has probably escaped you," &c. And in reply thereto he received on the 9th Dec. an official letter from Mr. Fildew announcing to him his appointment, and enclosing a copy of the above resolution, in which letter Mr. Fildew added the following notification:—"Perhaps I should say that the appointment will take effect only from the date of the day on which you enter on your duties at the infirmary; at present I am unable to give you that information, but will do so when fixed." Subsequently to these letters the plaintiff was informed that he was expected to enter on his duties on the 7th Jan. 1870, on and from which day he entered upon and fulfilled his duties as resident medical officer up to the 25th March, when the three months expired, and when he received 100*l.* salary for that period of service. It having been originally considered that the infirmary would be transferred to the Central London Sick Asylum District Board at Lady-day 1871, all the appointments to posts in the infirmary, including that of the plaintiff as medical officer, were made for that period only, and his appointment was sanctioned (as was necessary) by the Poor Law Board, on the express condition that it was to cease upon the infirmary being handed over to the Central Sick District Board as above mentioned. The transfer, however, not having come to pass at Lady-day, the plaintiff continued to perform the duties of his post after Lady-day, nothing being said or done on either side in the matter until the 6th April, when, at an infirmary committee meeting, a resolution was passed, "That the medical officer" (and other officers and servants mentioned in the resolution) "whose engagements expired at Lady-day should be employed monthly at the several salaries assigned to them by the guardians." Of this resolution Mr. Fildew, the clerk, stated in evidence that he gave verbal notice to the plaintiff, but the plaintiff, on the contrary, swore he was never told anything of the kind. On the 24th May a meeting of the infirmary committee was held, and at this meeting the medical officer (the plaintiff) was called into the room, together with the matron and the steward, when notices were handed to them by the chairman of the meeting, informing them that their appointments would terminate on the 24th June.

The following is a copy of the notice handed to the plaintiff:

24th May 1870.

Sir,—The guardians of the poor of the parish of St. Pancras hereby give you notice to terminate your appointment as medical officer at the Highgate Infirmary on the 24th June next ensuing. I am, &c.,

DANIEL FILDEW, Clerk.

D. H. Dyte, Esq.

At the same time that the chairman handed these notices to the plaintiff and the other officials, he, according to the evidence of the plaintiff, expressly informed them that "the notices were merely formal in order to protect the guardians from liability for the officers' salaries beyond the 24th June, as it was thought the infirmary would be transferred at that time; but, if it should not be then transferred, the notices would go for nothing, and matters would continue as at present." On the 23rd June the plaintiff received an official letter from the Clerk to the Board of Guardians, informing him that his successor, a Dr. Shaw, had been that day elected by the guardians (the defendants) as medical officer of the infirmary, "upon the termination of your engagement to-morrow, the 24th June, instant," and that Dr. Shaw would commence his duties about noon on the 24th. The plaintiff thereupon wrote to the Poor Law

Board communicating the above facts, and on the 27th June he received a reply from the board to the effect that as under the notice of the 24th May his appointment apparently terminated on the 24th June, they were unable to interfere in the matter, but would forward a copy of his letter to the St. Pancras Board. On the same day (the 27th June) the defendant retired from the post and quitted the infirmary, under a strong written protest, sent by him to the defendants, against the illegality of their proceedings, and claiming 100*l.* for salary, and "an equivalent in lieu of rations and apartments for three months," in lieu of three months' notice. The infirmary was not transferred to the Central District Board until Michaelmas 1870, until which time the other officers of the infirmary, who had on the 24th May received notices similar to that which the plaintiff received, were retained at the infirmary in their several posts.

The following document, being a printed return dated 16th April 1870, furnished to the infirmary committee at the instance of one of its members, was relied on by the plaintiff as showing that his appointment was ratified by the Poor Law Board until the transfer of the infirmary took place.

Return, called for on the motion of Mr. Joseph Salter, showing a detailed statement of the "total costs of the infirmary at Highgate, including" . . . "a list of the officers appointed, dates of appointment, and for what period, and the salaries allowed to each."

1.—OFFICERS DULY APPOINTED.

David H. Dyte.	Medical officer.	6th Dec. 1869.	Originally appointed by the guardians for 3 months. They have, however, since been continued by the guardians for another month. The Poor Law Board have approved of the appointments until the infirmary has been handed over officially to the managers of the Central London Sick Asylum District Board.	At the rate of £400—board, lodging, & washing.

The defendants' counsel contended that there was no case for the jury. The board of guardians being a corporation, were not liable under a contract except under seal, and if there was any contract it expired at Lady-day 1870, and no new contract had been shown to have been made; and, moreover, whatever the contract was, it had been terminated on the 24th June by the notice given on the 24th May. The plaintiff's counsel, on the other hand, insisted that the engagement of the plaintiff was not a contract which required to be under seal, and though it was for three months only at first, yet it was afterwards made conditional on the transfer of the infirmary to the Central District Board, and sanctioned in that respect by the Poor Law Board. The learned judge was of opinion that the only question for the jury was whether the plaintiff had received any intimation that the engagement was to be monthly after the 25th March, whereupon the counsel for the defendants withdrew that part of the case altogether, and rested the case upon the point of law only. The plaintiff was thereupon nonsuited by direction of the learned judge, leave being reserved to him to move to set that nonsuit aside, and enter a verdict for him for the amount claimed in the declaration, subject to the following points reserved, namely, first, whether there was a contract; secondly, whether it was binding, not being under seal; thirdly, whether there was notice; fourthly, whether the notice was valid; fifthly, whether there was any waiver of the notice; and the plaintiff was nonsuited accordingly.

A rule was subsequently obtained by M. Chambers, Q.C. on behalf of the plaintiff in Michaelmas Term 1871, to set the nonsuit aside, and to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for 127*l.* 6*s.*, on the ground that the contract engaging or continuing the plaintiff as medical officer of the Highgate Infirmary, was valid, though not under the seal of the defendants; that the contract with the plaintiff was to serve as medical officer of the Highgate Infirmary until the establishment was handed over to the Central London Sick Asylum District Board, or until the plaintiff had had three months', or reasonable notice to give up his said appointment; that the plaintiff had no legal notice to give up or leave his appointment, and did not waive such or any notice, or in any other way abandon his right to continue in office; the plaintiff to be at liberty to amend the declaration upon the usual terms; and against that rule,

H. James, Q.C. and Beasley, for the defendants, now showed cause, and submitted that the nonsuit was right on many grounds. There was no evidence for the jury in support of the contract on the following grounds: First, there was no contract under seal, which was needful in the case of a corporation; secondly, there was no evidence of the fact of the contract alleged in the declaration—it was not only requisite that it should be under seal, but there was no contract in fact; thirdly, whatever contract there was was properly determined. To subdivide the second and third grounds, there being an engagement for three months, the plaintiff, by continuing on the service, after its expiration, became only a servant at will, to be determined at any time on the payment of a quantum meruit. Then the service was determined by a proper written notice, which notice by a corporation cannot be set aside by a verbal statement of a single member. The plaintiff was endeavouring to enforce the executory part of this alleged contract against a non-trading corporation, which cannot be sued upon such a contract if not under seal, whatever may be the law as to other corporations. Numerous cases support that proposition. [MARTIN, B. refers to The Mayor, &c. of Ludlow v. Charlton (6 M. & W. 815; 10 L. J., N. S., 75, Ex.), where it was held that a municipal corporation cannot enter into a contract to pay corporate funds for borough improvements except under the common seal.] No doubt the old and general rule of law is that a seal is required in every case of a contract made by or with a corporation: (See the judgment of Rolfe, B., in The Mayor &c., of Ludlow v. Charlton ubi sup.) To the same effect were the decisions of the Court of Common Pleas in Arnold v. The Mayor, &c. of Poole (4 M. & G. 860; 12 L. J., N. S., 97, C.P.) and the judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, in The London Dock Company v. Sinnott (8 E. & B. 347; 27 L. J. 129, Q. B.), and Reg. v. The Mayor, &c. of Stamford (6 Q. B. 443; 13 L. J., N. S., 177, Q. B.)

In later times, however, a distinction has been drawn between ordinary municipal corporations and (so called) trading corporations, and also between cases of executed and executory consideration, and an exception to the old general rule has been and is now recognised:

The Mayor, &c., of Stafford v. Till, 4 Bing. 75;
Beverley v. The Lincoln Gaslight and Coke Company, 6 A. & E. 827; 7 L. J. N. S., 113, Q. B.; Church v. The Imperial Gaslight and Coke Company, 6 A. & E. 346; 7 L. J., N. S., 118, Q. B.;
Sanders v. The Guardians of St. Neots Union, 8 Q. B. 810; 15 L. J., N. S., 104, M.C.

Then in Clarke and another v. The Guardians of the Cuckfield Union, in the Bail Court (21 L. J. 349, Q.B.), it was held by Wightman, J. following those decisions, that if the guardians at a properly constituted board meeting give orders for putting up water closets at the union workhouse, and they are put up and afterwards accepted and approved of by them, it is no defence, in an action against them for the price of the work, that there was no contract under seal, the purposes for which they were made a corporation requiring that such articles should be provided. The principle of the distinction and exception before referred to is well and clearly stated by Wightman, J. in his judgment in that case, where, after commenting on the various cases, he regrets the present state of the law, and thinks it would have been better, and have avoided the existing uncertainty, if the old rule had never been relaxed; but, as it is, he was inclined to think the case came within the recognised exception to the general rule, and that where it was necessary that work should be done or goods supplied to effect the express purposes of the corporation, and such work or goods was done or supplied and accepted, and approved of by the corporation, and the whole consideration for payment executed, the corporation could not keep the goods or the benefit, and refuse to pay on the ground of the want of a seal to the contract; and the learned judge thought (though not without much doubt, by reason of the authorities in some respects contrary), that such a conclusion was warranted by the three cases before mentioned and others to which he adverted in his judgment. But it is submitted that there is an evident distinction between a trading corporation and an ordinary municipal corporation, or one such as a board of guardians, and between buying goods or ordering works to be done and appointing a medical officer, which is more like appointing an attorney; and it is observable that, in Henderson v. The Australian Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company (24 L. J. 322, Q. B; 5 E. & B. 409), which was the case of an executed consideration and a trading corporation, Crompton, J., though joining in the judgment of the rest of the court, expressed some doubt on the point of the necessity of a seal, and in Haigh v. The Guardians of the North Brierly Union (1 E. B. & E. 873; 28 L. J. 62, Q. B.), the same learned judge expressed the same doubt on the same point, and found it difficult to distinguish the case from The London Dock Company v. Sinnott (ubi sup.). The defendants here, it is submitted, are in the same position as in Sinnott's case. If the defendants are right on this point, all the other questions fall; but it is submitted that an appointment made by a resolution can be put an end to in the like manner. After the 25th March the plaintiff was there only as a servant at will. It is on him to prove a special contract to continue till the transfer of the infirmary to another board, and there is not a shred of evidence to support such a contract, save the verbal statement of the chairman of the infirmary committee, who was not an agent of the corporation. [MARTIN, B. — Without any reference to the case of a corporation at all, where, as between man and man, is there any evidence here of a second contract?] It is submitted that there is not a tittle. They noticed also Lamprell v. The Guardians of the Billericay Union (18 L. J., N. S., 282, Ex.; 3 Ex. 283), and Nicholson v. The Guardians of the Bradfield Union (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 830; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 620; 35 L. J. 176, Q. B.)

M. Chambers, Q.C. and Nasmyth, for the plaintiff contra, supported their rule. It is contended on the plaintiff's part, first, that if a seal were necessary, the order of the Poor-Law Board, under sect. 46 of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, directing the guardians to appoint medical officers, which order was under the seal of the Poor-Law Board, was a perfect sealing of the contract to support it on that ground, and that the seal of the guardians to the actual appointment was not necessary; secondly, the original contract was until the transfer of the infirmary should take place, and that did not happen until Michaelmas 1870. But if the court should think the original contract was only for three months, then it is contended that there was a second contract to continue until the transfer, by reason of the resolution to employ him monthly, and that appointment as appears by the evidence in the case, being expressly approved by the Poor-Law Board "until the infirmary be handed over to the Central Sick District Board." This operated as an estoppel in pais, and it did not lie in the mouths of the defendants after that to take the objection of the want of a seal. But even as to the law of the matter, it is submitted that the plaintiff's contention is right. With regard to ancient corporations the law, as laid down from time to time, with regard to the use of the seal on important occasions was not doubted or disputed. But the doctrine to be eliminated from all the numerous cases in all the courts was this, that, if it was essentially necessary to the discharge of their duties by the corporation that a certain act should be done, and their duties would be unfulfilled unless the act were done, then it was an act under the charter, or under the Act of incorporation, and no seal was necessary. An appointment of a medical officer was a most important and urgently necessary duty—a duty absolutely essential to be performed without, it might be, even an hour's delay, and on what principle of justice or propriety could it be said that though that were so, yet it was to be postponed until all the members could be called together, and forms gone through, and the corporate seal be attached to the appointment; and if it were not so attached, were all the medical officers liable to be dismissed at a day's warning? It was submitted that it could not be so. In cases like this, where sickness or death was the matter under consideration, there was ample power in the guardians to make the appointment without seal. The case of Church v. The Imperial Gas Company (ubi sup.), shows that a corporation may maintain assumpsit for the breach of an executory contract connected with the purposes for which that corporation was constituted; and Lord Denman, C.J., there repudiated the distinction between executed and executory contracts.

Surely the relation must be reciprocal, and if a corporation may sue, it may be sued on such a contract. And in Nicholson v. The Guardians of the Bradfield Union (ubi sup.), Blackburn, J., in deciding as he did in that case, would not say what his opinion would be if it had been an unexecuted contract; and none of the judges have departed from this, that there need be no seal to a contract, even of the highest importance, if the appointment be one of urgent and essential necessity. Again, as to the chairman's statement, he was the delegated agent of the committee to deliver the notice, and must be assumed to have acted properly as such, and so the defendants were bound by what he said. The state of matters afterwards shows this to be so. The guardians met weekly, and all the other officers having been continued in their posts till Michaelmas was a ratification of the chairman's statement. And the memorandum, appended to the return or statement called for on the motion of one of the guardians, stating the period of the original appointments, and the approval of the Poor Law Board of the subsequent monthly employment, was another act of ratification. [CHANNELL, B.—Suppose there had been no verbal statement by the chairman, what do you say would be the effect of the notice?] It is submitted first that the engagement, as explained by the clerk, was to be until the transfer of the infirmary, and the word "temporary," on which the defendants relied must be construed as meaning that; and the notice, therefore, would be of no effect. But secondly, the notice was waived by the second appointment for a monthly employment, which was sanctioned by the Poor Law Board as an appointment until the transfer. The court would not hold that so essential and important an officer as the medical officer could be taken to be a mere servant at will, liable to dismissal at a moment's notice. But if there were any doubt as to the matter of the seal, there was none as to the estoppel, and the cases of Piggott v. Stratton (29 L. J. 1, Ch.), and Wing v. Harvey, (23 L. J. 311, Ch.) were direct authorities to that effect.

MARTIN, B.—I believe that we are all of opinion that this rule should be discharged, and that the nonsuit which my brother Pigott directed to be entered at the trial was quite right. The plaintiff undertakes in this action to prove that there was a contract entered into with him by the defendants, the St. Pancras Board of Guardians (who are a corporation simpliciter and not a trading corporation), that they would employ him from the 25th March 1870, until such time as the management of the Highgate infirmary should be transferred from the defendants to the Central London Sick Asylum District Board. Now, as far as I can perceive, there is not a particle of evidence of such a contract which is at all binding on this corporation, and therefore such a contract is not made out. But, I understand that the spirit of the reservation of leave was, that if there was any contract proved which would entitle the plaintiff to any further payment, or to any damages, it was to be considered as raised, or that it might be raised by any amendment necessary for that purpose. Now the plaintiff has been paid for all the work which he actually did at the rate of 400*l.* a-year, which was the sum mentioned when he entered into the employment of this body; and what he has to make out is that there was a contract binding upon the corporation for his employment for any period of time beyond that for which he has actually been employed. Now, in my opinion, he fails as to this for want of a contract under seal. The several cases of The Mayor, &c., of Ludlow v. Charlton, The London Dock Company v. Sinnott, Arnold v. The Mayor, &c., of Poole, and Reg. v. The Mayor, &c., of Stamford (ubi sup. respectively), which have been cited in the argument at the bar, establish, beyond all doubt, that that is so. There are, without doubt, several cases in which trading corporations have been held to be liable upon executed considerations, and all the courts have been inclined to provide for such cases; for it would be a great injustice to allow a man to do work and labour for, or to supply goods to, a corporation, and then say that he shall not be able to recover the value or price of his labour or his goods, simply because his contract with the corporation did not happen to be under seal. The courts, therefore, would be anxious to assist him in obtaining payment. But, with respect to executory contracts, the matter is, in my judgment, very different. It has been argued by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that this was a matter of necessity. It was no matter of necessity at all in that sense. Had it been the case of a medical man suddenly called in by the board of guardians to attend a pauper then and there suffering under acute disease, or a sudden and dangerous fracture of a limb, that might be such a case of necessity; but this is a contract for the employment of a gentleman for a certain period of time in the future, and there is no immediate necessity in it at all; and there is no occasion whatever for the contract being entered into and completed otherwise than under seal. It does not therefore fall within the class of cases where corporations have been held to be liable on contracts not under seal for matters that are of necessity. The point therefore that has been argued upon that head altogether fails. Then what are the circumstances of the case here? They are as follows: In the month of Dec. 1869 the plaintiff entered into a contract for three months that expired on 25th March 1870. He then continued on without any contract at all, performing the work, and, upon the principle which I have already mentioned with regard to executed considerations, he would be entitled to recover for work and labour done. But there is nothing whatever to show that any new contract for an extended period of time was entered into. The next thing which occurred, instead of being evidence of any such new contract, shows exactly the contrary, for it is a notice informing him that his services would not be required after, and would be at an end on, the 24th June; which, so far from showing a fresh contract for his continued services, is evidence to show that he would cease to be in the defendants' employment on the day mentioned in the notice, the 24th June. But then it is said that there was an estoppel. Now so far from there being any estoppel, what occurred has not the semblance even of one. An estoppel takes place when parties are induced to go on making arrangements with each other by reason of representations which both parties are unable to dispute. But the facts upon which this so-called estoppel are supposed to be based, are nothing more than these—that a gentleman called Salter, a member of the board of guardians, at a board meeting, moved for a return, and thereupon, by the order of the board, the return which has been referred to was made, with regard to a great variety of matters: e.g., the cost of the infirmary, the cost of the furniture and fittings, the amount of debt, and the amount of inteaest on the debt; the list of the officers appointed, the dates of their several appointments, and for what period of time, and their salaries. And it is headed, so far as relates to the present question, "List of officers appointed at the Highgate infirmary, dates of appointment, for what period, and amount of salaries." This document shows that the plaintiff, Dr. Dyte, was the medical officer, that the date of his appointment was the 6th Dec. 1869, and that the salary to be paid to him for his services was at the rate of 400*l.* a year. The return then goes on further, and states that these several officers were "originally appointed by the guardians for three months; they have, however, since been continued by the guardians for another month. The Poor Law Board have approved of the appointments until the infirmary has been handed over officially to the managers of the Central London Sick Asylum District." Now, so far from this statement being an estoppel, which is a matter of conclusive evidence, I should say myself that it was very weak evidence indeed of one, and such as the jury would have been well justified in utterly disregarding. This document is a return not made as between the defendants and the plaintiff, but a return made to the general body of guardians, upon the motion of one of their own board, and is utterly unlike anything which can be called an estoppel. It shows the approval of the Poor Law Board of the several appointments therein specified, until the period had arrived for the infirmary being handed over to the Central Sick Board, which is something very different altogether from the original appointment for three months which was afterwards continued by the guardians for a month. It seems to me that all which this paper states is that these various persons had been appointed, and that their appointments had been approved of by the Poor Law Board; but that if it should turn out that the establishment should be handed over to the management of the Central London Sick Asylum District Board within the month, then their appointments would cease. They gave their approval to the further appointment of the various officers for one month, for which these several persons were respectively employed, subject to that contingency. Whether that be or not the meaning of it, I am, at all events, perfectly clear that the plaintiff has failed to prove it to be an estoppel. It was then said that this appointment need not be under seal, and that there is nothing in the statute requiring that the appointment of the medical officer by the board of guardians should be so. The Act of Parliament (4 & 5 W. 4 c. 76) s. 46 enacts that the Poor Law Commissioners, who, I apprehend, are not a corporation at all, must issue their directions under seal to the boards of guardians to appoint the several paid officers of the union, in order to be binding upon the guardians; but the latter can do it in the manner required by the common law authority. If the appointment in this case is to be treated as a contract between a medical man and a corporation like the St. Pancras Board of Guardians, for the former's appointment to the post of medical officer to the corporation, and his continuance in that office for a year, or any other fixed and definite period of time, then it seems to me that, to be valid, it ought to be, by the common law itself, under seal. And further, even supposing that there were no objection of that kind, I think that there is no evidence here whatever of a binding contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, or of any contract which he could state in his declaration by any amendment, so as to entitle him to recover in this case. Therefore I think that this rule should be discharged.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also very clearly of opinion that this rule should be discharged; and I propose to state the grounds of that opinion very shortly. I think that, if there were a valid contract, the authority of the cases referred to by my brother Martin is conclusive to show that it could be valid only if it were under seal. I am aware that, in certain cases of trading corporations, they have been held bound to a contract not under seal; but the body here is not a corporation of that character. One of the cases referred to confirms that view. Then I see nothing here showing that these defendants could be bound by any contract which is not under seal. I think also that the point of estoppel, for the reasons already so fully explained by my brother Martin, does not arise; but supposing that there had been more doubt about that in my mind, than there really exists (for in truth I entertain no doubt about it at all), is there any evidence of the contract which the plaintiff has declared upon? That is quite apart from the question whether it must be verified by a seal or not. I am of opinion that there is here no such evidence. The contract alleged in the declaration, taking all the evidence before us and dismissing all necessity for having it under seal, is not a contract which supports the declaration. The plaintiff had the opportunity at the trial of amending the declaration, but he declined then to do so. It is true that this kind of reservation took place, that if the court saw, in any view of the matter, that a contract could be established, which, though not being under seal, would entitle the plaintiff to recover, but a contract discharged in point of form from the statements in the delcaration, then the court was not to be precluded, after this period of time, from its right to amend the declaration. But no amendment has been asked for to-day, nor has any argument been offered to us to show to my mind that the court could, in any other form, say that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. In my opinion, therefore, the contract was one requiring to be verified by the seal of the defendants; but supposing that that point was not with the defendants, as I think it is, and supposing that we were to look at what was agreed to in fact, independently of the consideration of the seal, the contract laid in the declaration is not made out.

PIGOTT, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I take now the same view which I took at the trial, that this was a contract which required a seal. The reason for that is given in those cases to which my brother Martin has already referred. It is the old rule of law, and that is to prevail now unless this case comes within any of the exceptions which have been engrafted upon that rule. Now I think myself that it comes within none of those excepted cases which have been decided. Some of them are cases of executed contracts; one, however, is a case of an executory contract. I refer to the case of Church v. The Imperial Gas Company (ubi sup.) That was the case of a trading corporation, and the action was brought in respect of matters as to which there had been a contract broken, for not fulfilling the contract. It had been brought by the company for not accepting gas. But that would not make any difference; it would be equally necessary that there should be a seal if there was to be mutuality in the contract. Although there was no sealed contract in that case, yet no doubt the court did hold that the action might lie; but it was expressly upon the ground that it was a trading corporation, therefore that is not an exception at all serviceable to the argument on the part of the plaintiff in the present case. In the present case the fact is that there was no seal from the beginning; there was a resolution and an intimation by letter that the hiring was for three months, and what happened afterwards was merely a continuing on in the employment. It has been argued that there was an estoppel arising upon what the chairman of the infirmary committee said when the notice determining the service was given to the plaintiff. It seems to me, however, that that cannot be made the ground of an estoppel against the defendants, because the person who made that statement had no authority from them to make any such statement, and there is no evidence of any such authority. He was merely a member of the infirmary committee, and he was not then acting as a member of the corporation, even if it could be an estoppel if he had been. I think it could not be one even then, because he would only be one of the corporate body, and without express authority what he said on the occasion would not bind the whole corporation. Then, as to the other estoppel arising upon the "return" furnished to the board of guardians, my brother Martin has already disposed of that. I think that there is nothing in the nature of an estoppel arising out of that document, and I concur with my learned brothers in thinking that the plaintiff's rule should be discharged. Rule discharged.

JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

(Before Mr. Justice QUAIN.)

Sept. 13 and 17, 1872.

REG. v. LANYON.

Adjudication in bastardy—Order first served incorrectly drawn up—Power of same justices to draw up a correct order subsequently and proceed thereon.

Where two justices had adjudicated A. to be the father of a bastard child, but by mistake the order first drawn up and signed did not correctly embody the terms of such adjudication, and no step had been taken to enforce such order beyond serving the same on A., who treated it as a nullity;

Held, that the same justices were entitled to cause a second order to be drawn up, and enforced, embodying correctly the terms of their adjudication, notwithstanding that the first order had not been quashed, and notwithstanding that there had been no fresh summons or hearing, or tender of costs.

IT appeared from the affidavits that a summons in bastardy came on to be heard before two justices of Cornwall, at Falmouth, on the 30th Jan. 1872, when such justices adjudicated Lanyon to be the father of a bastard child, and ordered him to pay 2*s.* a week from the date of its birth towards its maintenance. An order in writing was thereupon drawn up by the clerk, signed by the justices who adjudicated on the summons, and served on Lanyon, but it was subsequently ascertained that in this document the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* had been inserted, where the sum of 2*s.* only ought to have appeared, and that the date of the birth of the child had been altogether omitted. No proceeding was therefore taken to enforce it, and Lanyon refused to make, and did not make, any payment to the complainant. In this state of things the complainant, in May 1872, applied to the same justices for a proper order, and an order, dated 30th Jan. 1872, embodying correctly the verbal adjudication of that date, was thereupon made out and signed by the same justices, and served on Lanyon, who refused to obey it, and the payments under it being in arrear he was committed to the Cornwall county prison at Bodmin, pursuant to the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 3.

On these facts the learned judge, on a former day (Sept. 10th), on the application of Folkard, granted a summons, calling upon the keeper of the prison to show cause why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue to bring up the body of Lanyon, or why Lanyon should not be discharged from custody without any writ of habeas corpus, the contention on behalf of the prisoner being that, inasmuch as the first order had never been quashed, the second order was invalid, or that at all events there ought to have been a fresh summons and a fresh hearing after tender of costs, before the justices could make a second order.

Murch now showed cause. — The prisoner is not entitled to the writ or to his discharge. In the case of Ex parte Johnson (3 B. & S. 947; 32 L. J. 193, M. C.) it was held, overruling Reg. v. The Justices of Flintshire (15 L. J. 50, M. C.) that the time for appealing against an order in bastardy was from the date of the oral judgment, and not from the time when the order in writing was signed. Such an order must therefore, be taken to be made when pronounced orally, and may be drawn up at any time. Here, the only order made was the oral order of 30th Jan. 1872, and such order was never drawn up till May, when all proceedings taken upon it were perfectly regular. The first order drawn up was not the order of the justices, but a nullity, and the prisoner admits in his affidavit that he so treated it. But it will be said on behalf of the prisoner that the service of the first order upon him is such an enforcing of that order as to bar any further proceeding by the complainant without a fresh summons. In Reg. v. Brisby (18 L. J. 157, M. C.), which will be relied on by the other side, it clearly appears that mere service of an order is not such an enforcing of it, and that case is also an authority for contending that, where the first order is a nullity, it is not necessary that it should be quashed before a second application can be made. And although in that case there was a fresh summons, and a fresh hearing, the justices there were not the same justices who had made the original adjudication. That case is, therefore, no authority for the contention that the same justices cannot cause their order to be correctly drawn up without a fresh summons. Here, all the complainant did, was to request the same justices to hand her a record of their adjudication of 30th Jan. Then, as to the point with reference to tender of costs, such a proceeding is only required where no result has followed from a first hearing, and a second hearing becomes necessary, which is not the case here.

Folkard in support of the summons.—The order first drawn up and signed is the only order of which notice can be taken, and until it is quashed, no other order can be made in the same subject matter: (Reg. v. The Justices of Cheshire, 5 B & Ad. 439.) But assuming that it was not necessary that the first order should have been quashed, here the justices have entertained a second application without any fresh summons or fresh hearing, which is clearly not in accordance with the course pursued in Reg. v. Brisby (sup). And, lastly, the justices had no jurisdiction to make a second order until a tender of the costs already incurred by the prisoner had been made to him by the complainant. According to the case of Reg. v. Hinchcliff (1 Q. B. 356) he was entitled to be replaced in the position in which he stood before the hearing of 30th Jan. The second order is, therefore, invalid, and the prisoner is entitled to his discharge.

The learned judge said that he would take time to consider the matter, and on the 17th Sept. delivered the following judgment:—

QUAIN, J.—This is an application for a habeas corpus in order to obtain the discharge from custody of the prisoner Lanyon, who has been committed for disobeying an order in bastardy whereby he was adjudged the father of a bastard child, and ordered to pay 2*s.* a week towards its maintenance. It was objected on behalf of the prisoner that the order in bastardy was invalid, and that the commitment founded on it was consequently illegal. The facts were these: On the 30th Jan. 1872, an application was made to two justices for an order of affiliation in the usual way, who, after hearing the evidence adduced before them, made an order adjudging the prisoner to be the father of the child, and ordered him to pay 2*s.* a week to the mother. By mistake of the clerk to the justices a written order was drawn up ordering the prisoner to pay 2*s.* 6*d.* a week instead of 2*s.*, and omitting to state the date of the birth of the child from which time the payments were to be made. The justices by mistake signed the order so drawn up, and this order was served on the prisoner. It was stated in the affidavit of the prisoner that he refused to obey this order, as he was advised that it was a nullity; and the applicant also swore that she made no attempt to enforce it on the same ground, and no step was taken to enforce this order except serving it on the prisoner. Two months later the applicant went before the same two justices and asked that the order made by them on the 30th Jan. should be correctly drawn out and signed, in order that she might enforce it, and accordingly an order was then drawn up and signed and dated as of the 30th Jan. (the day when the original order was made) correctly embodying the terms of the original order, and a correct order was then delivered to the applicant. This last order was served on the prisoner, and on his failure to obey it he was committed to prison, and this was the imprisonment of which he now complained. It was objected that the justices had no power to make the second order till the first had been quashed on appeal or certiorari, or that, if the applicant was entitled to treat the first order as a nullity, no second order could be made except after a fresh summons and a fresh hearing, and after tender of the costs of the first summons. I am of opinion that this objection is not well founded, and that the commitment of the prisoner is right. It has been decided in Ex parte Johnson (3 B. & S. 947) that an order in bastardy is made when the judgment of the justices is pronounced orally in court, and that the formal written order is merely the record of the adjudication, and may be drawn up afterwards and signed at any time, and that consequently the time for appeal against such an order was from the oral adjudication in petty sessions and not from the time when the written order is signed or served. The applicant in this case had a right to have the order made in her favour correctly drawn up. The order first drawn up did not embody correctly the terms of the order made, and in fact no such order as that first drawn up was ever really made by the justices, their signatures having been appended by mistake to a wrong order. It is an error, therefore, to allege that a second order was made. The only order made was the oral order of the 30th Jan. and an incorrect record of that order having been delivered to the applicant I think that she was entitled to apply to the same justices and to request that a correct record of their order should be delivered to her. This is all she did, and as there was in fact no second order made it follows that no fresh summons and fresh hearing were necessary. The case of Reg. v. Brisby (18 L. J., 157, M. C.) was cited as an authority that a new summons was required before a second order could be drawn up. In that case the point now raised was not involved, nor was there any opinion expressed on the subject. The second application in that case appears to have been made to other justices than those who heard the first, and, of course, if other justices are called upon to make an order, there must be a fresh hearing before them. But here the same justices who heard the first application are called upon merely to draw up a correct record of their own order. That case, however, is a distinct authority for the proposition that where the order first drawn up is bad on the face of it, as in this case, and, therefore, a nullity, there is no necessity to have it quashed on appeal or certiorari before a second application to the other justices is made; nor was there any necessity in this case to tender the costs of the first summons; that course is required to be adopted only where the first hearing is admitted to have been altogether abortive, and that, therefore, the proceedings have to be commenced over again. Under such circumstances the case of Reg. v. Hinchcliff (10 Q. [B. 356), decides that the justices are not bound to entertain a second application until the costs of the first have been paid or tendered, and the defendant has been thereby replaced in his original position. But in this present case, so far from the first adjudication being admitted to have been abortive, that is the only adjudication which the applicant now seeks to enforce. What she asks is, that a correct record of that adjudication should be drawn up, and she seeks for no fresh hearing nor judgment in the case, nor is the prisoner subjected to any fresh costs by reason of the mistake made in drawing up the first record of the order. It is clear, therefore, that no tender of costs is required in this case where the first and only adjudication was right, and the applicant seeks to enforce that adjudication. The case of Wilkins v. Hemsworth (7 A. & E. 807), may also be referred to. In that case the justices signed two orders intended to be duplicates, but, by mistake, the order served on the father ordered the mother instead of the father to pay 1*s.* 6*d.* a week. Afterwards a correct copy of the order was drawn up and served on the father, and it was held that as there was but one order made the service of an incorrect copy of it could not vitiate the order, but that a correct copy might afterwards be drawn up, served, and enforced. For these reasons I am of opinion that the commitment of the prisoner was right, and this summons must therefore be dismissed.

V.C. WICKENS' COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW and HENRY GODEFROI, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Nov. 11, 12, and 13, 1872.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE TOTTENHAM LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Misapplication of funds—Audit—Costs.

Where a local board of health misapplied the rates toward defraying the expenses of a Bill in Parliament, the Court granted an injunction to restrain the further prosecution of the Bill, which, however, had been abandoned before the hearing. The auditor had surcharged some of the defendants, members of the board, with the amount paid for such expenses, and no order was therefore made on that part of the prayer of the information which sought to make them personally liable; but costs were decreed against them.

A member of the board, who proved that he had opposed the scheme embodied in the Bill, was held not to be personally liable, and the information was dismissed as against him, with costs against the relator.

Semble, that where the clerk or secretary to a corporation aggregate puts in an answer in his own name, he might not be able to get his costs; but, secus, where he acts only for the board, and no further answer is asked from the latter.

THIS was an information at the relation of Henry Childs to restrain the defendants, the local board of health, and their clerk, Edmund Crowne, James Brickwell, Nathaniel Tregelles, Robert Luke Howard, Edward Clarke, and John Follard Lovering, from applying any moneys produced by the rates and funds under their control towards payment of the expenses incurred or to be incurred by them in the preparation, introduction, or promotion of a Bill in Parliament for the utilisation of the sewage of the Tottenham district upon certain portions of the Lammas and other lands in Tottenham and Walthamstow parishes by irrigation. It was also prayed that the defendants other than the board and their clerk might be ordered to repay to the board a sum of 400*l.* paid to Messrs. Wyatt and Hoskins as expenses with regard to the Bill, and also to pay the costs of this suit, but not out of any rates or funds under the board's control. An injunction in the terms of the prayer had been granted on motion, and the bill had been abandoned. The case now came on on motion for decree as to that part of the prayer which asked for an order charging the defendants with the 400*l.* so paid and the costs of the suit. It appeared that the sewage scheme had been opposed by the ratepayers, but that the board nevertheless persevered in it, acting under the advice of Mr. Rawlinson, an eminent engineer.

Answers had been put in by Crowne, the clerk to the board, by the other defendants except Lovering jointly, and by Lovering alone. The case made by them was that the board acted bonâ fide for the benefit of the ratepayers. Lovering stated that he was opposed to the irrigation scheme, and that though he was present at some of the meetings at which it was discussed, and also at that at which the cheque was signed for the 400*l.*, he was not personally chargeable, as he in fact voted against the payment, though such vote was not recorded.

During the hearing of the case an affidavit was put in stating that the auditor for the union had disallowed the 400*l.*, and surcharged the defendants, Clarke, Howard, and Brickwell as to that payment.

Schomberg Q.C. (Jason Smith with him) for the informant, contended that the proceedings of the board were clearly illegal:

Attorney-General v. West Hartlepool Improvement Commissioners, L. Rep. 10 Eq. 123; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 510;
Attorney-General v. Eastlake, 11 Hare, 205;

Reg. v. Mayor and Corporation of Sheffield, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 652; Joint Stock Discount Company v. Brown, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 381; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 692.

Waller for Crowne stated that he appeared for them simply as clerk to the board, and asked for his costs against the relator, under rule 16 of the 40th Consolidated Order. [THE VICE-CHANCELLOR: He cannot have them in the first instance, where the bill prays for relief as well as discovery.] Waller cited Morgan and Davey on Costs, p. 151, and referred to Attorney-General v. Burch (4 Madd. 178).

Greene Q.C. (H. B. Howard with him) for Brickwell, Tregelles, Howard, and Clarke, claimed the protection of sect. 140 of the Board of Health Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), which grants exemption for things done bonâ fide for the purposes of the Act, and cited sect. 75 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98.) They also observed that the amount surcharged by the auditor could be recovered under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, sect. 4.

Mackeson, Q.C. (T. Stevens with him) for Lovering, contended that he was in no way liable, and cited

Land Credit Company of Ireland v. Lord Fermoy, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 7; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293;
Rex v. Justices of Essex, 3 B. & Ad. 941;
Wright v. Wales, 5 Bing. 336;
Cann v. Clipperton, 10 Ad. & Ell. 589;
Smith v. Hobhouse, 9 Q. B. 1005.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR intimated that as to the 400*l.*, he did not intend to decide anything which would clash with the decision of the auditor.

Schomberg, in reply, cited.
Attorney-General v. Andrews, 2 M. N. & G. 225;
Clinch v. Financial Corporation, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 484; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334;
Tinkler v. Wandsworth Board of Health, 2 De G. & J. 261.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Practically all I have to decide is as to the question of costs; but as Mr. Schomberg asks to have a perpetual injunction, I will grant it against the board, so as to prevent them from applying any rates towards paying any costs of, or relating to this bill. As regards the payment of the 400*l*., any order I might make would be unnecessary, since the auditor's decision may be taken to be primâ facie right, and any future question on the subject can be raised under the liberty to apply. I therefore make no order as to that payment. I have now to deal with the liability of the parties as to costs. The case is one in which, assuming the solvency of the persons chargeable, ample justice can be had through the action of the auditor; but where the sum is large I think the ratepayers have a right, notwithstanding such solvency, to come here to check its growth. The 400*l*. might easily have become 4000*l*., and the suit against the local board is certainly a proper one. As to Lovering, I think he has shown himself, on the facts, not to be liable; but as to the other defendants who say that the payment was legal, and I was surprised to hear it argued that it was so, I do not think they are protected by the 140th section of the Act of 1848. The auditor was right to decide as he did, and I hold that it is clear that when persons who know or ought to know that they are acting irregularly, take out of the corporate chest money devoted to other purposes, they are acting illegally, and must be made to refund. It is hardly necessary to say that although the auditor has made the charge against only three, the others are not thereby absolved; at all events they would be secondarily if not primarily liable. As to the costs of Crowne, owing to some irregularity he has appeared and answered by himself; but as the informant has accepted his answer and not required a further answer from the corporation, it may be treated as if the corporation had joined in it. The decree will therefore be as follows: Continue the injunction against the defendant, the board of health, applying any moneys arising out of the rates in payment of any costs or expenses of the Bill in Parliament mentioned in the information. And it appearing that since the information was filed, that is, in the month of June 1872, the auditor has disallowed the sum of 400*l*. stated in the information to have been paid to Messrs. Wyatt and Hoskins out of the rates, and has surcharged the defendants Howard, Brickwell, and Clark with the said sum, this court doth not think fit to make any order in respect thereof; dismiss the information as against the defendant Lovering, with costs; order the defendant, the board of health, to pay the relator's costs of the motion for the injunction; order the informant to pay one set of costs as the costs of the defendant, the board of health, and the costs of the defendant Crowne, other than the costs of the motion for the injunction; the defendants Brickwell, Tregelles, Howard, and Clark to pay to the informant the costs paid by him to the defendants, the board of health and Crowne, and the costs of the suit other than the costs of the motion for the injunction. Liberty to apply.

Harbours, &c., Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 74—Damage to pier—Inevitable accident—Liability of owner of vessel.

Sect. 74 of the Harbours, &c., Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27) enacts that "the owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock or pier, or the buoys or works connected therewith, &c."

The above enactment applies to the case of damage done to a pier by a vessel through inevitable accident caused by stress of weather.

CASE.

THIS is a case stated by us, the undersigned, five of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the division of Woodbridge, in the county of Suffolk, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before us as hereinafter stated:

At a petty sessions holden at the Shire Hall, Woodbridge, in and for the division of Woodbridge, in the county of Suffolk, on the 13th March 1872, a complaint preferred by Charles Samuel Tovell (hereinafter called the respondent), against John Dennis (hereinafter called the appellant), under sects. 74 and 75 of the Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27, charging, for "that, on the 27th Sept. 1871, the said John Dennis was the owner of a certain vessel called the Ava, which said vessel, on the day and year aforesaid, at or near Landguard, in the county of Suffolk, did damage to the pier and works of the Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board, there situate, to the amount of 50*l*., by striking violently against the said pier and works, and breaking and destroying divers parts of the same, the said vessel at the time such damage was done not then being in charge of any duly licensed pilot, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided, by reason whereof the said John Dennis, as such owner, of the said vessel, became liable to pay to the said Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board, the sum of 50*l*.," was heard and determined by us, the said John Dennis, the appellant, appearing by Edward Chapman, his attorney, and the said Charles Samuel Tovell being then present; and upon such hearing the appellant was by us ordered to pay to the said Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board, the sum of 50*l*., and in default of payment thereof, the same to be recovered according to law, and an order was afterwards drawn up and signed. Herewith is a copy of such order, which is to be taken as part of this case.

The appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said complaint, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into recognizances as required by the statute in that behalf.

Now therefore we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved on the part of the respondent and found as a fact, that the said vessel, the Ava, did the damage as alleged in the complaint, and it was proved on the part of the appellant that the said damage was the result of an inevitable accident caused by stress of weather, and did not arise from any wilful act or negligence of the master or other persons in the said vessel, and it was contended therefore, on the part of the appellant, that he was not liable to pay to the said Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board the amount claimed for damage so done as aforesaid.

We, however, being of opinion that the said appellant became liable under sect. 74 of the Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27 (a), to pay the said Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board the said sum of 50*l.* for the damage so done as aforesaid, whether the damage was the result of inevitable or unavoidable accident or otherwise, gave our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law arising in the above statement for the opinion of this court therefore is,

Whether the said damage to the said pier and works, being the result of an inevitable accident, caused by stress of weather, and not arising from any wilful act or negligence of the master or other persons in the said vessel, the said appellant became liable to pay to the said Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board the amount claimed in respect of the damage so done as aforesaid.

If the court should be of opinion that the said order was legally and properly made and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said order is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said complaint is to be dismissed.

And the court is humbly solicited according to the power vested in the court by the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, to remit the case to us the said justices with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court may seem fit.

Grantham, for the appellant, contended that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to make the owners of vessels liable for an inevitable accident of this kind. [COCKBURN, C.J. —It may seem strange, but the Legislature has said that the owner of the ship shall be liable for the accident, however occurring. It may have been supposed that such a case would seldom occur.]

Philbrick (with him Tindal Atkinson), for the respondent, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—The Lord Chief Justice has left the court, but he has already intimated his opinion. I am of opinion that the Legislature, whether intentionally or not, has said that "the owner of every vessel, or float of timber, shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, &c." The Legislature has put the owner in the same position as a man who keeps a dangerous animal, who must do so at his peril, and be answerable for any injury such animal may do. It enacts simply that the owner shall be liable for whatever damage the vessel may occasion. It appears to me that the Legislature has clearly said so, whether it intended it or not.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rating—Paving of new streets—Land bounding or abutting on street—Metropolis Local Management Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77.

Sect. 77 of the Metropolis Local Management Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) enacts that "where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by the 105*th section of* 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, have paved, or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street, shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same," &c.

Vacant land possessed by a railway company close to one of the piers of a railway bridge, and used for the purposes of repairing the bridge, and land which is partly vacant and partly a buttress or support to the embankment of the railway, are "land" within the meaning of the above enactment.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, by James Taylor Ingham, Esq., sitting magistrate of the Hammersmith Police Court, under and by virtue of the statute made and passed in the 21st year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43) intituled "an Act to improve the administration of the law so far as respects summary proceedings before justices of the peace."

The appellant is the secretary of the Hammersmith and City Railway Company, and the respondent is the clerk of the vestry of the parish of Saint Mary Abbots, Kensington, in the county of Middlesex.

The appellant was summoned for having neglected to pay to the vestry or the respondent the sum of 54*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*, charged upon the appellant as the owner of certain land abutting upon a street known as St. Marks-road, in the parish of Ken-

(a) Sect. 74 of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27, provides that the owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the buoys or works connected therewith, and the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done, shall also be liable to make good the same, &c., provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of.

sington, in respect of paving works to be carried out in the said St. Marks-road, under the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, and the other Acts of Parliament amending the same.

The following is a copy of the summons:

HAMMERSMITH POLICE COURT.

Metropolitan Police District to wit. } To John Drew Higgins, Secretary, Hammersmith and City Railway Company, Paddington Station. Whereas George Capper Harding, the clerk of the vestry of the parish of St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, in the county of Middlesex, has this day made complaint before me, one of the magistrates of the police courts of the Metropolis sitting at the Hammersmith Police Court in the said county and within the Metropolitan Police District, that you have refused or neglected to pay to the said vestry or to their said clerk the sum of 54*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* (although the same has been duly demanded of you), such sum being charged upon you as owner of certain land situate and being east and west side of St. Mark's-road, in the said parish of Kensington, and abutting on a certain street or way, known as St. Mark's-road, in respect of paving works to be carried out in St. Mark's-road aforesaid, under and by virtue of the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act, and the other Acts of Parliament amending the same. These are therefore to command you in Her Majesty's name to be and appear on Thursday next, at two o'clock in the afternoon at the Police Court aforesaid, before me or such other magistrates of the said Police Court as may then be there, to answer to the said complaint, and to be further dealt with according to law.

Given under my hand and seal this 1st March 1872, at the Police Court aforesaid.

(Signed) J. T. INGHAM.

The summons was heard before me on the 7th and 14th March 1872, and at the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted:

The said Saint Mark's-road was formerly an occupation road for horses and carts leading to Notting Barn Farm, and also a public footpath, but of late years buildings have been erected and a street formed. On the 2nd Aug. 1870, the said vestry duly passed a resolution that the said Saint Mark's-road was not paved to the satisfaction of the said vestry, and that it was necessary and expedient that the carriage ways and footpaths thereof should be paved throughout the whole breadth thereof, in pursuance of sect. 105 of the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), and sect. 77 of the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102).

The appellant, as the secretary of the Hammersmith and City Railway Company is the owner of the land consisting of two portions abutting on the said Saint Mark's-road, one portion being on the west side of the said road, and having a frontage of ten feet, the other portion being on the east side of the said road, and having a frontage of seventy-three feet.

The surveyor for the time being of the said vestry had in pursuance of the aforesaid sections estimated the amount of the expenses for providing and laying such pavement, and apportioned the amount chargeable against the owners of the said two pieces of land at the sum of 7*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* for and in respect of the piece situate on the west side of the said road, and at the sum of 47*l.* 9*s.* for and in respect of the piece situate on the east side. Notice of the said resolution and apportionment, and demanding payment of the said sums respectively dated the 3rd Oct. 1871, were duly posted and served by the respondent upon the appellant. Copies of such notices are annexed hereto, and are to be taken to form part of this case:

The Hammersmith and City Railway crosses St. Mark's-road on an arch at a height of 16ft., and is carried in the direction of Hammersmith on brick arches. From the east side of the said road the railway is carried on an embankment, the foot of such embankment projecting from 40ft. to 50ft. the line of the arches.

It was also proved that the portion of land on the west side of the said road forms part of a strip of an uniform width of 10ft., which is kept and solely used for the purpose of repairing the arches of the viaduct. It was also proved that the embankment on the east side of the said road formed part of the railway, and acts only as a buttress or support thereto, and could not be used for any other purpose. The space situate between the foot of the embankment and the wall is land purchased by the company to allow for the slippings of the embankment, which have actually taken place, and are likely to recur owing to the peculiar nature of the soil.

It was further admitted by the surveyor for the said vestry that the amounts estimated as chargeable against the owners of the two pieces of land was so estimated in respect of the whole frontage of the two frontages of 10ft. and 73ft. respectively.

Under the above circumstances, it was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was not liable to contribute to the said expenses in respect of his ownership of either of the said portions of land, on the ground that they were mere strips of land forming part of and appertaining to the railway, and necessary for its maintenance; that there was no separate ownership apart from the railway; and that the appellant was not chargeable under the before-mentioned Acts as owner of the railway.

It was further contended that even assuming the appellant to be chargeable in respect of his ownership of so much of the land on the east side of the said road as is situated between the part C. on the said plan and the foot of the said embankment he was not chargeable in respect of the embankment itself or any portion of it, and that therefore the amount claimed in the summons could not be recovered, and the summons must be dismissed.

I found as a fact that the portion of land on the western side of the said road is used with the said railway, and necessary for the repairs thereof, and further, that about one half of the portion of land on the eastern side of the said road is simply a buttress or support to the embankment, but I was of opinion that neither portion thereby lost its character of land, and I therefore made an order that the appellants should pay the said sum of 54*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* in the summons mentioned and 2*s.* costs.

The appellants being dissatisfied with my determination as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied to me in writing within three days to state and sign a case for the opinion of one of the Superior Courts of law, in pursuance whereof I have stated and signed the above case.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the appellant is liable to pay the said sum of 54*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* If the court shall answer this question in the affirmative the said order shall be affirmed and the appellant shall pay the respondent the costs of this appeal. If the court should answer the above question in the negative, the said order to be quashed and the summons dismissed, and the respondent shall pay the appellant the costs thereof and of this appeal.

Lopes, Q.C. (with him E. E. Webster), for the appellant, contended that these portions of land were not "land" within the meaning of the Acts 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. Sect. 105 of the former Act provides that "in case the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district is situate, be desirous of having the same paved, as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriageway and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall, on demand, pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement, &c." Sect. 162 provides that "all such hospitals, public schools, and other public buildings, dead walls, and void spaces of ground as are now by law rateable to any rate for the costs and charges of paving or repairing the pavements within any parochial or other district, either separately or jointly with any other object or objects (except only places of religious worship and burial grounds, or places which have been used for burial grounds and are not used for any other purpose) shall be rateable under this Act to the like extent and for the like objects or purposes as they may now be rated, &c." It cannot be said that the present case comes within these enactments; but it will probably be contended that the case does come within sect. 77 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102. That section enacts that "where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by the 105th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, have paved or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do, &c." It is submitted that the portions of land mentioned in the present case are not "land" within the meaning of this section. It was evidently the intention of the Act to make liable to rating only such lands as would derive advantage from the paving, which none of the lands here would do. That the word "land" in the Metropolis Management Acts is not always to be taken in its widest sense, is shown by the case of Angell v. The Vestry of Paddington (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 714), where a church, built on land conveyed to the Commissioners for building Additional Churches, was held not liable to be assessed to the expenses of forming a new street, either as "house" or "land" under those Acts. [Prentice, Q. C. referred the court to the case of Lord Northbrook (app.) v. The Plumstead Board of Works (resps.) (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 183) where it was held that the words "bounding or abutting on such street," include the soil of private roads leading out of a new street.] Bowditch (app.); The Wakefield Local Board of Health (resps.) (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 567; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 88) was also referred to.

Prentice, Q. C. (with him Beresford) for the respondents, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I did not hear the whole of the argument, but so far as I gather from it, I cannot see that there is any doubt whatever upon the point. Our judgment must therefore be for the respondents.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have no doubt that land occupied as a railway continues to be land. The only reason assigned why it should not be is that those who have the freehold of a church are not rateable in respect of it; but the two cases are not at all similar.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the 77th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, exactly meets this case. That section provides that "where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by the 105th section of the firstly recited Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) have paved or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same," &c. This section seems to me to meet the very case of land not built upon abutting on any street, such as exists in the present case.

WARWICK AND BIRMINGHAM CANAL COMPANY (apps.) v. GUARDIANS OF BIRMINGHAM (resps.)

Poor-rate—Wharf, canal, towing path—Same proportion as other land and grounds.

By a local Act of 1793, the appellants are to be rated in respect of their lands and grounds, and all warehouses and other buildings, in the same proportions as other lands, grounds, and buildings lying near the same are rated. Near the offices, machine-houses, wharf, canal, towing path, and premises, for which the appellants are rated in the respondent's parish, are pieces of vacant land, a piece of garden ground, and sets of premises consisting of warehouses or gasometers, and also of yards and wharves used therewith.

Held, that the appellants' wharf, canal, and towing path, ought not to be rated in the same proportion as the neighbouring piece of garden ground; nor as if it were land occupied by the appellants, supposing no canal to exist; but that the land upon which the neighbouring sets of premises stand ought to be calculated in the proportion.

ON an appeal to the general quarter sessions holden in and for the borough of Birmingham against a poor's rate made the 15th April 1871 for the parish of Birmingham, in which the above-named appellants were rated as occupiers in respect of their offices, machine houses, wharf, canal, towing path, and premises at a gross rental (estimated) of 462*l.*, and a rateable value of 416*l.*, the recorder amended the rate by reducing the gross estimated rental to 186*l.*, and the rateable value to 163*l.*, subject to the opinion of the court of Queen's Bench upon the following case:

The appellants are a canal company incorporated by an Act of 33 Geo. 3, entitled "An Act for making and maintaining a navigable canal from, or nearly from, a place called the Saltisford, in the parish of St. Mary, in the borough of Warwick, into or near the parish of Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, and to terminate at or near to a certain navigable canal in or near to the town of Birmingham, called the Digbeth Branch of the Birmingham and Fazeley Canal Navigations."

The following sections of this Act are material to the present case:

Sect. 29:

And be it further enacted and declared that the said company of proprietors shall from time to time, be rated to all parliamentary and parochial rates, taxes, and assessments, for and in respect of the lands and grounds to be purchased or taken, and all warehouses and other buildings to be erected by the said company of proprietors, in pursuance of this Act, in the same proportions as other lands, grounds, and buildings lying near the same, are, or shall be rated.

Sect. 53:

And be it further enacted and declared, that the said rates, tolls, and duties shall at all times hereafter be exempted from the payment of all and every parliamentary and other taxes, rates, assessments, or impositions whatsoever.

By the said Act all necessary powers were given to the company to take hold and use lands and erect buildings for the purposes of the company, and to make and maintain the canal and wharves, and to take tolls in respect thereof, all of which have been duly exercised by the company.

The canal has long since been made, and a portion thereof, including the towing path, and some wharves and buildings, are situate within the parish and borough of Birmingham. One of the said wharves, and a portion of the water way or basin made by the company is let off to, and occupied by the Grand Junction Canal Company; the remainder of the canal and premises attached thereto being occupied by the appellants' company.

On the 15th April 1871, a poor's rate for the parish of Birmingham was duly made, and the appellants were assessed thereto as follows:

	Gross Value	Rateable Value
Offices, Machine Houses, Wharf, Canal, Towing-path, and Premises.	£462	£416

but during the hearing of the appeal, these figures were altered to 328*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* gross, and 300*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* rateable value, it having been agreed between the surveyors on both sides, that a portion of the canal, situate in the parish of Aston had by mistake been included in the rate.

Against this rate the appellants duly appealed to the quarter sessions for the borough of Birmingham, and in their grounds of appeal, they complained that they were overrated, and were not rated in accordance with the aforesaid provisions of their Act of Parliament. The appeal was heard at the Epiphany sessions, 1872.

A plan was made part of the case, but the following explanation of the locality is sufficient for the material points of the decision: The canal runs nearly in a straight line across part of the respondents' parish, and a section of this piece of the canal, about the middle, is in the parish of Aston. On one side of this piece of canal are pieces of vacant land not rated, and at the part which is in the Aston parish there is a piece of garden ground called Earl Howe's ground which is entirely in the parish of Aston. On the other side of the canal, there are first a wharf and basin in the sole occupation of the Grand Junction Canal Company, next a basin, a wharf, and some buildings in the occupation of the appellants; then come three sets of premises in the separate occupation respectively of W. A. Lyndon, the Birmingham Gas Company, and S. Walker. Each set of premises consists of buildings, either warehouses or gasometers, and also of yards and wharves used therewith. Of these five sets of premises, each has an access to the street; each is surrounded by walls except on the sides abutting on the canal; and each is a separate tenement.

There were about five acres of garden ground similar to Earl Howe's ground, belonging to the London and North-Western Railway Company, situate in the parish of Aston, about a quarter of a mile distant from the canal, and divided from the canal by the line of the London and North-Western Railway Company, but accessible by communication under the line of railway.

At the hearing of the appeal no question arose with regard to the value of the appellants' buildings, which were taken at 29*l.* 13*s.* gross estimated rental, and 22*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* rateable valuable.

With regard to the remainder of their premises, the appellants contended that the above-mentioned garden grounds were the only lands and grounds which in the present instance could be the measure of their rateable value within the true meaning of the aforesaid sections of their Act of Parliament, and if this contention be correct, their canal, towing-path, wharf, and basin, would be rateable at 22*l.* gross estimated rental, and 20*l.* rateable value.

The respondents, on the other hand, contended that the wharves, yards, and open spaces uncovered with buildings were as much lands and grounds within the meaning of the above Act of Parliament as the garden grounds aforesaid, and that, therefore, the said garden grounds (which were wholly situate in another parish) were not the only lands and grounds to be taken into consideration in assessing the rateable value of the canal and its adjuncts; but that they, the respondents, were also entitled to take into consideration the rateable value of the wharves, yards, and open spaces above mentioned, occupied by Lyndon, the Birmingham Company, the Grand Junction Canal Company, and S. Walker, severing wholly therefrom the sites from any actual buildings or parts thereof, though considering such wharves, yards, and open spaces enhanced in value by reason of such buildings and of others in the neighbourhood. By thus striking an average of all, which they consider as lands and grounds within the meaning of the above statute, lying near the canal, the respondents arrive at a measure of value for the canal; and thus the gross estimated rental of the canal premises would be 299*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, and the rateable value 277*l.* 19*s.*

The Recorder did not adopt either of the above contentions, but asked the witnesses on either side to put a value on the whole land occupied by the appellants in the parish, supposing it to exist in its present position, but with no canal, and to be let to a tenant from year to year, and acting on this opinion, and finding as a fact that the wharf of the canal was as much open land as any in the neighbourhood, reduced the rate to 186*l.* gross, and 163*l.* net; such sums nevertheless, including the value of the said buildings of the appellants before mentioned; and on the application of both parties a case was granted for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. The question for the court is whether the view taken by the Recorder, or that taken by the respondents, or that taken by the appellants, be the correct one; and the rate is to stand or to be amended on the facts herein stated in accordance with the judgment of the court.

Wills, Q.C. (with him Chandos Leigh and Dugdale), argued for the appellants.—This is a question primæ impressionis; for the case of The Grand Junction Canal Company v. The Overseers of Hemel Hempstead (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 173), upon which the respondents rely, differs wholly from the present in its facts. The question here is, whether land with buildings upon it is to be taken as a test for the rating of open land. In Reg. v. Glamorganshire Canal (3 E. & E. 186), the words of the Act creating the rateability were in respect of the lands and grounds to be purchased or taken by the company, and concluded "in the same proportion as other lands lying near the same are or shall be rated." The court held upon those words the true principle of rateability was that the adjoining land covered with buildings should be brought into hotchpot, with the adjoining lands of other descriptions, and that appellants should be rated for the land occupied by the canal, according to the aggregate value at the time of making the rate of all the land brought into hotchpot. We say that all the land occupied by the Birmingham Gas Company is so essentially part of their premises and buildings as to be no test for the land of the canal. [BLACKBURN, J.—If the canal has a piece of land near, although it be building land, it does not seem right to reject it from consideration, and go some distance off in order to find a bit of garden land with which to compare it.] The canal can never be built upon, and therefore can never be made so valuable as this land immediately adjoining. We exclude from our calculation all land which has any building on it. [QUAIN, J.—If you sever buildings from land to make the rate, why not to obtain the test for the rate?] The other cases which bear upon this matter are:

Reg. v. Grand Junction Canal, 7 W. R. 597;
Rex v. Grand Junction Canal, 1 B. & Ald. 289;
Rex v. Monmouthshire Canal, 3 A. & E. 619;
Rex v. Regent's Canal, 6 B. & C. 720;
Rex v. Chelmer and Blackwater Navigation, 2 B. & Ad. 14.

Brown, Q.C. (with him Ewins Bennett and Buszard), for the respondents.—The land has been estimated in proportion to neighbouring land not covered with buildings, on the authority of the Hemel Hempstead case; but the other cases all seem to show that the value of the appellants' premises should have been estimated even at a higher rate than that taken by the respondents.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The question put to us is which of three different views of the appellants' rateability we think is the correct one. We are left to gather from a very slight statement of the facts in the special case what those views are, and we find it extremely difficult to tell what they are, especially that of the recorder. The authorities do not agree, and we ought to have a more exact statement of the facts in order to find which of them most nearly applies to this case. We are, however, clearly of opinion that the view taken by the appellants is wrong. Also, as far as we understand it, the recorder's is wrong. There remains then to be considered whether the respondents' view is right, or whether the land upon which the buildings stand ought not to be thrown into the hotchpot, from the aggregate of which the rateability should be computed as in the Glamorgan case. One thing, to my mind, is clear, viz., that the respondents have adopted a principle the least favourable to themselves of those which can be maintained, and, therefore, I think we ought to adopt their view in this appeal, and leave the future question as to the correct calculation to be raised upon another appeal. Our judgment is, therefore, for the respondents.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellants contend that ground in their neighbourhood, which has not been taken for buildings or the yards connected with them, should be solely considered in rating their canal. This is clearly wrong, for it is directly opposed to the decision of the Glamorgan case. It is difficult to understand the recorder's view of the matter; we doubt whether, under any circumstances, access to the canal should be excluded from the estimate. It may be a question whether the respondents are right; they have omitted the sites of buildings in the proportion they have adopted, and that seems to me to be in opposition to the Glamorgan case. It is sufficient, however, that on this rate the respondents cannot claim more than the amount they have fixed; so we give them judgment. Another case may determine the correct principle to be adopted in future.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the appellants cannot take a small piece of garden ground as the sole test of their liability. The recorder has left out of his calculation the enhanced value of the land by reason of its neighbourhood to the canal; and that also seems to me to be clearly wrong. If the respondents are not right, the question of their larger claim may be raised upon another occasion.

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. COMMISSIONERS OF HARWICH (resp).

Local rate—Permanent way of a railway—Attached to a station.

A local Act of 1819 authorised the respondents to rate all persons who should inhabit, hold, or occupy any house, shop, and other buildings within the limits of the Act, and the lands, yards, and gardens attached to and with any of the before-mentioned buildings respectively occupied.

The appellants had within the rateable district about a mile and a half of their railway and a station, with a station-master's house, a tank and pumping machine, and a yard for coals and trucks. They were rated by the respondents upon the value not only of the station and premises, but also of the permanent way.

Held, upon appeal against this rate, that the permanent way could not be said to be attached to or occupied with the station.

On the 17th Aug. 1870 the Commissioners of the town of Harwich made a certain rate under and by virtue of an Act made and passed in the 59 Geo. 3 entitled "An Act for paving, cleansing, lighting, watching, and otherwise improving the town of Harwich in the county of Essex, and supplying the same with water."

The appellants are the owners and occupiers of a railway running from the sea at Harwich through Dovercourt and Manningtree to London and other places, having a station, buildings, sheds, and premises at Dovercourt, together with the permanent way; and the amount payable by the appellants (if liable) in respect of the said rates for paving, lighting, and cleansing the said town of Harwich would be 9*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*

The appellants refused to pay the said 9*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, and gave notice of appeal to the court of quarter sessions of Essex, holden at Harwich, in and for the said county against the said rates. Afterwards by consent, and by order dated the 30th May 1872, the following special case was stated by the appellants and the respondents under the provisions of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, for the opinion of this honourable court, the parties thereto hereby agreeing that a judgment in conformity with the decision of this court, and for such costs as this court shall adjudge, may be entered at the County Quarter Sessions according to the provisions of the said Act.

The appellants are the Great Eastern Railway Company.

The respondents are the commissioners for carrying into execution an Act of Parliament passed in the 59 Geo. 3, and entitled "An Act for paving, cleansing, lighting, and watching the town of Harwich in the county of Essex, and supplying thesame with water."

The respondents on the 17th Aug. 1870, made, laid, and assessed a rate for the purposes of the said Act on the appellants, as a person duly rated and assessed under and by virtue of the said Act, amounting to 9*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, in respect of premises occupied by the appellants within the parish of Dovercourt in the said borough of Harwich.

The rate was duly allowed by two justices, and due notice of appeal to the quarter session was given under the said Act, and no objection is to be made to the form of the present appeal.

The 16th section of the before-mentioned Act enacts

And for defraying the charges and expenses for paving, cleansing, lighting, and watching the said streets, lanes, and other public passages and places, and for removing encroachments, obstructions, nuisances, and annoyances therein, and for supplying the said town with water, be it enacted, that from and after the 24th June 1819, one or more rate or rates, assessment or assessments, shall twice in every year (or oftener, if it shall be thought needful by the commissioners) be made, laid, and assessed by the said commissioners upon all and every person and persons who do, or shall inhabit, hold, or occupy any house, shop, warehouse, wharf, cellar, vault, stable coach house, brew house, brewing offices, granaries, malt houses, store houses, and other buildings within the limits of this Act, and the lands, yards, and gardens attached to and with any of the before-mentioned buildings respectively occupied (save and except any houses, buildings, or other hereditaments used and occupied for the purpose of any public charity, also all churches and chapels, which are not intended to be made liable to the rates hereby imposed), and in such competent sum and sums of money as the said commissioners shall yearly and every year order and direct, so as such rates or assessments do not exceed in the whole the sum of 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound in any one year, of the yearly value of such houses, shops, warehouses, wharfs, cellars, vaults, stables, coach houses, brew houses, brewing offices, granaries, malt houses, storehouses, and other buildings, yards, and gardens as aforesaid, such yearly value to be ascertained by such ways and means as the said commissioners shall think proper.

The appellants are the owners of a railway running from the sea at Harwich through Dovercourt and Manningtree to London, and having a station at Dovercourt hereinafter called the Dovercourt station. The portion of the permanent way of the railway passing through the parishes of St. Nicholas, Harwich, and of Dovercourt, is 1 mile 29 chains and 70 links, in length. Both these parishes are for the purposes of this case taken to be within the jurisdiction of the commissioners.

The Dovercourt station abuts on the said railway and stands on land belonging to the appellants. It comprises a house inhabited by the station-master in the employ of the appellants, which contains the ticket office and luggage room, and two waiting-rooms; the station has the usual platform, and there are also upon it an engine-shed, a large iron water tank erected on a brick pumping house, and a water column connected with the water tank, where the appellants' locomotive steam engines, both from such station and the railway station at Harwich, are supplied with all the water used in working the railway from the Harwich end of it. The station comprises also a yard open to the railway, and used for depositing coals from railway trucks for sale, and for unloading coals, bricks, limestone, and other materials brought there for removal by carts to the adjoining neighbourhood, but now only used for the last mentioned purpose. All the before-mentioned buildings and premises belong to the appellants, and are so used by them in carrying on their traffic.

The Public Health Act 1858 has not been adopted by the commissioners, so that the railway company do not come under the special provision of the 55th section of that Act.

The appellants are willing to pay so much of the said rate as applies to the buildings, land, and premises above described, but contended that they are not liable for so much as applies to the permanent way.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the permanent way is rateable by the commissioners under the 16th section of the said act.

Giffard, Q.C. (with him Marriott), appeared for the appellants, but was stopped by the court.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Grantham) argued for the respondents.—The station and this piece of the railway are ancillary to each other. [BLACKBURN, J.—The question is whether the permanent way of the railway can be said to be land attached to and with the station-master's house. I should think that the house is rather the adjunct of the railway.] In the case of Peto v. Overseers of West Ham (2 E. & E. 144), a dock was considered ancillary to an adjoining warehouse, and upon that ground the decision was approved of in a subsequent case, Reg. v. Neath Canal Navigation (40 L. J. 193, M. C.); there the dock was taken to be land, although covered with water, and here the permanent way cannot be the less land because it has iron rails upon it.

Giffard was not heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C. J.—To my mind this case is wonderfully clear. These rates are imposed upon persons amongst others occupying lands, yards, and gardens attached to, and with any of the buildings thereinbefore mentioned. The subject of the rate in question is the appellants' station, and the respondents contend that they may include the permanent way as land attached to that building. This piece of the permanent way is no part of the station but is the railway itself, and my only possible answer to the question submitted to us is that it is not subject to this rate. It cannot be said that a railway is attached to a station, and the appellants, therefore, are not properly rated.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns upon the terms of the local Act, and Mr. Manisty contends that this piece of permanent way is attached to the station in the same way as lands, yards, and gardens are generally attached to buildings. I think it is clearly not so, and our judg-ment must be for the appellants.

QUAIN, J.—Although a permanent way may be said to be land, it seems to me impossible to include it under the word "lands," when the context is "yards and gardens," as in this section.

REG v. TOMLINSON.

Certiorari—Bastardy order—Payment from previous summons—Amendment—12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7.

The mother of a bastard child obtained a summons against the defendant in Aug. 1870, but withdrew it when the hearing came on; she obtained a second summons, in which the complaint was stated to have been that day made, in March 1871, and upon the hearing the justices ordered the defendant, as putative father, to pay for the support of the child from the date of the first summons in Aug. 1870. This order having been brought up by certiorari, application was made by the complainant to amend this date in the order by inserting instead the date of the second summons:

Held, that 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7, gave the court no power to make such an amendment, and that the order must be quashed.

THIS was a rule obtained on behalf of the defendant Thomas Tomlinson, calling upon the complainant, Jane Flower, to show cause why the following order should not be quashed:

At a petty sessions of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Stafford, holden in and for the division of Stone, in the said county, at the police court, Stone, on the 25th April 1871, before us, John Bourne, Charles Meigh, and Edward Capper Copeland, Esquires, three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county—County of Stafford to wit—whereas, one Jane Flower, single woman, residing at Stone, within this division, did, on the 11th Aug. 1870, having been delivered of a male bastard child within twelve calendar months prior thereto, make application to Wm. Masefield, Esq., of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting for this division, for a summons to be served upon one Thomas Tomlinson, of Stone, whom she alleged to be the father of the said child, and a summons has been issued to the said Thomas Tomlinson to appear at a petty session to be holden on this day for this division, in which the said justices usually act, to answer her complaint touching the premises. And whereas the said Thomas Tomlinson having been duly served with the said summons within forty days from this day, and now appearing in pursuance thereof, and the said Jane Flower having now applied to us, the justices in petty sessions assembled, for an order upon the said Thomas Tomlinson, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And it being now proved to us in the presence and hearing of the said Thomas Tomlinson that the said child was, since the passing of an Act passed in 8 Vic. intituled "An Act for the further Amendment of the Laws relating to the Poor in England," that is to say, on the 27th May 1870, born a bastard of the body of the said Jane Flower. And we having in the presence and hearing of the said Thomas Tomlinson heard the evidence of such woman, and such other evidence as she hath produced, and having also heard all the evidence tendered on behalf of the said Thomas Tomlinson; and the evidence of the said Jane Flower, the mother of the said child, having been corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to our satisfaction, do hereby adjudge the said Thomas Tomlinson to be the putative father of the said bastard child; and having regard to all the circumstances of this case, we do now hereby order that the said Thomas Tomlinson do pay unto the said Jane Flower, the mother of the said bastard child, so long as she shall live, and shall be of sound mind, and shall not be in any gaol or prison, or under sentence of transportation, or to the person who may be appointed to have the custody of such bastard child under the provisions of the said statute, the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* per week from the said 11th Aug. now last, being the day upon which such application was made to the said justice as aforesaid, until the said child shall attain the age of thirteen years, or shall die, or the said Jane Flower shall marry. And we do hereby further order the said Thomas Tomlinson to pay to the said Jane Flower the sum of 3*l.* 5*s.*, being the costs incurred in obtaining this order, and the sum of 10*s.* for the midwife.

Given under our hands and seals at the sessions aforesaid,

JOHN BOURNE (L. S.)
C. MEIGH (L. S.)
ED. C. COPELAND (L. S.)

It appeared from the affidavit of the clerk to the justices who made the order that, on or about the 11th Aug. 1870, the said Jane Flower applied for and obtained a summons against the defendant; the information and complaint were taken before, and the summons was granted by, Wm. Masefield, Esq., one of the justices for that division. It was believed that the defendant had then removed from the neighbourhood of Stone to avoid service of the summons, and several successive summonses were issued on the said information and complaint, but the defendant could not be served until the month of March 1871, when he was duly summoned to appear on the 11th April. On that day the com plainant and defendant came before the justices, but the attorney for the former being unable to attend, the said Jane Flower, the complainant, applied for her case to be adjourned to the then next petty sessions. This application the defendant opposed, and refused his consent thereto except upon payment of the costs of the day. She thereupon, acting upon the advice of the clerk of her attorney, withdrew the summons and intimated her intention of taking out another, returnable at such time as would be convenient for her attorney to attend. A few minutes after the said summons was withdrawn the complainant and the clerk to her attorney applied for another summons to issue, and urged the issue thereof immediately, on the grounds that the defendant had then stated to them his intention of going away to avoid service. This application was made to Morton Edward Buller, Esq., one other of the said justices attending the said petty sessions, the said William Masefield not being then in attendance; and the said M. E. Buller thereupon issued his summons to the defendant, returnable on the 25th April, and reciting that application had that day been made to him by the said Jane Flower. On the said 25th April the complainant and defendant, and their attorneys duly appeared; and the justices then present, having heard the evidence offered on the part of the complainant, as also of the defendant, were fully satisfied that the defendant was the father of the complainant's child, and therefore made the said order now in question. A series of summonses having been issued against the defendant, the justices believed they might consider the summons signed by the said M. E. Buller as a summons issued upon the original information; and being perfectly satisfied that the defendant was the father of the said child, made the order as and from the date of the application to the said William Masefield, instead of the date of the application to the said M. E. Buller.

On the 24th Oct. 1872, after the issue of the rule for the certiorari, the complainant by her attorney gave notice to the defendant that she claimed to be entitled to be paid by him in respect of the order in bastardy in question from the 11th April 1871 only; and she thereby abandoned all and every claim against him for the maintenance of the bastard child, the subject of the said order in bastardy, prior to the said 11th April 1871.

McMahon now applied, on behalf of the said Jane Flower the complainant, to amend the said order by inserting the 11th April 1871 as the date of the application, and the time from which payment by the defendant was ordered to be made, instead of the 11th Aug. 1870, the date therein mentioned. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7:

> If upon the return to any writ of certiorari any objection shall be made on account of any omission or mistake in the drawing up of such order or judgment, and it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court that sufficient grounds were in proof before the justice or justices, making such order or giving such judgment, to have authorised the drawing up thereof free from the said omission or mistake, it shall be lawful for the court, upon such terms as to payment of costs as it shall think fit, to amend such order or judgment, and to adjudicate thereupon as if no such omission or mistake had existed.

In the case of Reg. v. Higham (7 E. & B. 557) this court amended a bastardy order under this section by striking out a statement that the defendant appeared by attorney, and held it to be good as if made upon an unopposed summons. They also amended other omissions and mistakes. [COCKBURN, C.J.—This was a mistake of the justices as to their jurisdiction, not in any way their clerk's mistake of fact. QUAIN, J.—How can you distinguish this from Reg. v. Cridland, in the same volume?] There is no authority for limiting the interpretation of this power of amendment so as to exclude the present case. [COCKBURN, C.J.—You are asking to amend the judgment itself.]

Kemplay, Q. C., appeared for the defendant, but was not heard.

The COURT (Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, and Quain, JJ.) refused to allow the amendment applied for.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

COOKE (app.) v. BUTLER (resp.)

County occupation franchise—Rateable value—Duty of revising barrister—Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), sect. 6, sub-sect. 2. In dealing with a claim to a county vote as a 12*l. occupier, the revising barrister is not bound by the rated value appearing on the rate book, but may take evidence and judge for himself as to whether the "rateable value" of the premises, in respect of which the claim is made, is* 12*l. or not.*

ON appeal from the revising barrister for the county of Bedford, the following case was stated:

At a court held on the 28th Sept. 1872, at Luton, in the county of Bedford, before &c., John Hubbard, of, &c., whose name had not been placed by the overseers on the list of persons entitled to vote as owner or tenant of lands and tenements within the said parish of Luton, of the rateable value of 12*l.* or upwards, claimed to have his name inserted in the said list as being the occupier of premises of the rateable value of 12*l.* or upwards.

It was proved or admitted that the said John Hubbard, being of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity, had occupied for a sufficient time on the 31st July last the said premises, and that he paid an annual rent of 14*l.*, which it was proved was a fair rent for the same premises; that he was the occupier thereof on the 31st July last, and had been such occupier for twelve months immediately preceding; that he had been duly rated, and paid all poor rates in respect of the premises; and that the premises were in an improving neighbourhood.

It was also admitted that the premises of the said John Hubbard were not rated at a lower rate than similar premises occupied by other persons in the said parish.

It appeared from the poor-rate book that the gross estimated rental of the premises was there stated to be 14*l.* 9*s.*, and the rateable value 11*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

It was objected by the said appellant that inasmuch as the premises were stated in the poor rate book to be of the rateable value of 11*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* only, and the respondent had paid rates upon that assessment, the respondent was not entitled to be registered as a voter in respect thereof.

I held that the property was of the real rateable value of 12*l.*, and allowed the claim, and inserted the name on the said list. If the court shall be of opinion that the claim should not have been allowed, the name is to be struck out of the list.

Gorst, for the appellant.—The question arises on the construction of the words "rateable value" in sect. 6, sub-sect. 2, of the Representation of the People Act 1867, and it is whether the revising barrister is bound, in estimating the value, by what appears in the rate book, or whether he is at liberty to decide for himself as to the rateable value of premises. If he is bound by the rate book, then "rateable value" means nothing more than "rated value." This appeal is made in order to settle the law on this point, as some barristers have held themselves concluded by the rate book, while others have taken evidence and judged for themselves. [BRETT, J.—The question is whether the words "rateable value" in this section mean anything more than the same words in the Act of 1832. Under the old Act, revising barristers always held themselves at liberty to judge for themselves.]

Bulwer, Q.C., for the respondent, was not called upon.

BOVILL, C.J.—I am of opinion that this matter was correctly decided by the revising barrister. The words of the Act are "of the rateable valueof 12*l.*" There is, of course, a distinction between lands of the rateable value of 12*l.* and lands rated at 12*l.*, and the words of the Act are not open to be construed as equivalent to "rated at 12*l.*" I think, therefore, notwithstanding the opinion of Mr. Davis, that the revising barrister was right. It is said that some revising barristers refuse to receive evidence of the real value of lands, and treat the rate book as conclusive of their value. I am, however, of opinion that that is wrong.

BRETT, J.—Here the 6th section says that persons occupying lands, &c., of the rateable value of 12*l.* shall, under certain conditions, be entitled to be registered. The question is whether that means the rateable value in point of fact, or the value appearing in the rate book, which, for the purpose of raising the point, we must assume not to be the real rateable value. To uphold the latter proposition, we must say that "of the rateable value of 12*l.*" means the same as "rated at 12*l.*" But in the next sub-sect. it is said, "and has . . . been rated," &c. It thus appears that the Legislature was fully alive to the distinction, and the distinction is a real one. It seems to me to be contrary to every rule of construction to say that these words mean "rated at 12*l.*" Whether it would be better or not to take the rate book as conclusive, is a question of politics, not of law, though, for my own part, I should not be disposed to concur in making the right to the franchise depend on the overseers, or throw into their hands the power of disfranchising a man possessed of the requisite amount of property.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

BESWICK (app.) v. ALKER (resp.)

County vote—Freehold land and pew rents—Parsonage house—Land held therewith—Sect. 24 of 2 Will. 4, c. 45.

A., the minister of St. M. Church, within the parliamentary borough of P., claimed a county vote in respect of freehold land and pew rents. No profit accrued to him from the land, but he was entitled to the rent of certain pews in the church on the land, which pews were let by the churchwardens. The rent of the pews exceeded 100*l. per annum. A. occupied the parsonage house, belonging to him as minister of St. M., which house was also within the borough of P., and in respect of which he had acquired the right to vote for the borough of P.*

Held, that A.'s estate in the freehold land and pew rents was not an estate in land occupied by him, together with the parsonage house, so as to disentitle him to a county vote in respect thereof under sect. 24 of The Representation of the People Act 1832 *(*2 Will. 4, c. 45).

ON appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for North-West Lancashire, the following case was stated:—

At a court holden, &c., the appellant duly objected to the name of the respondent being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members of Parliament for the said division in respect of property situate in the township of Preston.

The qualification of the respondent was set out in the register as follows:

Alker, Geo., Lisbon Hall, Fishwick. Freehold land and pew rents. St. Mary's Church, St. Mary's-street. The respondent is minister of St. Mary's Church, which is situated within the parliamentary borough of Preston. No profit has accrued to him, or is likely to accrue, from the above-named land; but under the "sentence of consecration" of the said church, he is entitled to the rents of certain pews and sittings which are let by the churchwardens according to a certain scale, which scale the churchwardens for the time being, may, with the consent of the bishop, alter from time to time as occasion may require; and after deducting yearly two several sums of 8*l.* 15*s.* and 5*l.*, for the services of the church, the said churchwardens pay the residue of such pew rents to the minister for the time being of the said church, to be received by him for his own absolute use and benefit by way of stipend. The sum which the respondent has so received from the above pew rents has always exceeded 100*l.* in the year.

The house mentioned on the register as the respondent's place of abode, is the parsonage house of the minister of St. Mary's, and the respondent occupies, and is rated for it, and in respect of it, has acquired the right to vote for the borough of Preston.

It was objected that the said house was part of his benefice, which benefice could not be divided, so that any part of it could confer on the respondent the right to vote for the said division, and that therefore his name should be expunged from the said register.

I decided that the respondent was entitled to have his name retained on the said register.

If a court should be of opinion that my decision was right, the respondent's name is to remain on the register; if the court is of opinion that my decision was wrong, his name is to be struck off.

Leofric Temple, Q.C. for the appellant.—No doubt, were it not for the fact that the respondent occupies the parsonage house, he would be entitled to vote for the freehold land and pew rents. But the question is, whether his occupation of the house, the land, and the pew rents, is not so much one occupation as to disentitle him, under sect. 24 of the Act of 1832. He holds them all under one title. Capell v. The Overseers of Aston (8 C. B. 1) and Barton v. The Same (8 C. B. 7) are authorities for the appellant. Though the facts there were just the reverse of what they are here, the reasoning of Wilde, C.J., is conclusive to show that the respondent could not sever what he held as minister of the church, so as to get the borough vote in respect of part, and the county vote in respect of another part.

Gorst, for the respondent, was not called upon.

BOVILL, C.J.—The question in this case is not as to the right of the respondent to vote for the county, but the objection, and the only objection to his vote, must rest on the construction to be placed on the 24th section of the Reform Act of 1832. On the statements in the case, I am of opinion that the respondent is not brought within the terms of that section. There is nothing to show that he is in the occupation of anything except the land which appears to be of no value. It is contended by the appellant that he is in the occupation of the pew rents; but if he is, the pew rents are not occupied with the parsonage house. Mr. Temple has contended that the respondent is in the occupation of the pews themselves; but there is no such statement in the case. The pews are occupied either by the churchwardens or the lessees. I cannot see any foundation for Mr. Temple's argument to bring the respondent within the terms of the 24th section. The precise nature of the respondent's right to the pew rents does not appear. The only question raised by the case is as to the true construction of the 24th section, which on the facts as stated has no application to the case.

BRETT, J.—It appears to me very difficult to get at the real facts of the case; but, as it seems to me, it must be taken to be stated that the claimant had such a freehold interest in respect of the pew rents as entitled him to a county vote, unless the fact of his occupation of the parsonage house, and of his being registered as an elector for the borough in respect thereof, brings him within the terms of the 24th section of the Act of 1832. He claims a vote for the county in respect of a freehold interest out of which he gets rents. We do not know the real facts as to the pew rents. The only way in which the claimant can have a county vote in respect of them, is that under the Act of Parliament by which the pew rents are collected, they may be considered as a charge on the land, or that he has a freehold interest in the church, the profit of which is represented by the rents. At any rate, the claimant is a clergyman, who must be considered as having a freehold interest in the church, and a freehold interest in the parsonage house which he occupies. He has claimed a county vote in respect of his freehold interest in the church; and his claim is objected to, not on the ground that he occupies the church, but on the ground that he occupies the parsonage house. Sect. 27 of the Act of 1832 says that a man shall not have a county vote in respect of his freehold interest in any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building occupied by himself, or in any land occupied by himself, or in any land occupied by himself with any house, &c. The case does not say that the claimant occupies the church; his claim in respect of the church must be taken to be a claim in respect of a freehold interest. Then it is said that he occupies the church and the house under one title. But if he could claim a vote for the borough in respect of the occupation of the church, it would be as the occupier of a "building." That would be a different qualification to that conferred by the parsonage house. I think the correct way of describing the state of facts is to say that the claimant occupies the house, and that he has the freehold in the church, which he does not occupy. Here are two distinct qualifications, just as much so as if a man has a freehold estate in a lot of houses within a borough under one title and occupies one and lets the rest. A man in such a case would have a vote for the borough in respect of the house he occupied and a county vote in respect of the others. That is just this case. On these grounds I think the revising barrister was quite right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. All I need add is, that I do not see how it can be said that the claimant occupies the pew rents or the land; or supposing that he does, how he can be said to occupy it together with the parsonage house.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the occupation of the house is connected with the right to the pew rents, and there is no other question before us. Decision affirmed.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

LITTLE (app.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF PENRITH (resp.)

Rating — Question whether rated or not — And whether described or not—Insufficient description —6 Vict. c. 18 s. 75.

G. A. was in all respects duly qualified as a county elector as joint occupier of premises with his brother, T. A., of the requisite value, if he could be said to be rated in respect of the premises and to be described on the rate-book. It appeared that some time ago N. A. had occupied the premises in question, carrying on business there, and being duly rated for the house. Some years ago he took two of his sons, the above-named G. A. & T. A. (he having several other sons), into partnership and into joint occupation of the premises. He then requested the overseer to change the rating to "N. A. and Sons," and the firm of "N. A. and Sons" had ever since remained on the rate-book as the occupiers of the premises. Some years subsequently N. A. retired from the business, leaving it to G. A. and T. A., who had since carried on the business and occupied the premises. Application had been made during that period from time to time to G. A. and T. A. for payment of the rate, and one or other of the brothers had always paid them, and taken a receipt as paid by "N. A. and Sons."

Held that G. A. was rated, and that the inaccurate or insufficient description was curable under 6 Vict. c. 18 s. 75.

ON appeal from the revising barrister for East Cumberland, the following case was stated:

At a court holden, &c., objection was duly made to the name of George Arnison being retained on the list of voters for the said parish. The facts of the case were as follows:—The name of George Arnison appeared upon the list in the following form:—

PARISH OF PENRITH.

Voters as Occupiers of Rateable Value of £12.

Christian Name and Surname of each Voter at full length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street.
Arnison, George	Burrowgate, Penrith.	Joint occupier of house and shop of the rateable value of £30 and upwards.	Devonshire-street.

1. The said George Arnison had a right to have his name retained upon the said list, provided the court should be of opinion that under the following circumstances the said George Arnison was duly rated in respect of the premises occupied by him within the meaning of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, sect. 6, sub-sect. 3.

2. The premises in question are described in the rate-book as follows:

Name of Occupier.	Name of Owner.	Description of Property Rated.	Name or Situation of Property.	Gross Estimated Rental.	Rateable Value.
				£ s. d.	£ s. d.
N. Arnison and Sons.	Nathan Arnison.	House and shop.	Burrowgate.	105 0 0	89 5 0

3. N. Arnison means Nathan Arnison. He is alive and was formerly the sole occupier of the premises, where he carried on the business of a draper. He subsequently took two of his sons, the above-mentioned George Arnison and Thomas Arnison into partnership, and the business was carried on under the name of "N. Arnison and Sons." Nathan Arnison has retired from business some years ago, and, ever since his retirement, the business has been carried on by the above-mentioned two sons, under the name of "N. Arnison and Sons."

4. The said two sons are now the sole occupiers.

5. Nathan Arnison has three other sons; they do not occupy the premises in question, nor do they carry on business with the two above-mentioned.

6. For the last five years, when the rates have been called for, they have been paid by one or other of the two (George Arnison or Thomas Arnison), and a receipt given for them as received from "N. Arnison and Sons."

7. With the consent of both parties, I received the statement of the overseer, and it is as follows: The overseer stated that when he came into office fifteen years ago, "N. Arnison" was solely rated for the premises in question. About seven years ago, the said N. Arnison requested him to alter the rating to "N. Arnison and Sons," but gave no names, and this rating has remained "N. Arnison and Sons" ever since.

8. I decided that as the said George Arnison was not named in the rate-book, otherwise than as above appears, he was not duly rated in respect of the premises occupied by him, within the meaning of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 6, sub-sect. 3.

9. The name of one other person was objected to under similar circumstances.

10. I expunged the name of the said George Arnison and the said other person from the said list.

If the court should be of opinion that I was wrong, the name of the said George Arnison and of the said other person will be restored to the said list.

Campbell Foster for the appellant.—The appellant claims the franchise under sects. 6 and 27 of the Representation of the People Act 1867. By sect. 59 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, sect. 75 of 6 Vict. c. 18, is made applicable to the present case, and the claimant being actually rated and described, (though insufficiently) in the rate-book, is entitled under that section to have the insufficient description rectified. Some description is given of him, for under the partnership name each partner is described. The remarks of Erle, J. in Moss v. Litchfield (14 L. J. 56, C.P.) are applicable.

The respondents did not appear.

BOVILL, C.J.—George Arnison occupied a house and premises jointly with Thomas Arnison. The two brothers carried on business there, and the name of the firm was "N. Arnison and Sons." There was no Nathan Arnison in the firm or in the occupation of the premises; but the two sons occupied the house, and carried on business there under the name of N. Arnison and Sons. On turning to the rate-book we find that N. Arnison and Sons were there rated in respect of the house, and the question now arises whether under that appellation the overseers intended to rate the persons who actually occupied the premises and carried on business there. It appears that the rates were in point of fact paid from time to time by one or the other of the brothers. The case seems to me just the same as it would be in the case of any other mercantile house—say that of Messrs. Child and Co. A house is occupied by Messrs. Child and Co., and if the name of the firm were entered on the rate-book as the occupiers, we should conclude that the overseers meant thereby to rate the persons occupying the premises and carrying on business there, and that they so rated them not knowing the names of the members of the firm. If that is so, whom must we consider to be described under the name of "N. Arnison and Sons?" I think the persons carrying on business under that name. In Moss v. The Overseers of St. Mary, Litchfield (14 L. J. 56, C. P.) the question raised was different to that raised by the present case; but the observation of Erle, J., was pertinent, that "if a partnership firm is charged in the rate, each partner is intended to be charged." I think, therefore, the revising barrister was wrong, and that his decision must be reversed. Whether the appellant was described in the rate-book sufficiently to enable the overseers to enforce payment by him is not in question and need not be determined.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I must confess I had some doubt upon the case in the course of the argument, but I now think the case falls within the 75th section of 6 Vict. c. 18. It appears that N. Arnison was first rated. He then took his sons into partnership, and, on the occasion of his doing so, went to the overseer and requested him to change the name of the occupier in the rate book. He did not mention the names of his sons, and it does not appear whether or no he had any reason for so doing. But it does appear that, after N. Arnison retired from the business, the rates were called for, and the two existing partners paid them. Under these circumstances, I come to the conclusion that the overseer intended, under the name of "N. Arnison and Sons," to rate the partners who occupied the premises and carried on business there. Undoubtedly, the description was not an accurate one, and I do not express any opinion as to whether or not payment of the rate might have been enforced, but I think the 75th section was just intended to meet a case where the rating is not precisely accurate, but where there has been a rating. The case is by no means free from doubt, but that is the conclusion at which I have arrived.

BRETT, J.—The appellant here, if entitled to a vote at all, is entitled under sect. 6 of The Representation of the People Act 1867, and, under sub-sect. 3 of that section, it is necessary to show that he has been rated to all the rates made in respect of the premises so occupied by him. On turning to the rate-book, we find a description of the persons who are rated in respect of the house occupied by the appellant, and the question is, whether that description is sufficient to show that the appellant is rated. That it is an accurate description cannot be maintained. But then it is said that the want of accuracy may be cured by sect. 75 of 6 Vict. c. 18. That section is, no doubt, made applicable to the new occupation franchise in counties, and the question, therefore, is whether the present case falls within the 75th section. It has before been remarked, that sect. 75 is somewhat singularly drawn, as the earlier part of the latter half of the section seems to apply (if the person has been bonâ fide called upon to pay the rate, and has bonâ fide paid) though the occupier has never been rated at all. But the proviso at the end of the section, "any misnomer, or inaccurate, or insufficient description in any rate of the person so occupying or of the premises occupied notwithstanding," seems to assume that some description has been given of the person in the rate-book, though the description is inaccurate or insufficient, and the name a misnomer. It assumes, therefore, that there has been an intention to rate the person occupying. It follows, therefore, to bring the present appellant within the provisions of the 75th section, that he must be shown, not only to have paid the rates, but to have been in fact rated, and that there has been an attempt to describe him in the rate-book. We must, therefore, first inquire, whether it is shown that there was an intention to rate the claimant, and an attempt made to describe him in the rate-book. It appears that at first N. Arnison, the father, was solely rated, and, when he was so, was properly described. He then took his two sons into partnership, and when he did so, he went to the overseer and requested him to make a charge in the rate book to "N. Arnison and Sons." There can be no meaning in what he did, unless he meant to have his sons put in the rate. The evidence before the revising barrister as to the next material point (which was not only that the father meant the appellant and his other son to be rated, but that he gave instructions to that effect to the overseer who acted upon them), was that the overseer made the alteration as requested by N. Arnison, and from that time received the rates from, and gave a receipt to, the firm of N. Arnison and Sons. I think these circumstances show that in point of fact there was an intention to rate not only the father, but also any sons of his who might be members of the firm, even though their names were not in the rate-book. That is sufficient to show that the appellant was in point of fact rated. Then arises the question, whether any description is given of him, though an inaccurate one. I think that "N. Arnison and Sons" is a description of all the persons comprising that firm, if intended to be so. There was then both the intention to rate, and a description though inaccurate and insufficient, and consequently sect 75 applies. It seems to me, that what weighed most on the mind of the revising barrister was, not so much that there was no intention to rate the appellant, as that he was not found at all in the rate-book. But I think if under the name of the firm it was intended to include the appellant, and to describe him in those terms, the revising barrister was wrong in thinking that the appellant was not described at all. The decision must be reversed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. First of all I joined with my brother Keating in entertaining doubts upon the point, and should have liked to have heard counsel on the other side. The doubt that I had was whether it could be said that there was a misnomer or an inaccurate or insufficient description, when there was no description at all; and, secondly, whether the sons were really described at all. But, on reflection, I think there is some description of the sons. Then, if we once get that, the 75th section becomes applicable. I express no opinion as to the sufficiency of the description for the purposes of enforcing payment of the rate; nor can I think the intention of the overseer the sole guide in the matter. I think there was a description, which, though not sufficient, is cured by the 75th section. The revising barrister probably thought that as the appellant was not named, he could not be said to be described, and therefore sect. 75 could not apply.

Decision reversed.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and H. LEIGH, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 21, 1872.

HILTON v. ANKESSON.

Fences—Non-liability to repair—Straying of cattle from defects of—Distress damage feasant.

An owner or occupier of lands, though bound to take care that his cattle do not wander from his own land, and stray upon the land of another, is under no legal obligation to put up or maintain a fence so as to prevent the cattle of his neighbour straying upon his land: such an obligation can only be founded upon a statutory obligation, or some agreement or covenant.

The plaintiff was the occupier of a field, which was separated from a field in the occupation of the defendant by a hedge or fence. In consequence of this fence being out of repair, the plaintiff's cattle strayed into the field of the defendant, and were seized by him as a distress damage feasant. Upon an action brought by the plaintiff for this seizure of the cattle, the pleadings raised the issue of whether or not the defendant was bound to repair the hedge through which the cattle escaped, and the only evidence of liability consisted in the practice for fifty years and upwards, of the defendant and his predecessors to repair such hedge:

Held, that this was in itself no proof of such liability.

THIS was a rule calling upon the defendant to show cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and a new trial be had, upon the ground that there was evidence to go to the jury of the defendant's obligation to repair the fence, and evidence to go to the jury to support the plaintiff's case.

The declaration was for trespass and illegally impounding the plaintiff's cattle. The defendant pleaded (second plea) that he seized the cattle as for a distress damage feasant. To this the plaintiff replied (second replication) to the second plea that before the time when the said cattle were so as aforesaid in the close of the defendant, the plaintiff was possessed of a close contiguous and next adjoining the said close of the defendant, and the defendant and all other tenants and occupiers of the last-mentioned close for the time being from time to time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, have repaired, and of right ought to repair, the hedges and fences between the last-mentioned close and the said close of the plaintiff as often as need hath been and required in order that cattle being feeding and depasturing in those closes respectively might not err or escape out of the one into the other of them through the defects of the said hedges and fences, and because the said hedges and fences between the said closes of the defendant and the plaintiff, before and at the time when, &c., were ruinous and in decay for want of needful repair thereof, the said cattle then lawfully being and depasturing in the said close of the plaintiff a little before the time when, &c., erred and strayed out of the last-mentioned close into the close of the defendant through the defects in the said hedges and fences between the said closes, and on that occasion were in the said close in which, &c., until the defendant of his own wrong, and before the plaintiff had notice of the premises and could remove the said cattle, committed the trespass in the declaration mentioned.

The case was tried before Bramwell, B. at the Lewes Assizes. The facts of the trespass and seizure were admitted, and the only question was, as to whether or not the defendant was liable to repair a certain hedge which separated his field from that of the plaintiff, and through the want of repair of which hedge the plaintiff's cattle strayed into the field of the defendant. In support of the plaintiff's case the plaintiff was called, but he had only lived in the farm a few months, and could give no material evidence upon the point; but a Mr. Greenfield who was a former occupier, and also the steward of the landlord, were called, and they proved that the occupier of the defendant's farm had from time to time for fifty years done what repars were necessary, and Mr. Greenfield upon being asked why he had done so? replied because he thought that every man was bound to keep his hedges in repair. Both the witnesses however failed to show any legal obligation upon the occupier to do the repairs. Upon this, the learned judge directed a nonsuit with leave to move to set it aside. A rule having been accordingly obtained.

Parry, Serjt., and Joyce, showed cause.—There was no evidence adduced on the part of the plaintiff to show any obligation on the part of the defendant to keep up or repair the hedge separating the two fields. The law is very clear, and was fully considered in Boyle v. Tamlyn (6 B. & C. 329). The marginal note there is, "Where the owner of two adjoining closes (A. and B.), separated by a fence and gate which had always been repaired by the occupier of B., sold A. to the plaintiff, and two years afterwards sold B. to the defendant: Held, that the latter was not bound to repair the gate unless he or his vendor had made some specific bargain with the plaintiff to that effect, and that the doing of occasional repairs was not evidence of such bargain." In his judgment in that case Bayley, J., says: "There can be no doubt that the general rule of law is that a man is only bound to take care that his cattle do not wander from his own land and trespass upon the land of others. He is under no legal obligation, therefore, to keep up fences between adjoining closes of which he is owner; and even where adjoining lands, which have once belonged to different persons, one of whom was bound to repair the fences between the two, afterwards become the property of the same person, the pre-existing obligation to repair the fences is destroyed by the unity of ownership. And where the person who has so become the owner of the entirety afterwards parts with one of the two closes, the obligation to repair the fences will not revive unless express words be introduced into the deed of conveyance for that purpose." In the present case there was no evidence whatever to show a legal liability on the part of the defendant to repair the hedge, and the fact that he and his predecessors were in the habit of doing so was no evidence of an obligation. It was the duty, therefore, of the plaintiff to see that his cattle did not escape from his own land on to that of another.

Hawkins, Q.C. and Grantham, in support of the rule. It was entirely a question for the jury. The defendant and his predecessors having always repaired the hedge, it was a fair inference to draw that they were under some legal obligation to do so. Mr. Greenfield, who occupied before the defendant, stated that he believed he was liable to repair the fence. Where it is necessary for the safe keeping of cattle that there should be a fence, it might properly be assumed from the conduct of the parties that there is a legal liability to repair; if otherwise, it would be necessary that each occupier of adjoining fields should have a separate hedge. They cited Singleton v. Williamson (31 L. J. 17, Ex.).

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the nonsuit was right, and that the judge was not justified in leaving any of the facts in the case as evidence of a liability to repair. A liability to repair a fence can only be created by Act of Parliament, or some agreement or covenant which will constitute a binding contract between the parties. Undoubtedly, there may be evidence of such an agreement or covenant by the acts of the parties, as where a person is called upon to repair, and he has repaired accordingly; in such a case, although the evidence would be by no means conclusive, it would still be evidence for the consideration of the jury. But there is no such fact here. The evidence is simply this, that the defendant had kept his land fenced. That, however, was no evidence of a liability to repair. If a man chooses to surround his land with a fence, he may pull the fence down again at any time. He may erect a fence to prevent his cattle from straying upon the property of his neighbours. That which he had a right to set up he has a right to pull down; and no matter how long he has had it up or repaired it, that affords no evidence of a legal liability to repair it. It would really be alarming if the law were otherwise—if a person who once set up a fence were compelled to keep it up. In this case I cannot see a particle of evidence of the liability of the defendant to repair the hedge; and the learned judge was quite right in so holding.

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The question is whether there was a fence which the defendant was liable to repair? I really cannot see that there is any evidence whatever of any such liability. It certainly seems that for fifty years at least the fences were kept up by the defendant and his predecessors; but they were kept up for his own purposes, and not for the sake of his neighbours; and it is argued that such repairs are evidence of an obligation to repair, but no such legal obligation is to be inferred from such acts of repairing.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion that there was no evidence of a liability on the part of the defendant to repair the fence. When the rule was moved I understood that there were additional facts, such as that the defendant had repaired the fence, when it was not necessary that he should have done so for his own purposes, but now it is quite clear that that was not so. It was certainly necessary that some evidence should have been given of the obligation to repair, such as that he had been called upon by his neighbour to repair, and he had repaired accordingly.

BRAMWELL, B.—I continue of the same opinion that I entertained at the trial. It is quite clear that there is no obligation to fence land that has not been fenced before. Well, if a party is not bound to fence, he may take down any fence that he may have put up, or he may let it fall down. It is said, however, that his repairing the fence is evidence that he is bound repair it; but as he puts it up for his own purposes he may surely take it down again. Again, it is said that the witness said he thought he was bound to repair his fence, and, therefore, he did repair it. This, however, shows no obligation to repair. There was no requisition to repair, and no repairing in consequence. To hold that a man who erects a fence, and repairs it from time to time, is bound always to continue it, would involve a serious state of things.

Rule discharged.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

ERROR FROM THE EXCHEQUER.

Tuesday, June 25, 1872.

(Before WILLES, BYLES, BLACKBURN, KEATING, MELLOR, LUSH, and BRETT, JJ.)

WHITECHURCH AND OTHERS v. THE EAST LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Poor rate—Parochial rate—Railway company—Rating of lands taken by railway company under compulsory powers—Liability of company to make good deficiency in rate by reason of lands being so taken—East London Railway Act 1865 (28 Vict. c. li., s. 128)—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18, s. 133).

The defendants, under the powers of their special Act (28 Vict. cap. li.) had taken lands in several parishes for the purpose of constructing several lines of railway thereon, one of the railways (No. 1) passed through (amongst other parishes) the parish of R., of which the plaintiffs are the overseers.

Under sect. 128 of their said Act, the defendants are liable to make good the deficiency in the rating of any parish in which they shall have taken rateable property for the purpose of their railway, by the reason of their having so taken it, until the railway or the works thereof are completed, and assessed or liable to be assessed to such rates.

By the interpretation clause of the said Act, the expression, "the railways," means, "the railways, stations, works, &c., or any or either of them, or any part thereof by this Act authorised."

The portion of railway No. 1, which lies within the parish of R., was completed, and had been let by defendants to and was worked by the London and Brighton Railway Company, who had opened it for traffic. The rest of railway No. 1, in other parishes, was not completed, but was in course of construction by the defendants. On other lands, in other parishes also taken by them, the defendants were constructing, but had not constructed, the remaining railways authorised by their Act.

The majority of the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell and Channell, BB.), dissentiente, Martin, B.) held (distinguishing Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company in the Q.B.), that the liability of the defendants to make good the deficiency in the rates, under sect. 128, ceased as soon as the portion of "the railway and works thereof" that was situated within the plaintiff's parish, was completed and opened for traffic, as the same then became rateable property, and "liable to be assessed."

Held, in error from that decision, by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber (Willes, Keating, Lush, and Brett, JJ.) reversing the decision of the Court below, that the liability of the Railway Company under sect. 128, to make good the deficiency in the poor's-rate of the parish of R. would not cease until the whole of the railway authorised by the Act had been completed.

Held, contra, by Blackburn and Mellor, JJ. (dissenting from the decision of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company) that the decision of the majority of the court below was right, and should be affirmed.

Byles, J. gave no judgment.

Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 608; 40 L. J. 113, M.C.) discussed and commented on.

THIS was error brought by the plaintiffs upon the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer, deciding in favour of the defendants, upon the following

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The plaintiffs are the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe, and are duly empowered and entitled to make and receive, within and in respect of the said parish, the poors rate, and paving and general purposes rate, lighting rate, and sewers rate, respectively.

2. The defendants are the East London Railway Company, incorporated by the East London Railway Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. li., Local and Personal), a printed copy of which Act accompanies and is to be taken as forming part of this case.

3. The said company are possessed of and use lands for the purposes of the said Act. The land taken by the company in the parishes of Deptford and Rotherhithe, have been appropriated to and form the completed railway and stations herein mentioned, and the land taken by the company in other parishes is actually being used for the purposes of constructing the uncompleted portions of the unfinished railways.

4. Clause 22 specifies the railways which the company are authorised to make, and which said railways when completed are to be called "The East London Railway," referred to in the said Act. They are therein described as railway No. 1, railway No. 2, railway No. 3, railway No. 4, railway No. 5, railway No. 6, and railway No. 7. Railway No. 1 is the principal line, and is to commence in Bethnal-green, and terminate at New Cross, Deptford, passing in its course through the Thames Tunnel, and through, amongst others, the parish of St. Mary, Rotherhithe.

6. As much of railway No. 1 as is within the parishes of Rotherhithe and Deptiord is complete, and also the stations thereof. So much of the railway No. 1 as is within the parish of Wapping is also nearly finished. The completed part aforesaid is let to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, under an agreement dated 17th Nov. 1869, confirmed by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 4. That company opened the said completed portion of railway No. 1 for traffic in Dec. 1869, and have ever since occupied and worked it.

7. The whole of the railway No. 4 is also completed, and is let to, and worked by, the Brighton Company, under the said agreements; but railways No. 2, No, 3, No. 5, No. 6, and No. 7, are commenced, but not completed.

8. Clause 128 of the said East London Railway Act provides that "If and while the company are possessed under this Act of any lands assessed or liable to be assessed, to any sewers rate, consolidated rate, poor rate, police rate, main drainage rate, church rate, or other parochial or ward rate, they shall, from time to time, until the railways or the works thereof are completed and assessed, or liable to be assessed, be liable to make good the deficiency in the assessment for such rates by reason of those lands being taken or used for the purposes of the railway or works, and the deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which those lands, with any buildings thereon, are now rated;" and, accordingly, pursuant to such clause, the defendants, whilst they were constructing their railway within the plaintiff's said parish, paid to the plaintiffs the deficiency of rates in their parish; but after that portion of the railway from the New Cross station to Wapping was completed the defendants considered it liable to be assessed within the meaning of the said clause, and refused to pay to the plaintiffs, as by them required, any further sum for deficiency of rates within their parish under that section.

9. Concurrently with the defendants' said refusal to pay, the said Brighton Company claimed of the plaintiffs to be rated in respect of the said completed portion of railway within their (the plaintiffs') said parish as the sole occupiers thereof, upon the true gross and rateable value thereof; and they, the said Brighton Company, were afterwards rated by the plaintiffs in the rate made by them on the 13th April 1870 upon the sum of 1181*l.* 15*s.* rateable value, which rate was based upon the same rentals as those in respect of which the defendants had paid rates during the construction of the said portion of railway No. 1. The said Brighton Company, however, objected to such rating, alleging that the true rateable value of the portion of the railway within the plaintiffs' said parish was 150*l.*; and they accordingly claimed, as sole occupiers thereof, to be assessed at that sum in lieu of the sum of 1181*l.* 15*s.*, the amount at which the property, on the site of which the railway had been constructed, was originally assessed.

10. The plaintiffs did not collect the said rate from the Brighton Company, being advised that they were in error in rating them, and contended that the defendants were and are liable under the said clause 128 of the said East London Railway Act, to make good the deficiency in the assessment for rates notwithstanding that so much of the said railway which is, as before stated, completed within the plaintiffs' parish, and is occupied and used by the Brighton Company under the said agreement for the purposes therein mentioned.

11. The deficiency in the assessment of rates made by the plaintiffs in their said parish on the 13th April and 5th Oct. 1870 amounts, in the whole, to 310*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*

12. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the defendants are liable to pay the said deficiency. If the court is of opinion that they are, then the judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for the said sum of 310*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.*, with costs of suit. But if the court is of a contrary opinion, the judgment is to be entered for the defendants.

The case was argued in the court below in Easter Term, when the majority of that court (Kelly, C.B., and Bramwell, and Cleasby, BB., Martin, B., dissentiente) held (distinguishing the case of Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company in the Queen's Bench, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 608; 40 L. J. 113, M.C.) that the liability of the defendants ceased as soon as the portion of the railway and works thereof that was situated in the plaintiffs' parish was completed and opened for traffic, and had thereby become rateable property, and gave judgment in favour of the defendants accordingly. Martin, B., holding, on the contrary, in favour of the plaintiffs, that the case in the Queen's Bench was directly in point, and governed the present case. (See report of the case below, ante, p. 476; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 248; 41 L. J. 168, Ex.; Ibid. 123 M.C. The plaintiffs thereupon brought error to this court.

The plaintiffs' points for argument: First, that the defendants are not liable to be rated by the plaintiffs in respect of any portion of their railway or the works thereof until the completion of their whole line of railway and the works thereof, which, by the East London Railway Act 1865, they are authorised to construct, and to be called "The East London Railway;" secondly, that the defendants are not liable to be rated by the plaintiffs in respect of the completed portion of railway (No. 1) not mentioned in the special case until, at least, the completion, in accordance with the said East London Railway Act, of the whole of the said railway No. 1 and the works thereof; thirdly, That the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company could not legally claim to be rated, nor had the plaintiffs any legal right, nor are they bound to rate the said London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company in respect of that portion of the railway No. 1, of which the said company took the management and working; and that, at all events, the plaintiffs not having collected the rate made, are entitled to have recourse to the defendants; fourthly, That for the foregoing reasons the defendants are liable and bound to make good to the plaintiffs, as provided by sect. 128 of the said Act, the deficiency in the assessment of rates referred to in the special case.

The defendants' points for argument: First, that as the defendants have completed the railway and stations in St. Mary, Rotherhithe, such railway and stations are liable to be assessed at their true rateable value, and that the East London Railway Company are therefore not liable to make good the deficiency in the rates under sect. 128 of the East London Railway Act 1865; secondly, that as the plaintiffs, after the completion of the railway and stations in the said parish, in fact assessed the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company in respect of such railway and stations as the occupiers thereof, such railway and stations were "completed and assessed" within the meaning of the said section; and that the said East London Railway Company are not, therefore, liable to make good the deficiency in the rates under that section; thirdly, that under the circumstances mentioned in the special case, the defendants are not now liable to make good the deficiency in the rates, but that the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company ought to be rated and assessed in the ordinary way in respect of the said railway and stations as the beneficial occupiers thereof.

Prentice, Q.C. (with him was Morgan Howard) argued for the appellants, the plaintiffs.

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q.C. (with him was Poland) argued for the respondents, the defendants.

Prentice, Q.C. replied.

The same arguments were urged on both sides as in the court below, and the same cases were cited, namely:

Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 608; 40 L. J. 113, M.C.;
Wheeler and others v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 848; 38 L. J. 165, Ex; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 303;
The Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham, L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 193; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 490;
Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 15; 38 L. J. 24, M.C.
The Mayor, &c., of London v. St. Andrew's, Holborn, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 665; L. Rep. 2 C.P. 574; 36 L. J. 292, C.P.

The COURT, after consulting together for some time at the conclusion of the argument, were divided in opinion, and delivered separate judgments, seriatim, as follows:

BRETT, J.—After the best consideration that I have been able to give to this case, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the majority of the court below ought to be reversed. The question for our consideration is whether the liability of the defendants' company, under their Act of Parliament, the East London Railway Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. li), s. 128, has ceased, and, if not, when it is to cease. Now, the answer to these questions depends upon the construction to be given to sect. 128, and whether or not the words "in the parish" are to be read in as if they had been originally inserted in that section after the words "until the railway or the roads thereof;" and I am of opinion that, as the Legislature has not thought proper to insert those words in the section in question, they should not to be so read in. True it is that cases might exist in which we might, of necessity almost, be compelled to construe an enactment similar to the present one as though, by implication, it contained these words; but such a construction should, I think, only be put upon a statute when the court feels itself driven to the conclusion that it was the real intention of the Legislature that such a construction should be put upon the words used. Reasons have been given by the learned counsel on both sides; on the one hand, why the words in question here should be taken to be inserted, and on the other hand why they should not. The learned counsel for the defendants (the respondents) contended that, as soon as any portion of the line of railway was completed, and anything put upon the land liable to be rated, then such portion of the railway should be treated in the same way as any other property liable to be assessed, and that it should be taken in substitution for the land, whether having buildings thereon or not, which the company had appropriated for the purposes of the railway, and that thereupon the special liability of the company under sect. 128, should at once cease. Then, again, upon the other side, it was urged by the learned counsel for the parochial authorities that, until the whole of the contemplated line of railway has been completed and opened for traffic, the full value of the land to be used as a railway is not and cannot be completely developed. Now both these reasons seem to me to be pretty equally balanced, and to afford a reasonable argument on the one hand in favour of the defendants (the respondents), and for holding that the words in question should be taken as inserted in the section, and, on the other, for our adopting the view urged by the appellants (the plaintiffs) that the company's liability, under sect. 128, is to continue until the whole line of railway is completed. I am, however, of opinion that the construction contended for by the appellants is the right one, and that these words must not be read in as though they had been originally inserted in the section, and the equal balance between the two opposing views is, I think, an additional reason for coming to that conclusion. The argument in favour of the view contended for by the appellants is confirmed, I think, by a reference to the interpretation clauses in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c 18), and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c 20). By sect. 133 of the first-named Act the promoters of any undertaking under the Act are to make good the deficiency in the assessment for poor's rate, by reason of lands having been taken by them under the Act, "until the works shall be completed and assessed to such poor's rate," and by the interpretation clause (sect. 2) the expression "the works" is to mean "the works of whatever nature which shall by the special Act be authorised to be constructed;" and in the latter of the above mentioned Acts, by the interpretation clause the expression "the railway" shall mean "the railway and works by the special Act mentioned to be constructed." Now, I see nothing inconsistent in our reading the section in the present Act in conformity with the interpretation clauses in the two Acts to which I have just referred. I think, therefore, that the completion of "the railway or the works thereof" alluded to in sect. 128 means the substantial completion of the whole undertaking, and that the liability of the defendants will not cease until the whole line of railway is substantially completed as a railway, and that it is not meant that this liability is to continue for ever, if it should happen that a mere spur or a trifling strip or loop of the line should be left unfinished at the expiration of the limited five years, as Sir J. Karslake has argued would be the effect if the construction of the section contended for by the appellants were to be adopted. When such substantial completion is effected, the liability of the defendants, under this section, will cease, but not until then. I think that the decision of the majority of the Court of Exchequer was wrong, and should be reversed, and that we should in this case agree with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company.

LUSH, J.—After having paid every attention to the arguments which have been addressed to the court on behalf of the defendants, I adhere to the opinion which I expressed and the decision which I came to in the case of Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company, in the Queen's Bench, and which is relied on by the learned counsel for the appellants in the present case. The practice in such matters is for estimates of the value of the land required for the purposes of the line, and of the probable or expected profits or earnings of the line when completed, to be laid before the Parliamentary committee which has under its consideration the particular railway Bill which it is proposed to pass; and the object of the Legislature in enacting, as it has done, in sect. 128 in the present Act, is that the parishes through which the intended line is to pass shall not, in consequence of such land being taken for the purposes of the railway, be losers while the line is in course of construction, and until it is completed, and the parish be enabled to have the benefit of the full rateable value of the completed line. The words of the section in question (sect. 128 of the East London Railway Act 1865) are as follows: (His Lordship read the section). Now I think that the expression "the railway or the works thereof" in that section, does not mean the portion of the railway which runs through any particular parish, but that it means the whole undertaking, the entire scheme of railway communication authorised by the Act. That, to my mind, is the natural and true meaning and construction of sect. 128. There are other clauses in the Act, too, which, I think, confirm this view. It appears from the Act that other parishes in the district have obtained the insertion in the Act of clauses or provisions specially guarding and protecting their interests in this respect. Thus, by sect. 75, the rights, powers, authorities, and privileges of the vestry of the parish of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, are expressly saved and protected. So with respect to the parish of St. Leonards, Shoreditch, by sect. 77 the railway company, from the time of their taking any lands, &c., in that parish for the purposes of the railway, until the said railway shall be assessed and rated to such rates, are to be assessed and rated for such lands, &c., in the same amount as such lands were rated prior to the Act, and are to make good to and in aid of such parish all such rates as aforesaid. And by sect. 109 the company taking lands, &c., in the Whitechapel district, are to be liable to make good the deficiency in the rates "until any works to be constructed under the Act in that district are so far completed as to be assessed or liable to be assessed to an amount equal to or greater than the aggregate amount of the gross rateable value of the same lands, &c., for the twelve months preceding the passing of the Act." Now this 109th section seems more favourable to that parish than sect. 128 is to the parish in question. I agree that if sect. 128 stood alone it might be capable of the construction put upon it by Sir John Karslake, but upon reviewing the Act as a whole, there can be no doubt that the intention of the Legislature was to save the parishes from loss, and therefore I think that that construction of the section is to be adopted which best carries out that intention. The judgment of the court below, should, in my opinion, be reversed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the majority of the court below ought to be affirmed. The railway company is to be rated according to its earnings. It is now capable of being worked, and is in fact at this moment worked as a railway in the parish. I have always understood the rule as to rating such property to be, that if a railway in any parish is capable of being worked, and is worked, it becomes liable at law to be assessed to the poor's rate of the parish in which it lies. Sect. 128, I think, affords abundant reason for the decision of the court below. By that section the inhabitants of the parish have obtained that which the Legislature had in contemplation in passing it, and as soon as the parish can be indemnified against loss by the rating of the railway, the company becomes assessable to the rate in the usual way, and this special liability under sect. 128 ceases. I confess that I draw a conclusion from the several clauses referred to by my brother Lush somewhat different from that at which he has arrived. The object, as it seems to me, of sect. 128 was simply to make good any deficiency there might appear to be in the rates of the several parishes through which the line of railway passed, whilst the land in such parishes respectively was not of any assessable value; but surely as soon as the line of railway in any p rticular parish is completed and in working order, and is actually, as in this case, worked and profits are being earned, and it is capable of being assessed, there is no wrong or injustice done in rating it in the usual and ordinary manner. It seems to me that if the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company be correct, the several provisions in the clauses referred to by my brother Lush are quite unnecessary; and they rather, I think, detract from the force of the judgment in that case. There is now in this parish a "railway" or a part of a railway, and "the works thereof," liable, in my opinion, to be assessed. The judgment of the majority of the court below was right, and ought to be affirmed.

KEATING J.—When I consider the variety of the opinions which have been expressed upon the construction of this section, I cannot but feel some diffidence in the matter, yet I confess that I see no reason to change or depart from the opinion which I expressed in the case in the Queen's Bench (Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company) which has been so much discussed before us to-day. The words of the section which we have to consider in the present case are not more obscure than those of the section which were discussed in that case. The object of the Act of Parliament now before us is clear; namely, to effect a communication or connection between the lines of railway on the two sides (the north and the south) of the river Thames by means of the Thames Tunnel. Now this object would not be effected by making and working a fragment of a line of railway only, but by the carrying to completion the whole scheme. Of necessity, an injury is at first inflicted upon a parish by the constructing of a line of railway through it, in that, by the appropriation of rateable land (and it may be land with buildings on it) to the purposes of the line, the value of the rateable property in the parish is for the time diminished. It is only a reasonable proposition, therefore, and it is the meaning of the Legislature, that the railway company, who take the land for their own purposes, should make good the deficiency thus caused in the rates, and they should not, I think, escape from that statutory liability until the making of the railway, as intended by the Legislature, is completed. The section in question here imposes that liability upon the respondents, and the question is, up to what time and how long, are they to be bound to make good the deficiency so caused in the poor's rate assessment? I think the answer to that question, founded upon a reasonable construction of the statute, is that they shall be liable until they have done that which they undertook to do, and have provided, not a fragment of a railway merely but, the whole line of railway contemplated and authorised by their Act of Parliament. That seems to me to be a reasonable view of the matter on which the Legislature has, in my opinion, expressed its meaning very clearly; and I think that a contrary view can only be entertained by doing violence to the language of the Act of Parliament. The words are, "until the railway or the works thereof are completed," &c. Now, what did the Legislature mean by those words? It has been suggested, and I own somewhat ingeniously, on the part of the defendants, that they meant to impose this burden upon the railway company only until the portion of the line of railway in the particular parish was completed, but if they had so meant, why did they not in terms expressly say so? The section speaks of the completion of the railway; it must be completed before it can be assessed. The word "railway" there means the entire scheme of railways authorised by the Act, and the completion referred to means the completion of that whole scheme. Although the interpretation clause in this Act may not be quite so clear as that in the case of Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company, I see nothing in it which opposes the conclusion at which I have arrived. Suppose the section had said "until the whole of the railway mentioned in the Act were completed," &c., there could then have been no possible doubt. Then why should not the section be, as it ought I think to be, so read? It would be more in harmony with the rest of the Act, and more in accordance with the intention of the Legislature so to read it. I speak with much diffidence, but I confess I think that the view entertained to the contrary, is more ingenious than sound. I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company was right, and that that of the majority of the Court of Exchequer in the present case was wrong, and should therefore be reversed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in this case is wrong in the sense that it did not follow the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. the Metropolitan District Railway Company, and then come up here to be reversed. But the case is now before us; and sitting here as a court of error, we are not bound to take either case as binding upon us. I think that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in that case was wrong, and that the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer, though wrong in the sense which I have mentioned, was otherwise right, and should be affirmed. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18) contains a clause very similar to sect. 128 here. That Act (by sect. 133) enacts that the promoters of the undertaking, on becoming possessed under the Act of lands charged with land tax or liable to be assessed to the poor's rate, shall be liable to make good the deficiency in the said assessments "until the works shall be completed and assessed," &c., and the word "works" there, to which some of my learned brethren attach importance, are explained in the interpretation clause (sect. 12) to mean "the works of whatever nature which shall by the special Act be authorised to be executed." So again in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), the interpretation clause says that "the expression the railway shall mean the railway and works by the special Act authorised to be constructed." These several enactments should be construed upon similar principles. Poor rates are assessed and the occupiers are rated according to the yearly value of the land—that is to say, according to the amount of rent which it will let at from year to year. Now when a railway company under the provisions of this Act of Parliament appropriates land for the purpose of constructing a line of railway upon it, there ceases for a time to be a beneficial occupation of such land, and the manifest intention of the Legislature in sect. 128, and other similar enactments, is that in such cases the inhabitants of the parish through which the line of railway runs, shall be compensated for, or indemnified against, loss by reason of the land so appropriated by the railway company remaining for a time unprofitable and incapable of assessment. The interpretation clause is not, I think, of importance. I think that sect. 128 here, where it says, "until the railway or the works thereof are completed," means, until that portion of the rail or works which lay within a particular parish is completed, and does not mean until the completion of the whole line of railway and works authorised by the Act. When such a portion is completed, the railway so far, is in working order and fit to be opened for purposes of traffic, and is therefore capable of being assessed; the inhabitants then will, to the extent of the portion of the railway completed, be re-imbursed, and the liability of the company under this section ceases pro tanto, and the land in which this portion of railway has been made, is then liable to be rated in the ordinary and usual manner. The words "liable to be assessed" are mere surplusage, for as soon as there is a valuable occupation the land must, on the request of any ratepayer, be assessed. If the construction contended for by the learned counsel for the appellants should be held to be correct, and the expressions in sect. 128 should be held to mean "until the entire scheme of railway communication authorised by the Act be completed," then the railway might continue liable to this burden for ever unless the whole of the works included in that scheme were completed within the five years limited by the 131st section, and if ever so small a portion of the line should remain unfinished at the expiration of that period, the operation of the 128th section might continue to exist indefinitely. The interpretation clause, sect. 4, has not, as I have before said, much bearing on the construction of sect. 128, but at any rate it is not antagonistic to the construction which I have put upon this latter section; and, indeed, so far as it goes, it is rather in favour of it, for the word "railways" may, I think, under that clause (sect. 4) be taken to mean any part of the railways authorised by the Act. I think, therefore, for the above reasons, that the judgment of the majority of the court below was right, and should be affirmed.

BYLES, J.—Having been absent during a considerable portion of the argument, I think I ought to give no opinion on the matter.

WILLES, J.—This is no doubt a question of much nicety, but we have to construe the words as they appear before us in the section. Now I apprehend it to be a clear and well established rule of grammatical construction and of reasoning, that an indefinite and general expression is to be taken to have a universal application. Therefore the words "railway and works thereof," ought primâ facie to be taken to mean the whole "railway," and the whole "works thereof," authorised by the Act. We may well suppose, in the first place, that the word "railway" here used was intended to bear, and have put upon it, its ordinary meaning. No doubt there occur instances in the statute where it must be taken to mean not the whole but a portion only of the contemplated works; but it will be seen that in these instances the context necessitates that the meaning should be so restricted. I look therefore to see if there is anything in the statute or the context in the present case, which renders it necessary to cut down the general word "railway" to mean a portion or fragment of the railway, and which obliges us to read in to the section the words "in the parish," as it has been suggested we ought to do. I confess I fail to see anything of the sort. I attach no importance to the interpretation clause (sect. 4), but I do to sect. 22, which last named section shows, I think, that the company are bound to complete the whole of the works in the several parishes therein specified. Reading sects. 22 and 128 together, I think the plain and fair construction of them is that the whole and entire scheme of railways authorised by the Act must be completed before the liability of the company to make good the deficiency in the rates can cease. (His Lordship read sect. 128 and proceeded.) Now if the company take the land and do not make or complete the whole line of railway upon it, they have still rendered themselves liable to the liability and burden imposed by sect. 128. When the Bill is before Parliament, witnesses are called by the promoters to state the advantages which are expected to be derived by the public from the construction of the line; and it must be assumed that it was intended by the Legislature that the railway should be completed, and that the company should be liable to make good the deficiency for an indefinite time if it took land for the purpose of the railway, but did not construct it. It has been suggested that it is unjust to oblige the company to make compensation to the parish for the depreciation in value of its rated property, but I confess that I see no hardship or injustice in such a proceeding at all, and it strikes me as being nothing but just that the parish should be compensated for the burden which the diminishing the rateable property in the parish, and the consequent increase in the amount of the rates assessed, has cast upon it. I am content to abide by the words which the Legislature has used, without adding to or subtracting from them. It may, as Martin, B., said, in the case of a very long line of railway, be unreasonable; nevertheless we must follow the words of the statute. The Legislature has said that the whole system of railways must be completed before the company's liability can cease, and no question of inconvenience can be taken into account. Here, however, as a matter of fact, we are dealing with a short line. I think that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. The Metropolitan District Railway Company was right; and that the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer in the present case was wrong, and ought to be reversed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Nov. 4 and 5, 1872.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

CLOWES v. THE STAFFORDSHIRE POTTERIES WATERWORKS COMPANY.

Public company—Abuse of parliamentary powers—Consequential damage—Remedy—Compensation—Injunction—Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, s. 6.

The special Act of a Waterworks Company, with which was incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, empowered them to take the waters of certain springs which flowed into a river on the banks of which certain dyeing works and mills were situate, but restricted the quantity of water to be taken till the company should have made a compensation reservoir. And the Act contained an express reservation of the rights of the owners and occupiers of any lands, mills, and works to the use of the waters of the springs or river, except so far as provided by the Act. The company constructed a compensation reservoir, which was recognised as sufficient by a subsequent Act giving them further powers. The owners of the dyeing works, finding that the effect of the reservoir was to render the water as it flowed out of it into the river turbid and muddy, and unfit for the purposes of the dyeing works, filed a bill against the company to restrain them from permitting the water of the river to remain in its turbid and muddy condition:

Held (reversing the decision of Malins, V.C.), that their Act gave the company no power to foul the water of the river, and that, as the injury complained of was not one which their Act authorised them to commit, the plaintiff's remedy was not under the compensation clauses of the Waterworks Act 1847, but that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the company from so storing or discharging the water of the reservoir as to foul the water of the river to the injury of the plaintiff.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C.

The Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Company was incorporated by an Act of Parliament, passed in 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 114), for the purpose of supplying with water the town of Newcastle-under-Lyme, and several townships and places adjoining thereto. This Act empowered the company to construct waterworks, and to take and use for the purposes of their undertaking the waters of certain springs and streams specified in the Act, the 32nd section of which recited that the water flowing or issuing from the springs and streams thereinbefore mentioned, and which was thereby authorised to be taken and diverted for the purposes of the Act, or some of it then flowed into the river Churnet, and was then employed in driving, or assisting to drive, the machinery of certain mills situate on the river Churnet, and provided that in lieu of the water which should or might be abstracted for the purposes of the undertaking, the company should and were thereby empowered and required to construct, and should for ever after uphold and maintain, in a certain place called the Deep Hays Valley, a compensation reservoir of sufficient dimensions and extent to contain twenty millions of cubic feet of water at the least, with sufficient embankments, waste weirs, water courses, discharge pipes, gauges and other works, for the purpose of retaining flood waters and other waters, and for discharging the same so and in such manner as that the supply of water in the river would be increased and rendered more uniform.

This Act was repealed by an Act passed in 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 198), whereby the company were re-incorporated with enlarged powers.

The 4th section of the Act of 1853 provided that the clauses contained in the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15) with respect to the supply of water to be furnished by the undertakers should be incorporated with and form part of this Act, save only that the company should not be bound to lay on at any time the supply of water for houses to any top story not being at least 20ft. below the service reservoir from whence the supply was taken.

It was also provided that, except where otherwise provided in this Act, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 should be incorporated with and form part of the Act.

The 26th section empowered the company to make and maintain certain works, and to take and use certain streams and waters, provided that the maximum quantity of water to be abstracted by the company for the purposes of their undertaking should not exceed 1,500,000 imperial gallons in a day of twenty-four hours, until an additional compensation reservoir or additional compensation reservoirs should have been made completed and certified as thereinafter mentioned, provided also that after such completion and certificate the maximum quantity of water to be abstracted for the purposes of the undertaking should not in any event exceed 3,000,000 imperial gallons in a day of twenty-four hours.

The 54th section provided that before the company should abstract or take from the springs or streams specified in the Act, or from any other sources or tributary streams of the river Churnet, a greater quantity of water than 1,500,000 imperial gallons in any one day, the company should, and were thereby required, within four years from the passing of this Act to construct for the use and benefit of the owners and occupiers of the said mills such additional compensation reservoir or reservoirs, with proper embankments, waste weirs, watercourses, discharge pipes, gauges, and other works, as should together, with the existing reservoirs in Deep Hayes Valley, be capable of constantly discharging into the river Churnet such quantity of water as should be equal to the maximum quantity of water required to be taken by the company, exclusive of the ordinary flow of the Deep Hayes stream, and of the stream or streams on which the additional reservoir or reservoirs should be constructed; and that such additional reservoir or reservoirs should as to the capacity and sufficiency thereof, be made and completed to the satisfaction of an engineer to be appointed by the owners and occupiers of the mills, who, upon the completion thereof to his satisfaction, should give a certificate in writing of such completion, and should certify that such additional reservoir or reservoirs, together with the then existing reservoir, were capable of constantly discharging, by way of compensation, and in addition to the ordinary flow of the streams upon which the same should have been respectively constructed, a quantity of water equal to the maximum quantity of water so required to be taken by the company.

The 56th section provided that the company should for ever thereafter maintain for the use and benefit of the owners and occupiers for the time being of the said mills, the said existing reservoir, and such additional compensation reservoir or reservoirs as should be constructed and certified as aforesaid with proper gauges for measuring the flow of water therefrom.

The 62nd section provided that for the purpose of constructing the said additional compensation reservoir or reservoirs, and the works connected therewith, it should be lawful for the company to purchase and acquire, with the consent of the owners and occupiers thereof, any land which might be necessary, not exceeding eighty acres, in addition to the lands authorised to be acquired by this Act, or by the Acts incorporated therewith.

The 72nd section provided that "nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to affect, diminish, abridge, prejudice, or alter in any manner whatsoever any right which, before the passing of this Act, the owners, lessees, and occupiers of any lands, canals, mills, and works, or of any of the springs or streams authorised to be taken or used for the purposes of this Act, had or have possessed or enjoyed, or might lawfully have, possess, or enjoy, to the use of the waters of the said springs or streams, or of the tributary waters, springs, or streams flowing into the same, except so far as is provided and declared in and by this Act.

In 1861 an Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 146) was passed to enable the company to extend its works. It recited the Act of 1853, and that the company had constructed at or near Tittesworth, in the parish of Leek, in the county of Stafford, a reservoir intended to constitute and be used as an additional compensation reservoir for the use and benefit of the owners and occupiers of the Churnet Mills, as required by the Act of 1853, but such reservoir had not been certified as required by that Act, and that it was expedient that the same should be constituted a compensation reservoir as thereinafter provided. And the 27th section of the Act provided that the present Deep Hayes and Tittesworth Reservoirs should, from and after the passing of this Act, be compensation reservoirs, and the same and the gauges, and other works connected with the same respectively, should for ever be maintained by the company for the protection and benefit of the owners of certain canals, and the owners and occupiers from time to time of the Churnet Mills.

The 6th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 provides that where, by their special Act, the undertakers shall be empowered, for the purpose of constructing or supplying waterworks, to take or use any lands or streams otherwise than with the consent of the owners or occupiers thereof, they shall in exercising the powers so given to them, be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act, and if the waterworks be situated in England or Ireland, to the provisions and restrictions contained in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845; and shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, any lands or streams taken or used for the purposes of the special Act, or injuriously affected by the construction or maintenance of the works thereby authorised, or otherwise by the execution of the powers thereby conferred, full compensation for the value of the lands or streams so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other persons, by reason of the exercise, as to such lands and streams, of the powers vested in the undertakers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith; and except where otherwise provided by this or the special Act, the amount of such compensation shall be determined in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 for determining questions of compensation with regard to lands re-leased or taken under the provisions thereof, and all the provisions of the said last-mentioned Act shall be applicable to determine the amount of any such compensation, and to enforce payment or other satisfaction thereof.

Miss Ann Clowes, the plaintiff in this suit, was tenant for life of certain dye works on the river Churnet, a little to the north of the town of Leek. These dye works were in the occupation of her tenants, Messrs. Hammersley, who had for upwards of thirty years carried on in them the business of silk-dyers.

The bill alleged that the plaintiff and her predecessors had always had and enjoyed the right to use the water of the river Churnet uninjured, for the purposes of dyeing, and that pure soft water was absolutely necessary for the purpose of washing and dyeing silk; that up to the time of the construction of the Tittesworth reservoir the water of the river Churnet had been remarkable for its great purity and softness, and the Churnet, being a mountain stream, it used to rise quickly after heavy rains, and as quickly subside upon their cessation, and although the water was discoloured more or less according to the quantity of rain which it received, such discoloration never continued for more than one or two days after the subsidence of the flood, all mud and other matter brought down from the hills being completely carried away by the force of the flood itself; that immediately after the completion of the Tittesworth reservoir the plaintiff's tenants found that the works of the defendants had a most injurious effect upon the water of the river Churnet, which, instead of regaining its purity in one or two days after a flood, as it formerly used to do, continued in a filthy and muddy state for periods varying from ten to fourteen days, and sometimes longer, and was in fact in a more impure condition on the eighth or tenth day after rain than on any of the days preceding; that this impure condition of the water continued; that complaints had been made to the company, who had admitted the plaintiff's right and promised to provide a remedy, but that no sufficient remedy had been provided, and the plaintiff's tenants had threatened to quit the works, and that it would be difficult to relet them on such advantageous terms. And the bill prayed that the defendant might be restrained by injunction from permitting the water of the river Churnet to remain any longer in its present muddy or turbid condition, and might be ordered to take all necessary and proper measures for restoring the said water to the condition in which it was prior to the construction of the Tittesworth reservoir, and that in the event of the defendants failing to adopt effective measures for preventing the continuance of the nuisance complained of, proper damages might be awarded to the plaintiff for the injury sustained by her by reason of such continuance.

The defendants by their answer alleged that the reservoir of which the plaintiff complained, and all their works had been constructed and erected under and pursuant to the powers of their several Acts of Parliament, and the Acts incorporated therewith, and they submitted that if the case set up by the plaintiffs were well founded in fact, her only remedy would be a claim for damages under the statutes, and that she was not entitled to any relief in equity.

The Vice-Chancellor held (see 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 298) that, independently of the question whether the inquiry arose from the exercise by the defendants of their Parliamentary powers, the plaintiff had not sustained such an amount of damage as entitled her to the interference of a court of equity, and that if the plaintiff had sustained any damage, it was capable of compensation by an action at law; but that as the damage complained of had arisen from the exercise by the defendants of their Parliamentary powers, the remedy must be sought under the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Pearson, Q.C. and Montague Cookson, for the appellant.—The 6th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 does not apply to this case; it relates to compensation for persons injuriously affected by the construction or maintenance of the works; we do not complain of the manner in which the works have been constructed, but that the company does not cleanse the reservoir under the provisions of its Acts, and consequently sends down to our works mud and water instead of pure water. The fouling of the water is not the necessary result of the exercise of the company's parliamentary powers, the Act giving no power to foul the water; the fouling of the water is, therefore, an illegal act, and we are entitled to an injunction restraining the company from doing so. We ought to have relief in this court, for if we are sent to law, we shall be obliged to bring an action every time the injury arises. They cited

Lord Justice MELLISH referred to Isenberg v. The East India House Estate Company, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 625,

Cotton, Q.C. and Speed, for the respondents.—The fouling of the water is the result of the exercise of our parliamentary powers, and it is well settled that where the injury complained of is one arising from works executed according to an Act of Parliament, the remedy is under the statute only. The East and West India Docks and Birmingham Junction Railway v. Gattke (3 Mac. & G. 155) shows that the words "injuriously affected" in the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, comprehend cases of injury independent of taking land, and are not limited to damage sustained by persons whose lands, or a part of whose lands are taken used or indirectly interfered with, and the right to compensation extends to and may be asserted in respect of consequential damage. It is true that that case does not agree with The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith (1 Mac. & G. 216) which it must be taken to have overruled. If the plaintiff has suffered any damage at all, she has been "injuriously affected" by the exercise of our parliamentary powers within the meaning of the 6th section of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, and she can have compensation only under the provisions of that section. [Lord Justice MELLISH.—Is she to have compensation from time to time, or once for all?] The Tittesworth Reservoir has been recognised by the Act of 1861, as such an additional compensation reservoir as was required by the Act of 1853, and, that being so, the plaintiff can have no right to interfere with it. They also referred to Lawrence v. The Great Northern Railway Company, 16 Q. B. 643.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice MELLISH said.—The plaintiff in this case is the tenant for life of certain dyeing mills, situate on the river Churnet, and the suit is brought to restrain the defendants, the Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Company, from fouling the stream, which fouling is said to be injurious to the plaintiff in respect of the dye-works. The general case that is made by the bill is that before the defendant's reservoir was made, although it is true that the river Churnet did not always send down water sufficiently pure for the dye-works, but that from time to time there were floods in the stream, and that when a flood occurred it usually took two, three, or four days before the water became clear, yet, according to the allegations contained in the bill, and they appear to me to be proved by a considerable body of evidence, the result and effect of making the reservoir in the way in which it has been made, and the user of it in the way in which it has been used, is that the water which used only to be disturbed for two or three days, is now in the case of a flood disturbed for a very much longer time, and also that at other times when there has been no rain or flood at all, if the reservoir is low, the water comes down in a muddy state, so as seriously to affect the plaintiff's works. The Vice-Chancellor has dismissed the bill upon two grounds. First, he has come to the conclusion that the complaint is a frivolous one, and that the damage is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to maintain a suit in this court. Secondly, he has come to the conclusion that the remedy, if any, is not by action or by suit, but under the compensation clauses of the Waterworks Clauses Act. I think it would be better that I should first consider what the Vice-Chancellor treated in his judgment as the second point, namely, whether the remedy in this case is by action at law, or whether it is under the compensation clauses of the Act. In the first place, if this reservoir could have been made without the authority of an Act of Parliament, and the effect of it had been such as it is proved in this case to be, there can be no doubt at all that the occupier, at any rate, of the dye works would be entitled to maintain an action at law on account of the fouling of the stream. So far, I do not understand that it is disputed by the defendants. That being so, of course the right to maintain that action at law must continue, unless it has been taken away by the Acts of Parliament, and the burden of showing that it has been taken away by the Acts of Parliament rests, beyond all question, upon the defendants, because if a public company or any individual obtain an Act of Parliament which they say enables them to take away the common law rights of an individual person, they are bound to show that it does so with sufficient clearness. It is their business to see, if they intend to affect the rights of the public, that their Act of Parliament is framed in such a way that the courts can have no reasonable doubt that that is the effect of them. That being so, the simple question now is, whether according to the true construction of the two Acts of Parliament, the one of 1853 and the other of 1861, taken together, the right to foul the water is given to the defendants. By the 26th section of the Act of 1853 there is a general power given to make the works. It provides "that it shall be lawful for the company, subject to the provisions of this Act, to make and maintain the said works hereby authorised in the line and according to the levels defined on the sections and upon the lands delineated on the said plans and described in the said book of reference, and to enter upon, take, and use such of the lands, streams, and waters mentioned in the said plans and books of reference as shall be necessary for that purpose, or to agree for a lease of such lands and streams, and to take therefrom such water as the company may require for the purpose of this Act and the said incorporated Acts; provided that the maximum quantity of water to be abstracted by the company for the purposes of the said undertaking shall not exceed 1,500,000 imperial gallons in a day of twenty-four hours, until an additional compensation reservoir or additional compensation reservoirs shall have been made, completed, and certified, as hereinafter mentioned; provided also, that after such completion and certificate the maximum quantity of water to be abstracted for the purposes of the said undertaking shall not in any event exceed 3,000,000 imperial gallons in a day of twenty-four hours." In that section, no doubt, a power is given to make the reservoir in question, which is the compensation reservoir mentioned in that section, but it is to be observed that this reservoir is not made for the purpose of supplying them with water to be used in the town, but it is a condition precedent to their being entitled to take the waters of the different streams. If they do not make the reservoir, or cannot make the reservoir, the simple consequence is that then they cannot take the water beyond the limited quantity which is mentioned in this section. It is also to be observed, that although to a certain extent compulsory powers are given, and lands are delineated on the plans which they are entitled compulsorily to affect, yet they are not given any compulsory power for the purchasing of land for this reservoir. If it had so happened that no owner of lands on the stream were willing to sell them the lands, they could not have made the reservoir at all, and the simple consequence then would have been that they would not have been entitled to take the additional quantity of water. If it had remained there, if there had been nothing beyond that section, it would have been extremely doubtful indeed, whether any compulsory powers at all were given with reference to that section. If no compulsory powers were given for the purpose of purchasing land upon which the works were to be built, it certainly seems extraordinary that compulsory powers should be given to take away the rights of other persons who have rights in the nature of easements over the land purchased by the company. But the case does not at all stop simply with that section. The next section which is material, is the 54th, which is in fact a repetition of what is said in the 26th as to the making of the reservoir. [His Lordship read the 54th section of the Act, and then continued:] That section simply carries out what was mentioned in the 26th section. There is another section which appears to me to be very material in the determination of this question, namely, the 72nd section of the Act. [His Lordship read the 72nd section.] Now the plaintiff and the other owners of these mills, and the occupiers of these mills, beyond all question, did enjoy before the passing of the Act, the right of using the water of the Churnet in its natural purity for the purpose of dyeing. They had that right beyond all question. Then does not the 72nd section preserve it? It appears to me that beyond all question it does. What is the object of inserting such a section as this? It was said that it means nothing, that it simply reserves what would have been implied even if it had not been there, and possibly to a great extent that may be so. I am not at all certain whether, even if this section had not been there, the construction would not have been the same. But the section is put in to save all doubt. There might possibly have been a question, if the section had not been there, whether the rights of persons were not incidentally affected, and then to save that doubt, and prevent any persons whose advisers might be afraid that their rights might incidentally be affected by this Act of Parliament from being obliged to come when the Act is before Parliament and before the committees for the purpose of getting express clauses for their protection. To save all disputes that might arise in that way this sort of section is inserted in order that the advisers of all such persons may be able to say to them: "You are perfectly safe; you need not go before the committees of the House of Commons or the House of Lords to get a clause for your express protection, for no power is given to take away any right that you possess." The scheme of the Act appears to me to be simply this. The waters of the streams are to be taken, and therefore it necessarily follows that they will be greatly diminished in quantity. Therefore, as respects the millowners who used the stream for power, and are interested in the quantity of water which comes down the stream, their rights might be affected qua the quantity, and therefore they are to be compensated in kind. But as respects any other person who may have an interest in the stream, any riparian proprietor who may use the water, anybody who may be interested in its purity, because he uses it for manufacturing purposes — as respects all those persons, we, the promoters of this scheme, we, the waterworks company, undertake that we do not affect their rights at all. That appears to me to be the bargain upon which the Act of Parliament was obtained, and in my opinion, the court ought to hold persons to these bargains, because otherwise a clause of this kind deceives people. They are prevented from coming and asserting their rights. Suppose that in the clause giving them power to make this reservoir they had expressly inserted the words: "and that the company shall be at liberty, so far as they find it convenient, to foul the water as much as they may find it convenient for the purpose of making and working their reservoir," would not the plaintiff and the owners of these mills, if they had seen such a clause, or heard there was such a clause to be inserted in the Act of Parliament, have come directly, and would not a clause have been inserted as a matter of course for their protection? Because, it is not the practice of Parliament, I apprehend, to take away these water rights, at any rate except in cases of extreme necessity. The ordinary practice when these Acts are obtained, because it is always possible to be done, is to compensate people in kind. It is very difficult to compensate in money, and Parliament does not intend to destroy the manufacturing value of streams. Therefore clauses are inserted to preserve the general rights which persons have, and which engineers seem to have, generally speaking, not much difficulty in enabling them to do. That appears to me, therefore, to be the scheme of this Act of Parliament. Then with respect to the second Act, namely, the Act of 1861, it was strongly relied upon, because it was said that, whatever might be the effect of the Act of 1853, the Act of 1861 recognised the reservoir as a complete reservoir, which had been properly made, and therefore no person can, after the passing of that Act, legally assert that there is any imperfection in the making, or, indeed, as it is contended, in the working of the reservoir. I am of opinion that that Act had not that effect. The object of it was simply to regulate the rights between the millowners and the company, and the effect of the clause in question (sect. 27), as it appears to me, simply is that it is a legislative recognition that the reservoir is a sufficient compliance with the obligations which the previous Act had imposed upon the company as between them and the millowners for the purpose of furnishing the quantity of water which was necessary for their purposes. The language of the Act is this: [His Lordship read the 27th section of the Act of 1861.] Then it goes on in several sections to give the millowners the control of the reservoir for the purpose of sending out the water from the reservoir into the stream when they require it. The control of the reservoir having been thus given to the millowners, the 34th section of the Act provides that "the company may draw and let off the water of either of the present compensation reservoirs when and as often as it shall be requisite for the purpose of repairing or cleansing the same or any part thereof, or for any other necessary purpose, the company doing as little damage as possible, and using all reasonable despatch in reinstating the reservoir, and during the work permitting the stream to flow freely down the Churnet, provided that unless in case of absolute necessity the water shall not be drawn off by the company, from more than one compensation reservoir at the same time." Therefore that section plainly contemplates that the reservoir will from time to time require to be cleansed, and that it will require to be emptied. There are two reservoirs and they are not to be empty both at the same time; and there is a power given to the company which appears to me to be to a considerable extent a recognition that it was never contemplated that the water was to be as dirty as the company chose to make it. Therefore I am of opinion that it would be wrong to construe this Act of 1861 as affecting what certainly the committees, when they passed it, never supposed they would do, namely, to take away the rights of persons which had been preserved by the previous Act. Those persons were not before Parliament; they had no occasion to go before Parliament, because they had no reason to assume that their rights would be affected in any way. In construing an Act of Parliament obtained by a company, I think it would be wrong to construe it as incidentally taking away rights which had been expressly reserved under a previous Act. Therefore I am of opinion that these Acts of Parliament did not give the defendants any right to foul the water so as to be injurious to the plaintiff. That being so, an action at law would have been maintainable. Then comes the only other question in this case, which I will deal with shortly. The Lord Justice may perhaps say more clearly what the rule of this court would be. But I cannot conceive that, an action at law being maintainable, relief is not to be had in this court. If this case had happened before Sir John Rolt's Act or Lord Cairns' Act, I presume that the ordinary course would have been that, a bill having been filed, an action would have been sent to be tried at law. The action having been tried, nominal damages would have been obtained, and the plaintiff would have come back to this court for his injunction. Would this court have sent him away and said that he should bring action after action instead of having his remedy by injunction? I cannot think that would have been so. The Vice-Chancellor said that, if the plaintiff could recover at all, he thought she would get greater damages at law than would be sufficient to put up a gauge, and that that would be a sufficient compensation. But with submission to the Vice-Chancellor the plaintiff would not get at law a sum sufficient to put up a gauge. She would only get in the first instance, in all probability, nominal damages, because in this sort of case you cannot prove specific damage, and there is no evidence here of specific damage, and upon the evidence, the plaintiff would get in the first instance only 40*s*. damages. Then she would have to bring a second action, and what she would get in the second action would be the actual damage which she proved that she had sustained between the time she brought the first action, and the time she brought the second action. Then she would bring a third action, and she would get as damages the actual damage which she could prove that she had sustained in the interval between the time of bringing the second and third actions. It is because it is a most inconvenient mode to leave the rights of parties to be determined in that way, and it was impossible to leave them to be determined in that way, that this court has always given relief in these cases. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to have a declaration that the Acts of Parliament have not given the defendants any right to foul the water to her damage, and that she should have an injunction to prevent any such damage in future.

Lord Justice JAMES.—I entirely concur in the view which has been expressed by the Lord Justice as to the legal construction of the Acts of Parliament, and as to the legal right of the plaintiff and the legal liability of the defendants. That being so, and the legal right being, as it seems to me, quite clear, the only question is whether it is of such character as to induce this court to grant an injunction. I am of opinion that this is pre-eminently a case for an application to this court for an injunction upon two grounds, to one of which the Lord Justice has referred—the absolute necessity of preventing a continued series of actions which would be the sole result if we remitted the plaintiff to what used to be called the other side of Westminster Hall. Beyond that, it has always been the practice of this court, and one of the main duties of this court, to take care that public bodies who obtain authorities under Act of Parliament do not use the powers of their Acts so as to affect the rights of other persons, to confine them carefully to the exercise of their powers so as not to affect or injure other persons. The Vice-Chancellor indeed expressed an opinion that this was a trivial damage, and that the courts ought not to encourage such cases to be brought before them. I myself, of course, should be very loth indeed to encourage parties to come here upon a mere technical legal right, but it is impossible, as it seems to me, to read what has taken place between these parties without seeing that, if there was a legal foundation for it, there has been a very substantial ground of complaint recognised by the defendants and their agents, who have during all the years that have elapsed used their efforts to avoid or mitigate that damage which has been complained of. After that, it seems to me, with all deference to the Vice-Chancellor, that it is impossible to hold that this is a case of a person who merely comes into this court for the purpose of vexation and oppression, availing himself of some technical right which he has under an Act of Parliament, That being so, I am of opinion that the injunction is really a matter of course, and I propose, if the Lord Justice agrees with me, to declare, following out the judgment he has been good enough to pronounce as to the legal construction, that the provisions of the Acts of Parliament mentioned in the pleadings for storing and discharging the water in and from the reservoir of the defendants, did not legalise the fouling of the stream below the reservoir. Then there will be an injunction to restrain the defendants from so storing and discharging the water as to foul the water to the damage and injury of the owners and occupiers of the plaintiff's dye works in the bill mentioned.

Then the injunction will be suspended for six months with liberty to apply to this court if that time be found insufficient for making the necessary works. Of course it will follow that the Vice-Chancellor's decree will be discharged and the defendants will be ordered to pay the costs of the suit, and to repay any costs they may have been paid by the plaintiff.

*Nuisance — Noise — Vibration — Light — Delay — Damages—*21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, s. 2.

The defendant in Jan. 1865 erected a steam-engine in a shed adjoining the stable belonging to the plaintiffs, by which the stable was rendered unfit for horses, and some inconvenience occasioned in the plaintiffs' dwelling-house. No complaint was made by the plaintiffs until June 1870.

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that an injunction could not be granted under the circumstances to restrain the defendant from working the engine.

A nuisance by noise, supposing malice to be out of the question, is a question of degree. It is not every occasional and accidental noise more loud or harsh than usual, that will entitle a plaintiff to an injunction where the general case of "habitual nuisance" is not satisfactorily proved.

Bill dismissed.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Master of the Rolls (reported ante, p. 441). A full statement of the facts and arguments will be found in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—The plaintiffs, who are unmarried ladies living at Leek in Staffordshire, ask for an injunction (with damages) to restrain an alleged nuisance by noise and vibration, and to restrain alleged trespasses by enroachment on land and obstruction of light. The Master of the Rolls has made a decree refusing an injunction, but granting an inquiry as to damages, from which decree both parties appeal. Leek is a town in which the silk manufacture is carried on. The plaintiffs' house faces a street, called Derby Street, to the south, and has a garden of some size to the north; with two stables to the east, separate from the house and from each other. Eastward and southward of the nearer of these stables (called the old stable), which is about nineteen yards from the house and garden, is a silk mill belonging to, and worked by, the defendant. The plaintiffs state that the defendant was formerly in the employment of the plaintiffs' father, who was a mill-owner carrying on the silk manufacture in part of the buildings now occupied by the defendant. The defendant states that the plaintiffs' father (from whom they derive their title) deliberately placed his house (the same house in which the plaintiffs now live) close to the mill. The mill has, however, been much enlarged, by the addition of new buildings, since that time. Down to the winter of 1864-5, it was worked by hand-power; and a narrow strip of land between the northern part of it and the eastern wall of the plaintiffs' old stable remained unbuilt upon. In that winter the defendant caused this intervening space to be covered over, and erected a small steam-engine of about 4-horse power in the chamber so formed, connecting this engine by proper gearing with the machinery in the mill, which from that time forward was worked by steam. The plaintiffs made no complaint of any annoyance till the summer of 1870; and they were in the habit of keeping three or more horses or ponies in the old stable, till the end of Oct. in that year. I consider it to be admitted upon the plaintiffs' pleadings, and established by their evidence, that there was no nuisance from noise or vibration, either to the house, or to the garden, or to the stables, prior to the end of May, or the beginning of June 1870. But the plaintiffs allege that the defendant's mill then began to be worked with such a degree of noise as to become after that time a serious nuisance; that they remonstrated, and received promises of redress; but that nothing was effectually done to remedy the evil; and that in and after Oct. 1870 the noise and vibration increased daily, destroying, or materially diminishing, the comfort, salubrity, and value of their house and garden, and rendering the old stable unsafe and unfit for horses; in consequence of which their horses were removed from it at the end of Oct. or the beginning of Nov. 1870. The bill was filed on the 28th Nov. 1870. The question of trespass has emerged during the progress of the controversy, but this rests on distinct grounds, and must be separately considered. The case, thus made, is met by the defendant with a general denial of the material facts alleged. He says that no changes have been made in his engine or machinery since Jan. 1865, except some which were made in 1870 to meet (as far as possible) the plaintiffs' objections; that the manner of working them has been throughout, both in kind and in degree, the same; that there has been no increase, either of noise or vibration; that the state of things of which the plaintiffs now complain is a mere continuation of that which existed without complaint during the five preceding years, and which is admitted not to have then constituted a nuisance. In these statements he is supported by the evidence of every witness in the cause who has any knowledge of the interior working of the mill. [His Lordship then referred to the evidence.] If the defendant's evidence is believed, the plaintiffs' case fails. The burden of proof as to this part of the case rests wholly on the plaintiffs. The Scotch law has a phrase which in cases of this nature may well admit of a negative, as well as of a positive, application. It forbids a man to use his own rights "in emulationem vicini." Neighbours everywhere (and certainly in a manufacturing town) ought not to be extreme or unreasonable, either in the exercise of their own rights or in the restriction of the rights of each other. The ruling approved by the House of Lords in the St. Helen's Smelting Company's case that "the law does not regard trifling inconveniences," and that "everything is to be looked at from a reasonable point of view," and the observations of Lord Cranworth seem to be particularly applicable to such a case as the present. [His Lordship then read passages from the report, 11 H. L. Cas. 650.] There may, of course, be such a thing as a legal nuisance from noise in a manufacturing or other populous town, of which the case of Soltau v. Du Held (2 Sim. N. S. 133) is an example. But a nuisance of this kind is much more difficult to prove than when the injury complained of is the demonstrable effect of a visible or tangible cause; as when waters are fouled by sewage, or when the fumes of mineral acids pass from the chimneys of factories or other works over land or houses, producing deleterious physical changes which science can trace and explain. A nuisance by noise (supposing malice to be out of the question) is emphatically a question of degree. If my neighbour builds a house against a party wall next to my own, and I hear through the wall more than is agreeable to me of the sounds from his nursery or his music-room, it does not follow (even if I am nervously sensitive or in infirm health) that I can bring an action or obtain an injunction. Such things to offend against the law must be done in a manner which, beyond fair controversy, ought to be regarded as exceptive and unreasonable. I am far from saying that there may not be cases in which the owner of a house very near a mill in a manufacturing town may be entitled to protection against noises resulting from the introduction into the mill of new machinery, or of new modes and processes of working. But in every case of this kind it ought to be clearly made out that the mill-owner has exceeded his rights. When there has been no introduction of new machinery, and nothing new in the manner of working—when everything within the mill has gone on without change in the usual and accustomed course of the manufacturer's business—a plaintiff undertaking to prove that at and after a definitive time the noise from the mill, admitted to have been previously lawful and harmless, became excessive and noxious, imposes upon himself (to say the least) an arduous task. And how have the plaintiffs acquitted themselves of this burden? I see no reason to doubt that they, and their servants and friends who were witnesses in this case (several of whom have not been cross-examined) do themselves believe that the considerable increase of noise of which they speak has really taken place, and are persuaded that this noise is a serious nuisance. But it is not impossible that this should be the case, and yet that the witnesses for the defendants (none of whom have been cross-examined) should be believed. Those who compare the noise which they hear to-day with the noise which they heard months or years ago, are witnesses (within certain limits) to impressions upon the mind, rather than to facts. Those who speak of the manner in which the engine and machinery have been worked, and the business of the mill carried on, speak of facts, and not of impressions on the mind. Mr. Fry made a happy use in part of his argument of a passage in a recent work upon mental science (a) which (treating of the influence of the mind upon the sense of hearing) says "that the thought uppermost in the mind, the predominant idea or expectation, makes a real sensation from without assume a different character." Every one must have had some experience of the truth of this statement; a nervous, or anxious, or prepossessed listener hears sounds which would otherwise have passed unnoticed, and magnifies and exaggerates into some new significance originating within himself sounds which at other times would have been passively heard, and not regarded. In the present case, I have no doubt that a real "whirring sound," such as the plaintiffs' witnesses describe, did proceed from the machinery in the mill when at work, at all times before as well as after the erection of the steam-engine in 1864-5. I have no doubt that this sound (and also the sound of the steam-engine after its erection) was often, if not always, perceptible in the plaintiffs' garden, and in some of the rooms of their house, especially when the windows were open; I have no doubt that it was louder and more audible at some times, and when the wind was in particular quarters, than at other times, and other states of the wind. I have no doubt that it must always have been more or less heard in the old stable, where the heads of the horses, as they stood in their stalls, were turned towards the wall (described as a thin wall), on the other side of which the engine was fixed; and where there was a small window which but for its being closed by certain boards would have opened directly into the engine room itself. But all this is admitted to have gone on from Jan. 1865 to June 1870 without amounting to a nuisance. In June 1870 a sudden noise had alarmed the servants of the plaintiffs, and since that time the plaintiffs had entertained the idea of some danger from the boiler used by the defendant. From this time forth the engine and its noises were to the plaintiffs a permanent source of irritation and uneasiness. [His Lordship then examined the evidence on both sides as to the house, and as to the effect of the noise and vibration on the horses in the stable.] Witnesses for the plaintiffs have stated that on one occasion the horse of a visitor when put in the stable was so terrified that it had to be removed; but this evidence does not make a powerful impression on my mind. The case of Cooke v. Forbes (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 166) shows that it is not every occasional and accidental noise which might frighten a horse in a stable on a particular day that will entitle a plaintiff to an injunction, if the general case or habitual nuisance alleged in the bill is not satisfactorily proved. His Lordship came to the conclusion that no sufficient case was made out, and that the bill, so far as it sought relief on the ground of nuisance, must be dismissed. As to the trespass, it appeared that part of the defendant's engine-house overhung the plinth of one of the plaintiffs' walls. The defendant, however, disputed the right of the plaintiffs to the plinth, a question which he could not then determine. It was enough to dispose of that, that the defendant had been in possession for more than five years without remonstrance on the plaintiffs' part. A bill for an ejectment by way of mandatory injunction could not be supported under these circumstances, and that part of the bill must also be dismissed. His Lordship continued: There is left only one more question; that of the obstruction of the window in the plaintiffs' old stable by the boards placed against it, and also by the roof of the defendant's engine-room. As to this, I have felt some embarrassment. On the one hand, it seems to me that an unlawful obstruction by the defendant of an ancient, though not very valuable, light of the plaintiffs has been established. On the other hand, this obstruction took place nearly six years before the bill was filed, under the very eyes of the plaintiffs or their servants, who can never have gone into the stable without perceiving it; and the light does not appear to have been for any practical purpose missed or wanted since its obstruction. A bill for an injunction in such a case would (I think) before the passing of Lord Cairns' Act, have been dismissed, and the plaintiffs would have been left to their remedy at law. Since that Act, if the bill were not dismissed, I should certainly agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking the case one for an inquiry as to damages, and not for an injunction. But, finding myself obliged to leave the plaintiffs to their legal remedy (if any) as to the other matters complained of, and being of opinion that the obstruction of light is so connected with the other alleged trespass as to make it possible that some injustice might be done if damages as to the light were given here, and the plaintiffs at the same time left in possession of all their legal remedies as to the plinth of their wall and the disputed slip of land, I have come to the conclusion that the bill ought to be altogether dismissed, without prejudice to any action which the plaintiffs may be advised to bring. The costs of the suit will follow the event; the plaintiffs' appeal petition will be dismissed with costs. There will be no costs of the defendant's appeal; but the deposit will be returned.

V.C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. I. F. COOKE, T. H. CARSON, and F. GOULD, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Nov. 14, 1872.

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF FOLKESTONE v. WOODWARD.

Private Act—Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, s. 68—Public Health Act 1848, s. 2—Local Government Act 1858, s. 35—Whether "house" includes "church"—Laches of corporation in exercising their parliamentary powers.

The corporation of F. had by their private Act, with which the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 was mainly incorporated, power in case where the width of a street was less than 40*ft. to prescribe the line within which any house to be built or rebuilt should be erected, on compensating the owner if his house was set back.*

Land having been conveyed to W., the vicar of F., for building a church, he first erected a temporary wooden structure. After some years he pulled it down and began to build a permanent church still on the land conveyed.

The church so to be erected would abut upon a street averaging 32*ft. in width.*

The corporation prescribed a line within which the defendant should build, but the formal prescription was not made until some weeks after the foundations were laid.

The proposed church would at one corner abut 6*ft. beyond the prescribed line. There was no evidence to show that land could not be taken from the other side of the street if necessary, to widen it.*

Held, that a church was a house within the meaning of the Acts, and that the defendant W. was the owner to whom compensation would be paid, but that as the corporation had in the opinion of the court unreasonably exercised their strict power, and had prescribed the boundary line after the building was begun, the court would not restrain W. from continuing his building.

MOTION for injunction.

This was a motion on behalf of the Corporation of Folkestone to restrain the defendant, the Rev. Matthew Woodward, who is the perpetual curate of the parish of Folkestone, from erecting a church so as to project at one corner beyond a line prescribed by the corporation under the powers of the Folkestone Improvement Act 1855.

By the Folkestone Improvement Act 1855, with which the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, was mainly incorporated it was enacted as follows:

Sect. 50:

In every case where the width of any street shall not be 40ft., it shall be lawful for the corporation, whenever it shall appear to them expedient, to prescribe the line in which any house to be hereafter built or taken down for the purpose of being rebuilt or altered shall be erected, and the same shall be erected in accordance therewith, and the corporation shall pay or tender compensation to the owner or other person immediately interested in such house for any loss or damage he may sustain in consequence of his house being set back. . . . .

By an indenture dated the 10th July 1865, Benjamin John Andrews granted a piece of land in Folkestone, bounded on the north by the Dover-road, and on the south by St. Michael's-terrace, to the defendant and his successors perpetual curates of the parish of Folkestone for ever, for the purpose of there being erected thereon a church for the parishioners of Folkestone. Shortly after the date of this indenture, the defendant erected upon this piece of land a wooden building, which was used as a temporary church. In the month of May or June 1872, the defendant pulled down the temporary building in order to erect a permanent church, which would stand nearly on the site of the old temporary building, but a little in advance of it, though still upon the defendant's land conveyed by the indenture above mentioned.

On the 17th June 1872, it was resolved by the corporation, "that the width of the several roads upon which the proposed new church of St. Michael will abut, must be of not less width than 40ft. inclusive of the footways."

The bill stated that such resolution was forthwith brought to the notice of the defendant, but that, notwithstanding the resolution, his builders commenced putting in the foundations of the said permanent building. At this time the width of Dover-road averaged 32ft.

On the 5th Aug. 1872, the corporation prescribed the line in which any building thereafter built or taken down for the purpose of being rebuilt or altered, should be erected on the Dover-road frontage, and transmitted a copy of a plan showing the prescribed line so far as it affected the defendant's property to the defendant on the 6th Aug. 1872.

On the 21st Aug. 1872, the defendant informed the plaintiffs that he had obtained counsel's opinion that he had a right to build the proposed church in whatever position he thought fit upon his property.

The plaintiffs accordingly filed a bill on the 3rd Oct. 1872, stating the above facts, and that the proposed new building would at one corner on the north side project six feet over the prescribed building line. It also stated that the plaintiffs were and always had been willing to make compensation to the defendant for loss or damage by reason of his building being set back, and prayed an injunction to restrain him from building within the prescribed line.

The plaintiffs now moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant according to the prayer of the bill as above stated.

Ffooks, Q. C. and Ince in support of the motion, referred to section 50 of the Act above set out. The corporation have power to prescribe the line of building, and in this case they think it right to exercise the power. Dover-road is an existing street, being the old highway. The word "house," includes a church, as appears by the interpretation clause in the Public Health Act 1848. In the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, sect. 68, the words are "house or building," and sects. 109, 110, show that "houses" and "buildings" are used as synonymous terms, and that by a building a church is meant. The object of the Folkestone Improvement Act 1855 was to improve the town by widening the streets. This projection will cause inconvenience in the use of the street. Even if we give up our own Act, we have the power we contend for under the Local Government Act 1855, by virtue of the Public Health Act 1872.

Glasse, Q. C. and Bedwell, for the defendant.—The 50th section of the Folkestone Improvement Act 1847, does not apply to a church taken down to be rebuilt. If we chose to leave off building the corporation could not touch the land, as their power is to take possession on compensating the owner. There is no owner here; the defendant is not owner. Angell v. Vestry of Paddington (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 714) decides that commisioners for building a church are not owners. The definition of owner is the same in The Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, and the Public Health Act 1848. The foundations were put in in June. The line of building was not prescribed until the 5th of Aug. The resolution passed in April was not a prescription. The corporation can take a part of the land from the other side of the road, if a width of 40ft. is necessary.

Ffooks, Q. C., was called upon to reply only on the question of the laches of the corporation.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that it was not, and could not be, disputed that the corporation were a governing body, and that they had the power of prescribing the boundary line of new buildings. It had been argued for the defendant that this power did not apply in the case of a church; if that were so, then, wherever the church was erected, the corporation would have no power even if it were to be built entirely across the road. That could not be the meaning of the Acts. Although in The Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, the word house did not in terms include a church, he was of opinion he should have to hold it included under the term house in the 35th section of The Local Government Act 1855. He was of opinion that, upon the old and new Acts, a church was a building within the Acts. It had been argued that neither the defendant nor any one associated with him was an owner to whom the compensation provided for could be paid, and the case of Angell v. Vestry of Paddington had been cited in support of the argument, but that case was decided with reference to liability for taxation and did not apply to the present case. The corporation had passed a resolution on the 17th June, but it did not appear that they told the defendant at that time that they should require any of his land. They had the power of prescribing the line beyond which the building was not to extend, but he had not heard any evidence to show that they could not have a width of 40ft. for the street without taking any of this land. He thought that if the defendant was allowed to build up to the limit of his land there would still be room for a width of 40ft., as there were no buildings on the opposite side. In all cases of powers vested in a corporation, the court could not control their exercise of discretion where the powers were not fraudulently or corruptly exercised. He thought the corporation had taken an extreme view, seeing that public convenience might be met by a road of 23ft. or 24ft. in width. However, they had the power to insist on 40ft., but the ground on which he put his decision was that the corporation acting strictly must be treated strictly. The defendant was not doing any wrong in commencing his building. The parliamentary power was not exercised until the 5th Aug., when he had progressed with his building. There was no evidence that the defendant was building beyond other buildings already existing. As the corporation were exercising their power unreasonably, it was too late on the 5th Aug. for them to interfere. Motion refused with costs.

FORBES v. ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLAND.

51 Geo. 3, c. 115, s. 2—Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Grant by of waste land—Common rights—Village green—Demurrer.

The Act of 51 Geo. 3, c. 115, does not empower the lord of the manor to discharge commonable lands from common or customary rights not strictly manorial, as e.g., the right of parishoners to their village green.

THIS was a demurrer.

The bill was filed by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other the inhabitants of the parish of St. Mary Extra, Hants, in order to restrain the defendants from granting a portion of the common land belonging to the parish, for the purposes of a burial ground.

The defendants were the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who were the lords of the manor, and the vicar of the parish. The land in question was within the manor of Bitterne, and was known as Pear Tree Green; and the bill alleged that there had been, from time immemorial, a custom for all the inhabitants of the parish to enjoy the right of using the green for air, exercise, amusement, recreation, and all lawful village sports, games, and pastimes. In the year 1812 an Act (52 Geo. 3, c. 127) was passed, authorising the inclosure of lands in the parish of St. Mary Extra and the adjacent parish of Stoneham, called Bitterne Common. The Act recited that the Bishop of Winchester was lord of the manor of Bitterne; and by the 23rd section the commissioners were required to set apart one-sixteenth part of the waste lands to the Bishop of Winchester and his successors, in lieu of compensation for the waste lands. By the 25th section the commissioners were further directed to divide the residue of Bitterne Common, Weston Common, Weston Marsh, and all other waste lands between lands thereby intended to be divided, allotted, and inclosed in the parishes of Stoneham and St. Mary Extra (except Pear Tree Green, which consisted of 13a. 3r. 8p.) between the several owners and proprietors.

In 1846 a small portion of Pear Tree Green was annexed to the burial ground of Jesus Chapel, and inclosed for that purpose. In 1867 the necessity for providing more burial ground for the parish of St. Mary Extra being strongly felt by the parishioners, they appointed a committee to consider the best means of carrying out the object; and in June 1871 the committee made their report, recommending the purchase of a certain piece of ground of two and a half acres, which the owner was willing to sell for 50*l*. At a vestry meeting of the parishioners, held on the 15th of the same month to consider the matter, it appeared that a gentleman in the neighbourhood had agreed to give the 50*l*. required, and a resolution was passed that the offer should be accepted.

The resolution, however, was opposed by a few of the parishioners, who applied to the commissioners for leave to enlarge the present burial ground by a further enclosure of about an acre and three quarters of Pear Tree Green. In opposition to this application a memorial was prepared and presented to the defendants by other persons opposed to further encroachments on the green, and this was signed by the principal ratepayers and inhabitants of the parish. The commissioners at first refused to comply with the application; but ultimately the bishop having advised that a portion of Pear Tree Green should be enclosed as a burial ground, the commissioners assented.

A good deal of correspondence between the plaintiff and defendants followed on the subject, and eventually this bill was filed praying that it might be declared that the plaintiff and the other inhabitants of St. Mary Extra were entitled to the right to use the whole of the piece of ground remaining unenclosed and known as Pear Tree Green for enjoyment, exercise, amusement, recreation, and for all lawful village sports, games, and pastimes; and that the grant which the defendants, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, had made for the purpose of enclosure as aforesaid, was wholly void, and that the defendants were not entitled, nor were any of them, under the authority of the Act of 51 Geo. 3, c. 115, or otherwise, authorised to make any enclosure of any part of the said green or in any way to interfere with the said right of the plaintiff and the other inhabitants of the said parish.

That the defendants and every of them, their and every of their agents and servants might be restrained by the order and injunction of the court, from enclosing or granting, or purporting to grant, any authority to enclose any part of the said Pear Tree Green remaining unenclosed, or from in any way interfering with the enjoyment by the plaintiff and the other inhabitants of the parish of St. Mary Extra, of the rights to which they should be entitled as aforesaid.

To this bill the defendant, the vicar of the parish, demurred, for want of equity.

The defendants mainly relied on the provisions of 51 Geo. 3, c. 115.(a)

The defendants further relied on the 17th section of 52 Geo. 3, c. 127, which empowers the lord of the manor to extinguish commonable rights.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, maintained that the provisions of 51 Geo. 3, c. 115, were not intended to extend to the case of a village green so as to enable the lord of the manor to disregard and override the customary rights of recreation which might exist thereon; and he submitted that the defendants could not, under the authority of the Act (especially having regard to the subsequent Act of 52 Geo. 3, c. 127), inclose any part of the common so as to destroy or interfere with (a) Sect. 2. It shall be lawful for any person or persons bodies politic or corporate, seised of or entitled to the entire and absolute fee simple of any manor, by deed under the hand and seal, or hands and seals of any such person or persons, and under the seal or seals of any such body or bodies politic or corporate, and enrolled in the Court of Chancery in grant for the rector, vicar, or other ministers of any parish church, and his successors, any parcel or parcels of land not exceeding in the whole the quantity of five statute acres, parcel of the waste of such manor, and lying within the parish where such church or chapel shall be, or shall be intended to be erected, or within any extra parochial district, wherein any such chapel shall be, or shall be intended to be, erected for the purpose of erecting thereon, or enlarging any such church or chapel, or for a churchyard or burying ground, or enlarging a churchyard or burying ground for such parish or extra parochial place, or for a glebe for the rector, vicar, curate, or other minister of any such church or chapel to erect a mansion, house, or other buildings thereon, or make other conveniences for the residence of such rector, vicar, curate, or other minister, freed and absolutely discharged of and from all rights of common thereon, and any statute prohibiting any alienation in mortmain, or other statute, law, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided always, that no grant whatsoever shall be made of any land whatsoever for any of the purposes authorised by this Act, unless the church or chapel for the benefit whereof, or the minister whereof such grant shall be made, shall be a parochial church or chapel for the service of the United Church of England and Ireland, duly authorised by law, or a church or chapel duly consecrated for the service of such church, erected or to be erected for such purpose by and with the license and consent of the ordinary of the diocese wherein the same shall be.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The question raised by this demurrer is very simple, but at the same time very important. It is whether the commissioners, who are also lords of the manor, have power under the Act of 51 Geo. 3, c. 115, to discharge commonable lands, not only from ordinary rights, but also from customary rights, which strictly are not manorial. To hold that they have would be to put a forced construction on the Act, and as it were, by a sidewind, to sanction an invasion of the rights of the inhabitants of the parish. I am of opinion that the words of the statute are capable of receiving a perfectly satisfactory interpretation without applying to the custom claimed on behalf of the plaintiff. I must, therefore, hold that the lords of the manor have no power to destroy this custom, if it exists as alleged in the bill. The demurrer must therefore be overruled.

MOORE v. METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

False imprisonment—Implied authority to officer of a railway company to give a passenger in charge—8 Vict. c. 20, ss. 103, 104.

Plaintiff had taken a third-class return ticket from Notting Hill Gate to the Mansion House, and he was told by the station-master that, by the rules of the company, he might, if he liked, return from Moorgate-street instead of from the Mansion House. He availed himself of this privilege as far as Edgware-road, three stations short of that from which his return ticket was taken. Here upon giving up the second half of his ticket, the collector demanded 2d. extra payment. The plaintiff offered to pay under protest the sum demanded, if a receipt were given him. This was refused, and the ticket collector, acting under the advice of the station inspector, a railway official, caused the plaintiff to be taken to a police-station. Upon the facts the magistrate dismissed the charge, and in an action for false imprisonment the plaintiff was nonsuited on the ground that no evidence of express authority from the defendants to the inspector having been given, the defendants were not responsible for his mistake of law in taking the plaintiff into custody.

Held, upon a rule for a new trial, that there was evidence for a jury that the inspector was authorised by the company to exercise a discretion, which, by mistake, might include such an act as this, and the company might be liable for such a mistake.

THIS action was tried in Middlesex before Lush, J., who nonsuited the plaintiff. (See report of the case at Nisi Prius, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 951.)

The declaration stated that the defendants assaulted the plaintiff, and gave him into custody to a policeman, and compelled him to go to a police station, and be kept in prison for a long time, until he could procure bail for his appearance before a police magistrate, and thereupon compelled the plaintiff to appear the next morning before the said magistrate upon a charge by the defendants therein and theretofore made, namely, that he the said plaintiff, being a passenger on the defendants' railway, had refused, on arriving at Edgware-road Station, to deliver up his ticket and to pay his legal fare, and thereby had defranded the company of twopence. Whereby the plaintiff suffered great pain of body and mind, and was exposed and injured in his credit and circumstances, and was prevented from carrying on his business, and from providing for his family by his personal care and attention, and incurred great expense, to wit, 5*l.* for procuring the said bail as aforesaid, and otherwise in procuring his liberation and discharge from the said imprisonment.

The defendants pleaded not guilty.

It appeared that plaintiff had taken a third class return ticket from the Notting-hill-gate station to the Mansion-house, and the station master told him that by the rules of the company he might if he liked return from Moorgate-street instead of from the Mansion-house. He availed himself of this privilege as far as the Edgware-road, three stations short of that from which his return ticket was taken. Here, upon giving up the second half of his ticket, the collector demanded 2*d.* extra payment. The plaintiff offered to pay under protest the sum demanded, if a receipt were given him. This was refused, and the ticket collector, acting under the advice of the station inspector, a railway official, caused the plaintiff to be taken to a police station. The only three offences for which sects. 103 and 104 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, provide detention are, first, "If any person travel or attempt to travel in any carriage of the company, or of any other company or party using the railway, without having previously paid his fare, and with intent to avoid payment thereof:" Secondly, "if any person having paid his fare for a certain distance, knowingly and wilfully proceed in any such carriage beyond such distance, without previously paying the additional fare for the additional distance, and with intent to avoid payment thereof:" Thirdly, "if any person knowingly and wilfully refuse or neglect, on arriving at the point to which he has paid his fare, to quit such carriage." The magistrate dismissed the charge made in the name of the company against the plaintiff. The defendants argued, and the judge at the trial held, that no evidence of express authority from the defendants to the inspector having been given, the defendants were not responsible for his mistake of law in taking the plaintiff into custody.

A rule had been obtained calling upon the defendants to show cause why the nonsuit entered at the trial should not be set aside, and a new trial had on the ground of misdirection, in that the defendants were liable for the false imprisonment by their officials of the plaintiff under sects. 103, 104, 108, 109, 110, and 154 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, and upon the facts proved upon the trial.

M. Chambers, Q.C. (Serjt. Cox with him), for the plaintiff.—Here the station inspector acted in opposition to the law, and such a proceeding was not authorised by the defendants. A similar case was Poulton v. The London and South Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 534; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 11), in which the plaintiff having taken a horse to an agricultural show by the defendants' railway, was entitled, under arrangements advertised by the defendants, to take the horse back free of charge on production of a certificate. The plaintiff accordingly produced a certificate, and the horse was put into a box without payment or booking, and plaintiff having taken a ticket for himself, proceeded by the same train. At the end of the journey the station master demanded payment for the horse, and the plaintiff refusing to pay, was detained in custody by two policemen, under the orders of the station master, until it was ascertained by telegraph that all was right. An action having been brought against the defendants for false imprisonment, it was held that a railway company has power to apprehend a person travelling on the railway without having paid his own fare, but has power only to detain the goods for nonpayment of the carriage; consequently, as the defendants themselves would have had no power to detain the plaintiff on the assumption that he had wrongfully taken the horse by the train without paying, there could be no authority implied from them to the station master to detain the plaintiff on this assumption, and they were therefore not liable for this act of the station master. On this ground the court distinguished the case from Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company (3 E. & E. 672) and others mentioned in the argument. In Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company, the evidence for plaintiff showed that he, having travelled on defendants' line with a return ticket from L. to W. and back, at the end of the return journey gave up to defendant's ticket collector at the L. station the return half of another ticket which had then expired, and which he had put in his pocket by mistake for the right one. The ticket collector thereupon took him to the ticket office, where he explained the mistake. Thence the collector took him to defendants' paid inspector of police at the station, and the collector and inspector thence took him to the office, also at the station, of the superintendent of the line, who, refusing to accept plaintiff's explanation, said to the inspector, "I think you had better take him; but first you had better obtain the concurrence of the secretary." The inspector thereupon left, but returned shortly afterwards (whether or not having obtained the secretary's concurrence did not appear), when he directed a police constable, also in defendants' pay, to take plaintiff before a magistrate on the charge. The constable did so, and the magistrate, plaintiff's story proving true, dismissed the complaint. Held, in an action against the company for false imprisonment, that the conduct of all defendants' other officers, in referring to the superintendent of the line as the superior authority, was sufficient evidence to go to the jury that he was an officer having authority to act for defendants in arresting plaintiff; and that the verdict of 50*l.* found for the plaintiff should stand. There the defendants' officer made a mistake of fact in not believing the plaintiff's story, and the court considered his authority went so far as to exercise a discretion in such a matter; but here the officer acted illegally, without mistake of fact, and therefore the defendants, having given him no authority so to do, ought not to be liable. Railway companies hire their servants to do lawful acts only, and they have no implied authority to make an illegal arrest; this is the effect of Lewis Glyn appeared for the plaintiff to support the rule, but was not heard.

BLACKBURN, J.—We need not trouble counsel for the plaintiff, for when the facts are seen we find them clearly governed by the decision in Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company. My brother Lush therefore made a mistake at the trial, and should have allowed the evidence to go to the jury. The principle of Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company has never been deviated from in cases which have been since decided. "In determining whether (p. 678) there should have been a nonsuit or not, we must say, whether, assuming all that was stated to be accurate, it afforded evidence on which the jury might properly find that the imprisonment was the act of some person acting within the scope of an authority conferred on him by the defendants." The court then proceeded to apply the principles laid down by the Exchequer Chamber in Giles v. The Taff Vale Railway Company (2 E. & B. 822) concerning the evidence of authority to deal with goods, and concluded that there was in that case evidence of authority which ought to have been submitted to the jury. "By stat. 8 Vict. c. 20 ss. 103, 104, a penalty is imposed on any person travelling on a railway without having paid his fare, with intent to avoid payment thereof; and power is given to all officers and servants on behalf of the company to apprehend such person until he can conveniently be taken before a justice. In the ordinary course of affairs, the company must decide whether they will submit to what they believe to be an imposition, or use this summary power for their protection: and as, from the nature of the case, the decision whether a particular passenger shall be arrested or not must be made without delay, and as the case may be not of infrequent occurrence, we think it a reasonable inference that, in the conduct of their business, the company have on the spot officers with authority to determine, without the delay attending on convening the directors, whether the servants of the company shall or shall not, on the company's behalf, apprehend a person accused of this offence. We think that the company would have a right to blame those officers if they did not, on their behalf, apprehend a person, if it seemed a fit case; and, if so, the company must be answerable if, in the exercise of their discretion, these officers, on their behalf, apprehend an innocent person. The company ought to have a person of prudence to act in the capacity of station inspector, and, if he makes a mistake, the company ought to be responsible. Further, if a person in a responsible position is acting as if with authority from his employers to do what he is about, that is some evidence of his having been trusted with the authority he assumes." Applying these principles to the present case, the plaintiff had a ticket which entitled him to go on by a train of the defendants to the Notting Hill Gate Station. He, however, stopped three stations short at Edgware-road; if this were done with any intention to defraud the company, it would have been a plausible proceeding on the part of an agent of the company, if he determined to give the plaintiff in charge under the first head of the 103rd section; as to whether the company's agent was justified in this instance in considering the plaintiff entertained an intention to defraud, that was a question of fact within the discretion which such an agent is employed to exercise. Mr. Chambers argued that the authority conferred by the company upon its officers to give a passenger in charge under this section, existed only when the passenger actually broke the law, but in that case no action of this kind against a company could ever succeed. It is upon the ground that authority must be conferred by the company upon some officer to exercise a discretion in enforcing section 104, that the company should be liable for any improper use of that discretion. The case of Poulton v. The London and South Western Railway Company was relied upon by the defendants, but it will be found upon investigation that the decision there is not opposed to this; for there was no ground whatever for the station master's supposing he had any authority to give a passenger in charge because his goods, with which he was travelling, had not been paid for. In the present case, and also in Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company, the officer's authority included the exercise of this discretion, and I think the present case is within the decision of the court in Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company. It has been said that this is a hard case upon the company, but it would be surely harder upon the individuals who were victims, if a company could evade liability by ignoring the authority of their officers whenever those officers made a mistake. I say nothing about section 154, because I think sections 103 and 104 show that the plaintiff ought not to have been nonsuited; and I think that what was done by the station inspector was an act which the jury might infer was within the authority conferred upon him by the company.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied there was evidence in this case for a jury to find that the inspector had authority to exercise a discretion which might by mistake result in this arrest. If there were no pretence for an officer's supposing a passenger guilty of a breach of the statute, the company might not be liable for his improper proceeding; but the case of Poulton v. London and South-Western Railway Company is clearly distinguishable from the present, which, I think, is included in the principle established by Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company.

LUSH, J.—I also am of opinion that the view I took of this case at the trial was erroneous; I cannot now distinguish the facts from those of Goff v. The Great Northern Railway Company.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

SIMEY (app.) v. MARSHALL (resp.).

Equitable freehold — 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 5, sub-sect. 1—Freehold tenement—8 Hen. 6, c. 7—Hospital, younger brother of—His estate in the lands belonging to the hospital.

J. B. claimed a county vote in respect of freehold land, freehold coal mines, freehold rentcharges, or ground rent. The claimant was one of the younger brethren of a hospital, the master and ancient brethren of which were a corporation seised of freehold lands and tenements within the county. By the constitution of the hospital it was provided that there were to be a certain number of younger brethren, possessed of certain qualifications as to age, character and property, who were to be appointed by the master, and removable for certain faults by the bishop of the diocese. The lands of the hospital, the legal estate in which was in the corporation, were to be under the direction and management of the master, who was to receive and keep account of the revenues thereof, and in the first place pay thereout the land-tax, &c., and all outgoings affecting the same; and after that carry to his own account one-third of the net residue, then pay 25l. to each of the ancient brethren, and 40l. to the chaplain for his salary, and, after making these payments, was to divide the residue between the younger brethren of the hospital in equal shares, yet so, nevertheless, that no younger brother should receive more than 25l. a year. The number of the younger brethren, at the time of the claim being made, was twenty-three. The number might be raised by the authorities of the hospital, but in point of fact it never had been raised so as to reduce the share of each younger brother below 24l. per annum.

Held, that the claimant was not entitled to vote in respect of his rights as a younger brother, he having no estate, legal or equitable, in the lands belonging to the hospital; and his right to receive the annual payment, being not a free tenement, but only a right to a certain share of money in the hands of the master.

On appeal from the revising barrister for the northern division of the county of Durham, the following case was stated:—

At a court, &c., holden, &c., James Bennett was duly objected to as a voter for the said division.

The claim of the said James Bennett was in the following form:—

Bennet, James	Powell's Court, Gateshead.	Freehold land, freehold coal mines, freehold rentcharges or ground rent.	Friars Goose Farm, chemical works, and adjacent land, Clarton Farm, Cemetery Road, Clarton Quarry, and adjacent land under Friars Goose Estate leasing out of freehold land, King James street, Gateshead.

The following facts were established by the evidence:—

1. The hospital of King James in Gateshead has existed from time immemorial. Its founder is unknown, and the foundation charter has long been lost.

2. By a refoundation charter dated 4th Jan. 1610, King James the First incorporated the hospital, which then consisted of one master, and three brethren by the title of "The Hospital of King James at Gateshead."

The charter provides that the rector of Gateshead should for ever be the master of the hospital; that there should be three poor and needy men, bachelors or widowers advanced in life, sustained, maintained, and relieved in the hospital, who should be called the brethren, and should remain, be sustained, and relieved during their natural lives. The charter provides that when and so often as it should happen that any of the brethren should die or be removed from the hospital for any cause prescribed by the ordinances, provisions, and constitutions of the hospital, or in any other manner whatsoever, should be removed from the hospital, or should withdraw of his own accord, that then the master should within fourteen days nominate and place in actual possession any other fit person. The charter further provides that the Bishop of Durham and his successors should from time to time revise the ancient statutes, laws, ordinances, and constitutions of the hospital, and make such good, fit, and wholesome statutes in writing concerning the government and direction of the master and brethren as should not be contrary or repugnant to law. And by the charter, the hospital, with the garden and other lands (the greater part of which still belong to the hospital) were granted to the master and brethren and their successors, to have, hold, and enjoy the same, to the sole and proper benefit and use of the master and brethren and their successors, in free, pure, and perpetual frankalmoign for ever. It was also provided that after the death of the then master his successors should have and enjoy for their own use and benefit one full third part of the rents, revenues, and profits of all and singular the lands, tenements, and hereditaments thereby granted to the hospital, and the brethren and their successors should have and enjoy for their own use and maintenance the other two parts of such rents, revenues, and profits.

3. An Act of Parliament (which is to form part of this case) was passed in 51 Geo. 3 (1811), for enabling the master and brethren of the hospital to grant leases, and to enable the Bishop of Durham to make statutes and ordinances for the government of the hospital. This Act recited the refoundation charter, and that the master and brethren were seised of certain lands in Gateshead (which are specified in the schedule thereto) and that the Bishop of Durham was the patron of the mastership of the hospital, as annexed to the rectory of Gateshead, and that the master of the hospital had the appointment of the brethren in case of vacancy. It also recites that no statutes or ordinances of any kind were then known, and in respect that the estate of the said hospital was capable of considerable improvement, it was also expedient that statutes should be made for the government of the hospital, and that the benefits of the hospital should be extended to a greater number of poor aged men in furtherance of the benevolent intentions of the founder thereof. The Act then, after giving a power of leasing to the master and brethren, proceeds to enact that the Bishop of Durham may from time to time by writing under his hand make and establish such good, convenient, and wholesome statutes, laws, ordinances, and constitutions, as well concerning the Divine service to be performed in the hospital and the allowance to be made for the same, as touching the government and direction of the master and brethren, and providing for the repairs of the estate of the hospital, as also for increasing the number of the poor and aged brethren, and such statutes, laws, ordinances, and constitutions from time to time to revise, alter, and amend, so as the same be not contrary either to the laws of the realm or to the charter, except as to the increase of the number of the brethren. And it further enacts that all such brethren as should be from time to time added as aforesaid, should be named appointed, and admitted, and from time to time for ever be filled up in the same manner as is prescribed by the charter for naming, appointing, and admitting the three ancient brethren, and all such additional brethren should be called "the younger brethren," and should not be deemed or taken to constitute any part of the said body corporate—provided that nothing in the Act should authorise the making of any statute which should reduce or lessen the income of the then present master and three brethren from the rents and profits of the estates belonging to the hospital, but that they should during their lives receive for their shares of the future rents and profits of the estates, as much as they then actually received from such rents and profits, and that the shares of the younger brethren should always be less than the shares of the master and the three ancient brethren.

4. The schedule to this Act includes the whole of the lands which still belong to the hospital, and in respect of which the chaplain and the younger brethren claim to vote.

5. On the 17th Oct. 1811, Shute (Barrington) Bishop of Durham, made certain statutes and ordinances, under the power contained in the Act of Parliament, by which it is ordered (amongst other things) that in addition to three ancient brethren, who, together with the master, then constituted the corporate body, there should be ten younger brethren who should be entitled to the advantages after mentioned; that no person should be capable of being appointed one of the younger brethren except single men, of the age of fifty-six and upwards, not possessing more means than 20*l.* per annum, of unexceptionable life and conversstion, regular attenders of the Church of England, and frequenters of the Holy Sacrament; that the brethren should attend divine service regularly when opportunity offers, and should be sober, discreet, and regular in life and conversation; that in case of one or more of the brethren being guilty of drunkenness or any other immorality, the master should certify the same to the bishop, who should proceed, either by himself or by the Archdeacon of Durham, or by other clergymen of the diocese, to examine into the circumstances of the case, and should either remove him from the hospital or subject him to such lesser punishment as he should think fit; that the brethren should from time to time be appointed by the master; that such younger brethren as should reside within a convenient distance of the chapel, should have proper seats prepared and set apart for their accommodation, and should regularly attend divine service, except when prevented by illness or other lawful impediment admitted by the master; that for performance of Divine Service and preaching in the chapel, a chaplain should be appointed by the master with the approbation of the bishop; that the estates of the hospital should be under the direction and management of the master who should receive and keep account of the revenues thereof, and should in the first place pay thereout the land tax, tithes, repairs, and all other outgoings affecting the same, and, after that is done, the master shall carry one-third part of the net rents and revenues of the hospital estates to his own account, and should then pay 25*l.* to each of the three ancient brethren, and 40*l.* to the chaplain for his salary, and after making these payments, the master should, on the 24th Dec. in every year, divide the residue of the said net rents and revenues between the younger brethren of the hospital in equal shares and proportions, yet so nevertheless that no younger brother should take under such division more than 25*l.*, the sum directed to be paid to each of the ancient brethren.

6. On the 9th Oct. 1849, Edward (Maltby), Lord Bishop of Durham, made further statutes under the Act of Parliament, by which it was ordained (amongst other things), that to the ten younger brethren ordered to be appointed by the statute of 1811, should be added two more as soon as the funds would admit, that the master should have power from time to time to advance to the younger brethren such sums as the state of the revenues might appear to him to allow. And that he should, on or before the 25th March in each year, distribute the surplus among them, reserving a balance in his hands not exceeding 60*l.* to meet the current expenses, provided that the shares of the younger brethren should always be less than the shares of the master, and the three ancient brethren, and that the chaplain should receive for his services the annual salary of 70*l.*

7. By a statute made 8th Oct. 1867, by Charles (Baring) Bishop of Durham, four more younger brethren were added to the twelve theretofore existing, and by another statute of the same bishop, made 2nd April 1869, other six younger brethren were added. A subsequent statute of the same bishop has since added one other younger brother, the total number at the time being thus twenty-three. Copies of all the said statutes made by the said bishops of Durham are to form part of this case.

8. The claimant, James Bennett, and twenty-two other persons, viz., William Bishoprick, Robert Bone, William Clark, James Cumming, George Gladson, William Starkey Haswell, John Hetherington, James Hogg, John Hunter, William Hull, James Macannis, Hugh Moore, James Newton, George Nicholson, John Potts, William Renwick, George Stevenson, Richard Surties, Thomas Hepple Watson, John Whittle, Zachariah Williamson, and James Young have been duly appointed, and now are the younger brethren of the said hospital. There is no written form of appointment of a younger brother, such an appointment being made by the master entering his name and the date of his appointment in the roll kept by him.

9. No instance of dismissal of a brother has ever been known.

10. The number of younger brethren has never been increased so as to reduce their respective shares below 24*l.* per annum, and in fact the share of each younger brother of the net rents and revenues of the hospital estates has ever since the Act of 1811 amounted to upwards of 24*l.* per annum (which sum as well as the chaplain's stipend of 70*l.* per annum has been regularly paid to them by the master).

11. There is no hospital building at present in existence and neither the chaplain nor any of the brethren actually occupies any part of the property belonging to the hospital.

12. Upon these facts it was contended by the objector that the amount of the annual payment to the claimant could never exceed 25*l.*, and might be less if the bishop should think fit to increase the number of younger brethren; that the claimant together with the other younger brethren was not entitled to the surplus of the lands and tenements in question, or of the rents and profits thereof, after providing for the one-third share of the master, the payments to the ancient brethren and the chaplain's salary, but that after deducting the master's share, and paying the 25*l.* apiece to the three ancient brethren, the chaplain's salary, and the claimant and the other younger brethren the 25*l.*, or such lesser sum as for the time being they should be entitled to, the surplus of the rents and profits must be set aside for any additional younger brethren that might be appointed, and that, consequently, the claimant could not be considered as part owner of the said lands and tenements, or as having an estate at law or in equity therein. It was also contended that the sum payable to the claimant was not a rentcharge, both because it was of uncertain amount and liable to be varied, and because such sum was not a charge upon the said lands and tenements.

13. On the other hand, it was contended for the claimant that inasmuch as the whole surplus of the rents and profits of the lands and tenements, after deducting the master's third part and the payments to the ancient brethren and the chaplain's salary, must be divided amongst a certain class, viz., the younger brethren, of which class the claimant was one, the circumstance of the number of such class being liable to be increased, and possibly the payment to each person of that class being liable to be diminished, did not prevent the whole class, although varying in number from time to time, being equitable owners of and having an equitable estate in the said lands and tenements, that as the present amount of the payment to each younger brother was above 5*l.* a year, he was entitled as having an equitable estate for life in the said lands and tenements to be registered as a voter. Also that if not having such equitable estate in the said lands and tenements, the claimant had a rentcharge or such an interest in the nature of rentcharge thereon as to entitle him to be registered as a voter.

14. I was of opinion that inasmuch as the claimant and the other younger brethren were not necessarily entitled to the whole surplus (after paying to the ancient brethren and chaplain the sums aforesaid) of the net two-thirds of the rents and revenues of the hospital estates, but were only each entitled to receive thereout an annual payment never exceeding 25*l.* per annum, they had not an equitable estate in the said lands and tenements. I also was of opinion that the amount of the payment to the claimant not being a fixed and certain charge upon the said lands and tenements, was not a rentcharge, I therefore disallowed the claim, and struck the claimant's name out of the list of claimants.

If the court be of opinion that the claimant was entitled to be registered as a voter, either as the owner of an equitable estate in the said lands and tenements, or as being entitled to a rentcharge of the requisite amount issuing out of the same, then the claimant's name is to be restored. If entitled in respect of a rentcharge only, then the name of the hospital is to be inserted in the fourth column as owner of the said lands and tenements.

Shield for the appellant. — The appellant is entitled to the county franchise under the Act of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), sect. 5, sub-sect. 1; or, secondly, under the 8 Hen. 6, c. 7. He had an equitable estate for life in land of 5*l.* yearly value. He was only removable for certain causes, and that not by the person who appointed him. There were no hospital buildings, and this case is not like those where a claim has been made in respect of a room or rooms in a hospital. It is a claim in respect of an interest in lands, out of the profits of which the hospital is supported. The estate of the claimant is not of an eleemosynary character. Each of the younger brethren is the equitable owner of that fraction of the net surplus rents and profits which is denominated by their number. The younger brethren are tenants in common. They have an equitable estate in the whole lands of the hospital, subject to a charge in favour of the master and ancient brethren. [BRETT, J.—Can you maintain that the corporation aggregate hold the whole of the land in trust for the younger brethren?] They hold the whole in trust to pay themselves a fixed proportion and give the younger brethren the residue. [BRETT, J.—In that case have they not also an equitable estate? Manisty, Q. C. cited Steele v. Bosworth (Hop. & Phil. 106).] The distinction between that case and this is, that there there is no disposition of the surplus. The younger brethren are entitled to the whole of the surplus, provided the share of each does not exceed 25*l.* If it does exceed that sum, the number of younger brethren is increased, until the whole of the surplus can be divided between them. If the younger brethren are not entitled to the whole surplus, then and only then can they be described as having a mere right to a sum of money payable out of it. There is also this distinction, that there was something intermediate between the persons holding the legal estate and the claimants. Roberts v. Perceval (Hop. & Phil. 121) is an authority for the claimant. Secondly, the claimant is entitled under 8 Hen. 6 c. 7. The younger brethren have a legal estate in a tenement i.e., in a sum of money issuing out of land. They have a rentcharge: (Rex v. The Inhabitants of Tolpuddle, 4 T. Rep. 671.) They have a right to be paid a variable sum of money issuing out of the lands. This is a payment for which a distress is an appropriate remedy. [BRETT, J.—Can you say the claimant has a rentcharge, when the sum is fluctuating?] The sum is capable of being made certain, and that is sufficient. You may also describe their interest as an annuity charged on the land. This point was not raised in Steele v. Bosworth. [BOVILL, C.J.—Can you call a money payment to be made out of certain surplus rents, if there is any surplus, a tenement?] He cited also

Reg. v. Westbrook, 10 Q. B. 178;
Robinson v. Ainge, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 644; H. & C. 198;
Ashmore v. Lees, 1 Lutw. 367; 2 C. B. 21.

Manisty, Q. C. (Crompton with him) for the respondent, was not called upon.

BOVILL, C.J.—By the constitution of this hospital the legal estate in the lands belonging to the hospital, was in the corporation, and the direction and management of them was vested in the master, who, according to the fifth paragraph of the case, was to receive and keep account of the revenues thereof, and in the first place pay, &c. [His Lordship here read the remainder of the fifth paragraph.] Upon the terms of that constitution, it appears to me that the younger brethren were entitled only to an equitable right to a share of money which might form a surplus, after the portion allotted to the master, the ancient brethren, and the chaplain, had been paid. I think the facts are even stronger than they were in Steele v. Bosworth, against the vote. It is difficult to make out what description of estate or interest any of the younger brethren had in land, and Mr. Shield has been unable to define it. It is difficult to say in the case of the ancient brethren, and still more so in the case of the younger brethren. The latter are entitled to an interest in certain money but not to an interest in land. If that is so, it is clear that, under the constitution of the hospital, they have neither a legal nor an equitable estate in land, or in any rent, or in anything in the nature of rent issuing out of land. I think the case is governed by Steele v. Bosworth, that the revising barrister was quite right, and that his decision must be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. Numerous cases have arisen on the sort of question raised here, and the question has always been whether the claimant could make out that he had an equitable interest with respect to any portion of the proceeds of real estate, fixing it to any portion of the estate legal or equitable. In the present instance, there is a total absence of any defined portion either of the estate or of the proceeds thereof. The first payments were to be made by the master to himself, the ancient brethren, and the chaplain, and, after these were made, the surplus was to be divided among the younger brethren so as the share of one should not exceed £25 per annum. I do not think we could say, without overruling Steele v. Bosworth, that this was a qualification. The two cases are very similar as to their facts. The same remark applies here as there, as to the surplus not being disposed of; as, if in the present case a surplus remained after paying the younger brethren £25 each, the master would retain it in his hands. In Steele v. Bosworth it was decided that the claimant was not entitled to an equitable interest in land, but only to a money payment. The same remark applies here. The claimant had nothing more, so that Steele v. Bosworth is a direct authority against him. It is said that the claimant's interest is a rentcharge issuing out of land. But it is a fluctuating sum. Supposing the claimant wanted to distrain for his money, what would he distrain for? He has not a rentcharge, and his claim fails on this ground also. The claimant has nothing more than the claimant in Steele v. Bosworth had, viz., an equitable right to a money payment.

BRETT, J.—The claimant in this case claims a county vote in respect of a freehold interest in land, and he is bound to show that he has such a freehold interest of either a legal or an equitable nature. It is not pretended that he has any legal estate; we then question remains whether he has any estate in equity. He must show that he has an equitable interest either in the whole estates of the hospital as tenant in common with other persons, or else in some specific portion of them capable of separation from the rest. Can it now be said that the claimant is equitable tenant in common of the whole lands of the hospital? If he is, the corporation has no beneficial interest at all. Is he equitable tenant in common with the master? If he is, the master can have no interest at all. Has he an equitable interest as tenant in common in any specific land? Mr. Shield is obliged to say that whatever interest he has is in the whole of the lands, and that the interest of the master is a charge upon his interest. It is impossible to maintain that. If, then, the claimant has an equitable interest at all in this land, what is it? I am sure I cannot say. The claimant is not entitled to any money payment which can be said to issue out of any specific part of the land. He is entitled to a share in certain money after certain sums have been paid, and even then he is not entitled to the whole surplus absolutely, as if the surplus amounts to such a sum that his share would exceed 25*l.*, he still would not get more than that sum, but the excess would remain in the hands of the master. Under these circumstances, I think Steele v. Bosworth is a direct authority against the claim. Then it is said that the claimant has a free tenement, so as to be entitled under 8 Hen. 6, c. 7. When Mr. Shield is asked to define it, he says it is rentcharge. I may remark first, that if the claimant is entitled only to a money payment out of money in the hands of another, it does not issue out of land at all secondly, the amount to which the claimant is entitled is a fluctuating sum, and so no distress could be levied for it, and so the statute which gives a distress as a remedy in all cases of rentcharge shows that this is not a rentcharge. The claimant, therefore, has neither a legal nor an equitable estate in the land, nor has he a free tenement so as to entitle him to a vote.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Decision affirmed.
